Britain's spectators shall their strength combine
To mend our morals, and our taste refine,
Fight virtue's cause, stand up in wit's defence,
Win us from vice, and laugh us into sense.
Nor, Prior, hast thou hush'd the trump in vain,
Thy lyre shall now revive her mirthful strain,

New tales shall now be told; if right I see,
 The soul of Chaucer is restor'd in thee.
 Garth, in majestic numbers, to the stars
 Shall raise mock heroes, and fantastic wars;
 Like the young spreading laurel, Pope, thy name
 Shoots up with strength, and rises into fame;
 With Philips shall the peaceful vallies ring,
 And Britain hear a second Spenser sing. [fine,
 That much-lov'd youth, whom Utrecht's wall con-
 To Bristol's praises shall his Strafford's join:
 He too, from whom attentive Oxford draws
 Rules for just thinking, and poetic laws,
 To growing bards his learned aid shall lend,
 The strictest critic, and the kindest friend.
 Ev'n mine, a bashful muse, whose rude essays
 Scarce hope for pardon, not aspire to praise,
 Cherish'd by you in time may grow to fame,
 And mine survive with Bristol's glorious name.

Fir'd with the views this glittering scene displays,
 And smit with passion for my country's praise,
 My artless reed attempts this lofty theme,
 Where sacred Isis rolls her ancient stream;
 In cloister'd domes the great Philippa's pride,
 Where learning blooms, while fame and worth preside,
 Where the fifth Henry arts and arms was taught,
 And Edward form'd his Cressy, yet unfought,
 Where laurel'd bards have struck the warbling
 strings,
 The seat of sages, and the nurse of kings.
 Here thy commands, O Lancaster, inflame
 My eager breast to raise the British name,
 Urge on my soul, with no ignoble pride,
 To woo the muse, whom Addison enjoy'd,
 See that bold swain to heaven sublimely soar,
 Pursue at distance, and his steps adore.

TO MR. ADDISON,

ON HIS OPERA OF ROSAMOND.

"———Ne fortè pudori
 " Sit tibi musa lyræ solers, et cantor Apollo."

THE opera first Italian masters taught,
 Enrich'd with songs, but innocent of thought;
 Britannia's learned theatre disdains
 Melodious trifles, and enervate strains;
 And blushes, on her injur'd stage to see
 Nonsense well-tun'd, and sweet stupidity.

No charms are wanting to thy artful song,
 Soft as Corelli, and as Virgil strong,
 From words so sweet new grace the notes receive,
 And music borrows helps she us'd to give.
 Thy style hath match'd what ancient Romans knew,

Thy flowing numbers far excel the new.
 Their cadence in such easy sound convey'd,
 The height of thought may seem superfluous aid;
 Yet in such charms the noble thoughts abound,
 That needless seem the sweets of easy sound.

Landscips how gay the bowery grotto yields,
 Which thought creates, and lavish fancy builds!
 What art can trace the visionary scenes,
 The flowery groves, and everlasting greens,

The babbling sounds that mimic echo plays,
 The fairy shade, and its eternal maze?
 Nature and art in all their charms combin'd,
 And all Elysium to one view confin'd!
 No further could imagination roam,
 Till Vanbrugh fram'd, and Marlborough rais'd the dome.

Ten thousand pangs my anxious bosom tear,
 When drown'd in tears I see th' imploring fair;
 When bards less soft the moving words supply,
 A seeming justice dooms the nymph to die;
 But here she begs, nor can she beg in vain
 (In dirges thus expiring swans complain);
 Each verse so swells expressive of her woes,
 And every tear in lines so mournful flows;
 We, spite of fame, her fate revers'd believe,
 O'erlook her crimes, and think she ought to live.

Let joy salute fair Rosamonda's shade,
 And wreaths of myrtle crown the lovely maid.
 While now perhaps with Dido's ghost she roves,
 And hears and tells the story of their loves,
 Alike they mourn, alike they bless their fate,
 Since love, which made them wretched, makes them great.

Nor longer that relentless doom bemoan,
 Which gain'd a Virgil, and an Addison,
 Accept, great monarch of the British lays,
 The tribute song an humble subject pays.
 So tries the artless lark her early flight,
 And soars, to hail the god of verse and light.
 Unrival'd as unmatched be still thy fame,
 And thy own laurels shade thy envy'd name:
 Thy name, the boast of all the tuneful quire,
 Shall tremble on the strings of every lyre;
 While the charm'd reader with thy thought complies

Feels corresponding joys or sorrows rise,
 And views thy Rosamond with Henry's eyes.

TO THE SAME,

ON HIS TRAGEDY OF CATO.

Too long hath love engross'd Britannia's stage,
 And sunk to softness all our tragic rage:
 By that alone did empires fall or rise,
 And fate depended on a fair-one's eyes:
 The sweet infection, mix'd with dangerous art,
 Debas'd our manhood, while it sooth'd the heart.
 You scorn to raise a grief thyself must blame,
 Nor from our weakness steel a vulgar fame:
 A patriot's fall may justly melt the mind,
 And tears flow nobly, shed for all mankind.

How do our souls with generous pleasure glow?
 Our hearts exulting, while our eyes o'erflow,
 When thy firm hero stands beneath the weight
 Of all his sufferings venerably great;
 Rome's poor remains still sheltering by his side,
 With conscious virtue, and becoming pride!

The aged oak thus rears his head in air,
 His sap exhausted, and his branches bare;
 'Midst storms and earthquakes, he maintains his state,

Fixt deep in earth, and fasten'd by his weight:
 His naked boughs still lend the shepherds aid,
 And his old trunk projects an awful shade.

Amidst the joys triumphant peace bestows,
Our patriots sadden at his glorious woes;
Awhile they let the world's great business wait,
Anxious for Rome, and sigh for Cato's fate.
Here taught how ancient heroes rose to fame,
Our Britons crowd, and catch the Roman flame,
Where states and senates well might lend an ear,
And kings and priests without a blush appear.

France boasts no more, but fearful to engage,
Now first pays homage to her rival's stage,
Hastes to learn thee, and learning shall submit
Alike to British arms, and British wit:
No more she'll wonder, forc'd to do us right,
Who think like Romans, could like Romans fight.

Thy Oxford smiles this glorious work to see,
And fondly triumphs in a son like thee.
The senates, consuls, and the gods of Rome,
Like old acquaintance at their native home,
In thee we find: each deed, each word express'd,
And every thought that swell'd a Roman breast,
We trace each hint that could thy soul inspire
With Virgil's judgment, and with Lucan's fire;
We know thy worth, and, give us leave to boast,
We most admire, because we know thee most.

THE ROYAL PROGRESS.

When Brunswick first appear'd, each honest heart,
Intent on verse, disdain'd the rules of art;
For him the songsters, in unmeasur'd odes,
Debas'd Alcides, and dethron'd the gods,
In golden chains the kings of India led,
Or rent the turban from the sultan's head.
One, in old fables, and the Pagan strain,
With nymphs and tritons, wafts him o'er the main;

Another draws fierce Lucifer in arms,
And fills th' infernal region with alarms;
A third awakes some druid, to foretell
Each future triumph, from his dreary cell.
Exploded fancies! that in vain deceive,
While the mind nauseates what she can't believe.
My muse th' expected hero shall pursue
From clime to clime, and keep him still in view;
His shining march describe in faithful lays,
Content to paint him, nor presume to praise;
Their charms, if charms they have, the truth supplies,

And from the theme unlabour'd beauties rise.

By longing nations for the throne design'd,
And call'd to guard the rights of human-kind;
With secret grief his godlike soul repines,
And Britain's crown with joyless lustre shines,
While prayers and tears his destin'd progress stay,
And crowds of mourners choke their sovereign's way.

Not so he march'd, when hostile squadrons stood
In scenes of death, and fir'd his generous blood;
When his hot courser paw'd th' Hungarian plain,
And adverse legions stood the shock in vain.
His frontiers past, the Belgian bounds he views,
And cross the level fields his march pursues.
Here pleas'd the land of freedom to survey,
He greatly scorns the thirst of boundless sway.
O'er the thin soil, with silent joy, he spies
Transplanted woods, and borrow'd verdure rise

Where every meadow won with toil and blood,
From haughty tyrants and the raging flood,
With fruit and flowers the careful hind supplies,
And clothes the marshes in a rich disguise.
Such wealth for frugal hands doth heaven decree,
And such thy gift, celestial Liberty!

Through stately towns, and many a fertile plain,
The pomp advances to the neighbouring main,
Whole nations crowd around with joyful cries,
And view the hero with insatiate eyes.

In Haga's towers he waits, till eastern gales
Propitious rise to swell the British sails.
Hither the fame of England's monarch brings
The vows and friendships of the neighbouring kings;

Mature in wisdom, his extensive mind
Takes in the blended interests of mankind,
The world's great patriot. Calm thy anxious breast,
Secure in him, O Europe, take thy rest;
Henceforth thy kingdoms shall remain confin'd
By rocks or streams, the mounds which heaven design'd;

The Alps their new-made monarch shall restrain,
Nor shall thy hills, Pirene, rise in vain.

But see! to Britain's isle the squadrons stand,
And leave the sinking towers, and lessening land,
The royal bark bounds o'er the floating plain,
Breaks through the billows, and divides the main.
O'er the vast deep, great monarch, dart thine eyes,
A watery prospect bounded by the skies:
Ten thousand vessels, from ten thousand shores,
Bring gums and gold, and either India's stores:
Behold the tributes hastening to thy throne,
And see the wide horizon all thy own.

Still is it thine; though now the cheerful crew
Hail Albion's cliffs; just whitening to the view.
Before the wind with swelling sails they ride,
Till Thames receives them in his opening tide.
The monarch hears the thundering peals around,
From trembling woods and echoing hills rebound,
Nor misses yet, amid the deafening train,
The roarings of the hoarse-responding main.

As in the flood he sails, from either side
He views his kingdom in his rural pride;
A various scene the wide spread landscape yields,
O'er rich enclosures and luxuriant fields;
A lowing herd each fertile pasture fills,
And distant flocks stray o'er a thousand hills.
Fair Greenwich hid in woods with new delight,
Shade above shade, now rises to the sight;
His woods ordain'd to visit every shore,
And guard the island which they grac'd before.

The sun now rolling down the western way,
A blaze of fires renews the fading day;
Unnumber'd barks the regal barge enfold,
Brightening the twilight with its beamy gold;
Less thick the finny shoals, a countless fry,
Before the whale or kingly dolphin fly.
In one vast shout he seeks the crowded strand,
And in a peal of thunder gains the land.

Welcome, great stranger, to our longing eyes,
Oh! king desir'd, adopted Albion cries.
For thee the east breath'd out a prosperous breeze,
Bright were the suns, and gently swell'd the seas.
Thy presence did each doubtful heart compose,
And factions wonder'd that they once were foes.

That joyful day they lost each hostile name,
The same their aspect, and their voice the same.
So two fair twins, whose features were design'd
At one soft moment in the mother's mind,
Show each the other with reflected grace,
And the same beauties bloom in either face;
The puzzled stranger which is which inquire;
Delusion grateful to the smiling fire.

From that fair * hill, where hoary sages boast
To name the stars, and count the heavenly host,
By the next dawn doth great Augusta rise,
Proud town! the noblest scene beneath the skies.
O'er Thames her thousand spires their lustre shed,
And a vast navy hides his ample bed,
A floating forest. From the distant strand
A line of golden cars strikes o'er the land:
Britannia's peers in pomp and rich array,
Before their king triumphant, lead the way.
Far as the eye can reach, the gaudy train,
A bright procession, shines along the plain. [ways
So, haply, through the heaven's wide pathless
A comet draws a long extended blaze; [frame,
From east to west burns through the ethereal
And half heaven's convex glitters with the flame.

Now to the regal towers securely brought,
He plans Britannia's glories in his thought;
Resumes the delegated power he gave,
Rewards the faithful, and restores the brave.
Whom shall the muse from out the shining throng
Select, to heighten and adorn her song?
Thee, Halifax. To thy capacious mind,
O man approv'd, is Britain's wealth consign'd.
Her coin, while Nassau fought, debas'd and rude,
By thee in beauty and in truth renew'd,
An arduous work! again thy charge we see,
And thy own care once more returns to thee.
O! form'd in every scene to awe and please,
Mix wit with pomp, and dignity with ease:
Though call'd to shine aloft, thou wilt not scorn
To smile on arts thyself did once adorn:
For this thy name succeeding time shall praise,
And envy less thy garter, than thy bays.

The muse, if fir'd with thy enlivening beams,
Perhaps shall aim at more exalted themes,
Record our monarch in a nobler strain,
And sing the opening wonders of his reign;
Bright Carolina's heavenly beauties trace,
Her valiant consort, and his blooming race.
A train of kings their fruitful loves supplies,
A glorious scene to Albion's ravish'd eyes;
Who sees by Brunswick's hand her sceptre sway'd,
And through his line from age to age convey'd.

AN IMITATION OF THE PROPHECY OF NEREUS.

FROM HORACE. BOOK II. ODE XV.

"Dicam insigne, recens, adhuc

"Hebrum prospiciens, et nive candidam
"Thracen, ac pede barbaro
"Lustratam Rhodopen." HOR.

As Mar his round one morning took,
(Whom some call earl, and some call duke)

* Mr. Flamstead's house.

And his new brethren of the blade,
Shivering with fear and frost, survey'd,
On Perth's bleak hills he chanc'd to spy
An aged wizard six foot high,
With bristled hair and visage blighted,
Wall-ey'd, bare-haunch'd, and second-sighted.

The grisly sage in thought profound
Beheld the chief with back so round,
Then roll'd his eye-balls to and fro
O'er his paternal hills of snow,
And into these tremendous speeches
Broke forth the prophet without breeches.

Into what ill's betray'd, by thee,
This ancient kingdom do I see!
Her realms unpeopled and forlorn!
Wae's me! that ever thou wert born!
Proud English loons (our clans o'ercome)
On Scottish pads shall amble home;
I see them dress'd in bonnets blue
(The spoils of thy rebellious crew);
I see the target cast away,
And chequer'd plaid become their prey,
The chequer'd plaid to make a gown
For many a lass in London town.

In vain thy hungry mountaineers
Come forth in all thy warlike gears,
The shield, the pistol, durk, and dagger,
In which they daily wont to swagger,
And oft have sally'd out to pillage
The hen-roosts of some peaceful village,
Or, while their neighbours were asleep,
Have carry'd off a lowland sheep.

What boots thy high-born host of beggars,
Mac-leans, Mac-kenzies, and Mac-gregors,
With popish cut-throats, perjurd ruffians,
And Foster's troop of raggamuffins.

In vain thy lads around thee bandy,
Inflam'd with bag-pipe and with brandy,
Doth not bold Sutherland the trusty,
With heart so true, and voice so rusty,
(A loyal soul) thy troops affright,
While hoarsely he demands the fight?
Dost thou not generous Ilay dread,
The bravest hand, the wisest head?
Undaunted dost thou hear th' alarms
Of hoary Athol sheath'd in arms?

Douglas, who draws his lineage down
From Thanes and Peers of high renown,
Fiery, and young, and uncontroll'd,
With knights, and 'squires, and barons bold,
(His noble household band) advances,
And on the milk-white courser prances.
Thee Forfar to the combat dares,
Grown swarthy in Iberian wars:
And Monro, kindled into rage,
Sourly defies thee to engage;
He'll rout thy foot, though ne'er so many,
And horse to boot—if thou hadst any.

But see Argyll, with watchful eyes,
Lodg'd in his deep entrenchments lies!
Couch'd like a lion in thy way,
He waits to spring upon his prey;
While, like a herd of timorous deer,
Thy army shakes and pants with fear,
Led by their doughty general's skill,
From frith to frith, from hill to hill,

Is thus thy haughty promise paid
That to the Chevalier was made,
When thou didst oaths and duty barter,
For dukedom, generalship, and garter?
Three moons thy Jemmy shall command,
With Highland sceptre in his hand,
Too good for his pretended birth,
—Then down shall fall the king of Perth.

'Tis so decreed: for George shall reign,
And traitors be foresworn in vain.
Heaven shall for ever on him smile,
And bless him still with an Argyll.
While thou, pursued by vengeful foes,
Condemn'd to barren rocks and snows,
And hinder'd passing Inverlocky,
Shall burn the clan, and curse poor Jocky.

AN EPISTLE

From a Lady in England to a Gentleman at Avignon.

To thee, dear rover, and thy vanquish'd friends,
The health, she wants, thy gentle Chloe sends.
Though much you suffer, think I suffer more,
Worse than an exile on my native shore.
Companions in your master's flight you roam,
Unenvy'd by your haughty foes at home;
For ever near the royal outlaw's side
You share his fortunes, and his hopes divide,
On glorious schemes, and thoughts of empire dwell,
And with imaginary titles swell.

Say, for thou know'st I own his sacred line,
The passive doctrine, and the right divine,
Say, what new succours does the chief prepare?
The strength of armies? or the force of prayer?
Does he from heaven or earth his hopes derive?
From saints departed, or from priests alive?
Nor saints nor priests can Brunswick's troops withstand,

And beads drop useless through the zealot's hand;
Heaven to our vows may future kingdoms owe,
But skill and courage win the crowns below.

Ere to thy cause, and thee, my heart inclin'd,
Or love to party had seduc'd my mind,
In female joys I took a dull delight,
Slept all the morn, and punted half the night:
But now, with fears and public cares possess'd,
The church, the church, for ever breaks my rest.
The postboy on my pillow I explore,
And sift the news of every foreign shore,
Studious to find new friends, and new allies;
What armies march from Sweden in disguise;
How Spain prepares her banners to unfold,
And Rome deals out her blessings, and her gold
Then o'er the map my finger, taught to stray,
Cross many a region marks the winding way;
From sea to sea, from realm to realm I rove,
And grow a mere geographer by love:
But still Avignon, and the pleasing coast
That holds thee banish'd, claims my care the most:
Oft on the well-known spot I fix my eyes,
And span the distance that between us lies. [pair,

Let not our James, though foil'd in arms, des-
Whilst on his side he reckons half the fair:
In Britain's lovely isle a shining throng
War in his cause, a thousand beauties strong.

VOL. VIII.

Th' unthinking victors vainly boast their powers;
Be theirs the musket, while the tongue is ours.
We reason with such fluency and fire,
The beaux we baffle, and the learned tire,
Against her prelates plead the church's cause,
And from our judges vindicate the laws.
Then mourn not, hapless prince, thy kingdoms
lost;

A crown, though late, thy sacred brows may boast;
Heaven seems through us thy empire to decree;
Those who win hearts, have given their hearts to thee.

Hast thou not heard that when, profusely gay,
Our well-drest rivals grac'd their sovereign's day,
We stubborn damsels met the public view
In loathsome wormwood, and repenting rue?
What Whig but trembled, when our spotless band
In virgin roses whiten'd half the land!
Who can forget what fears the foe possess'd,
When oaken boughs mark'd every loyal breast!
Less scar'd than Medway's stream the Norman stood,

When cross the plain he spy'd a marching wood,
Till, near at hand, a gleam of swords betray'd
The youth of Kent beneath its wandering shade?

Those who the succours of the fair despise,
May find that we have nails as well as eyes.
The female bards, O prince by fortune cross'd,
At least more courage than thy men can boast:
Our sex has dar'd the mug-house chiefs to meet,
And purchas'd fame in many a well-fought street,
From Drury-Lane, the region of renown,
The land of love, the Paphos of the town,
Fair patriots sallying oft have put to flight
With all their poles the guardians of the night,
And bore, with screams of triumph, to their side
The leader's staff in all its painted pride.
Nor fears the hawker in her warbling note
To vend the discontented statesman's thought,
Though red with stripes, and recent from the thong,
Sore smitten for the love of sacred song,
The tuneful sisters still pursue their trade,
Like Philomela darkling in the shade.
Poor Trott attends, forgetful of a fare,
And hums in concert o'er his easy chair.

Mean while, regardless of the royal cause,
His sword for James no brother sovereign draws,
The Pope himself, surrounded with alarms,
To France his bulls, to Corfu sends his arms,
And though he hears his darling son's complaint,
Can hardly spare one tutelary saint,
But lifts them all to guard his own abodes,
And into ready money coins his gods.
The dauntless Swede, pursued by vengeful foes,
Scarce keeps his own hereditary snows;
Nor must the friendly roof of kind Lorrain
With feasts regale our garter'd youth again.
Safe, Bar-le-Duc, within thy silent grove
The pheasant now may perch, the hare may rove;
The knight, who aims unerring from afar,
Th' adventurous knight, now quits the sylvan war:
Thy brindled boars may slumber undisturb'd,
Or grunt secure beneath the chestnut shade.
Inconstant Orleans (still we mourn the day,
That trusted Orleans with imperial sway.)

Far o'er the Alps our helpless monarch sends,
Far from the call of his desponding friends.
Such are the terms, to gain Britannia's grace!
And such the terror of the Brunswick race!

Was it for this the sun's whole lustre fail'd,
And sudden midnight o'er the moon prevail'd!
For this did heaven display to mortal eyes
Aërial knights and combats in the skies!
Was it for this Northumbrian streams look'd red!
And Thames driv'n backward show'd his secret
False auguries! th' insulting victor's scorn! [bed!
Ev'n our own prodigies against us turn!
O portents construed on our side in vain!
Let never Tory trust eclipse again!
Run clear, ye fountains! be at peace, ye skies!
And, Thames, henceforth to thy green borders
rise!

To Rome then must the royal wanderer go,
And fall a suppliant at the papal toe?
His life in sloth inglorious must he wear,
One half in luxury, and one in prayer?
His mind perhaps at length debauch'd with ease,
The proffer'd purple and the hat may please.
Shall he, whose ancient patriarchal race
To mighty Nimrod in one line we trace,
In solemn conclave sit, devoid of thought,
And pole for points of faith his trusty vote!
Be summon'd to his stall in time of need,
And with his casting suffrage fix a creed!
Shall he in robes on stated days appear,
And English heretics curse once a year!
Garnet and Faux shall he with prayers invoke,
And beg that Smithfield piles once more may smoke!

Forbid it, heaven! my soul, to fury wrought,
Turns almost Hanoverian at the thought.

From James and Rome I feel my heart decline,
And fear, O Brunswick, 'twill be wholly thine;
Yet still his share thy rival will contest,
And still the double claim divides my breast.
The fate of James with pitying eyes I view,
And wish my homage were not Brunswick's due:
To James my passion and my weakness guide,
But reason sways me to the victor's side.
Though griev'd I speak it, let the truth appear!
You know my language, and my heart, sincere.
In vain did falsehood his fair fame disgrace;
What force had falsehood, when he show'd his face!

In vain to war our boastful clans were led;
Heaps driv'n on heaps, in the dire shock they fled:
France shuns his wrath, nor raises to our shame
A second Dunkirk in another name:
In Britain's funds their wealth all Europe throws,
And up the Thames the world's abundance flows:
Spite of feign'd fears and artificial cries,
The pious town sees fifty churches rise:
The hero triumphs as his worth is known,
And sits more firmly on his shaken throne.

To my sad thought no beam of hope appears
Through the long prospect of succeeding years.
The son, aspiring to his father's fame,
Shows all his fire: another and the same.
He, blest in lovely Carolina's arms,
To future ages propagates her charms:

With pain and joy at strife, I often trace
The mingled parents in each daughter's face;
Half sickening at the sight, too well I spy
The father's spirit through the mother's eye:
In vain new thoughts of rage I entertain,
And strive to hate their innocence in vain.

O princess! happy by thy foes confest!
Blest in thy husband! in thy children blest!
As they from thee, from them new beauties born,
While Europe lasts, shall Europe's thrones adorn.
Transplanted to each court, in times to come,
Thy smile celestial and unfading bloom,
Great Austria's sons with softer lines shall grace,
And smooth the frowns of Bourbon's haughty race.
The fair descendents of thy sacred bed,
Wide-branching o'er the western world shall spread,

Like the fam'd Banian tree, whose pliant shoot
To earthward bending of itself takes root,
Till, like their mother plant, ten thousand stand
In verdant arches on the fertile land;
Beneath her shade the tawny Indians rove,
Or hunt, at large, through the wide echoing grove.

O thou, to whom these mournful lines I send,
My promis'd husband, and my dearest friend;
Since heaven appoints this favour'd race to reign;
And blood has drench'd the Scottish fields in vain,
Must I be wretched, and thy flight partake?
Or wilt not thou, for thy lov'd Chloe's sake,
Tir'd out at length, submit to fate's decree?
If not to Brunswick, O return to me!

Prostrate before the victor's mercy bend:
What spares whole thousands, may to thee extend.
Should blinded friends thy doubtful conduct blame,
Great Brunswick's virtue shall secure thy fame:
Say these invite thee to approach his throne,
And own the monarch, heaven vouchsafes to own:
The world, convinc'd, thy reasons will approve;
Say this to them; but swear to me 'twas love.

AN ODE,

Occasioned by his Excellency the Earl of Stanhope's Voyage to France, 1718.

"Idem

"Pacis eras mediisque belli." HOR.

FAIR daughter once of Windsor's woods!
In safety o'er the rolling floods,
Britannia's boast and darling care,
Big with the fate of Europe, bear.
May winds propitious on his way
The minister of peace convey;
Nor rebel wave, nor rising storm,
Great George's liquid realms deform.

Our vows are heard. Thy crowded sails
Already swell with western gales;
Already Albion's coast retires,
And Calais multiplies her spires:
At length has royal Orleans prest,
With open arms, the well-known guest;
Before in sacred friendship join'd,
And now in counsels for mankind:

Whilst his clear schemes our patriot shows,
And plans the threaten'd world's repose,

They fix each haughty monarch's doom,
And bless whole ages yet to come.
Henceforth great Brunswick shall decree
What flag must awe the Tyrrhene sea;
From whom the Tuscan grape shall glow,
And fruitful Arethusa flow.

See in firm leagues with Thames combine
The Seine, the Maese, and distant Rhine!
Nor, Ebro, let thy single rage
With half the warring world engage.
Oh! call to mind thy thousands slain,
And Almanara's fatal plain;
While yet the Gallic terrors sleep,
Nor Britain thunders from the deep.

PROLOGUE

To the University of Oxford, 1713.

WHAT kings henceforth shall reign, what states
be free,

Is fix'd at length by Anna's just decree:
Whose brows the muse's sacred wreath shall fit,
Is left to you the arbiters of wit.

With beating hearts the rival poets wait,
Till you, Athenians, shall decide their fate;
Secure, when to these learned seats they come,
Of equal judgment, and impartial doom.

Poor is the player's fame, whose whole renown
Is but the praise of a capricious town;
While, with mock-majesty, and fancy'd power,
He struts in robes, the monarch of an hour.
Oft wide of nature must he act a part,
Make love in tropes, in bombast break his heart:
In turn and simile resign his breath,
And rhyme and quibble in the pangs of death.
We blush, when plays like these receive applause;
And laugh, in secret, at the tears we cause;
With honest scorn our own success disdain,
A worthless honour, and inglorious gain.

No trifling scenes at Oxford shall appear;
Well, what we blush to act, may you to hear,
To you our fam'd, our standard plays we bring,
The work of poets, whom you taught to sing:
Though crown'd with fame, they dare not think it due,

Nor take the laurel till bestow'd by you,
Great Cato's self the glory of the stage,
Who charms, corrects, exalts, and fires the age,
Bids here he may be try'd by Roman laws;
To you, O fathers, he submits his cause;
He rests not in the people's general voice,
Till you, the senate, have confirm'd his choice.

Fine is the secret, delicate the art,
To wind the passions, and command the heart;
For fancy'd ills to force our tears to flow,
And make the generous soul in love with woe;
To raise the shades of heroes to our view;
Rebuild fall'n empires, and old time renew.
How hard the task! how rare the godlike rage!
None should presume to dictate for the stage,
But such as boast a great extensive mind,
Enrich'd by nature, and by art refin'd; [bring,
Who from the ancient stores their knowledge
And tasted early of the muses' spring.

May none pretend upon her throne to sit,
But such as, sprung from you, are born to wit:
Chosen by the mob, their lawless claim we slight:
Yours is the old hereditary right.

THOUGHTS

*Occasioned by the sight of an Original Picture of King
Charles I. Taken at the time of his Trial.*

INSCRIBED TO GEORGE CLARKE, ESQ.

" — Animum pictura pascit inani

" Multa gemens, largoque humectat flumine
" vultum." VIRG.

CAN this be he! could Charles, the good, the
great,

Be sunk by heaven to such a dismal state!
How meagre, pale, neglected, worn with care!
What steady sadness, and august despair!
In those sunk eyes the grief of years I trace,
And sorrow seems acquainted with that face.
Tears, which his heart disdain'd, from me o'er-
flow,

Thus to survey God's substitute below,
In solemn anguish, and majestic woe.

When spoil'd of empire by unhallowed hands,
Sold by his slaves, and held in impious bands;
Rent from, what oft had sweeten'd anxious life,
His helpless children, and his bosom wife;
Doom'd for the faith, plebeian rage to stand,
And fall a victim for the guilty land;
Then thus was seen, abandon'd and forlorn,
The king, the father, and the saint to mourn.
How could'st thou, artist, then thy skill display?
Thy steady hands thy savage heart betray:
Near thy bold work the stunn'd spectators faint,
Nor see unmov'd, what thou unmov'd could'st paint.

What brings to mind each various scene of woe,
Th' insulting judge, the solemn-mocking show,
The horrid sentence, and accursed blow.

Where then, just heaven, was thy unactive hand,
Thy idle thunder, and thy lingering brand!
Thy adamant shield, thy angel wings,
And the great Genii of anointed kings!
Treason and fraud shall thus the stars regard!
And injur'd virtue meet this sad reward!
So sad, none like, can time's old records tell,
Though Pompey bled, and poor Darius fell!
All names but one too low—that one too high:
All parallels are wrongs, or blasphemy.

O power supreme! How secret are thy ways!
Yet man, vain man, would trace thy mystic maze,
With foolish wisdom, arguing, charge his God,
His balance hold, and guide his angry rod;
New-mould the spheres, and mend the sky's design,
And found th' immense with his short scanty line.
Do thou, my soul, the destin'd period wait,
When God shall solve the dark decrees of fate,
His now unequal dispensations clear,
And make all wise and beautiful appear;
When suffering saints aloft in beams shall glow,
And prosperous traitors gnash their teeth below.

Such boding thoughts did guilty conscience dart,
A pledge of hell to dying Cromwell's heart:

D d i

Then this pale image seem'd t' invade his room,
Gaz'd him to stone, and warn'd him to the tomb.
While thunders roll, and nimble lightnings play,
And the storm-wings his spotted soul away.

A blast more bounteous ne'er did heaven command

To scatter blessings o'er the British land. [Spain,
Not that more kind, which dash'd the pride of
And whirl'd her crush'd Armada round the main;
Not those more kind, which guide our floating
towers,

Waft gums and gold, and made far India ours :
'That only kinder, which to Britain's shore
Did mitres, crowns, and Stuart's race restore,
Renew'd the church, revers'd the kingdom's
doom,

And brought with Charles an Anna yet to come.

O Clarke, to whom a Stuart trusts her reign
O'er Albion's fleets, and delegates the main ;
Dear, as the faith thy loyal heart hath sworn,
Transmit this piece to ages yet unborn.

This sight shall damp the raging ruffian's breast,
The poison spill, and half-drawn sword arrest ;
To soft compassion stubborn traitors bend,
And, one destroy'd, a thousand kings defend.

A FRAGMENT OF A POEM ON HUNTING.

" Dona cano divûm, lartas venantibus artes,
" Auspicio, Diana, tuo——" GRATIUS.

Horses and hounds, their care, their various race,
The numerous beasts, that range the rural chase,
The huntsman's chosen scenes, his friendly stars,
The laws and glory of the sylvan wars,
I first in British verse presume to raise ;
A venturous rival of the Roman praise.

Let me, chaste queen of woods, thy aid obtain,
Bring here thy light-foot nymphs, and sprightly
train :

If oft, o'er lawns, thy care prevents the day
To rouse the foe, and press the bounding prey,
Woo thine own Phœbus in the task to join,
And grant me genius for the bold design.
In this soft shade, O sooth the warrior's fire,
And fit his bow-string to the trembling lyre ;
And teach, while thus their arts and arms we sing,
The groves to echo and the vales to ring.

* * * * *

Thy care be first the various gifts to trace,
The minds and genius of the latrant race.
In powers distinct the different clans excel,
In sight, or swiftness, or sagacious smell ;
By wiles ungenerous some surprise the prey,
And some by courage win the doubtful day.
See'st thou the gaze-hound ! how with glance severe

From the close herd he marks the destin'd deer !
How every nerve the greyhound's stretch displays,
The hare preventing in her airy maze ;
The luckless prey how treacherous tumblers gain,
And dauntless wolf-dogs shake the lion's mane ;
O'er all, the blood-hound boasts superior skill,
To scent, to view, to turn, and boldly kill !

His fellows' vain alarms rejects with scorn,
True to the master's voice, and learned horn.
His nostrils oft, if ancient fame sing true,
Trace the sly felon through the tainted dew ;
Once snuff'd, he follows with unalter'd aim,
Nor odours lure him from the chosen game ;
Deep-mouth'd he thunders, and inflam'd he views,
Springs on relentless, and to death pursues.

Some hounds of manners vile (nor less we find
Of fops in hounds, than in the reasoning kind)
Puff'd with conceit run gladding o'er the plain,
And from the scent divert the wiser train ;
For the foe's footsteps fondly snuff their own,
And mar the music with their senseless tone ;
Start at the starting prey, or rustling wind,
And, hot at first, inglorious lag behind.

A sauntering tribe ! may such my foes disgrace !
Give me, ye gods, to breed the nobler race.
Nor grieve thou to attend, while truths unknown
I sing, and make Athenian arts our own.

Dost thou in hounds aspire to deathless fame ?
Learn well their lineage and their ancient stem.
Each tribe with joy old rustic heralds trace,
And sing the chosen worthies of their race ;
How his sire's features in the son were spy'd,
When Die was made the vigorous Ringwood's bride,

Less sure thick lips the fate of Austria doom,
Or eagle noses rul'd almighty Rome.

Good shape to various kinds old bards confine,
Some praise the Greek, and some the Roman line ;
And dogs to beauty make as differing claims,
As Albion's nymphs, and India's jetty dames.
Immense to name their lands, to mark their bounds,
And paint the thousand families of hounds :
First count the sands, the drops where oceans
flow,

Or Gauls by Marlborough sent to shades below.
The task be mine, to teach Britannia's swains,
My much-lov'd country, and my native plains.

Such be the dog, I charge, thou mean'st to train,
His back is crooked, and his belly plain,
Of fillet stretch'd, and huge of haunch behind,
A tapering tail, that nimbly cuts the wind ;
Trufs-thigh'd, straight-ham'd, and fox-like form'd
his paw,

Large-leg'd, dry sol'd, and of protended claw.
His flat, wide nostrils snuff the savoury steam,
And from his eyes he shoots pernicious gleam ;
Middling his head, and prone to earth his view,
With ears and chest that dash the morning dew :
He best to stem the flood, to leap the bound,
And charm the Dryads with his voice profound ;
To pay large tribute to his weary lord,
And crown the sylvan hero's plenteous board.

The matron bitch whose womb shall best produce

The hopes and fortune of th' illustrious house,
Deriv'd from noble, but from foreign seed,
For various nature lothes incestuous breed,
Is like the fire throughout. Nor yet displease
Large flanks, and ribs, to give the teemer ease.

In spring let loose thy pairs. Then all things prove

The stings of pleasure, and the pangs of love ;

Æthereal Jove then glad, with genial showers,
Earth's mighty womb, and strews her lap with flowers.

Hence juices mount, and buds, embolden'd, try
More kindly breezes, and a softer sky:
Kind Venus revels. Hark! on every bough,
In lulling strains the feather'd warblers woo.
Fell tigers soften in th' infectious flames,
And lions, fawning, court their brinded dames:
Great love pervades the deep; to please his mate,
The whale, in gambols, moves his monstrous
weight,

Heav'd by his wayward mirth old ocean roars,
And scatter'd navies bulge on distant shores.

All nature smiles; come now, nor fear, my love,
To taste the odours of the woodbine grove,
To pass the evening glooms in harmless play,
And, sweetly swearing, languish life away.
An altar, bound with recent flowers, I rear
To thee, best season of the various year;
All hail! such days in beauteous order ran,
So swift, so sweet, when first the world began,
In Eden's bowers, when man's great fire assign'd
The names and natures of the brutal kind.
Then lamb and lion friendly walk'd their round,
And hares, undaunted, lick'd the fondling hound;
Wond'rous to tell! but when, with luckless hand,
Our daring mother broke the sole command,
Then want and envy brought their meagre train,
Then wrath came down, and death had leave to reign:

Hence foxes earth'd, and wolves abhor'd the day,
And hungry churls ensnar'd the nightly prey;
Rude arts at first; but witty want refin'd
The huntsman's wiles, and famine form'd the mind.

Bold Nimrod first the lion's trophies wore,
The panther bound, and lanc'd the bristling boar;
He taught to turn the hare, to bay the deer,
And wheel the courser in his mid career:
Ah, had he there restrain'd his tyrant hand!
Let me, ye powers, an humbler wreath demand.
No pomps I ask, which crowns and sceptres yield,
Nor dangerous laurels in the dusty field;
Fast by the forest, and the limpid spring,
Give me the warfare of the woods to sing,
To breed my whelps, and healthful press the game,
A mean, inglorious, but a guiltless name.

And now thy female bears in ample womb
The bane of hares, and triumphs yet to come.
No sport, I ween, nor blast of sprightly horn,
Should tempt me then to hurt the whelps unborn.

Unlock'd, in covers let her freely run,
To range thy courts, and bask before the sun;
Near thy full table let the favourite stand,
Strok'd by thy son's, or blooming daughter's hand.
Carefs, indulge, by arts the matron bribe,
T' improve her breed, and teem a vigorous tribe.

So, if small things may be compar'd with great,
And nature's works the muses imitate,
So, stretch'd in shades, and lull'd by murmuring
streams,

Great Maro's breast receiv'd the heavenly dreams.
Recluse, serene, the musing prophet lay,
Till thoughts in embryo, ripening, burst their way.

Hence bees in state, and foaming couriers come
Heroes, and gods, and walls of lofty Rome.

TO APOLLO MAKING LOVE.

FROM MONSIEUR FONTENELLE.

I AM, cry'd Apollo, when Daphne he woo'd
And panting for breath, the coy virgin pursued,
When his wisdom, in manner most ample, express'd
The long list of the graces his godship possess'd:

I'm the god of sweet song, and inspirer of lays;
Nor for lays, nor sweet song, the fair fugitive stays;
I'm the god of the harp—stop my fairest—in vain;
Nor the harp, nor the harper, could fetch her again.

Every plant, every flower, and their virtues I know,
God of light I'm above, and of physic below:
At the dreadful word physic, the nymph fled more
fast;

At the fatal word physic she doubled her haste.

Thou fond god of wisdom, then, alter thy phrase,
Bid her view the young bloom, and thy ravishing
rays, [charms,

Tell her less of thy knowledge, and more of thy
And, my life for't, the damsel will fly to thy arms.

THE FATAL CURIOSITY.

MUCH had I heard of fair Francelia's name,
The lavish praises of the babler, fame:
I thought them such, and went prepar'd to pry,
And trace the charmer, with a critic's eye.
Resolv'd to find some fault, before unspy'd,
And disappointed, if but satisfy'd.

Love pierc'd the vassal heart, that durst rebel,
And, where a judge was meant, a victim fell:
On those dear eyes, with sweet perdition gay,
I gaz'd, at once, my pride and soul away;
All o'er I felt the luscious poison run,
And, in a look, the hasty conquest won.

Thus the fond moth around the taper plays,
And sports and flutters near the treacherous blaze;
Ravish'd with joy, he wings his eager flight,
Nor dreams of ruin in so clear a light;
He tempts his fate, and courts a glorious doom,
A bright destruction, and a shining tomb.

TO A LADY;

WITH A DESCRIPTION OF THE PHOENIX.

LAVISH of wit, and bold, appear the lines,
Where Claudian's genius in the Phoenix shines;
A thousand ways each brilliant point is turn'd,
And the gay poem, like its theme, adorn'd:
A tale more strange ne'er grac'd the poet's art,
Nor e'er did fiction play so wild a part.

Each fabled charm in matchless Cælia meets,
The heavenly colours, and ambrosial sweets;
Her virgin bosom chaster fires supplies,
And beams more piercing guard her kindred eyes,
O'erflowing wit th' imagin'd wonder drew,
But fertile fancy ne'er can reach the true.

D d iij

Now buds your youth, your cheeks their bloom disclose,
Th' untainted lily, and unfolding rose;
Ease in your mien, and sweetness in your face,
You speak a syren, and you move a grace;
Nor time shall urge these beauties to decay,
While virtue gives, what years shall steal away:
The fair, whose youth can boast the worth of age,
In age shall with the charms of youth engage;
In every change still lovely, still the same,
A fairer Phoenix in a purer flame.

A DESCRIPTION OF THE PHOENIX.

FROM CLAUDIAN.

In utmost ocean lies a lovely isle,
Where spring still blooms, and greens for ever smile,
Which sees the sun put on his first array,
And hears his panting steeds bring on the day;
When, from the deep, they rush with rapid force,
And whirl aloft, to run their glorious course;
When first appear the ruddy streaks of light,
And glimmering beams dispel the parting night.
In these soft shades, unprest by human feet,
The happy phoenix keeps his balmy seat,
Far from the world disjoin'd; he reigns alone,
Alike the empire, and its king unknown.
A godlike bird! whose endless round of years
Outlasts the stars, and tires the circling spheres;
Not us'd like vulgar birds to eat his fill,
Or drink the crystal of the murmuring rill;
But fed with warmth from Titan's purer ray,
And flak'd by streams which eastern seas convey;
Still he renews his life in these abodes,
Contemns the power of fate, and mates the gods.
His fiery eyes shoot forth a glittering ray,
And round his head ten thousand glories play;
High on his crest, a star celestial bright
Divides the darkness with its piercing light;
His legs are stain'd with purple's lively dye,
His azure wings the fleeting winds outfly;
Soft plumes of cheerful blue his limbs enfold,
Enrich'd with spangles, and bedropt with gold.

Begot by none himself, begetting none,
Sire of himself he is, and of himself the son;
His life in fruitful death renews his date,
And kind destruction but prolongs his fate:
Ev'n in the grave new strength his limbs receive,
And on the funeral pile begin to live.

For when a thousand times the summer sun
His bending race has on the zodiac run,
And when as oft the vernal signs have roll'd,
As oft the wintery brought the numbing cold;
Then drops the bird, worn out with aged cares,
And bends beneath the mighty load of years.

So falls the stately pine, that proudly grew,
The shade and glory of the mountain's brow.
When pierc'd by blasts, and spouting clouds o'er-
spread,

It, slowly sinking, nods its tottering head,
Part dies by winds, and part by sickly rains,
And wasting age destroys the poor remains.

Then, as the silver empress of the night,
O'erclouded, glimmers in a fainter light,
So, froz'n with age, and shut from light supplies,
In lazy rounds scarce roll his feeble eyes,

And those fleet wings, for strength and speed re-
nown'd,

Scarce rear th' inactive lumber from the ground.

Mysterious arts a second time create
The bird, prophetic of approaching fate.
Pil'd on a heap Sabaean herbs he lays,
Parch'd by his fire the sun's intensest rays;
The pile design'd to form his funeral scene
He wraps in covers of a fragrant green,
And bids his spicy heap at once become
A grave destructive, and a teeming womb.

On the rich bed the dying wonder lies,
Imploring Phoebus with persuasive cries,
To dart upon him in collected rays,
And new-create him in a deadly blaze.

The god beholds the suppliant from afar,
And stops the progress of his heavenly car.
"O thou, says he, whom harmless fires shall burn,"
"Thy age the flame to second youth shall turn,"
"An infant's cradle is thy funeral urn."
"Thou, on whom heaven has fix'd th' ambiguous
doom

"To live by ruin, and by death to bloom,
"Thy life, thy strength, thy lovely form renew,
"And with fresh beauties doubly charm the view."

Thus speaking, 'midst the aromatic bed
A golden beam he tosses from his head;
Swift as desire, the shining ruin flies.
And straight devours the willing sacrifice,
Who hastes to perish in the fertile fire,
Sink into strength, and into life expire.

In flames the circling odours mount on high,
Perfume the air, and glitter in the sky,
The moon and stars, amaz'd, retard their flight,
And nature startles at the doubtful sight;
For, whilst the pregnant urn with fury glows,
The goddess labours with a mother's throes,
Yet joys to cherish, in the friendly flames,
The noblest product of the skill she claims.

Th' enlivening dust its head begins to rear,
And on the ashes sprouting plumes appear;
In the dead bird reviving vigour reigns,
And life returning revels in his veins:
A new-born Phoenix starting from the flame,
Obtains at once a son's, and father's name;
And the great change of double life displays,
In the short moment of one transient blaze.

On his new pinions to the Nile he bends,
And to the gods his parent urn commends,
To Egypt bearing, with majestic pride,
The balmy nest, where first he liv'd and dy'd.
Birds of all kinds admire th' unusual sight,
And grace the triumph of his infant flight;
In crowds unnumber'd round their chief they fly,
Oppress the air, and cloud the spacious sky;
Nor dares the fiercest of the winged race
Obstruct his journey through th' ethereal space;
The hawk and eagle useless wars forbear,
Forego their courage, and consent to fear;
The feather'd nations humble homage bring,
And bless the gaudy flight of their ambrosial king.

Less glittering pomp does Parthia's monarch
Commanding legions to the dusty field; [yield,
Though sparkling jewels on his helm abound,
And royal gold his awful head surround;

Though rich embroidery paint his purple vest,
And his steed bound in costly trappings drest,
Pleas'd in the battle's dreadful van to ride,
In graceful grandeur, and imperial pride.

Fam'd for the worship of the sun, there stands
A sacred fane in Egypt's fruitful lands,
Hewn from the Theban mountain's rocky womb
An hundred columns rear the marble dome;
Hither, 'tis said, he brings the precious load,
A grateful offering to the beamy god;
Upon whose altar's consecrated blaze
The seeds and relics of himself he lays,
Whence flaming incense makes the temple shine,
And the glad altars breathe perfumes divine.
The wafted smell to far Pelusian flies,
To cheer old Ocean, and enrich the skies,
With nectar's sweets to make the nations smile,
And scent the seven-fold channels of the Nile.

Thrice happy Phoenix! heaven's peculiar care
Has made thyself thyself's surviving heir;
By death thy deathless vigour is supply'd,
Which sinks to ruin all the world beside;
Thy age, not thee, assisting Phœbus burns,
And vital flames light up thy funeral urns.
Whate'er events have been, thy eyes survey,
And thou art fixt, while ages roll away;
'Thou saw'st when raging Ocean burst his bed,
O'erthrew'd the mountains, and the earth o'erspread;
When the rash youth enflam'd the high abodes,
Scorch'd up the skies, and scat'd the deathless gods.
When nature ceases, thou shalt still remain,
Nor second chaos bound thy endless reign;
Fate's tyrant laws thy happier lot shall brave,
Baffle destruction, and elude the grave.

VERSES TO MRS. LOWTHER

ON HER MARRIAGE.

From Menage.

THE greatest swain that treads th' Arcadian grove,
Our shepherds envy, and our virgins love,
His charming nymph, his foster fair obtains,
The bright Diana of our flowery plains;
He, 'midst the graceful, of superior grace,
And she the loveliest of the loveliest race.

Thy fruitful influence, guardian Juno, shed,
And crown the pleasures of the genial bed:
Raise thence, their future joy, a smiling heir,
Brave as the father, as the mother fair.
Well may'st thou shower thy choicest gifts on those,
Who boldly rival thy most hated foes;
'The vigorous bridegroom with Alcides vies,
And the fair bride has Cytherea's eyes;

TO A LADY;

WITH A PRESENT OF FLOWERS.

THE fragrant painting of our flowery fields,
The choicest stores that youthful summer yields,
Strephon to fair Eliza hath convey'd,
The sweetest garland to the sweetest maid.
O cheer the flowers, my fair, and let them rest
On the Elysium of thy snowy breast,
And there regale the smell, and charm the view,
With richer odours, and a lovelier hue.

I

Learn hence, nor fear a flatterer in the flower,
Thy form divine, and beauty's matchless power:
Faint, near thy cheeks, the bright carnation glows,
And thy ripe lips outblush the opening rose:
The lily's snow betrays less pure a light,
Lost in thy bosom's more unsullied white;
And wreathes of jasmine shed perfumes, beneath
Th' ambrosial incense of thy balmy breath.

Ten thousand beauties grace the rival pair,
How fair the chaplet, and the nymph how fair!
But ah! too soon these fleeting charms decay,
The fading lustre of one hastening day.
This night shall see the gaudy wreath decline,
The roses wither, and the lilies pine.

The garlands fate to thine shall be apply'd,
And what advance thy form, shall check thy pride:
Be wise, my fair, the present hour improve,
Let joy be now, and now a waste of love;
Each drooping bloom shall plead thy just excuse,
And that which show'd thy beauty, show its use.

ON A LADY'S PICTURE.

TO GILFRED LAWSON, ESQUIRE.

As Damon Chloe's painted form survey'd,
He sigh'd, and languish'd for the jilting shade:
For Cupid taught the artist hand its grace,
And Venus wanton'd in the mimic face.

Now he laments a look so falsely fair,
And almost damns, what yet resembles her;
Now he devours it with his longing eyes;
Now fated, from the lovely phantom flies,
Yet burns to look again, yet looks again, and dies.
Her ivory neck his lips presume to kiss,
And his bold hands the swelling bosom press:
The swain drinks in deep draughts of vain desire,
Melts without heat, and burns in fancy'd fire.

Strange power of paint! thou nice creator art!
What love inspires, may life itself impart.
Struck with like wounds, of old, Pygmalion pray'd,
And hugg'd to life his artificial maid;
Clasp, new Pygmalion, clasp the seeming charms,
Perhaps ev'n now th' enlivening image warms,
Destin'd to crown thy joys, and revel in thy arms:
Thy arms, which shall with fire so fierce invade,
That she at once shall be, and cease to be a maid.

PART OF THE FOURTH BOOK OF LUCAN.

Cæsar, having resolved to give battle to Petreius and Afranius, Pompey's lieutenants in Spain, encamped near the enemy in the same field.
The behaviour of their soldiers, at their seeing and knowing one another, is the subject of the following verses.

THEIR ancient friends, as now they nearer drew,
Prepar'd for fight the wondering soldiers knew;
Brother, with brother in unnatural strife,
And the son arm'd against the father's life:
Curst civil war then conscience first was felt,
And the tough veteran's heart began to melt.
Fix'd in dumb sorrow all at once they stand,
Then wave, a pledge of peace, the guiltless hand;

D d iiij

To vent ten thousand struggling passions move,
The stings of nature, and the pangs of love.
All order broken, wide their arms they throw,
And run, with transport, to the longing foe :
Here the long lost acquaintance neighbours claim,
There an old friend recalls his comrade's name,
Youths, who in arts beneath one tutor grew,
Rome rent in twain, and kindred hosts they view.

Tears wet their impious arms, a fond relief,
And kisses, broke by sobs, the words of grief ;
Though yet no blood was spilt, each anxious mind
With horror thinks on what his rage design'd.
Ah ! generous youths, why thus, with fruitless pain,
Beat ye those breasts ? why gush those eyes in vain ?
Why blame ye heaven, and charge your guilt on fate ?

Why dread the tyrant, whom yourselves make great ?

Bids he the trumpet sound ? the trumpet flight.

Bids he the standards move ? refuse the fight.

Your generals, left by you, will love again

A son and father, when they're private men.

Kind Concord, heavenly born ! whose blissful reign

Holds this vast globe in one surrounding chain,

Whose laws the jarring elements controul,

And knit each atom close from pole to pole ;

Soul of the world ! and love's eternal spring !

This lucky hour, thy aid fair goddess bring !

This lucky hour, ere aggravated crimes

Heap guilt on guilt, and doubly stain the times.

No veil henceforth for sin, for pardon none ;

They know their duty, now their friends are known.

Vain wish ! from blood short must the respite be,

New crimes, by love enhanc'd, this night shall see :

Such is the will of fate, and such the hard decree.

'Twas peace. From either camp, now void of fear,

The soldiers mingling cheerful feasts prepare :

On the green sod the friendly bowls were crown'd,

And hasty banquets pil'd upon the ground :

Around the fire they talk, one shows his scars,

One tells what chance first led him to the wars ;

Their stories o'er the tedious night prevail,

And the mute circle listens to the tale ;

They own they fought, but swear they ne'er could hate,

Deny their guilt, and lay the blame on fate ;

Their love revives, to make them guiltier grow,

A short-liv'd blessing, but to heighten woe.

When to Petreus first the news was told,

The jealous general thought his legions fold.

Swift with the guards, his headstrong fury drew,

From out his camp he drives the hostile crew ;

Cuts clasping friends asunder with his sword,

And stains with blood each hospitable board.

Then thus his wrath breaks out. ' Oh ! lost to fame !

' Oh ! false to Pompey, and the Roman name !

' Can ye not conquer, ye degenerate bands ?

' Oh ! die at least ; 'tis all that Rome demands.

' What ! will you own, while ye can wield the sword,

' A rebel standard, and usurping lord ?

' Shall he be sued to take you into place

' Amongst his slaves, and grant you equal grace ?

' What ? shall my life be begg'd ? inglorious thought !

' And life abhorr'd, on such conditions bought !

' The toils we bear, my friends, are not for life,

' Too mean a prize in such a dreadful strife ;

' But peace would lead to servitude and shame,

' A fair amusement, and a specious name.

' Never had man explor'd the iron ore,

' Mark'd out the trench, or rais'd the lofty tower,

' Ne'er had the steed in harness fought the plain,

' Or fleets encounter'd on th' unstable main ;

' Were life, were breath, with fame to be compar'd,

' Or peace to glorious liberty prefer'd.

' By guilty oaths the hostile army bound,

' Holds fast its impious faith, and stands its ground ;

' Are you perfidious, who espouse the laws,

' And traitors only in a righteous cause ?

' Oh shame ! in vain through nations far and wide,

' Thou call'st the crowding monarchs to thy side,

' Fall'n Pompey ! while thy legions here betray

' Thy cheap-bought life, and treat thy fame away.'

He ended fierce. The soldier's rage returns,

His blood flies upward, and his bosom burns.

So, haply tam'd, the tiger bears his bands,

Less grimly growls, and licks his keeper's hands ;

But if by chance he tastes forbidden gore,

He yells amain, and makes his dungeon roar.

He glares, he foams, he aims a desperate bound,

And his pale master flies the dangerous ground.

Now deeds are done, which man might charge aright

On stubborn fate, or undiscerning night,

Had not their guilt the lawless soldiers known,

And made the whole malignity their own.

The beds, the plenteous tables, float with gore,

And breasts are stabb'd, that were embrac'd before :

Pity a while their hands from slaughter kept.

Inward they groan'd, and, as they drew, they wept.

But every blow their wavering rage assures,

In murder hardens, and to blood inures,

Crowds charge on crowds, nor friends their friends descry,

But fires by sons, and sons by fathers die.

Black monstrous rage ! each, with victorious cries,

Drags his slain friend before the general's eyes,

Exults in guilt, that throws the only shame

On Pompey's cause, and blots the Roman name.

THE FIRST BOOK OF HOMER'S ILIAD.

THE DEDICATION.

WHEN I first entered upon this translation, I was ambitious of dedicating it to the Earl of Halifax ; but being prevented from doing myself that honour, by the unspeakable loss which our country hath sustained in the death of that extraordinary person, I hope I shall not be blamed for presuming to make a dedication of it to his memory. The greatness of his name will justify a practice altogether uncommon, and may gain favour towards a work, which (if it had deserved his patronage) is perhaps the only one inscribed to his lordship, that will escape being rewarded by him.

I might have one advantage from such a dedication, that nothing, I could say in it, would be suspected of flattery. Besides that the world would take a pleasure in hearing those things said of this great man, now he is dead, which he himself would have been offended at when living. But though I am sensible, so amiable and exalted a character would be very acceptable to the public, were I able to draw it in its full extent, I should be censured very deservedly, should I venture upon an undertaking, to which I am by no means equal.

His consummate knowledge in all kinds of business, his winning eloquence in public assemblies, his active zeal for the good of his country, and the share he had in conveying the supreme power to an illustrious family famous for being friends to mankind, are subjects easy to be enlarged upon, but incapable of being exhausted. The nature of the following performance more directly leads me to lament the misfortune, which hath befallen the learned world, by the death of so generous and universal a patron.

He rested not in a barren admiration of the polite arts, wherein he himself was so great a master; but was acted by that humanity they naturally inspire: which gave rise to many excellent writers, who have cast a light upon the age in which he lived, and will distinguish it to posterity. It is well known, that very few celebrated pieces have been published for several years, but what were either promoted by his encouragement, or supported by his approbation, or recompensed by his bounty. And if the succession of men, who excel in most of the refined arts, should not continue; though some may impute it to a decay of genius in our countrymen; those, who are unacquainted with his lordship's character, will know more justly how to account for it.

The cause of liberty will receive no small advantage in future times, when it shall be observed that the Earl of Halifax was one of the patriots who were at the head of it; and that most of those, who were eminent in the several parts of polite or useful learning, were by his influence and example engaged in the same interest.

I hope, therefore, the public will excuse my ambition for thus intruding into the number of those applauded men, who have paid him this kind of homage: especially since I am also prompted to it by gratitude, for the protection with which he had begun to honour me; and do it at a time when he cannot suffer by the importunity of my acknowledgments.

TO THE READER.

I must inform the reader, that when I began this first book, I had some thoughts of translating the whole Iliad: but had the pleasure of being diverted from that design, by finding the work was fallen into a much abler hand. I would not therefore be thought to have any other view in publishing this small specimen of Homer's Iliad, than to bespeak, if possible, the favour of the public to a translation of Homer's Odyssseys, wherein I have already made some progress.

ACHILLES' fatal wrath, whence discord rose,
That brought the sons of Greece unnumber'd woes,
O goddess, sing. Full many a hero's ghost
Was driven untimely to th' infernal coast,
While in promiscuous heaps their bodies lay,
A feast for dogs, and every bird of prey.
So did the fire of gods and men fulfil
His stedfast purpose, and almighty will;
What time the haughty chiefs their jars begun,
Atreides, king of men, and Peleus' godlike son.

What god in strife the princes did engage?
Apollo burning with vindictive rage
Against the scornful king, whose impious pride
His priest dishonour'd, and his power defy'd.
Hence swift contagion, by the god's commands,
Swept through the camp, and thinn'd the Grecian bands.

For, wealth, immense the holy Chryses bore,
(His daughter's ransom) to the tented shore:
His sceptre stretching forth, the golden rod,
Hung round with hallow'd garlands of his god,
Of all the host, of every princely chief,
But first of Atreus' sons he begg'd relief:

"Great Atreus' sons and warlike Greeks attend,
"So may th' immortal gods your cause befriend,
"So may you Priam's lofty bulwarks burn,
"And rich in gather'd spoils to Greece return,
"As for these gifts my daughter you bestow,
"And reverence due to great Apollo show,
"Jove's favourite offspring, terrible in war,
"Who sends his shafts unerring from afar."

Throughout the host consenting murmurs rise,
The priest to reverence, and give back the prize;
When the great king, incens'd, his silence broke
In words reproachful, and thus sternly spoke:

"Hence, dotard, from my sight. Nor ever more
"Approach, I warn thee, this forbidden shore;
"Lest thou stretch forth, my fury to restrain,
"The wreathes and sceptre of thy god, in vain.
"The captive maid I never will resign,
"Till age o'ertake her, I have vow'd her mine.
"To distant Argos shall the fair be led:
"She shall; to ply the loom, and grace my bed.
"Begone, ere evil intercept thy way.
"Hence on thy life: nor urge me by thy stay."

He ended frowning. Speechless and dismay'd,
The aged sire his stern command obey'd.
Silent he pass'd, amid the deafening roar
Of tumbling billows, on the lonely shore:
Far from the camp he pass'd: then suppliant stood;
And thus the hoary priest invoc'd his god:

"Dread warrior with the silver bow, give ear.
"Patron of Chrysa and of Cilla, hear.
"To thee the guard of Tenedos belongs;
"Propitious Smintheus! Oh! redress my wrongs.
"If e'er within thy fane, with wreathes adorn'd,
"The fat of bulls and well-fed goats I burn'd,
"O! hear my prayer. Let Greece thy fury know,
"And with thy shafts avenge thy servant's
"woe."

Apollo heard his injur'd suppliant's cry.
Down rush'd the vengeful warrior from the sky;
Across his breast the glittering bow he flung,
And at his back the well-stor'd quiver hung:
(His arrows rattled, as he urg'd his flight.)
In clouds he flew, conceal'd from mortal sight:
Then took his stand, the well-aim'd shaft to throw:
Fierce sprung the string, and twang'd the silver bow.

The dogs and mules his first keen arrow flew;
Amid the ranks the next more fatal flew,
A deathful dart. The funeral piles around
For ever blaz'd on the devoted ground.

Nine days entire he vex'd th' embattled host,
The tenth, Achilles through the winding coast
Summon'd a council, by the queen's command
Who wields heaven's sceptre in her snowy hand:
She mourn'd her favourite Greeks, who now enclose

The hero, swiftly speaking as he rose:

"What now, O Atreus' son, remains in view,
"But o'er the deep our wanderings to renew,
"Doom'd to destruction, while our wasted powers
"The sword and pestilence at once devours?
"Why haste we not some prophet's skill to prove,
"Or seek by dreams? for dreams descend from "Jove.)

"What moves Apollo's rage let him explain,
"What vow with-held, what hecatomb unflain:
"And if the blood of lambs and goats can pay
"The price of guilt, and turn this curse away."

Thus he. And next the reverend Calchas rose,
Their guide to Ilion whom the Grecians chose;
The prince of augurs, whose enlightened eye
Could things past, present, and to come, descry:
Such wisdom Phœbus gave. He thus began,
His speech addressing to the godlike man:

"Me then command'st thou, lov'd of Jove, to
"show

"What moves the god that bends the dreadful bow?
"First plight thy faith thy ready help to lend,
"By words to aid me, or by arms defend.
"For I foresee his rage, whose ample sway
"The Argian powers and sceptred chiefs obey.
"The wrath of kings what subject can oppose?
"Deep in their breasts the smother'd vengeance
"glows,

"Still watchful to destroy. Swear, valiant youth,
"Swear, wilt thou guard me, if I speak the truth?"

To this Achilles swift replies: "Be bold.

"Disclose, what Phœbus tells thee, uncontroul'd.
"By him, who, listening to thy powerful prayer,
"Reveals the secret, I devoutly swear,
"That, while these eyes behold the light, no hand
"Shall dare to wrong thee on this crowded strand,
"Not Atreus' son. Though now himself he boast
"The king of men, and sovereign of the host."

Then boldly he. "Nor does the god complain
"Of vows with-held, or hecatombs unflain.

"Chryseis to her awful fire refus'd,
"The gifts rejected, and the priest abus'd, [call,
"Call down these judgments, and for more they
"Just ready on th' exhausted camp to fall;
"Till ransom-free the damsel is bestow'd,
"And hecatombs are sent to soothe the god,

"To Chrysa sent. Perhaps Apollo's rage
"The gifts may expiate, and the priest assuage."
He spoke and sat. When, with an angry frown,
The chief of kings upstart from his throne.
Disdain and vengeance in his bosom rise,
Lour in his brows, and sparkle in his eyes:
Full at the priest their fiery orbs he bent,
And all at once his fury found a vent.

"Augur of ills, (for never good to me
"Did that most inauspicious voice decree)
"Forever ready to denounce my woes,
"When Greece is punish'd, I am still the cause;
"And now when Phœbus spreads his plagues a"broad,

"And wastes our camp, 'tis I provoke the god,
"Because my blooming captive I detain,
"And the large ransom is produc'd in vain.
"Fond of the maid, my queen, in beauty's pride,
"Ne'er charm'd me more, a virgin and a bride;
"Not Clytemnestra boasts a nobler race,
"A sweeter temper, or a lovelier face,
"In works of female skill hath more command,
"Or guides the needle with a nicer hand.

"Yet she shall go. The fair our peace shall buy:
"Better I suffer, than my people die.
"But mark me well. See instantly prepar'd
"A full equivalent, a new reward.

"Nor is it meet, while each enjoys his share,
"Your chief should lose his portion of the war:
"In vain your chief; whilst the dear prize I boast,
"Is wrested from me, and forever lost."

To whom the swift pursuer quick reply'd:
"O sunk in avarice, and swollen with pride!
"How shall the Greeks, though large of soul they "be,

"Collect their sever'd spoils, a heap for thee
"To search anew, and cull the choicest share,
"Amid the mighty harvest of the war?
"Then yield thy captive to the god resign'd,
"Assur'd a tenfold recompense to find,
"When Jove's decree shall throw proud Ilion
"down,

"And give to plunder the devoted town."
"Think not (Atrides answer'd) though thou
"shine,

"Graceful in beauty, like the powers divine,
"Think not, thy wiles, in specious words convey'd,
"From its firm purpose shall my soul dissuade.
"Must I alone bereft sit down with shame,
"And thou insulting keep thy captive dame?
"If, as I ask, the large-soul'd Greeks consent
"Full recompense to give, I stand content.
"If not: a prize I shall myself decree,
"From him, or him, or else perhaps from thee.
"While the proud prince, despoil'd, shall rage in "vain.

"But break we here. The rest let time explain.
"Launch now a well-trimm'd galley from the shore,
"With hands experienc'd at the bending oar:
"Enclose the hecatomb; and then with care
"To the high deck convey the captive fair.
"The sacred bark let sage Ulysses guide,
"Or Ajax, or Idomeneus, preside:
"Or thou, O mighty man, the chief shalt be.
"And who more fit to soothe the god than thee?"

" Shameless, and poor of soul," the prince replies,
 And on the monarch casts his scornful eyes,
 " What Greek henceforth will march at thy com-
 " mand,
 " In search of danger on the doubtful strand ?
 " Who in the face of day provoke the fight,
 " Or tempt the secret ambush of the night ?
 " Not I, be sure. Henceforward I am free.
 " For ne'er was Priam's house a foe to me.
 " Far from their inroads, in my pastures feed
 " The lowing heifer, and the pamper'd steed,
 " On Phthia's hills our fruits securely grow,
 " And ripen careless of the distant foe,
 " Between whose realms and our Thessalian shore
 " Unnumber'd mountains rise, and billows roar.
 " For thine, and for thy baffled brother's fame,
 " Across the seas, disdainful man, I came ;
 " Yet insolent ! by arbitrary sway,
 " Thou talk'st of seizing on my rightful prey,
 " The prize whose purchase toils and dangers cost,
 " And given by suffrage of the Grecian host.
 " What town, when sack'd by our victorious bands,
 " But still brought wealth to those rapacious hands ?
 " To me, thus scorn'd, contented, dost thou yield
 " My share of blood in the tumultuous field ;
 " But still the flower of all the spoil is thine ;
 " There claim'st thou most. Nor e'er did I repine.
 " Whate'er was giv'n I took, and thought it best,
 " With slaughter tir'd, and panting after rest.
 " To Phthia now, for I shall fight no more,
 " My ships their crooked prows shall turn from
 " shore.
 " When I am scorn'd, I think I well foresee
 " What spoils and pillage will be won by thee,
 " Hence ! (cry'd the monarch) hence ! without
 " delay : [stay.
 " Think not, vain man ! my voice shall urge thy
 " Others thou leav'st to the great cause inclin'd,
 " A league of kings thou leav'st, and Jove behind.
 " Of all the chiefs dost thou oppose me most :
 " Outrage and uproar are thy only boast.
 " Discord and jars thy joy. But learn to know,
 " If thou art strong, 'tis Jove hath made thee so.
 " Go, at thy pleasure. None will stop thy way.
 " Go, bid thy base-born Myrmidons obey.
 " Thou, nor thy rage, shall my resolves subdue ;
 " I fix my purpose, and my threats renew.
 " Since 'tis decreed I must the maid restore,
 " A ship shall waft her to th' offended power ;
 " But fair Briseis thy allotted prize,
 " Myself will seize, and seize before thy eyes :
 " That thou and each audacious man may see,
 " How vain the rash attempt to cope with me."
 Stung to the soul, tumultuous thoughts began
 This way and that to rend the godlike man.
 To force a passage with his falchion drawn,
 And hurl th' imperial boaster from his throne,
 He now resolves : and now resolves again
 To quell his fury, and his arm restrain.
 While thus by turns his rage and reason sway'd,
 And half unsheath'd he held the glittering blade ;
 That moment, Juno, whose impartial eye
 Watch'd o'er them both, sent Pallas from the sky :
 She flew, and caught his yellow hair behind,
 To him alone the radiant goddess shin'd.)

Sudden he turn'd, and started with surprise ;
 Rage and revenge flash'd dreadful in his eyes.
 Then thus with hasty words ? " O ! heavenly-
 " born,
 " Com'st thou to see proud Agamemnon's scorn ?
 " But thou shalt see (my sword shall make it good)
 " This glutted sand smoke with the tyrant's blood."
 " To soothe thy soul, the blue-ey'd maid replies,
 " (If thou obey my voice) I left the skies.
 " Heaven's queen, who favours both, gave this " command !
 " Suppress thy wrath, and stay thy vengeful hand.
 " Be all thy rage in tauntful words express'd ;
 " But guileless let the thirsty falchion rest.
 " Mark what I speak. An hour is on its way,
 " When gifts tenfold for this affront shall pay. }
 " Suppress thy wrath ; and heaven and me obey." }
 Then he : " I yield ; though with reluctant
 " mind.
 " Who yields to heaven shall heaven propitious find."
 The silver hilt close-grasping, at the word,
 Deep in the sheath he plung'd his mighty sword.
 The goddess, turning, darted from his sight,
 And reach'd Olympus in a moment's flight.
 But fierce Achilles, in a thundering tone,
 Throws out his wrath, and goes impetuous on :
 " Valiant with wine, and furious from the " bowl !
 " Thou fierce-look'd talker with a coward soul !
 " War's glorious peril ever slow to share :
 " Aloof thou view'st the field ; for death is there,
 " 'Tis greater far this peaceful camp to sway,
 " And peel the Greeks, at will, who disobey :
 " A tyrant lord o'er slaves to earth debas'd ;
 " For, had they souls, this outrage were thy last.
 " But, thou, my fix'd, my final purpose hear.
 " By this dread sceptre solemnly I swear :
 " By this (which, once from out the forest torn,
 " Nor leaf nor shade shall ever more adorn.
 " Which never more its verdure must renew,
 " Lopp'd from the vital stem, whence first it grew,
 " But given by Jove the sons of men to awe,
 " Now sways the nations, and confirms the law)
 " A day shall come, when for this hour's disdain
 " The Greeks shall wish for me, and wish in vain
 " Nor thou, though griev'd, the wanted aid af-
 " ford,
 " When heaps on heaps shall fall by Hector's sword :
 " Too late with anguish shall thy heart be torn,
 " That the first Greek was made the public scorn."
 He said. And, mounting with a furious bound,
 He dash'd his studded sceptre on the ground ;
 Then sat. Atrides, eager to reply,
 On the fierce champion glanc'd a vengeful eye.
 'Twas then, the madding monarchs to compose,
 The Pylian prince, the smooth-speech'd Nestor rose.
 His tongue dropp'd honey. Full of days was he ;
 Two ages past, he liv'd the third to see :
 And, his first race of subjects long decay'd,
 O'er their sons sons a peaceful sceptre sway'd.
 " Alas for Greece ! (he cries) and with what joy
 " Shall Priam hear, and every son of Troy !
 " That you, the first in wisdom as in wars,
 " Waste your great souls in poor ignoble jars !

" Go to! you both are young. Yet oft rever'd
 " Greater than you have the wise Nestor heard.
 " Their equals never shall these eyes behold:
 " Cæneus the just, Pirithous the bold,
 " Exadius, Dryas, born to high command,
 " Shepherds of men, and rulers of the land,
 " Theseus unrivall'd in his fire's abodes,
 " And mighty Polypheme, a match for gods.
 " They, greatest names that ancient story knows,
 " In mortal conflict met as dreadful foes:
 " Fearless through rocks and wilds their prey pur-
 " sued,
 " And the huge double Centaur race subdued.
 " With them my early youth was pleas'd to roam
 " Through regions, far from my sweet native home;
 " They call'd me to the wars. No living hand
 " Could match their valour, or their strength
 " withstand;
 " Yet wot they oft my sage advice to hear.
 " Then listen both, with an attentive ear.
 " Seize not thou, king of men, the beauteous slave,
 " Th' allotted prize the Grecian voices gave.
 " Nor thou, Pelides, in a threatening tone
 " Urge him to wrath, who fills that sacred throne.
 " The king of forty kings, and honour'd more
 " By mighty Jove than e'er was king before.
 " Brave though thou art, and of a race divine,
 " Thou must obey a power more great than thine.
 " And thou, O king, forbear. Myself will sue
 " Great Thetis' son his vengeance to subdue:
 " Great Thetis' valiant son, our country's boast,
 " The shield and bulwark of the Grecian host."
 " Wise are thy words, O sire, (the king began)
 " But what can satiate this aspiring man?
 " Unbounded power he claims o'er humankind,
 " And hopes for slaves, I trust, he ne'er shall find.
 " Shall we, because the gods have form'd him
 " strong,
 " Bear the lewd language of his lawless tongue!
 " If aw'd by thee, the Greeks might well de" spise
 " My name," the prince, precipitate, replies.
 " In vain thou nodd'st from thy imperial throne.
 " Thy vassals seek elsewhere; for I am none.
 " But break we here. The fair, though justly mine,
 " With sword undrawn I purpose to resign.
 " On aught beside, I once for all command,
 " Lay not, I charge thee, thy presumptuous hand.
 " Come not within my reach, nor dare advance,
 " Or thy heart's blood shall reek upon my lance."
 Thus both in foul debate prolong'd the day.
 The council broke, each takes his separate way.
 Achilles seeks his tent with restless mind;
 Patroclus and his train move slow behind.
 Mean time, a bark was haul'd along the sand,
 Twice ten selected Greeks, a brawny band,
 Tug the tough oars, at the great king's command.
 The gifts, the hecatomb, the captive fair,
 Are all intrusted to Ulysses' care.
 They mount the deck. The vessel takes its flight,
 Bounds o'er the surge, and lessens to the sight.
 Next he ordains along the winding coast
 By hollow'd rites to purify the host.
 A herd of chosen victims they provide,
 And cast their offals on the briny tide,

Fat bulls and goats to great Apollo die.
 In clouds the savoury steam ascend the sky.
 The Greeks to heaven their solemn vows address;
 But dire revenge roll'd in the monarch's breast.
 Obsequious at his call two heralds stand:
 To them in frowns he gives this harsh command.
 " Ye heralds, to Achilles' tent repair;
 " Thence swift the female slave Briseis bear.
 " With arms, if disobey'd, myself will come.
 " Bid him resign her, or he tempts his doom."
 The heralds, though unwillingly, obey.
 Along the sea-beat shore they speed their way:
 And, now the Myrmidonian quarter past,
 At his tent-door they find the hero plac'd.
 Disturb'd the solemn messengers he saw:
 They too stood silent, with respectful awe,
 Before the royal youth, they neither spoke.
 He guess'd their message, and the silence broke:
 " Ye ministers of gods and men, draw near,
 " Not you, but him whose heralds ye appear,
 " Robb'd of my right I blame. Patroclus, bring
 " The damsel forth for this disdainful king.
 " But ye, my wrongs, O heralds, bear in mind,
 " And clear me to the gods and all mankind,
 " Ev'n to your thoughtless king; if evermore
 " My aid be wanted on the hostile shore.
 " Thoughtless he is, nor knows his certain doom,
 " Blind to the past, nor sees the woes to come,
 " His best defence thus rashly to forego,
 " And leave a naked army to the foe."
 He ceas'd. Patroclus his dear friend obey'd,
 And usher'd in the lovely weeping maid.
 Sore sigh'd she, as the heralds took her hand,
 And oft look'd back slow-moving o'er the strand.
 The widow'd hero, when the fair was gone,
 Far from his friends sat bath'd in tears alone.
 On the cold beach he sat, and fix'd his eyes
 Where black with storms the curling billows rise,
 And as the sea wide-rolling he survey'd,
 With out-stretch'd arms to his fond mother pray'd:
 " Since to short life thy hapless son was born,
 " Great Jove stands bound by promise to adorn
 " His stinted course with an immortal name.
 " Is this the great amends? the promis'd fame?
 " The son of Atreus, proud of lawless sway,
 " Demands, possesses, and enjoys my prey."
 Near her old fire enthron'd, she heard him weep
 From the low silent caverns of the deep:
 Then in a morning mist her head she rears,
 Sits by her son, and mingles tears with tears, [cries]
 Close grasps her darling's hand. " My son (she
 " Why heaves thy heart? and why o'erflow thy
 " eyes?
 " Oh tell me, tell thy mother all thy care,
 " That both may know it, and that both may
 " share." [groan,
 " Oh! goddess! (cry'd he with an inward
 " Thou know'st it all: to thee are all things
 " known.
 " Eëtian Thebes we sack'd, their ran sack'd towers,
 " The plunder of a people, all was ours.
 " We stood agreed the booty to divide.
 " Chryseis rosy-cheek'd, and glossy-ey'd,
 " Fell to the king; but holy Chryses bore
 " Vast gifts of ransom to the tented shore:

" His sceptre stretching forth (the golden rod
 " Hung round with hallow'd garlands of his god)
 " Of all the host, of every princely chief,
 " But first of Atreus' sons he begg'd relief.
 " Throughout the host consenting murmurs ran,
 " To yield her to the venerable man;
 " But the harsh king deny'd to do him right,
 " And drove the trembling prophet from his sight.
 " Apollo heard his injur'd suppliant's cry,
 " And dealt his arrows through th' infected sky;
 " The swift contagion sent by his commands,
 " Swept through the camp, and thinn'd the Gre-
 " cian bands.
 " The guilty cause a sacred augur show'd,
 " And I first mov'd to mitigate the god.
 " At this the tyrant storm'd, and vengeance vow'd;
 " And now too soon hath made his threatnings
 " good.
 " Chryseis first with gifts to Chrysa sent,
 " His heralds came this moment to my tent,
 " And bore Breteis thence, my beauteous slave,
 " Th' allotted prize, which the leagu'd Grecians
 " gave.
 " Thou goddess, then, and thou, I know, hast
 " power,
 " For thine own son the might of Jove implore.
 " Oft in my father's house I've heard thee tell,
 " When sudden fears on heaven's great monarchs
 " fell,
 " Thy aid the rebel deities o'ercame,
 " And sav'd the mighty thunderer from shame.
 " Pallas, and Neptune, and great Juno, bound
 " The fire in chains, and hemm'd their sovereign
 " round.
 " Thy voice, O goddess, broke their idle bands,
 " And call'd the giant of the hundred hands,
 " The prodigy, whom heaven and earth revere,
 " Briareus nam'd above, Ægeon here.
 " His father Neptune he in strength surpass'd;
 " At Jove's right hand his hideous form he plac'd,
 " Proud of his might. The gods with secret dread,
 " Beheld the huge enormous shape and fled.
 " Remind him then: for well thou know'st the art:
 " Go, clasp his knees, and melt his mighty heart.
 " Let the driven Argians, hunted o'er the plain,
 " Seek the vast verge of his tempestuous main:
 " There let them perish, void of all relief,
 " My wrongs remember, and enjoy their chief.
 " Too late with anguish shall his heart be torn,
 " That the first Greek was made the public scorn."
 " Then she (with tears her azure eyes ran o'er:)
 " Why bore I thee! or nourish'd when I bore!
 " Blest, if within thy tent, and free from strife,
 " Thou might'st possess the poor remains of life,
 " Thy death approaching now the fates foreshow;
 " Short is thy destin'd term, and full of woe.
 " Ill-fated thou! and oh unhappy I!
 " But hence to the celestial courts I fly,
 " Where, hid in snow, to heaven Olympus swells,
 " And Jove, rejoicing in his thunder, dwells.
 " Mean time, my son, indulge thy just disdain:
 " Vent all thy rage, and shun the hostile plain,
 " Till Jove returns. Last night my waves he
 " cross'd,
 " And fought the distant Ethiopian coast:

" Along the skies his radiant course he steer'd,
 " Behind him all the train of gods appear'd,
 " A bright procession. To the holy feast
 " Of blameless men he goes a grateful guest.
 " To heaven he comes, when twice six days are " o'er!
 " Then shall his voice the fire of gods implore,
 " Then to my lofty mansion will I pass,
 " Founded on rocks of ever-during brass:
 " There will I clasp his knees with wonted art,
 " No doubt, my son, but I shall melt his heart."
 " She ceas'd: and left him lost in doubtful care,
 " And bent on vengeance for the ravish'd fair.
 " But, safe arriv'd near Chrysa's sacred stand,
 " The sage Ulysses now advanc'd to land.
 " Along the coast he shoots with swelling gales,
 " Then lowers the lofty mast, and furls the sails;
 " Next plies to port with many a well-tim'd oar,
 " And drops his anchors near the faithful shore.
 " The bark now fix'd amidst the rolling tide,
 " Chryseis follows her experienc'd guide:
 " The gifts to Phœbus from the Grecian host,
 " A herd of bulls went bellowing o'er the coast.
 " To the god's fane, high looking o'er the land,
 " He led, and near the altar took his stand,
 " Then gave her joyful to her father's hand.
 " All hail! Atreides sets thy daughter free,
 " Sends offerings to thy god and gifts to thee.
 " But thou entreat the power, whose dreadful
 " sway
 " Afflicts his camp, and sweeps his host away."
 " He said, and gave her. The fond father smil'd
 " With secret rapture, and embrac'd his child.
 " The victims now they range in chosen bands,
 " And offer gifts with unpolluted hands:
 " When with loud voice, and arms uprear'd in air,
 " The hoary priest preferr'd this powerful prayer:
 " Dread warrior with the silver bow, give ear:
 " Patron of Chrysa and of Cilla, hear.
 " About this domethou walk'st thy constant round:
 " Still have my vows thy power propitious found.
 " Rous'd by my prayers ev'n now thy vengeance
 " burns,
 " And smit by thee, the Grecian army mourns.
 " Hear me once more; and let the suppliant foe
 " Avert thy wrath, and slack thy dreadful bow."
 " He pray'd: and great Apollo heard his prayer.
 " The suppliants now their votive rites prepare:
 " Amidst the flames they cast the hallow'd bread,
 " And heaven-ward turn each victims destin'd head:
 " Next slay the fatted bulls, their skins divide,
 " And from each carcase rend the smoking hide,
 " On every limb large rolls of fat bestow,
 " And chosen morsels round the offering strow:
 " Mysterious rites. Then on the fire divine
 " The great high priest pours forth the ruddy wine;
 " Himself the offering burns. On either hand
 " A troop of youths, in decent order stand.
 " On sharpen'd forks, obedient to the fire,
 " They turn the tasteful fragments in the fire,
 " Adorn the feast, see every dish well stor'd,
 " And serve the plenteous messes to the board.
 " When now the various feasts had cheer'd their " souls, [bowls,
 " With sparkling wines they crown the generous

The first libations to Apollo pay,
And solemnise with sacred hymns the day :
His praise in ló Pæans loud they sing,
And soothe the rage of the far-shooting king.
At evening, through the shore dispers'd they sleep,
Hush'd by the distant roarings of the deep.

When now, ascending from the shades of night,
Aurora glow'd in all her rosy light,
The daughter of the dawn : th' awaken'd crew
Back to the Greeks encamp'd their course renew.
The breezes freshen : for with friendly gales
Apollo swell'd their wide, distended, sails :
Cleft by the rapid prow, the waves divide,
And in hoarse murmurs break on either side.
In safety to the destin'd port they pass'd,
And fix'd their bark with grappling haulsers fast ;
Then dragg'd her farther, on the dry-land coast,
Regain'd their tents, and mingled in the host.

But fierce Achilles, still on vengeance bent,
Cherish'd his wrath, and madden'd in his tent.
Th' assembled chiefs he shun'd with high disdain,
A band of kings : nor sought the hostile plain ;
But long'd to hear the distant troops engage,
The strife grow doubtful, and the battle rage.

Twelve days were past ; and now th' ethereal
train,
Jove at their head, to heaven return'd again :
When Thetis, from the deep prepar'd to rise,
Shot through a big-swoln wave, and pierc'd the skies.

At early morn she reach'd the realms above,
The court of gods, the residence of Jove.

On the top-point of high Olympus, crown'd
With hills on hills, him far apart she found,
Above the rest. The earth beneath display'd
(A boundless prospect) his broad eye survey'd.
Her left hand grasp'd his knees, her right she rear'd,
And touch'd with blandishment his awful beard ;
Then, suppliant, with submissive voice implor'd
Old Saturn's son, the god by gods ador'd :

" If e'er, by rebel deities oppress'd,
" My aid reliev'd thee, grant this one request,
" Since to short life my hapless son was born,
" Do thou with fame the scanty space adorn.
" Punish the king of men, whose lawless sway
" Hath sham'd the youth, and seiz'd his destin'd
" prey.

" Awhile let Troy prevail, that Greece may grieve,
" And doubled honours to my offspring give."

She said. The god vouchsaf'd not to reply
(A deep suspense sat in his thoughtful eye) :
Once more around his knees the goddesses clung,
And to soft accents form'd her artful tongue :
" Oh ! speak. Or grant me, or deny my prayer.
" Fear not to speak, what I am doom'd to bear ;
" That I may know, if thou my prayer deny,
" The most despis'd of all the gods am I."

With a deep sigh the thundering power replies :
" To what a height will Juno's anger rise !
" Still doth her voice before the gods upbraid
" My partial hand, that gives the Trojans aid.
" I grant thy suit. But, hence ! depart unseen,
" And shun the sight of heaven's suspicious queen.
" Believe my nod, the great, the certain sign,
" When Jove propitious hears the powers divine ;

" The sign that ratifies my high command,
" That thus I will : and what I will shall stand."

This said, his kingly brow the fire inclin'd ;
The large black curls fell awful from behind,
Thick shadowing the stern forehead of the god :
Olympus trembled at th' almighty nod,

The goddesses smil'd : and, with a sudden leap,
From the high mountain plung'd into the deep.

But Jove repair'd to his celestial towers :
And, as he rose, up-rose th' immortal powers.
In ranks, on either side, th' assembly cast,
Bow'd down, and did obeisance as he pass'd.

To him enthron'd (for whispering she had seen
Close at his knees the silver-footed queen,
Daughter of him, who, low beneath the tides,
Aged and hoary in the deep resides)
Big with invectives, Juno silence broke,
And thus, opprobrious her resentments spoke :

" False Jove ! what goddesses whispering did I
see ?

" O fond of counsels, still conceal'd from me !

" To me, neglected, thou wilt ne'er impart

" One single thought of thy close-cover'd heart."

To whom the fire of gods and men reply'd ;

" Strive not to find, what I decree to hide.

" Laborious were the search, and vain the strife,

" Vain ev'n for thee, my sister and my wife.

" The thoughts and counsels, proper to declare,

" Nor god nor mortal shall before thee share :

" But, what my secret wisdom shall ordain,

" Think not to reach, for know the thought were
" vain.

" Dread Saturn's son, why so severe ?" replies

" The goddesses of the large majestic eyes. [show ;

" Thy own dark thoughts at pleasure hide, or

" Ne'er have I ask'd, nor now aspire to know.

" Nor yet my fears are vain, nor came unseen

" To thy high throne, the silver-footed queen,

" Daughter of him, who low beneath the tides

" Aged and hoary in the deep resides.

" Thy nod assures me she was not deny'd :

" And Greece must perish for a madman's pride."

To whom the god, whose hand the tempest forms,
Drives clouds on clouds, and blackens heaven with storms, [plain ?

Thus wrathful answer'd : " Dost thou still com-

" Perplex'd for ever, and perplex'd in vain !

" Should'st thou disclose the dark event to come,

" How wilt thou stop th' irrevocable doom !

" This serves the more to sharpen my disdain ;

" And woes foreseen but lengthen out thy pain.

" Be silent then. Dispute not my command ;

" Nor tempt the force of this superior hand :

" Lest all the gods, around thee leagu'd, engage

" In vain to shield thee from my kindled rage."

Mute and abash'd she sat without reply,

And downward turn'd her large majestic eye,

Nor further durst th' offended fire provoke ;

The gods around him trembled, as he spoke,

When Vulcan, for his mother sore distress'd,

Turn'd orator, and thus his speech address'd :

" Hard is our fate, if men of mortal line

" Stir up debate among the powers divine,

" If things on earth disturb the blest abodes,

" And mar th' ambrosial banquet of the gods !

" Then let my mother once be rul'd by me,
 " Though much more wise than I pretend to be :
 " Let me advise her silent to obey,
 " And due submission to our father pay.
 " Nor force again his gloomy rage to rise,
 " Ill-tim'd, and damp the revels of the skies.
 " For should he toss her from th' Olympian hill,
 " Who could resist the mighty monarch's will ?
 " Then thou to love the thunderer reconcile,
 " And tempt him kindly on us all to smile."

He said : and in his tottering hands up-bore
 A double goblet, fill'd, and foaming o'er.

" Sit down, dear mother, with a heart content,
 " Nor urge a more disgraceful punishment,
 " Which if great Jove inflict, poor I, dismay'd,
 " Must stand aloof, nor dare to give thee aid.
 " Great Jove shall reign for ever, uncontrol'd :
 " Remember, when I took thy part of old,
 " Caught by the heel he swung me round on high,
 " And headlong hurl'd me from th' etherial sky :
 " From morn to noon I fell, from noon to night ;
 " Till pitch'd on Lemnos, a most piteous sight,
 " The Sintians hardly could my breath recal,
 " Giddy and gasping with the dreadful fall."

She smil'd : and, smiling, her white arm display'd

To reach the bowl her awkward son convey'd.
 From right to left the generous bowl he crown'd,
 And dealt the rosy nectar fairly round.
 The gods laugh'd out, unwearied, as they spy'd
 The busy skinker hop from side to side.

Thus, feasting to the full, they pass'd away,
 In blissful banquets, all the live-long day,
 Nor wanted melody. With heavenly art
 The muses sung ; each muse perform'd her part.
 Alternate warbling ; while the golden lyre,
 Touch'd by Apollo, led the vocal choir.
 The sun at length declin'd, when every guest
 Sought his bright palace, and withdrew to rest ;
 Each had his palace on th' Olympian hill,
 A masterpiece of Vulcan's matchless skill.
 Ev'n he, the god, who heaven's great sceptre sways,
 And frowns amid the lightning's dreadful blaze,
 His bed of state ascending, lay compos'd ;
 His eyes a sweet refreshing slumber clos'd :
 And at his side, all-glorious to behold,
 Was Juno lodg'd in her alcove of gold.

TO THE EARL OF WARWICK,

ON THE DEATH OF MR. ADDISON.

If, dumb too long, the drooping muse hath stay'd,
 And left her debt to Addison unpaid,
 Blame not her silence, Warwick, but bemoan,
 And judge, oh judge, my bosom by your own.
 What mourner ever felt poetic fires !
 Slow comes the verse that real woe inspires :
 Grief unaffected suits but ill with art,
 Or flowing numbers with a bleeding heart.

Can I forget the dismal night that gave
 My soul's best part for ever to the grave !
 How silent did his old companions tread,
 By midnight lamps, the mansions of the dead,
 Through breathing statues, then unheeded things,
 Through rows of warriors, and through walks of kings !

What awe did the slow solemn knell inspire ;
 The pealing organ, and the pausing choir ;
 The duties by the lawn-rob'd prelate pay'd ;
 And the last words, that dust to dust convey'd !
 While speechless o'er thy closing grave we bend,
 Accept these tears, thou dear departed friend.
 Oh, gone for ever ! take this long adieu ;
 And sleep in peace, next thy lov'd Montague.
 To strew fresh laurels, let the task be mine,
 A frequent pilgrim, at thy sacred shrine ;
 Mine with true sighs thy absence to bemoan,
 And grave with faithful epitaphs thy stone.
 If e'er from me thy lov'd memorial part,
 May shame afflict this alienated heart ;
 Of thee forgetful if I form a song,
 My lyre be broken, and untun'd my tongue,
 My grief be doubled from thy image free,
 And mirth a torment, unchastis'd by thee.

Oft let me range the gloomy aisles alone,
 Sad luxury ! to vulgar minds unknown,
 Along the walls where speaking marbles show
 What worthies form the hallow'd mould below ;
 Proud names, who once the reins of empire held ;
 In arms who triumph'd ; or in arts excell'd ;
 Chiefs, grac'd with scars, and prodigal of blood ;
 Stern patriots, who for sacred freedom stood ;
 Just men, by whom impartial laws were given ;
 And saints who taught, and led, the way to heaven ;
 Ne'er to these chambers, where the mighty rest,
 Since their foundation, came a nobler guest ;
 Nor e'er was to the bowers of bliss convey'd
 A fairer spirit or more welcome shade.

In what new region, to the just assign'd,
 What new employments please th' unbodily mind ;
 A winged virtue, through th' ethereal sky,
 From world to world unwearied does he fly ?
 Or curious trace the long laborious maze
 Of heaven's decrees, where wondering angels gaze ;
 Does he delight to hear bold seraphs tell
 How Michael battl'd, and the dragon fell ;
 Or, mix'd with milder cherubim, to glow
 In hymns of love, not ill essay'd below ?
 Or dost thou warn poor mortals left behind,
 A task well-suited to thy gentle mind ?
 Oh ! if sometimes thy spotless form descend ;
 To me thy aid, thou guardian genius, lend !
 When rage misguides me, or when fear alarms,
 When pain distresses, or when pleasure charms,
 In silent whisperings purer thoughts impart,
 And turn from ill, a frail and feeble heart ;
 Lead through the paths thy virtue trod before,
 Till bliss shall join, nor death can part us more.

That awful form, which, so the heavens decree,
 Must still be lov'd and still deplor'd by me ;
 In nightly visions seldom fails to rise,
 Or, rous'd by fancy, meets my waking eyes.
 If business calls, or crowded courts invite ;
 Th' unblemish'd statesman seems to strike my sight ;
 If in the stage I seek to soothe my care ;
 I meet his soul which breathes in Cato there ;
 If pensive to the rural shades I rove ;
 His shape o'ertakes me in the lonely grove ;
 'Twas there of just and good he reason'd strong,
 Clear'd some great truth, or rais'd some serious
 song ;

There patient shew'd us the wise course to steer,
A candid censor, and a friend severe;
There taught us how to live; and (oh! too high
The price for knowledge) taught us how to die.

Thou hill, whose brow the antique structures
 grace,
Rear'd by bold chiefs of Warwick's noble race,
Why, once so lov'd, when'er thy bower appears,
O'er my dim eye-balls glance the sudden tears!
How sweet were once thy prospects fresh and fair,
Thy sloping walks, and unpolluted air!
How sweet the glooms beneath thy aged trees,
Thy noon-tide shadow, and thy evening breeze!
His image thy forsaken bowers restore;
Thy walks and airy prospects charm no more;
No more the summer in thy glooms allay'd,
Thy evening breezes, and thy noon-day shade.

From other hills, however fortune frown'd;
Some refuge in the muse's art I found;
Reluctant now I touch the trembling string,
Bereft of him, who taught me how to sing;
And these sad accents, murmur'd o'er his urn,
Betray that absence, they attempt to mourn.
O! must I then (now fresh my bosom bleeds,
And Craggs in death to Addison succeeds)
The verse, begun to one lost friend, prolong,
And weep a second in th' unfinish'd song.

These works divine, which on his death-bed laid
To thee, O Craggs! th' expiring sage convey'd,
Great, but ill-omen'd, monument of fame,
Nor he surviv'd to give, nor thou to claim.
Swift after him thy social spirit flies,
And close to his, how soon! thy coffin lies.
Blest pair! whose union future bards shall tell
In future tongues: each other's boast! farewell,
Farewell! whom, join'd in fame, in friendship
 try'd,

No chance could sever, nor the grave divide.

COLIN AND LUCY.

A BALLAD.

OF Leinster, fam'd for maidens fair,
Bright Lucy was the grace;
Nor e'er did Liffy's limpid stream
Reflect so sweet a face:
Till luckless love, and pining care,
Impair'd her rosy hue,
Her coral lips, and damask cheeks,
And eyes of glossy blue.

Oh, have you seen a lily pale,
When beating rains descend?
So droop'd the flow-consuming maid,
Her life now near its end.

By Lucy warn'd, of flattering swains
Take heed, ye easy fair:
Of vengeance due to broken vows,
Ye perjur'd swains, beware.

Three times, all in the dead of night,
A bell was heard to ring;
And shrieking at her window thrice,
The raven flap'd his wing.
Too well the love-lorn maiden knew
The solemn boding sound:

And thus, in dying words, bespoke
The virgins weeping round:

"I hear a voice, you cannot hear;
"Which says, I must not stay;
"I see a hand, you cannot see,
"Which beckons me away.
"By a false heart, and broken vows,
"In early youth I die:
"Was I to blame, because his bride
"Was thrice as rich as I?
"Ah, Colin! give not her thy vows,
"Vows due to me alone:
"Nor thou, fond maid, receive his kiss,
"Nor think him all thy own.
"To-morrow, in the church to wed,
"Impatient, both prepare!
"But know, fond maid; and know, false man,
"That Lucy will be there!

"Then bear my corse, my comrades, bear,
"This bridegroom blithe to meet,
"He in his wedding-trim so gay,
"I in my winding sheet."
She spoke, she dy'd, her corse was borne,
The bridegroom blithe to meet,
He in his wedding trim so gay,
She in her winding-sheet.

Then what were perjur'd Colin's thoughts?
How were these nuptials kept?
The bridesmen flock'd round Lucy dead,
And all the village wept.
Confusion, shame, remorse, despair,
At once his bosom swell:
The damps of death bedew'd his brow,
He shook, he groan'd, he fell.

From the vain bride, ah, bride no more!
The varying crimson fled,
When, stretch'd before her rival's corse,
She saw her husband dead.
Then to his Lucy's new-made grave,
Convey'd by trembling swains,
One mould with her, beneath one sod,
For ever he remains.

Oft at his grave, the constant hind
And plighted maid are seen;
With garlands gay, and true-love knots,
They deck the sacred green;
But, swain forsworn, whoe'er thou art,
This hallow'd spot forbear;
Remember Colin's dreadful fate,
And fear to meet him there.

TO SIR GODFREY KNELLER,

AT HIS COUNTRY SEAT.

To Whitton's shades, and Hounslow's airy plain,
Thou, Kneller, tak'st thy summer flights in vain,
In vain thy wish gives all thy rural hours
To the fair villa, and well-order'd bowers;
To court thy pencil early at thy gates,
Ambition knocks, and fleeting beauty waits;
The boastful muse, of others fame so sure,
Implores thy aid to make her own secure;
The great, the fair, and, if aught nobler be,
Aught more belov'd, the arts solicit thee.

How canst thou hope to fly the world, in vain
From Europe sever'd by the circling main;
Sought by the kings of every distant land,
And every hero worthy of thy hand?
Hast thou forgot that mighty Bourbon fear'd
He still was mortal, till thy draught appear'd?
That Cosmo chose thy glowing form to place,
Amidst her masters of the Lombard race?
See on her Titian's and her Guido's urns,
Her falling arts forlorn Hesperia mourns;
While Britain wins each garland from her brow,
Her wit and freedom first, her painting now.

Let the faint copier, on old Tiber's shore,
Nor mean the task, each breathing bust explore,
Line after line, with painful patience trace,
This Roman grandeur, that Athenian grace;
Vain care of parts; if, impotent of soul,
Th' industrious workman fails to warm the whole,
Each theft betrays the marble whence it came,
And a cool statue stiffens in the frame.
Thee nature taught, nor art her aid deny'd,
The kindest mistress, and the surest guide,
To catch a likeness at one piercing sight,
And place the fairest in the fairest light;
Ere yet thy pencil tries her nicer toils,
Or on thy pallet lie the blended oils,
Thy careless chalk has half achiev'd thy art,
And her just image makes Cleora start.

A mind that grasps the whole is rarely found,
Half learn'd, half painters, and half wits, abound;
Few, like thy genius, at proportion aim,
All great, all graceful, and throughout the same.

Such be thy life, O since the glorious rage
That fir'd thy youth! flames unsubdued by age;
Though wealth, nor fame, now touch thy fated
mind,
Still tinge the canvas, bounteous to mankind;
Since after thee may rise an impious line,
Coarse manglers of the human face divine;
Paint on, till fate dissolve thy mortal part,
And live and die the monarch of thy art.

ON THE

DEATH OF THE EARL OF CADOGAN.

Or Marlborough's captains, and Eugenio's friends,
The last, Cadogan, to the grave descends:
Low lies each hand, whence Blenheim's glory sprung, [sung.
The chiefs who conquer'd, and the bards who
From his cold corse though every friend be fled,
Lo! envy waits, that lover of the dead;
Thus did she feign o'er Nassau's herse to mourn;
Thus wept insidious Churchill o'er thy urn;
To blast the living, gave the dead their due,
And wreaths, herself had tainted, trim'd anew.
Thou, yet unnam'd to fill his empty place,
And lead to war thy country's growing race.
Take every wish a British heart can frame,
Add palm to palm, and rise from fame to fame.

An hour must come, when thou shalt hear with rage
Thyself traduc'd, and curse a thankless age:
Nor yet for this decline the generous strife,
These ills, brave man, shall quit thee with thy life,
VOL. VIII.

Alive, though stain'd by every abject slave,
Secure of fame and justice in the grave.
Ah, no!—when once the mortal yields to fate,
The blast of fame's sweet trumpet sounds too late,
Too late to stay the spirit on its flight,
Or soothe the new inhabitant of light;
Who hears regardless, while fond man, distress'd,
Hangs on the absent, and laments the blest.

Farewell then fame, ill sought through fields
and blood,
Farewell unfaithful promiser of good:
Thou music, warbling to the deafen'd ear!
Thou incense wasted on the funeral bier!
Through life pursued in vain, by death obtain'd,
When ask'd, deny'd us, and when given, disdain'd.

AN ODE,

Inscribed to the Earl of Sunderland, at Windsor.

Thou dome, where Edward first enroll'd
His red-cross knights and barons bold,
Whose vacant seats, by virtue bought,
Ambitious emperors have fought:
Where Britain's foremost names are found,
In peace belov'd, in war renown'd,
Who made the hostile nations moan,
Or brought a blessing on their own:

Once more a son of Spenser waits,
A name familiar to thy gates;
Sprung from the chief whose prowess gain'd
The garter while thy founder reign'd,
He offer'd here his dinted shield,
The dread of Gauls in Cressi's field,
Which, in thy high-arch'd temple rais'd,
For four long centuries hath blaz'd.

These seats our fires, a hardy kind,
To the fierce sons of war confin'd,
The flower of chivalry, who drew
With sinew'd arm the stubborn yew:
Or with heav'd pole-ax clear'd the field;
Or who, in jousts and tourneys skill'd,
Before their ladies eyes renown'd,
Threw horse and horseman to the ground.

In after-times, as courts refin'd,
Our patriots in the list were join'd.
Not only Warwick stain'd with blood,
Or Marlborough near the Danube's flood,
Have in their crimson crosses glow'd;
But, on just lawgivers bestow'd,
These emblems Cecil did invest,
And gleam'd on wife Godolphin's breast.

So Greece, ere arts began to rise,
Fix'd huge Orion in the skies,
And stern Alcides, fam'd in wars,
Bespangled with a thousand stars;
Till letter'd Athens round the pole
Made gentler constellations roll;
In the blue heavens the lyre she strung,
And near the Maid the * Balance hung.

Then, Spenser, mount amid the band,
Where knights and kings promiscuous stand.

* Names of constellations.

What though the hero's flame repress'd
Burns calmly in thy generous breast!
Yet who more dauntless to oppose
In doubtful days our home-bred foes!
Who rais'd his country's wealth so high,
Or view'd with less desiring eye!

The sage who large of soul surveys
The globe, and all its empires weighs,
Watchful the various climes to guide,
Which seas, and tongues, and faiths, divide,
A nobler name in Windsor's shrine,
Shall leave, if right the muse divine,
Than sprung of old, abhor'd and vain,
From ravag'd realms, and myriads slain.

Why praise we, prodigal of fame,
The rage that sets the world on flame?
My guiltless muse his brow shall bind,
Whose godlike bounty spares mankind.
For those, whom bloody garlands crown,
The brass may breathe, the marble frown,
To him through every rescued land,
Ten thousand living trophies stand.

KENSINGTON-GARDEN.

"— Campos, ubi Troja fuit." — VIRG.

WHERE Kensington high o'er the neighbouring lands

'Midst greens and sweets, a regal fabric, stands,
And sees each spring, luxuriant in her bowers,
A snow of blossoms, and a wild of flowers,
The dames of Britain oft in crowds repair
To gravel walks, and unpolluted air.
Here, while the town in damps and darkness lies,
They breathe in sun-shine, and see azure skies;
Each walk, with robes of various dyes bespread,
Seems from afar a moving tulip-bed,
Where rich brocades and glossy damasks glow,
And chints, the rival of the showery bow.

Here England's daughter, darling of the land,
Sometimes, surrounded with her virgin band,
Gleams through the shades. She, towering o'er
the rest,

Stands fairest of the fairer kind confess'd, [ny'd,
Form'd to gain hearts, that Brunswick's cause de-
And charm a people to her father's side. [known,

Long have these groves to royal guests been
Nor Nassau first prefer'd them to a throne.
Ere Norman banners wav'd in British air;
Ere lordly Hubba with the golden hair
Pour'd in his Danes; ere elder Julius came;
Or Dardan Brutus gave our isle a name;
A prince of Albion's lineage grac'd the wood,
The scene of wars, and stain'd with lovers' blood.

You, who through gazing crowds, your captive
throng,

Throw pangs and passions, as you move along,
'Turn on the left, ye fair, your radiant eyes,
Where all unlevell'd the gay garden lies:

If generous anguish for another's pains [veins,
Ere heav'd your hearts, or shiver'd through your
Look down attentive on the pleasing dale,
And listen to my melancholy tale.

That hollow space, where now in living rows
Line above line the yew's sad verdure grows,

Was, ere the planter's hand its beauty gave
A common pit, a rude unfashion'd cave.
The landskip now so sweet we well may praise:
But far, far sweeter in its ancient days,
Far sweeter was it, when its peopled ground
With fairy domes and dazzling towers was crown'd.
Where in the midst those verdant pillars spring,
Rose the proud palace of the Elfin king;
For every hedge of vegetable green,
In happier years a crowded street was seen;
Nor all those leaves that now the prospect grace,
Could match the numbers of its pygmy race,
What urg'd this mighty empire to its fate,
A tale of woe and wonder, I relate.

When Albion rul'd the land, whose lineage came
From Neptune mingling with a mortal dame,
Their midnight pranks the sprightly fairies play'd
On every hill, and danc'd in every shade.
But, foes to sun-shine, most they took delight
In dells and dales conceal'd from human sight:
There hew'd their houses in the arching rock;
Or scoop'd the bosom of the blasted oak;
Or heard, o'ershadow'd by some shelving hill,
The distant murmurs of the falling rill.
They, rich in pilfer'd spoils, indulg'd their mirth,
And pity'd the huge wretched sons of earth.
Ev'n now, 'tis said, the hinds o'erhear their strain,
And strive to view their airy forms in vain:
They to their cells at man's approach repair,
Like the shy leveret, or the mother-hare,
The whilst poor mortals startle at the sound
Of unseen footsteps on the haunted ground.

Amid this garden, then with woods o'ergrown,
Stood the lov'd seat of royal Oberon.
From every region to his palace-gate
Came peers and princes of the fairy state,
Who, rank'd in council round the sacred shade,
Their monarch's will and great behests obey'd.
From Thames' fair banks, by lofty towers adorn'd,
With loads of plunder oft his chiefs return'd:
Hence in proud robes, and colours bright and gay,
Shone every knight and every lovely fay.
Whoe'er on Powell's dazzling stage display'd,
Hath fam'd King Pepin, and his court survey'd,
May guess, if old by modern things we trace,
The pomp and splendour of the fairy-race.

By magic fenc'd, by spells encompass'd round,
No mortal touch'd this interdicted ground;
No mortal enter'd, those alone who came
Stol'n from the couch of some terrestrial dame:
For oft of babes they robb'd the matron's bed,
And left some sickly changeling in their stead.

It chanc'd a youth of Albion's royal blood
Was foster'd here, the wonder of the wood.
Milkah for wiles above her peers renown'd,
Deep-skill'd in charms and many a mystic sound,
As through the regal dome she sought for prey,
Observ'd the infant Albion where he lay
In mantles broider'd o'er with gorgeous pride,
And stole him from the sleeping mother's side.

Who now but Milkah triumphs in her mind!
Ah, wretched nymph, to future evils blind!
The time shall come when thou shalt dearly pay
The theft, hard-hearted! of that guilty day:
Thou in thy turn shalt like the queen repine,
And all her sorrows, doubled, shall be thine:

He who adorns thy house, the lovely boy
Who now adorns it, shall at length destroy.

Two hundred moons in their pale course had seen
The gay-rob'd fairies glimmer on the green,
And Albion now had reach'd in youthful prime
To nineteen years, as mortals measure time.
Flush'd with resistless charms he fir'd to love
Each nymph and little Dryad of the grove;
For skilful Milkah spar'd not to employ
Her utmost art to rear the princely boy;
Each supple limb she swath'd, and tender bone,
And to the Elfin standard kept him down;
She robb'd dwarf-elders of their fragrant fruit,
And fed him early with the daisy's root,
Whence through his veins the powerful juices ran,
And form'd in beauteous miniature the man.
Yet still, two inches taller than the rest,
His lofty port his human birth confess'd;
A foot in height, how stately did he show!
How look superior on the crowd below!
What knight like him could toss the rusty lance!
Who move so graceful in the mazy dance!
A shape so nice, or features half so fair,
What elf could boast! or such a flow of hair!
Bright Kenna saw, a princess born to reign,
And felt the charmer burn in every vein.
She, heiress to this empire's potent lord,
Prais'd like the stars, and next the moon ador'd.
She, whom at distance thrones and princedom
view'd,

To whom proud Oriel and Azuriel sued,
In her high palace languish'd, void of joy,
And pin'd in secret for a mortal boy.

He too was smitten, and discreetly strove
By courtly deeds to gain the virgin's love.
For her he cull'd the fairest flowers that grew,
Ere morning suns had drain'd their fragrant dew;
He chas'd the hornet in his mid-day flight,
And brought her glow-worms in the noon of night;
When on ripe fruits she cast a wishing eye,
Did ever Albion think the tree too high!
He show'd her where the pregnant goldfinch hung,
And the wren-mother brooding o'er her young;
To her th' inscription on their eggs he read,
(Admire, ye clerks, the youth whom Milkah bred)
To her he show'd each herb of virtuous juice,
Their powers distinguish'd and describ'd their use:
All vain their powers, alas! to Kenna prove,
And well sung Ovid, "There's no herb for love."

As when a ghost, enlarg'd from realms below,
Seeks its old friend to tell some secret wo,
The poor shade shivering stands, and must not break

His painful silence, till the mortal speak:
So far'd it with the little love-sick maid,
Forbid to utter, what her eyes betray'd.
He saw her anguish, and reveal'd his flame,
And spar'd the blushes of the tongue-ty'd dame.
The day would fail me, should I reckon o'er
The sighs they lavish'd, and the oaths they swore
In words so melting, that compar'd with those
The nicest courtship of terrestrial beaux
Would sound like compliments, from country clowns [gowns.

To red cheek'd sweet-hearts in their home-spun

All in a lawn of many a various hue
A bed of flowers (a fairy forest) grew:
'Twas here one noon, the gaudiest of the May,
The still, the secret, silent, hour of day,
Beneath a lofty tulip's ample shade
Sat the young lover and th' immortal maid.
They thought all fairies slept, ah, luckless pair!
Mid, but in vain, in the sun's noon-tide glare!
When Albion, leaning on his Kenna's breast,
Thus all the softness of his soul express'd:

"All things are hush'd. The sun's meridian rays
"Veil the horizon in one mighty blaze:
"Nor moon nor star in heaven's blue arch is seen
"With kindly rays to silver o'er the green,
"Grateful to fairy eyes; they secret take
"Their rest, and only wretched mortals wake.
"This dead of day I fly to thee alone,
"A world to me, a multitude in one.
"Oh, sweet as dew-drops on these flowery lawns,
"When the sky opens, and the evening dawns!
"Straight as the pink, that towers so high in air,
"Soft as the blow-bell! as the daisy fair!
"Blest be the hour, when first I was convey'd
"An infant captive to this blissful shade!
"And blest the hand that did my form refine,
"And shrunk my stature to a match with thine!
"Glad I for thee renounce my royal birth,
"And all the giant-daughters of the earth.
"Thou, if thy breast with equal ardour burn,
"Renounce thy kind, and love for love return.
"So from us two, combin'd by nuptial ties,
"A race of unknown demi-gods shall rise.
"O speak, my love! my vows with vows repay,
"And sweetly swear my rising fears away."

To whom (the shining azure of her eyes
More brighten'd) thus th' enamour'd maid replies:

"By all the stars, and first the glorious moon,
"I swear, and by the head of Oberon,
"A dreadful oath! no prince of fairy line
"Shall e'er in wedlock plight his vows with mine.
"Where'er my footsteps in the dance are seen,
"May toadstools rise, and mildews blast the green,
"May the keen east wind blight my favourite
"flowers,
"And snakes and spotted adders haunt my bowers,
"Confin'd whole ages in an hemlock shade
"There rather pine I a neglected maid,
"Or worse, exil'd from Cynthia's gentle rays,
"Parch in the sun a thousand summer-days,
"Than any prince, a prince of fairy line,
"In sacred wedlock plight his vows with mine."

She ended: and with lips of rosy hue
Dipp'd five times over in ambrosial dew,
Stifled his words. When from his covert rear'd,
The frowning brow of Oberon appear'd.
A sun-flower's trunk was near, whence (killing sight!)

The monarch issued, half an ell in height:
Full on the pair a furious look he cast,
Nor spoke; but gave his bugle-horn a blast
That through the woodland echoed far and wide,
And drew a swarm of subjects to his side.
A hundred chosen knights, in war renown'd,
Drive Albion banish'd from the sacred ground;

And twice ten myriads guard the bright abodes,
Where the proud king, amidst his demi-gods,
For Kenna's sudden bridal bids prepare,
And to Azuriel gives the weeping fair.

If fame in arms, with ancient birth combin'd,
A faultless beauty, and a spotless mind,
To love and praise can generous souls incline,
That love, Azuriel, and that praise, was thine.
Blood, only less than royal, fill'd thy veins,
Proud was thy roof, and large thy fair domains.
Where now the skies high Holland-House invades,

And short-liv'd Warwick sadden'd all the shades,
Thy dwelling stood: nor did in him afford
A nobler owner, or a lovelier lord.

For thee a hundred fields produc'd their store,
And by thy name ten thousand vassals swore;
So lov'd thy name, that, at their monarch's
choice,

All fairy shouted with a general voice.

Oriel alone a secret rage suppress'd,
That from his bosom heav'd the golden vest.
Along the banks of Thame his empire ran,
Wide was his range, and populous his clan.
When cleanly servants, if we trust old tales,
Beside their wages had good fairy vails,
Whole heaps of silver tokens, nightly paid,
The careful wife, or the neat dairy-maid,
Sunk not his stores. With smiles and powerful bribes

He gain'd the leaders of his neighbour tribes
And ere the night the face of heaven had chang'd,
Beneath his banners half the fairies rang'd.

Meanwhile, driven back to earth, a lonely way
The cheerless Albion wander'd half the day,
A long, long journey, chok'd with brakes and thorns

Ill-measur'd by ten thousand barley-corns.
Tir'd out at length, a spreading stream he spy'd
Fed by old Thame, a daughter of the tide:
'Twas then a spreading stream, though now its
fame

Obscur'd, it bears the Creek's inglorious name,
And creeps, as through contracted bounds it strays,
A leap for boys in these degenerate days.

On the clear crystal's verdant bank he stood,
And thrice look'd backward on the fatal wood,
And thrice he groan'd, and thrice he beat his breast,

And thus in tears his kindred gods address'd.

"If true, ye watery powers, my lineage came
From Neptune mingling with a mortal dame;
Down to his court, with coral garlands crown'd
Through all your grottoes waft my plaintive,
found,

"And urge the god, whose trident shakes the earth,
To grace his offspring, and assert my birth."

He said. A gentle Naiad heard his prayer,
And, touch'd with pity for a lover's care,
Shoots to the sea, where low beneath the tides
Old Neptune in th' unfathom'd deep resides,
Rous'd at the news, the sea's stern sultan swore
Revenge, and scarce from present arms forbore;
But first the nymph his harbinger he sends,
And to her care the favourite boy commends.

As through the Thames her backward course she guides,

Driven by his current up the refluxing tides,
Along his banks the pigmy legions spread,
She spies, and haughty Oriel at their head.

Soon with wrong'd Albion's name the host she fires,
And counts the ocean's god among his fires:

"The ocean's god, by whom shall be o'erthrown,

"(Styx heard his oath) the tyrant Oberon.

"See here beneath a toadstool's deadly gloom

"Lies Albion: him the fates your leader doom.

"Hear, and obey; 'tis Neptune's powerful call,

"By him Azuriel and his king shall fall."

She said. They bow'd: and on their shields up-bore

With shouts their new saluted emperor.

Ev'n Oriel smil'd: at least to smile he strove,
And hopes of vengeance triumph'd over love.

See now the mourner of the lonely shade

By gods protected, and by hosts obey'd,

A slave, a chief, by fickle fortune's play,

In the short course of one revolving day.

What wonder if the youth, so strangely blest,

Felt his heart flutter in his little breast!

His thick embattled troops, with secret pride,

He views extended half an acre wide;

More light he treads, more tall he seems to rise,

And struts a straw-breadth nearer to the skies.

O for thy muse, great Bard*, whose lofty strains

In battle join'd the pigmies and the cranes!

Each gaudy knight, had I that warmth divine,

Each colour'd legion in my verse should shine.

But simple I, and innocent of art,

The tale, that sooth'd my infant years, impart,

The tale I heard whole winter-eves, untir'd,

And sing the battles, that my nurse inspir'd.

Now the shrill corn-pipes, echoing loud to arms,

To rank and file reduce the straggling swarms.

Thick rows of spears at once, with sudden glare,

A grove of needles glitter in the air;

Loose in the winds small ribbon-streamers flow,

Dipt in all colours of the heavenly bow,

And the gay host, that now its march pursues,

Gleams o'er the meadows in a thousand hues,

On Buda's plains thus formidably bright,

Shone Asia's sons, a pleasing dreadful fight.

In various robes their silken troops were seen,

The blue, the red, and prophet's sacred green:

When blooming Brunswick, near the Danube's
flood,

First stain'd his maiden sword in Turkish blood.

Unseen and silent march the slow brigades

Through pathless wilds, and unfrequented shades.

In hope already vanquish'd by surprise,

In Albion's power the fairy empire lies;

Already has he seiz'd on Kenna's charms,

And the glad beauty trembles in his arms.

The march concludes: and now in prospect near,

But fenc'd with arms, the hostile towers appear,

For Oberon, or Druids falsely sing,

Wore his prime visier in a magic ring,

* Mr. Addison

A subtle sprite, that opening plots foretold
By sudden dimness on the beamy gold.
Hence, in a crescent form'd, his legions bright
With beating bosoms waited for the fight;
To charge their foes they march, a glittering band,
And in their van doth bold Azuriel stand.

What rage that hour did Albion's soul possess,
Let chiefs imagine, and let lovers guess!
Forth issuing from his ranks, that strove in vain
To check his course, athwart the dreadful plain
He strides indignant: and with haughty cries
To single fight the fairy prince defies.

Forbear! rash youth, th' unequal war to try;
Nor, sprung from mortals, with immortals vie.
No god stands ready to avert thy doom,
Nor yet thy grandfire of the waves is come.
My words are vain—no words the wretch can move,

By beauty dazzled, and bewitch'd by love:
He longs, he burns, to win the glorious prize,
And sees no danger, while he sees her eyes.

Now from each host the eager warriors start,
And furious Albion flings his hasty dart.
'Twas feather'd from the bee's transparent wing,
And its shaft ended in a hornet's sting;
Bat, tost in rage, it flew without a wound,
High o'er the foe, and guiltless pierc'd the ground.
Not so Azuriel's: with unerring aim
Too near the needle-pointed javelin came,
Drove through the sevenfold shield, and silken vest,
And lightly raz'd the lover's ivory breast.
Rous'd at the smart, and rising to the blow,
With his keen sword he cleaves his fairy foe,
Sheer from the shoulder to the waste he cleaves
And of one arm the tottering trunk bereaves.

His useless steel brave Albion wields no more,
But sternly smiles, and thinks the combat o'er:
So had it been, had aught of mortal strain,
Or less than fairy felt the deadly pain.
But empyreal forms howe'er in fight
Gash'd and dismember'd, easily unite.
As some frail cup of China's purest mould,
With azure varnish'd, and bedropt with gold,
Though broke, if cur'd by some nice virgin's
hands,

In its old strength and pristine beauty stands;
The tumults of the boiling bohea braves,
And holds secure the coffee's sable waves:
So did Azuriel's arm, if fame say true,
Rejoin the vital trunk whence first it grew;
And, whilst in wonder fix'd poor Albion stood,
Plung'd the curs'd sabre in his heart's warm blood.
The golden broidery, tender Milkah wove,
The breast, to Kenna sacred and to love,
Lie rent and mangled: and the gaping wound
Pours out a flood of purple on the ground.
The jetty lustre sickens in his eyes:
On his cold cheeks the bloomy freshness dies;
'Oh Kenna, Kenna, thrice he try'd to say,
'Kenna, farewell!' and sigh'd his soul away.

His fall the Dryads with loud shrieks deplore,
By sister Naiads echo'd from the shore,
Thence down to Neptune's secret realms con-
vey'd,
Through grots, and glooms, and many a coral shade.

The sea's great fire, with looks denouncing war,
The trident shakes, and mounts the pearly car:
With one stern frown the wide-spread deep de-
forms,

And works the madding ocean into storms.
O'er foaming mountains, and through bursting tides,

Now high, now low, the bounding chariot rides,
Till through the Thames in a loud whirlwind's
roar

It shoots, and lands him on the destin'd shore.

Now fix'd on earth his towering stature stood,
Hung o'er the mountains, and o'erlook'd the wood.
To Brumpton's grove one ample stride he took,
(The vallies trembled, and the forests shook)
The next huge step reach'd the devoted shade,
Where chok'd in blood was wretched Albion laid;
Where now the vanquish'd, with the victors join'd,
Beneath the regal banners stood combin'd.

Th' embattell'd dwarfs with rage and scorn he past,

And on their town his eye vindictive cast.

In deep foundations his strong trident cleaves.

And high in air th' uprooted empire heaves;

On his broad engine the vast ruin hung,

Which on the foe with force divine he flung:

Aghast the legions, in th' approaching shade,

Th' inverted spires and rocking domes survey'd,

That downward tumbling on the host below

Crush'd the whole nation at one dreadful blow.

Towers, arms, nymphs, warriors, are together
lost,

And a whole empire falls to soothe sad Albion's [ghost.]

Such was the period, long restrain'd by fate,
And such the downfall of the fairy state.

This dale, a pleasing region, not unblest,

This dale possess they; and had still possess;

Had not their monarch, with a father's pride,

Rent from her lord th' inviolable bride,

Rash to dissolve the contract seal'd above,

The solemn vows and sacred bonds of love.

Now, where his elves so sprightly danc'd the round,

No violet breathes, nor daisy paints the ground,

His towers and people fill one common grave,

A shapeless ruin, and a barren cave.

Beneath huge hills of smoking piles he lay

Stunn'd and confounded a whole summer's day,

At length awak'd (for what can long restrain

Unbody'd spirits!) but awak'd in pain:

And as he saw the desolated wood,

And the dark den where once his empire stood,

Grief chill'd his heart: to his half-open'd eyes

In every oak a Neptune seem'd to rise:

He fled: and left, with all his trembling peers,

The long possession of a thousand years.

Through bush, through brake, through groves
and gloomy dales,

Through dank and dry, o'er streams and flowery
vales,

Direct they fled; but often look'd behind,

And stop'd and started at each rustling wind.

Wing'd with like fear, his abdicated bands

Disperse and wander into different lands.

Part hid beneath the Peak's deep caverns lie,

In silent glooms, impervious to the sky;

Part on fair Avon's margin seek repose,
 Whose stream o'er Britain's midmost region flows,
 Where formidable Neptune never came,
 And seas and oceans are but known by fame;
 Some to dark woods and secret shade retreat:
 And some on mountains choose their airy seat.
 There haply by the ruddy damsel seen,
 Or shepherd-boy, they featly foot the green,
 While from their steps a circling verdure springs;
 But fly from towns, and dread the courts of kings.

Mean while sad Kenna, loth to quit the grove,
 Hung o'er the body of her breathless love,
 Try'd every art, (vain arts!) to change his doom,
 And vow'd (vain vows!) to join him in the tomb.
 What could she do? the fates alike deny
 The dead to live, or fairy forms to die. [tells

An herb there grows (the same old * Homer
 Ulysses bore to rival Circe's spells)
 Its root is ebon-black, but sends to light
 A stem that bends with flowrets milky white,
 Moly the plant, which gods and fairies know,
 But secret kept from mortal men below.
 On his pale limbs its virtuous juice she shed,
 And murmur'd mystic numbers o'er the dead,
 When lo! the little shape by magic power
 Grew less and less, contracted to a flower;
 A flower, that first in this sweet garden smil'd,
 To virgins sacred, and the snow-drop styl'd.

The new-born plant with sweet regret she view'd, [dew'd,
 Warm'd with her sighs, and with her tear's be-
 Its ripen'd seeds from bank to bank convey'd,
 And with her lover whiten'd half the shade.
 Thus won from death each spring she sees him
 grow,
 And glories in the vegetable snow, [plains,
 Which now increas'd through wide Britannia's
 Its parent's warmth and spotless name retains,
 First leader of the flowery race aspires,
 And foremost catches the sun's genial fires,
 'Mid frosts and snows triumphant dares appear,
 Mingles the seasons, and leads on the year.

Deserted now of all the pigmy race,
 Nor man nor fairy touch'd this guilty place.
 In heaps on heaps, for many a rolling age,
 It lay accurs'd, the mark of Neptune's rage,
 Till great Nassau recloth'd the desert shade,
 Thence sacred to Britannia's monarchs made.
 'Twas then the green-rob'd nymph, fair Kenna,
 came,

(Kenna, that gave the neighbouring town its name.)
 Proud when she saw th' ennobled garden shine,
 With nymphs and heroes of her lover's line,
 She vow'd to grace the mansions once her own,
 And picture out in plants the fairy town.
 To far-fam'd wife her flight unseen she sped,
 And with gay prospects fill'd the craftsman's head,
 Soft in his fancy drew a pleasing scheme,
 And plann'd that landship in a morning dream.

With the sweet view the fire of gardens fir'd,
 Attempts the labour by the nymph inspir'd,
 The walls and streets in rows of yew designs,
 And forms the town in all its ancient lines;

* Odys. Lib. x.

The corner trees he lifts more high in air,
 And girds the palace with a verdant square;
 Nor knows, while round he views the rising scenes,
 He builds a city as he plants his greens.

With a sad pleasure the aerial maid
 This image of her ancient realms survey'd,
 How chang'd, how fall'n from its primæval state!
 Yet here each moon, the hour her lover dy'd,
 Each moon his solemn obsequies she pays,
 And leads the dance beneath pale Cynthia's rays;
 Pleas'd in these shades to head her fairy train,
 And grace the grove, where Albion's skinmen reign.

TO A LADY BEFORE MARRIAGE.

Oh, form'd by nature, and refin'd by art!
 With charms to win, and sense to fix the heart!
 By thousands sought, Clotilda, canst thou free
 Thy crowd of captives, and descend to me?
 Content in shades obscure to waste thy life,
 A hidden beauty, and a country wife.
 O, listen, while thy summers are my theme!
 Ah, soothe thy partner in his waking dream!
 In some small hamlet on the lonely plain,
 Where Thames, through meadows, rolls his ma-
 zy train; [ray'd,
 Or where high Windsor, thick with greens ar-
 Waves his old oaks, and spreads his ample shade,
 Fancy has figur'd out our calm retreat;
 Already round the visionary seat
 Our limes begin to shoot, our flowers to spring,
 The brooks to murmur, and the birds to sing.
 Where dost thou lie, thou thinly-peopled green?
 Thou nameless lawn, and village yet unseen?
 Where sons, contented with their native ground,
 Ne'er travell'd further than ten furlongs round;
 And the tann'd peasant, and his ruddy bride,
 Were born together, and together died.
 Where early larks best tell the morning light,
 And only Philomel disturbs the night;
 'Midst gardens here my humble pile shall rise,
 With sweets surrounded of ten thousand dyes;
 All savage where th' embroider'd gardens end,
 The haunt of echoes shall my woods ascend;
 And oh! if heaven th' ambitious thought approve,
 A rill shall warble cross the gloomy grove,
 A little rill, o'er pebbly beds convey'd,
 Gush down the steep, and glitter through the glade,
 What cheering scents those bordering banks exhale!

How loud that heifer lows from yonder vale!
 'Tis that thrush how shrill! his note so clear, so high,
 He drowns each feather'd minstrel of the sky.
 Here let me trace, beneath the purpled morn,
 The deep-mouth'd beagle, and the sprightly horn;
 Or lure the trout with well-dissembled flies,
 Or fetch the fluttering partridge from the skies,
 Nor shall thy hand disdain to crop the vine,
 The downy peach, or flavour'd nectarine;
 Or rob the bee-hive of its golden hoard,
 And bear th' unbought luxuriance to thy board.
 Sometimes my books by day shall kill the hours,
 While from thy needle rise the filken flowers,
 And thou, by turns, to ease my feeble sight,
 Resume the volume, and deceive the night.

Oh! when I mark thy twinkling eyes oppress,
 Soft whispering, let me warn my love to rest;
 Then watch thee, charm'd, while sleep locks every sense,
 And to sweet heaven commend thy innocence.
 Thus reign'd our fathers o'er the rural fold,
 Wife, hale, and honest, in the days of old;
 Till courts arose, where substance pays for show,
 And specious joys are bought with real woe.
 See Flavia's pendants, large, well-spread, and right,
 The ear that wears them hears a fool each night:
 Mark how th' embroider'd colonel sneaks away,
 To shun the withering dame that made him gay;
 That knave, to gain a title, lost his fame;
 That rais'd his credit by a daughter's shame;
 This coxcomb's ribband cost him half his land,
 And oaks, unnumber'd, bought that fool a wand.
 Fond man, as all his sorrows were too few,
 Acquires strange wants that nature never knew,
 By midnight lamps he emulates the day,
 And sleeps, perverse, the cheerful suns away;
 From goblets high-emboss'd, his wine must glide,
 Round his clos'd sight the gorgeous curtain slide;
 Fruits ere their time to grace his pomp must rise,
 And three untasted courses glut his eyes.
 For this are nature's gentle calls withstood,
 The voice of conscience, and the bonds of blood;
 This wisdom thy reward for every pain,
 And this gay glory all thy mighty gain.
 Fair phantoms woo'd and scorn'd from age to age,
 Since bards began to laugh, or priests to rage.
 And yet, just curse on man's aspiring kind,
 Prone to ambition, to example blind,
 Our children's children shall our steps pursue,
 And the same errors be for ever new.
 Mean while in hope a guiltless country swain,
 My reed with warblings cheers th' imagin'd plain.
 Hail humble shades, where truth and silence dwell!
 Thou noisy town, and faithless court, farewell!
 Farewell ambition, once my darling flame!
 The thirst of lucre, and the charm of fame!
 In life's by-road, that winds through paths unknown,
 My days, though number'd, shall be all my own.
 Here shall they end, (O, might they twice begin!)
 And all be white the fates intend to spin.

A POEM,

IN PRAISE OF THE HORN-BOOK.

Written under a Fit of the Gout.

"Magni magna patrant, nos non nisi ludicra—
 ——— Podagra hæc otia fecit."

HAIL, ancient book, most venerable code!
 Learning's first cradle, and its last abode!
 The huge unnumber'd volumes which we see,
 By lazy plagiaries are stol'n from thee.
 Yet future times, to thy sufficient store,
 Shall ne'er presume to add one letter more.
 Thee will I sing, in comely waincoat bound,
 And golden verge enclosing thee around;
 The faithful horn before, from age to age,
 Preserving thy invaluable page;

Behind, thy patron saint In armour shines,
 With sword and lance, to guard thy sacred lines:
 Beneath his courser's feet the dragon lies
 Transfix'd; his blood thy scarlet cover dies;
 Th' instructive handle's at the bottom fix'd,
 Lest wrangling critics should pervert the text.
 Or if to ginger-bread thou shalt descend,
 And liquorish learning to thy babes extend;
 Or sugar'd plane, o'erspread with beaten gold,
 Does the sweet treasure of thy letters hold;
 Thou still shalt be my song—Apollo's choir
 I scorn t' invoke; Cadmus my verse inspire:
 'Twas Cadmus who the first materials brought
 Of all the learning which has since been taught,
 Soon made complete! for mortals ne'er shall know
 More than contain'd of old the Christ-crofs row;
 What masters dictate, or what doctors preach,
 Wise matrons hence, ev'n to our children teach:
 But as the name of every plant and flower
 (So common that each peasant knows its power)
 Physicians in mysterious cant express,
 T' amuse the patient, and enhance their fees;
 So from the letters of our native tongue,
 Put in Greek scrawls, a mystery too is sprung,
 Schools are erected, puzzling grammars made,
 And artful men strike out a gainful trade:
 Strange characters adorn the learned gate,
 And heedless youth catch at the shining bait;
 The pregnant boys the noisy charms declare,
 And * Tau's and Delta's make their mother's stare;
 Th' uncommon sounds amaze the vulgar ear,
 And what's uncommon never costs too dear.
 Yet in all tongues the horn-book is the same,
 Taught by the Grecian master, or the English dame.

But how shall I thy endless virtues tell,
 In which thou dost all other books excel?
 No greasy thumbs thy spotless leaf can soil,
 Nor crooked dogs-ears thy smooth corners spoil;
 In idle pages no errata stand,
 To tell the blunders of the printer's hand:
 No fullsome dedication here is writ,
 Nor flattering verse, to praise the author's wit;
 The margin with no tedious notes is vex'd,
 Nor various reading to confound the text:
 All parties in thy literal sense agree,
 Thou perfect centre of concordancy!
 Search we the records of an ancient date,
 Or read what modern histories relate,
 They all proclaim what wonders have been done
 By the plain letters taken as they run:
 "† Too high the floods of passion us'd to roll,
 "And rend the Roman youth's impatient soul;
 "His hasty anger furnish'd scenes of blood,
 "And frequent deaths of worthy men ensued;
 "In vain were all the weaker methods try'd,
 "None could suffice to stem the furious tide,
 "Thy sacred line he did but once repeat,
 "And laid the storm, and cool'd the raging heat."
 Thy heavenly notes, like angels' music, cheer
 Departing souls, and soothe the dying ear.

† The advice given to Augustus, by Athenodorus the Stoic philosopher.

An aged peasant, on his latest bed,
Wish'd for a friend some godly book to read;
The pious grandson thy known handle takes,
And (eyes lift up) this savory lecture makes:
Great A he gravely read; th' important sound
The empty walls and hallow roof rebound:
Th' expiring ancient rear'd his drooping head,
And thank'd his stars that Hodge had learn'd to read.

Great B, the younker bauls; O heavenly breath!
What ghostly comforts in the hour of death!
What hopes I feel! great C, pronounc'd the boy;
The grandfire dies with ecstasy of joy.

Yet in some lands such ignorance abounds,
Whole parishes scarce know thy useful sounds.
Of Essex hundreds fame gives this report,
But fame, I ween, says many things in sport.
Scarce lives the man to whom thou'rt quite unknown,

Though few th' extent of thy vast empire own.
Whatever wonders magic spells can do
On earth, in air, in sea, in shades below;
What words profound and dark wise Mahomet spoke,

When his old cow an angel's figure took;
What strong enchantments sage Canidia knew,
Or Horace sung, fierce monsters to subdue,
O mighty book! are all contain'd in you?
All human arts, and every science meet,
Within the limits of thy single sheet:

From thy vast root all learning's branches grow,
And all her streams from thy deep fountain flow.
And, lo! while thus thy wonders I indite,
Inspir'd I feel the power of which I write;
The gentler gout his former rage forgets,
Less frequent now, and less severe the fits:
Loose grew the chains which bound my useless feet;
Stiffness and pain from every joint retreat;
Surprising strength comes every moment on,
I stand, I step, I walk, and now I run.
Here let me cease, my hobling numbers stop,
And at thy handle hang my crutches up.

THERISTES;

OR, THE LORDLING,

The Grandson of a Ericklayer, Great-grandson of a Butcher.

THERISTES of amphibious breed,
Motley fruit of mongrel seed:
By the dam from lordlings sprung,
By the sire exhal'd from dung:
Think on every vice in both,
Look on him, and see their growth.
View him on the mother's side,
Fill'd with falsehood, spleen, and pride,
Positive and over-bearing,
Changing still, and still adhering,
Spiteful, peevish, rude, untoward:
Pierce in tongue, in heart a coward;
When his friends he most is hard on,
Cringing comes to beg their pardon;

Voliva Tabula.—HOR.

Reputation ever tearing,
Ever dearest friendship swearing,
Judgment weak, and passion strong;
Always various, always wrong:
Provocation never waits,
Where he loves, or where he hates.
Talks whate'er comes in his head,
Wishes it were all unsaid.

Let me now the vices trace,
From his father's scoundrel race,
Who could give the looby such airs;
Were they masons? Were they butchers?
Herald lend the muse an answer,
From his atavus and grandfire;
This was dexterous at his trowel,
That was bred to kill a cow well:
Hence the greasy clumsy mien,
In his dress and figure seen:
Hence that mean and fordid soul,
Like his body, rank and foul:
Hence that wild suspicious peep,
Like a rogue that steals a sheep:
Hence he learn'd the butcher's guile,
How to cut a throat and smile:
Like a butcher doom'd for life,
In his mouth to wear his knife.
Hence he draws his daily food,
From his tenant's vital blood.

Lastly, let his gifts be try'd,
Borrow'd from the mason side.
Some, perhaps, may think him able
In the state to build a Babel;
Could we place him in a station
To destroy the old foundation.
True, indeed, I should be gladder
Could he learn to mount the ladder.
May he at his letter end
Mount alive, and dead descend.
In him tell me, which prevail,
Female vices most, or male?
What produc'd them, can you tell?
Human race, or imp of hell?

OXFORD:

A POEM.

Inscribed to Lord Lonsdale, 1707.

"Unum opus est intactæ palladis urbem
"Carminè perpetuo celebrare"—
HOR. I Od. vii.

WHILST you, my lord, adorn that stately seat,
Where shining beauty makes her soft retreat,
Enjoying all those graces, uncontrol'd,
Which noblest youths would die but to behold;
Whilst you inhabit Lowther's awful pile,
A structure worthy of the founder's toil;
Amaz'd we see the former Lonsdale shine
In each descendant of his noble line:
But most transported and surpriz'd we view
His ancient glories all reviv'd in you,
Where charms and virtues join their equal grace,
Your father's godlike soul, your mother's lovely face.

Me fortune and kind Heaven's indulgent care
To famous Oxford and the muses bear,
Where, of all ranks, the blooming youths combine
To pay due homage to the mighty Nine,
And snatch, with smiling joy, the laurel crown,
Due to the learned honours of the gown.
Here I, the meanest of the tuneful throng,
Delude the time with an unhallow'd song,
Which thus my thanks to much-lov'd Oxford pays,
In no ungrateful, though unartful lays.

Where shall I first the beauteous scene disclose,
And all the gay variety expose?

For wheresoe'er I turn my wondering eyes,
Aspiring towers and verdant groves arise,
Immortal greens the smiling plains array,
And mazy rivers murmur all the way.

O! might your eyes behold each sparkling dome,

And freely o'er the beauteous prospect roam,
Lest ravish'd your own Lowther you'd survey,
Though pomp and state the costly seat display,
Where art so nicely has adorn'd the place,
That nature's aid might seem an useless grace;
Yet nature's smiles such various charms impart,
That vain and needless are the strokes of art.
In equal state our rising structures shine,
Fram'd by such rules, and form'd by such design,
That here, at once surpris'd and pleas'd, we view
Old Athens lost and conquer'd in the new;
More sweet our shades, more fit our bright abodes
For warbling muses and inspiring gods.

Great * Vanbrook's self might own each artful draught

Equal to models in his curious thought,
Nor scorn a fabric by our plans to frame,
Or in immortal labours sing their fame;
Both ways he saves them from destroying fate,
If he but praise them, or but imitate.

See, where the sacred † Sheldon's haughty dome
Rivals the stately pomp of ancient Rome,
Whose form, so great and noble seems design'd
T' express the grandeur of its founder's mind.
Here, in one lofty building, we behold
Whate'er the Latian pride could boast of old.
True, no dire combats feed the savage eye,
And strew the sand with sportive cruelty;
But, more adorn'd with what the muse inspires,
It far outshines their bloody theatres.
Delightful scene! when here, in equal verse,
The youthful bards their godlike queen rehearse,
To Churchill's wreaths Apollo's laurel join,
And sing the plains of Hockley and Judoign.

Next let the muse record our Bodley's feat ‡
Nor aim at numbers, like the subject, great:
All hail, thou fabric, sacred to the Nine,
Thy fame immortal, and thy form divine!
Who to thy praise attempts the dangerous flight,
Should in thy various tongues be taught to write;
His verse, like thee, a lofty dress should wear,
And breathe the genius which inhabits there;
Thy proper lays alone can make thee live,
And pay that fame, which first thyself didst give.

* Sir John Vanbrugh.

† The Theatre.

‡ The Bodleian Library.

So fountains, which through secret channels flow,
And pour above the floods they take below,
Back to their father ocean urge their way,
And to the sea, the streams it gave, repay.

No more we fear the military rage,
Nurs'd up in some obscure barbarian age;
Nor dread the ruin of our arts divine,
From thick-scall'd heroes of the Gothic line,
Though pale the Romans saw those arms advance,
And wept their learning lost in ignorance.
Let brutal rage around its terrors spread,
The living murder, and consume the dead,
In impious fires let noblest writings burn,
And with their authors share a common urn;
Only, ye fates, our lov'd Bodleian spare,
Be IT, and learning's self shall be your care,
Here every art and every grace shall join,
Collected Phœbus here alone shall shine,
Each other seat be dark, and this be all divine.
Thus when the Greeks imperial Troy defac'd,
And to the ground its fatal walls debas'd,
In vain they burn the work of hands divine,
And vow destruction to the Dardan line,
Whilst good Æneas flies th' unequal wars,
And, with his guardian gods, lulus bears,
Old Troy for ever stands in him alone,
And all the Phrygian kings survive in one.

Here still presides each sage's reverend shade,
In soft and easy grandeur laid;
Their deathless works forbid their fame to die,
Nor time itself their persons shall destroy,
Preserv'd within the living gallery *.

What greater gift could bounteous heaven bestow,

Than to be seen above, and read below?
With deep respect I bend my duteous head;
To see the faithful likenesses of the dead;
But O! what muse can equal warmth impart?
The painter's skill transcends the poet's art.
When round the pictur'd founders I descry,
With goodness soft, and great with majesty,
So much of life the artful colours give,
Scarce more within their colleges they live;
My blood begins in wilder rounds to roll,
And pleasing tumults combat in my soul;
An humble awe my downcast eyes betray,
And only less than adoration pay,
Such were the Roman fathers, when o'ercome,
They saw the Gauls insult o'er conquer'd Rome;
Each captive seem'd the haughty victor's lord,
And prostrate chiefs their awful slaves ador'd.

Such art as this adorns your Lowther's hall,
Where feasting gods carouse upon the wall;
The nectar, which creating paint supplies,
Intoxicates each pleas'd spectator's eyes;
Who view, amaz'd, the figures heavenly fair,
And think they breathe the true Elysian air.
With strokes so bold, great Verrio's hand has drawn

The gods in dwellings brighter than their own.

Fir'd with a thousand raptures, I behold
What lively features grac'd each bard of old;
Such lips, I think, did guide his charming tongue,
In such an air as this the poet sung;

* The Picture Gallery.

Such eyes as these glow'd with the sacred fire,
 And hands like these employ'd the vocal lyre.
 Quite ravish'd, I pursue each image o'er,
 And scarce admire their deathless labours more.
 See where the gloomy Scaliger appears,
 Each shade is critic, and each feature sneers;
 The artful Ben so smartly strikes the eye,
 I more than see a fancied comedy;
 The muddy Scotus crowns the motley show,
 And metaphysics cloud his wrinkled brow.
 But distant awe invades my beating breast,
 To see great Ormond in the paint exprest;
 With fear I view the figure from afar,
 Which burns with noble ardour for the war;
 But near approaches free my doubting mind,
 To view such sweetness with such grandeur join'd.

Here studious heads the graver tablet shows,
 And there with martial warmth the picture glows;
 The blooming youth here boasts a brighter hue,
 And painted virgins far outshine the true.

Hail, colours, which with nature bear a strife,
 And only want a voice to perfect life;
 The wondering stranger makes a sudden stand,
 And pays low homage to the lovely band;
 Within each frame a real fair believes,
 And vainly thinks the mimic canvass lives;
 Till, undeceiv'd, he quits th' enchanting show,
 Pleas'd with the art, though he laments it too.

So when his Juno bold Ixion woo'd,
 And aim'd at pleasures worthy of a god,
 A beauteous cloud was form'd by angry Jove,
 Fit to invite, though not indulge his love;
 The mortal thought he saw his goddess shine,
 And all the lying graces look'd divine;
 But when with heat he clasp'd her fancied charms,
 The empty vapour baulk'd his eager arms.

Loth to depart, I leave th' inviting scene,
 Yet scarce forbear to view it o'er again;
 But still new objects give a new delight,
 And various prospects bless the wandering sight.

Aloft in state the airy towers arise,
 And with new lustre deck the wondering skies;
 Lo! to what height the schools ascending reach,
 Built with that art which they alone can teach;
 The lofty dome expands her spacious gate,
 Where all the decent graces jointly wait;
 In every shape the god of art resorts,
 And crowds of sages fill th' extended courts.

With wonders fraught the bright museum see,
 Itself the greatest curiosity!
 Where nature's choicest treasure, all combin'd,
 Delight at once, and quite confound the mind;
 Ten thousand splendors strike the dazzled eye,
 And form on earth another galaxy.

Here colleges in sweet confusion rise,
 There temples seem to reach their native skies;
 Spires, towers, and groves, compose the various
 show,

And mingled prospects charm the doubting view;
 Who can deny their characters divine,
 Without resplendent, and inspir'd within?
 But, since above my weak and artless lays,
 Let their own poets sing their equal praise.

One labour more my grateful verse renews,
 And rears aloft the low-descending muse;

The building *, parent of my young essays,
 Asks in return a tributary praise.
 Pillars sublime bear up the learned weight,
 And antique sages tread the pompous height;
 Whilst guardian muses shade the happy piles,
 And all around diffuse propitious smiles.
 Here Lancaster, adorn'd with every grace,
 Stands chief in merit, as the chief in place:
 To his lov'd name our earliest lays belong,
 The theme at once, and patron of our song.
 Long may he o'er his much-lov'd queen's preside,
 Our arts encourage, and our counsels guide;
 Till after-ages, fill'd with glad surprise,
 Behold his image all majestic rise,
 Where now in pomp a venerable band,
 Princes and queens, and holy fathers, stand.
 Good Eggesfield † claims homage from the eye,
 And the hard stone seems soft with piety;
 The mighty monarchs still the same appear,
 And every marble frown provokes the war;
 Whilst rugged rocks, mark'd with Philippa's face,
 Soften to charms, and glow with new-born grace.
 A fight less noble did the warriors yield,
 Transform'd to statues by the Gorgon shield;
 Distorting fear the coward's form confess,
 And fury seem'd to heave the hero's breast;
 The lifeless rocks each various thought betray'd,
 And all the soul was in the stone display'd.

Too high, my verse, has been thy daring flight,
 Thy softer numbers now the groves invite,
 Where silent shades provoke the speaking lyre,
 And cheerful objects happy songs inspire,
 At once bestow rewards, and thoughts infuse,
 Compose a garland, and supply a muse.

Behold around, and see the living green
 In native colours paints a blooming scene;
 Th' eternal buds no deadly winter fear,
 But scorn the coldest season of the year;
 Apollo sure will bless the happy place,
 Which his own Daphne condescends to grace;
 For here the everlasting laurels grow,
 In every grotto, and on every brow.
 Prospects so gay demand a Congreve's strains,
 To call the gods and nymphs upon the plains;
 Pan yields his empire o'er the sylvan throng,
 Pleas'd to submit to his superior song;
 Great Denham's genius looks with rapture down,
 And Spenser's shade resigns the rural crown.

Fill'd with great thoughts, a thousand sages rove
 Through every field and solitary grove;
 Whose souls, ascending an exalted height,
 Outsoar the drooping muse's vulgar flight,
 That longs to see her darling votaries laid
 Beneath the covert of some gentle shade,
 Where purling streams and warbling birds con-
 spire

To aid th' enchantments of the trembling lyre.

Bear me, some God, to Christ-Church, royal seat,
 And lay me softly in the green retreat,
 Where Aldrich holds o'er wit the sovereign power,
 And crowns the poets which he taught before.

† Robert Eggesfield, B. D. the founder, 1340.

To Aldrich Britain owes her tuneful Boyle,
The noblest trophy of the conquer'd isle;
Who adds new warmth to our poetic fire,
And gives to England the Hibernian lyre.
Philips, by Phœbus and his Aldrich taught,
Sings with that heat wherewith his Churchill fought,

Unfetter'd, in great Milton's strain he writes,
Like Milton's angels whilst his hero fights;
Pursues the bard, whilst he with honour can,
Equals the poet, and excels the man. [round,

O'er all the plains, the streams, and woods a-
The pleasing lays of sweetest bards resound;
A faithful echo every note returns,
And listening river-gods neglect their urns.
When Codrington * and Steele their verse unrein,
And form an easy, unaffected strain,
A double wreath of laurel binds their brow,
As they are poets and are warriors too.
Trapp's lofty scenes in gentle numbers flow,
Like Dryden great, as soft as moving Rowe.
When youthful Harrison, with tuneful skill, [Hill;
Makes Woodstock Park scarce yield to Cooper's
Old Chaucer from th' Elysian fields looks down,
And sees at length a genius like his own; [low,
Charm'd with his lays, which reach the shades be-
Fair Rosamonda intermits her woe,
Forgets the anguish of an injur'd soul,
The fatal poignard, and envenom'd bowl.

Apollo smiles on Magd'len's peaceful bowers,
Perfumes the air, and paints the grot with flowers,
Where Yalden learn'd to gain the myrtle crown,
And every muse was fond of Addison.
Applauded man! for weightier trusts design'd,
For once disdain not to unbend thy mind;
Thy mother Isis and her groves rehearse,
A subject not unworthy of thy verse;
So Latian fields will cease to boast thy praise,
And yield to Oxford, painted in thy lays:
And when the age to come, from envy free,
What thou to Virgil giv'st shall give to thee,
Isis, immortal by the poet's skill,
" Shall, in the smooth description, murmur still †;"
New beauties shall adorn our sylvan scene,
And in thy numbers grow for ever green.

Danby's fam'd gift ‡ such verse as thine requires,
Exalted raptures, and celestial fires;
Apollo here should plenteously impart,
As well his singing, as his curing art;
Nature herself the healing garden loves,
Which kindly her declining strength improves,
Baffles the strokes of unrelenting death,
Can break his arrows, and can blunt his teeth.
How sweet the landskip! where, in living trees,
Here frowns a vegetable Hercules!
There fam'd Achilles learns to live again,
And looks yet angry in the mimic scene;
Here artful birds, which blooming arbours show,
Seem to fly higher, whilst they upwards grow,
From the same leaves both arms and warriors rise,
And every bough a different charm supplies.

† Letter from Italy, by Mr. Addison.

‡ The Physic-garden at Oxford.

So when our world the great Creator made,
And, unadorn'd, the sluggish chaos laid,
Horror and Beauty own'd their fire the same,
And Form itself from Parent Matter came,
That lumpish mass alone was source of all,
And Bards and Themes had one original.

In vain the groves demand my longer stay,
The gentle Isis wafts the muse away;
With ease the river guides her wandering stream,
And hastes to mingle with uxorious Thame,
Attempting poets on her banks lie down,
And quaff, inspir'd, the better Helicon,
Harmonious strains adorn their various themes,
Sweet as the banks, and flowing as the streams.

Bless'd we, whom bounteous fortune here has thrown,

And made the various blessings all our own!
Nor crowns, nor globes, the pageantry of state,
Upon our humble, easy slumbers wait;
Nor aught that is ambition's lofty theme
Disturbs our sleep, and gilds the gaudy dream.
Touch'd by no ills which vex th' unhappy great,
We only read the changes in the state,
Triumphant Marlborough's arms at distance hear,
And learn from fame the rough events of war;
With pointed rhymes the Gallic tyrant pierce,
And make the cannon thunder in our verse.

See how the matchless youth their hours improve,

And in the glorious way to knowledge move!
Eager for fame, prevent the rising sun,
And watch the midnight labours of the moon.
Not tender years their bold attempts restrain,
Who leave dull Time, and hasten into man,
Pure to the soul, and pleasing to the eyes,
Like angels youthful, and like angels wise.

Some learn the mighty deeds of ages gone,
And, by the lives of heroes, form their own;
Now view the Granique chok'd with heaps of slain,

And warring worlds on the Pharfalian plain;
Now hear the trumpets clangour from afar,
And all the dreadful harmony of war;
Now trace those secret tricks that lost a state,
And search the fine-spun arts that made it great,
Correct those errors that its ruin bred,
And bid some long-lost empire rear its ancient
head,

Others, to whom persuasive arts belong
(Words in their looks, and music on their tongue),
Instructed by the wit of Greece and Rome,
Learn richly to adorn their native home;
Whilst listening crowds confess the sweet surprise,
With pleasure in their breasts, and wonder in their eyes.

Here curious minds the latent seeds disclose,
And nature's darkest labyrinths expose;
Whilst greater souls the distant words descry,
Pierce to the outstretch'd borders of the sky,
Enlarge the searching mind, and broad expand
the eye.

O you, whose rising years so great began,
In whose bright youth I read the shining man,
O Lonsdale, know what noblest minds approve,
The thoughts they cherish, and the arts they love,

Let these examples your young bosom fire,
 And bid your soul to boundless height aspire.
 Methinks I see you in our shades retir'd,
 Alike admiring, and by all admir'd :
 Your eloquence now charms my ravish'd ear,
 Which future senates shall transported hear,
 Now mournful verse inspires a pleasing woe,
 And now your cheeks with warlike fury glow,
 Whilst on the paper fancy'd fields appear,
 And prospects of imaginary war ;
 Your martial soul sees Hockstet's fatal plain,
 Or fights the fam'd Ramilia o'er again.

But I in vain these lofty names rehearse,
 Above the faint attempts of humble verse,
 Which Garth should in immortal strains design,
 Or Addison exalt with warmth divine ;
 A meaner song my tender voice requires,
 And fainter lays confess the fainter fires,
 By nature fitted for an humble theme,
 A painted prospect, or a murmuring stream,
 To tune a vulgar note in Echo's praise,
 Whilst Echo's self resounds the flattering lays ;
 Or, whilst I tell how Myra's charms surprise,
 Paint roses on her cheeks, and suns within her eyes.

O, did proportion'd height to me belong,
 Great Anna's name should grace th' ambitious song ;

Illustrious dames should round their queen resort,
 And Lonsdale's mother crown the splendid court ;
 Her noble son should boast no vulgar place,
 But share the ancient honours of his race ; [eyes
 Whilst each fair daughter's face and conquering
 To Venus only should submit the prize.

O matchless beauties ! more than heavenly fair,
 Your looks resistless, and divine your air,
 Let your bright eyes their bounteous beams diffuse,
 And no fond bard shall ask an useless muse ;
 Their kindling rays excite a noble fire,
 Give beauty to the song, and music to the lyre.

This charming theme I ever could pursue,
 And think the inspiration ever new,
 Did not the God my wandering pen restrain ;
 And bring me to his Oxford back again.

Oxford, the goddess muse's native home,
 Inspir'd like Athens, and adorn'd like Rome !
 Hadst thou of old been Learning's fam'd retreat,
 And Pagan muses chose thy lovely seat,

O, how unbounded had their fiction been !
 What fancy'd visions had adorn'd the scene !
 Upon each hill a Sylvan Pan had stood,
 And every thicket boasted of a God ;
 Satyrs had frisk'd in each poetic grove,
 And not a stream without its nymphs could move ;
 Each summit had the train of Muses show'd,
 And Hippocrene in every fountain flow'd ;
 The tales, adorn'd with each poetic grace,
 Had look'd almost as charming as the place.

Ev'n now we hear the world with transports own
 Those fictions by more wond'rous truths outdone ;
 Here pure Eusebia keeps her holy seat,
 And Themis smiles from Heaven on this retreat ;
 Our chaster graces own refin'd desires,
 And all our muses burn with vestal fires ;
 Whilst guardian-angels our Apollo's stand,
 Scattering rich favours with a bounteous hand
 To bless the happy air, and sanctify the land. }

O pleasing shades ! O ever-green retreats !
 Ye learned grottos ! and ye sacred seats !
 Never may you politer arts refuse,
 But entertain in peace the bashful muse !
 So may you be kind Heav'n's distinguish'd care,
 And may your fame be lasting, as 'tis fair !
 Let greater bards on fam'd Parnassus dream,
 Or taste th' inspir'd Heliconian stream ;
 Yet, whilst our Oxford is the blest abode
 Of every muse, and every tuneful god,
 Parnassus owns its honours far outdone,
 And Isis boasts more bards than Helicon.

A thousand blessings I to Oxford owe,
 But you, my Lord, th' inspiring muse bestow ;
 Grac'd with your name th' unpolish'd poem shines,
 You guard its faults, and consecrate the lines,
 O might you here meet my desiring eyes,
 My drooping song to nobler heights would rise ;
 Or might I come to breathe your northern air,
 Yet should I find an equal pleasure there ;
 Your presence would the harsher climate soothe,
 Hush every wind, and every mountain smooth ;
 Would bid the groves in springing pomp arise,
 And open charming vista's to the eyes ;
 Would make my trifling verse be heard around,
 And sportive echo play the empty sound :
 With you I should a better Phœbus find,
 And own in you alone the charms of Oxford join'd.

WILLIAM SOMERVILLE

THE LIFE OF SOMERVILE.

THE family of Somervile was originally from Normandy; and came to England with William the Conqueror, in 1066. Sir Walter de Somervile had a considerable command in the Conqueror's army; and was rewarded for his services, with the lordship of Whichenovre in Staffordshire, and Aston in Gloucestershire. His eldest son, Sir Walter de Somervile, succeeded him in the lordship of Whichenovre; and from him was descended Sir Philip de Somervile, lord of Whichenovre, in the reign of Henry V. who held the lands of Whichenovre, Scirescot, Ridware, Netherton, and Cowlee, of the Earls of Lancaster, by the memorable service of giving a fitch of bacon, as a reward to any husband and wife, who could say, that they never had the least difference, nor contradicted one another, within the space of twelve months after marriage, &c. The male line of the Whichenovre family is long since extinct, having ended in a daughter, married to Stafford Duke of Buckingham, beheaded in the reign of Henry VIII. William de Somervile, the second son of the first Sir Walter, having contracted a friendship with David I. King of Scotland, when he was in England, accompanied him to Scotland, and obtained from him the barony of Carnwath in Lanarkshire, where he settled. He was the progenitor of the present Lord Somerville, and the other families of that name in Scotland.

Roger de Somervile, the third son of the first Sir Walter, got from his father the lordship of Aston in Gloucestershire, which, after him, was called Somervile-Aston.

Sir John Somervile, his grandson, obtained by marriage several estates in Warwickshire, which, with Somervile-Aston, descended to Robert Somervile, Esq. his lineal representative, father of William Somervile, the poet, who was born at Edston in Warwickshire, in 1692.

He tells of himself, in his Ode to General Stanhope, that he was born near Avona's winding stream; and Ramsay, his contemporary and admirer, in an encomiastic epistle addressed to him, on reading several of his excellent poems, gives a metrical, but inaccurate account of his illustrious lineage, and that of his "noble kinsman."

You both from one great lineage spring,
Both from de Somervile, who came
With William, England's conqu'ring king,
To win fair plains and lasting fame.
Whichnour he left to 's eldest son,
That first-born chief you represent;
The second came to Caledon,
From whom our Somer'le takes descent.

Of the personal history of Somervile, some dates, and some few facts, scarce more interesting than those that make the ornaments of a country tombstone, are all the memorials that have descended to posterity.

A poet, while living, it has been well observed, is seldom an object sufficiently great to attract much attention; his real merits are known but to a few, and these are generally sparing in their praises. When his fame is increased by time, it is then too late to investigate the peculiarities of his disposition and familiar practices: "the dews of the morning are past, and we vainly try to continue the chase by the meridian splendour."

He was educated at Winchester school, and afterward chosen to one of the vacancies in New College, Oxford.

In the places of his education, tradition has preserved no account of his having displayed any uncommon proofs of his genius or literature.

It is probable that he was not negligent of study; and, it is certain, that he made a considerable proficiency in classical learning, and discovered an early propensity to poetry.

It is not known how long he resided at Oxford, or what literary or political connections he formed there; but he seems to have been an early friend to the Hanover succession, and other measures resulting from principles of freedom.

When the Tory ministers of Queen Anne removed the Duke of Marlborough from all his places, he addressed an Ode to him, which stands high among the most distinguished compositions of that time.

It was followed, in 1712, by an Ode, occasioned by the Duke of Marlborough's embarking for Ostend; which, though less elevated, has some fine encomiastic strains.

After the accession of King George, he preserved his attachment to the Whig party; and addressed an Ode to General Stanhope, one of his Majesty's Secretaries of State, afterward Earl Stanhope, in which he is constant to his theme, and mingles the praises of Marlborough and Stanhope with appropriate encomiums on Milton, and Addison, and other English poets, whose efforts have been directed to support the cause of freedom.

When Addison purchased an estate in Warwickshire, his native county, he did not miss so fair an occasion of showing his respect for that great man, and of doing honour to the seat of his illustrious ancestors, and the birth-place of the immortal Shakspeare.

Contending nations ancient Homer claim,
And Mantua glories in her Maro's name,
Our happier soil the prize shall yield to none,
Ardenna's groves shall boast an Addison.—
Your wiser choice prefers this spot of earth,
Distinguish'd by th' immortal Shakspeare's birth;
Where through the vales the fair Avona glides,
And nourishes the glebe with fattening tides—
Here, on the painted borders of the flood
The babe was born, his bed with roses strew'd;
Here, in an ancient venerable dome,
Opprest with grief, we view the poet's tomb!

His compliment to Addison, as a teacher of moral and religious truth, is expressed with admirable felicity and delicacy.

When panting virtue her last efforts made,
You brought your CLIO to the virgin's aid,
Presumptuous Folly blush'd, and Vice withdrew,
To vengeance yielding her abandon'd crew.

He was now distinguished as a poet, and came forward among the rest, with verses to the author of the Essay on Man, and an Epistle to Mr. Thomson, on the first edition of his Seasons.

He was no less distinguished as an accomplished gentleman, an active and skilful sportsman, and a useful justice of the peace.

Inheriting an estate of fifteen hundred a-year, he lived chiefly in the country; and set a good example to men of his own class, by devoting part of his time to elegant knowledge; the subjects which his poetry has adorned, show that it is practicable to be at once a skilful sportsman and a man of letters.

He was a man of high spirit; and seems to have practised an unbounded hospitality, and to have been wholly negligent of economy, by which he impaired his fortune, and subjected himself to distresses, which met with but little commiseration from his unfeeling neighbours.

In 1730, he concluded a bargain with James Lord Somerville (who claimed and obtained, in 1722, the ancient peerage that had been dormant since 1618), for the reversion of his estate at his death.

His connection with Lord Somerville probably occasioned his poetical correspondence with Ramsay, who was patronised by that nobleman.

He was the intimate friend of Shenstone, who was his neighbour, and by whom he was too much resembled in his negligence of economy.

"I loved Mr. Somerville," says Shenstone, "because he knew so perfectly what belonged to the flocci-nauci-nihili-pilification of money."

In the latter part of his life, he wrote The Chase, which raised his reputation very high among sportsmen, and men of letters, and by which he is best known. It is written with equal vigour and elegance, and justly ranks among the best didactic poems in the English language.

It was followed by Hobbinol, a burlesque poem, dedicated to Hogarth; and Field Sports, a poem on hawking, addressed to Frederick Prince of Wales, and printed in 1742.

"Mr. Somerville's poem upon hawking, called Field Sports," says Shenstone, in his letter to Mr. Graves, "was sent to Mr. Lyttleton, to be read to the Prince, to whom it is inscribed. It seems he is fond of hawking."

Of the close of his life, those whom his poems have delighted, will read with pain the following account, copied from the letters of his friend Shenstone.

"Our old friend Somerville is dead! I did not imagine I could have been so sorry as I find myself upon this occasion. Sublatum quærimus. I can now excuse all his foibles, impute them to age, and to distress of circumstances; the last of these considerations wrings my very soul to think on. For a man of high spirit, conscious of having (at least in one production) generally pleased the world, to be plagued and threatened by wretches that are very low in every sense; to be forced to drink himself into pains of the body, in order to get rid of the pains of the mind, is a misery."

He died July 19, 1742, in the 50th year of his age, and was buried at Wotton, near Henley, on Arden.

His estate, inherited from a long line of ancestors, devolved to Lord Somerville, chargeable with a jointure of six hundred a-year to his mother, who lived till ninety.

His Chase, Hobbinol, and Field Sports, have been frequently printed; and are inserted with his Occasional Poems, Translations, Fables, and Tales, in the collection of the "English Poets" 1779, and 1790.

From Lady Luxborough's "Letters to Shenstone," p. 211, it appears that he translated Alzire, from Voltaire, which was then in MS., in her possession; together with several "little poems and impromptus, which," she says, "are, for the most part, too trivial or too local for the press."

Somerville is, by his contemporaries, allowed to have been a man of very great benevolence, and of very agreeable manners.

Shenstone, who knew him well, has transmitted to posterity a very advantageous idea of his private character, as well as his capacity as a poet.

Near Avon's banks, on Arden's flowery plain,
A tuneful shepherd charm'd the list'ning wave,
And funny Cotfol' fondly lov'd the swain;
Yet not a garland crowns the shepherd's grave.

Oh lost Ophelia! smoothly flow'd the day,
To feel his music with my flames agree,
To taste the beauties of his melting lay,
To taste, and fancy it was dear to thee!

When, for his tomb, with each revolving year,
I steal the musk rose from the scented brake,
I strew my cowslips, and I pay my tear;
I'll add the myrtle for Ophelia's sake.——Eleg. xviii.

He was much esteemed for his amiable and estimable qualities by Lady Luxborough, the sister of Lord Bolingbroke; who "seemed," says Shenstone, "in all respects the female Lord Bolingbroke." Her correspondence with Shenstone exhibits many unequivocal testimonies of her veneration for his virtue and his genius. "I return," says she, "Mr. Somerville's picture. I think it very like Worledge's, and indeed very like Mr. Somerville; but, methinks, it scarcely does him justice, as some of the least agreeable features in his face are rather too strongly marked; as under the eyes, for example; and I think, as he was very fair, the pencil might be fainter. But, upon the whole, had I not another of him, I would not give this for a great sum." In another place: "As to the urn for Mr. Somerville, my present design is to place it under the great double oak, as himself expresses it, "under the oak's protecting shade." It will be like raising a throne as well as a monument for Mr. Somerville; and, could he see it, he would, I believe, think himself more honourably placed, than if he was kicked down below one's feet, which might offend his elevated spirit." Again: "Mr. Allen proposes, that below where Mr. Somerville's name, &c. is placed, should be added,

Multis ille bonis flebiliis occidit."

I think with him, that this motto will record him as a man who deserved the esteem of every good man, and was regretted accordingly. But you and I may both be in the right in agreeing to the inscription's being in English.

Sacred to the Memory of
WILLIAM SOMERVILE, ESQUIRE.

"I am charmed with your thought of alluding to the Chase, which you very justly say would be the most proper ornament, a wreath and French-born. As the reason of my erecting it is to be plainly understood to mean no more than my esteem for him as a worthy man, and a good poet, who had honoured me with his friendship, I should like the whole to be as plain as possible; that is to say, as far as is consistent with expressing my friendship for Mr. Somerville, and his poetical genius, trophies of which must undoubtedly be on one side the urn. Neither would I have it expensive; but I would express with as much simplicity as possible, my respect for his memory, without flattery or pomp; and that it was my friendship only which made me raise this memorandum of him. So that my first thought of all was, only to have had an altar, without any urn, and something wrote upon it equivalent to what you have put round the blazing altar you drew out in your letter, viz. Sacred to Friendship, or to that effect." In her letter, April 25, 1750, she writes: "As to the urn, I told you it was erected. As the motto Mr. Allen, and that you had chose, cannot, in your opinion, be on each side the same plinth, and neither of them singly take in both the moral and the poetical character of Mr. Somerville, nor my friendship, I searched Francis's Horace, with a view to find one only that should express, in some measure, the whole. The motto is,

Debita sparge lacryma favillam
Vatis Amici.

This upon the plinth, and under it on the pedestal over the wreath, Mr. Somerville's name in Latin, and ^{H. L.}_{P.} and, at bottom, the date of the year he died, because of the word favillam. I do not imagine Author of the Chase can be put agreeably into Latin; and, I confess, it appears to me, that the emblematical born, wreathed with laurel, will suffice to put all who know him, in mind of that poetical performance, without any explanation by words."

His character as a poet, as given by Dr. Johnson, may be generally allowed, with some exception to his unreasonable dislike of blank verse and burlesque poetry.

"Somerville has tried many modes of poetry; and though perhaps he has not in any reached such excellence as to raise much envy, it may commonly be said, at least, that "he writes very well for a gentleman." His serious pieces are sometimes elevated, and his trifles are sometimes elegant. In his Verses to Addison, the couplet which mentions CLIO, is written with the most exquisite delicacy of praise; it exhibits one of those happy strokes that are seldom attained. In his Odes to Marlborough, there are beautiful lines. His subjects are commonly such as require no great depth of thought, or energy of expression. His Fables are generally stale; and therefore excite no curiosity. Of his favourite, The Two Springs, the fiction is unnatural, and the moral inconsequential. In his Tales, there is too much coarseness, with too little ease of language, and not sufficient rapidity of narration.

“ His great work is his Chase, which he undertook in his maturer age, when his ear was improved to the approbation of blank verse; of which, however, his two first lines give a bad specimen. To this poem praise cannot be totally denied. He is allowed by sportsmen, to write with great intelligence of his subject, which is the first requisite to excellence; and, though it is impossible to interest the common readers of verse, in the dangers or pleasures of the chase, he has done all that transition and variety could effect; and has, with great propriety, enlarged his plan, by the modes of hunting used in other countries.

“ With still less judgment did he choose blank verse as the vehicle of Rural Sports. If blank verse be not tumid and gorgeous, it is crippled prose—and familiar images in laboured language, have nothing to recommend them but absurd novelty, which, wanting the attractions of nature, cannot please long.—One excellence of the “Splendid Shilling,” is, that it is short. Disguise can gratify no longer than it deceives.”

THE WORKS OF SOMERVILLE.

PREFACE.

THE old and infirm have at least this privilege, that they can recal to their minds those scenes of joy in which they once delighted, and ruminate over their past pleasures, with a satisfaction almost equal to the first enjoyment. For those ideas, to which any agreeable sensation is annexed, are easily excited; as leaving behind the most strong and permanent impressions. The amusements of our youth are the boast and comfort of our declining years. The ancients carried this notion even yet further, and supposed their heroes in the Elysian fields were fond of the very same diversions they exercised on earth. Death itself could not wean them from the accustomed sports and gaieties of life.

"Pars in gramineis exercent membra palæstris;

"Contendunt ludo, et sulvâ luctantur arenâ :

"Pars pedibus plaudunt choreas, et carmina dicunt.

"Arma procul, currûsque virûm miratur inanes.

"Stant terrâ defixæ hastæ, passimque soluti

"Per campum pascuntur equi. Quæ gratia currûm

"Armorumque fuit vivis, quæ cura nitentes

"Pascere equos, eadem sequitur tellure repositos."———VIRG. Æneid. vi.

Part on the grassy cirque their pliant limbs
In wrestling exercise, or on the sands
Struggling dispute the prize. Part lead the ring,
Or swell the chorus with alternate lays.
The chief their arms admire, their empty cars,
Their lances fix'd in earth. Th' unharness'd
steeds

Graze unrestrain'd; horses, and cars, and arms,
All the same fond desires, and pleasing cares,
Still haunt their shades, and after death survive.

I hope, therefore, I may be indulged (even by the more grave and censorious part of mankind) if at my leisure hours, I run over, in my elbow-chair, some of those chases, which were once the delight of a more vigorous age. It is an entertaining, and (as I conceive) a very innocent amusement. The result of these rambling imaginations will be found in the following poem; which, if equally diverting to my readers, as to myself, I shall have gained my end. I have intermixed the preceptive parts with so many descriptions and digressions, in the Georgic manner, that I hope they will not be tedious. I am sure they are very necessary to be well understood by any gentleman, who would enjoy this noble sport in full perfection. In this, at least, I may comfort myself, that I cannot trespass upon their patience more than Markham, Blome, and the other prose writers upon this subject.

It is most certain, that hunting was the exercise of the greatest heroes in antiquity. By this they formed themselves for war; and their exploits against wild beasts were a prelude to their other victories. Xenophon says, that almost all the ancient heroes, Nestor, Theseus, Castor, Pollux, Ulyssus, Diomedes, Achilles, &c. were μαθηταὶ κυνηγετικῶν, disciples of hunting; being taught carefully that art, as what would be highly serviceable to them in military discipline. Xen. Cynegetic. And Pliny observes, those who were designed for great captains, were first taught "certare cum fugacibus feris cursu, cum audacibus robore, cum callidis astu:" to contest with the swiftest wild beasts, in speed; with the boldest, in strength; with the most cunning, in craft and subtilty. Plin. Panegy. And the Roman emperors, in those monuments they erected, to transmit their actions to future ages, made no scruple to join the glories of the chase to their most celebrated triumphs. Neither were their poets wanting to do justice to this heroic exercise. Beside that of Oppian in Greek, we have several poems in Latin upon hunting. Gratus was contemporary with Ovid; as appears by this verse:

"Aptaque venanti Gratus arma dabit."

Lib. iv. Pont.

Gratus shall arm the huntsman for the chase.

But of his works only some fragments remain. There are many others of more modern date. Amongst these Nemesianus, who seems very much superior to Gratus, though of a more degenerate age. But only a fragment of his first book is preserved. We might indeed have expected to have seen it treated more at large by Virgil, in his third Georgic, since it is expressly part of his subject. But he has favoured us only with ten verses; and what he says of dogs, relates wholly to greyhounds and mastiffs.

"Veloces Spartæ catulos, acremque Molossū."
Georg. iii.

The greyhound swift, and mastiff's furious breed.

And he directs us to feed them with butter-milk. "Pasce sero pingui." He has, it is true, touched upon the Chase, in the 4th and 7th books of the Æneid. But it is evident, that the art of hunting is very different now from what it was in his days, and very much altered and improved in these latter ages. It does not appear to me, that the ancients had any notion of pursuing wild beasts by the scent only, with a regular and well-disciplined pack of hounds; and therefore they must have passed for poachers amongst our modern sportsmen. The muster-roll, given us by Ovid, in his story of Actæon, is of all sorts of dogs, and of all countries. And the description of the ancient hunting, as we find it in the antiquities of Pere de Montfaucon, taken from the sepulchre of the Nafos, and the arch of Constantine, has not the least trace of the manner now in use.

Whenever the ancients mention dogs followed by the scent, they mean no more than finding out the game by the nose of one single dog. This was as much as they knew of the "odora canum vis." Thus Nemesianus says,

"Odorato noscunt vestigia prato,
"Atque etiam leporum secreta cubilia mon-
"strant."

They challenge on the mead the recent stains,
And trail the hare unto her secret form.

Oppian has a long description of these dogs in his first book, from ver. 479 to 526. And here, though he seems to describe the hunting of the hare by the scent through many turnings and windings; yet he really says no more, than that one of those hounds, which he calls ixvovnges, finds out the game. For he follows the scent no further than the hare's form; from whence, after he has started her, he pursues her by sight. I am indebted for these two last remarks to a reverend and very learned gentleman, whose judgment in the Belles Lettres nobody disputes, and whose approbation gave me the assurance to publish this poem.

Oppian also observes, that the best sort of these finders were brought from Britain; this island having always been famous (as it is at this day) for the best breed of hounds, for persons the best skilled in the art of hunting, and for horses the most enduring to follow the chase. It is therefore strange that none of our poets have yet thought it worth their while to treat of this subject; which is without doubt very noble in itself, and very well adapted to receive the most beautiful turns of poetry. Perhaps our poets have no great genius for hunting. Yet I hope, my brethren of the couples, by encouraging this first, but imperfect, essay, will show the world they have at least some taste for poetry.

The ancients esteemed hunting, not only as a manly and warlike exercise, but as highly conducive to health. The famous Galen recommends it above all others, as not only exercising the body, but giving delight and entertainment to the mind. And he calls the inventors of this art wise men, and well skilled in human nature. Lib. de parvæ pilæ exercitio.

The gentlemen, who are fond of a gingle at the close of every verse, and think no poem truly musical, but what is in rhyme, will here find themselves disappointed. If they be pleased to read over the short preface before the Paradise Lost, Mr. Smith's poem in memory of his friend Mr. John Philips, and the Archbishop of Cambray's letter to Monsieur Fontenelle, they may probably be of another opinion. For my own part, I shall not be ashamed to follow the example of Milton, Philips, Thomson, and all our best tragic writers.

Some few terms of art are dispersed here and there; but such only as are absolutely requisite to explain my subject. I hope in this the critics will excuse me; for I am humbly of opinion, that the affectation, and not the necessary use, is the proper object of their censure.

But I have done. I know the impatience of my brethren, when a fine day, and the concert of the kennel, invite them abroad. I shall therefore leave my reader to such diversion as he may find in the poem itself.

Hark, away,
Cast far behind the lingering cares of life.

RECOMMENDATORY POEMS.

TO WILLIAM SOMERVILE, Esq.

ON HIS POEM CALLED THE CHASE.

WHILE you, Sir, gain the steep ascent to fame,
 And honours due to deathless merit claim;
 To a weak muse a kind indulgence lend,
 Fond with just praise your labours to commend,
 And tell the world that Somervile's her friend. }
 Her incense guiltless of the forms of art
 Breathes all the huntsman's honesty of heart;
 Whose fancy still the pleasing scene retains
 Of Edric's villa, and Ardenna's plains:
 Joys, which from change superior charms receiv'd,
 The horn hoarse sounding by the lyre reliev'd:
 When the day crown'd with rural chaste delight,
 Relinquishes obsequious to the festive night;
 The festive night awakes th' harmonious lay,
 And in sweet verse recounts the triumphs of the day.

Strange! that the British muse should leave so long,

The chase, the sport of Britain's kings, unsung!
 Distinguish'd land! by Heaven indulg'd to breed,
 The stout, sagacious hound, and generous steed;
 In vain! while yet no bard adorn'd our isle,
 To celebrate the glorious sylvan toil.
 For this what darling son shall feel thy fire,
 God of th' unerring bow, and tuneful lyre?
 Our vows are heard.—Attend, ye vocal throng,
 Somervile meditates th' adventurous song.
 Bold to attempt, and happy to excel,
 His numerous verse the huntsman's art shall tell.
 From him, ye British youths, a vigorous race,
 Imbibe the various science of the chase;
 And while the well-plann'd system you admire,
 Know Brunswick only could the work inspire;
 A Georgic muse awaits Augustan days,
 And Somervile's will sing, when Frederick's give the bays.

JOHN NIXON.

TO THE

AUTHOR OF THE CHASE.

ONCE more, my friend, I touch the trembling lyre,
 And in my bosom feel poetic fire.
 For thee I quit the law's more rugged ways,
 To pay my humble tribute to thy lays,
 What, though I daily turn each learned sage,
 And labour through the unenlighten'd page:
 Wak'd by thy lines, the borrow'd flames I feel,
 As flints give fire when aided by the steel.
 Though in sulphureous clouds of smoke confin'd,
 Thy rural scenes spring fresh into my mind.
 Thy genius in such colours paints the chase,
 The real to fictitious joys give place.
 When the wild music charms my ravish'd ear,
 How dull, how tasteless Handel's notes appear!
 Ev'n Farinelli's self the palm resigns,
 He yields—but to the music of thy lines.
 If friends to poetry can yet be found;
 Who without blushing sense prefer to sound;
 Then let this soft, this soul-enslaving band,
 These warbling minstrels, quit the beggar'd land.
 They but a momentary joy impart,
 'Tis you, who touch the soul, and warm the heart.
 How tempting do thy sylvan sports appear!
 Ev'n wild Ambition might vouchsafe an ear,
 Might her fond lust of power a while compose,
 And gladly change it for thy sweet repose.
 No fierce, unruly senates, threaten here,
 No axe, no scaffold, to the view appear,
 No envy, disappointment, and despair. }
 Here, blest vicissitude, whene'er you please,
 You step from exercise to learned ease:
 Turn o'er each classic page, each beauty trace,
 The mind unwearied in the pleasing chase.
 Oh! would kind Heaven such happiness bestow,
 Let fools, let knaves, be masters here below.
 Grandeur and place, those baits to catch the wise,
 And all their pageant train, I pity and despise.

THE CHASE.

BOOK I.

"Nec tibi cura canum fuerit postrema."—VIRG. Georg. iii.

"Romanis solenne viris opus, utile famæ,

"Vitæque, et membris."—HOR. 1 Ep. xviii.

THE ARGUMENT.

The subject proposed. Address to his Royal Highness the Prince. The origin of hunting. The rude and unpolished manner of the first hunters. Beasts at first hunted for food and sacrifice. The grant made by God to man of the beasts, &c. The regular manner of hunting first brought into this island by the Normans. The best hounds and best horses bred here. The advantage of this exercise to us, as islanders. Address to gentlemen of estates. Situation of the kennel and its several courts. The diversion and employment of hounds in the kennel. The different sorts of hounds for each different chase. Description of a perfect hound. Of sizing and sorting of hounds, the middle-sized hound recommended. Of the large deep-mouthed hound for hunting the stag and otter. Of the lime-hound; their use on the borders of England and Scotland. A physical account of scents. Of good and bad scenting days. A short admonition to my brethren of the couples.

THE Chase I sing, hounds, and their various breed,
And no less various use. O thou great prince!
Whom Cambria's towering hills proclaim their lord,
Deign thou to hear my bold, instructive song.
While grateful citizens with pompous show,
Rear the triumphal arch, rich with th' exploits
Of thy illustrious house; while virgins pave
Thy way with flowers, and, as the royal youth
Passing they view, admire and sigh in vain;
While crowded theatres, too fondly proud
Of their exotic minstrels, and shrill pipes,
The price of manhood, hail thee with a song,
And airs soft warbling; my hoarse-sounding horn
Invites thee to the Chase, the sport of kings;
Image of war, without its guilt. The muse
Aloft on wing shall soar, conduct with care
Thy foaming courser o'er the steepy rock,
Or on the river bank receive thee safe,
Light-bounding o'er the wave, from shore to shore.
Be thou our great protector, gracious youth!

And if, in future times, some envious prince,
Careless of right and guileful, should invade
Thy Britain's commerce, or should strive in vain
To wrest the balance from thy equal hand;
Thy hunter-train, in cheerful green array'd,
(A band undaunted, and innur'd to toils)
Shall compass thee around, die at thy feet,
Or hew thy passage through th' embattled foe,
And clear thy way to fame: inspir'd by thee
The nobler chase of glory shall pursue
Through fire, and smoke, and blood, and fields of death.

Nature, in her productions slow, aspires
By just degrees to reach perfection's height:
So mimic art works leisurely, till time
Improve the piece, or wise experience give
The proper finishing. When Nimrod bold,
That mighty hunter, first made war on beasts,
And stain'd the woodland-green with purple dye,
New, and unpolish'd was the huntsman's art;
No stated rule, his wanton will his guide.
With clubs and stones, rude implements of war,
He arm'd his savage bands, a multitude
Untrain'd; of twining osiers form'd, they pitch
Their artless toils, then range the desert hills,
And scour the plains below; the trembling herd
Start at th' unusual sound, and clamorous shout
Unheard before; surpris'd, alas! to find [lord,
Man now their foe, when erst they deem'd their
But mild and gentle, and by whom as yet
Secure they graz'd. Death stretches o'er the plain
Wide-wasting, and grim slaughter red with blood:
Urg'd on by hunger keen, they wound, they kill,
Their rage licentious knows no bound; at last,
Incumber'd with their spoils, joyful they bear
Upon their shoulders broad the bleeding prey.
Part on their altars smoke a sacrifice
To that all-gracious power, whose bounteous hand
Supports his wide creation; what remains
On living coals they broil, inelegant
Of taste, nor skill'd as yet in nicer arts
Of pamper'd luxury. Devotion pure,
And strong necessity, thus first began

The chase of beasts: though bloody was the deed,
Yet without guilt. For the green herb alone
Unequal to sustain man's labouring race,
Now every moving thing that liv'd on earth
Was granted him for food*. So just is Heaven,
To give us in proportion to our wants.

Or chance or industry in after-time
Some few improvements made, but short as yet
Of due perfection. In this isle remote,
Our painted ancestors were slow to learn,
To arms devote, of the politer arts
Nor skill'd nor studious; till from Neustria's coasts
Victorious William, to more decent rules
Subdu'd our Saxon fathers, taught to speak
The proper dialect, with horn and voice
To cheer the busy hound, whose well-known cry
His listening peers approve with joint acclaim.
From him successive huntsmen learn'd to join
In bloody social leagues, the multitude
Dispers'd, to size, to sort their various tribes,
To rear, feed, hunt, and discipline the pack.

Hail, happy Britain! highly favour'd isle,
And Heav'n's peculiar care! To thee 'tis given
To train the sprightly steed, more fleet than those Begot by winds, or the celestial breed
That bore the great Pelides through the press
Of heroes arm'd, and broke their crowded ranks;
Which proudly neighing, with the sun begins
Cheerful his course? and ere his beams decline,
Has measur'd half thy surface unfatigu'd.
In thee alone, fair land of liberty!
Is bred the perfect hound, in scent and speed
As yet unrival'd, while in other climes
Their virtue fails, a weak degenerate race,
In vain malignant steams and winter fogs
Load the dull air, and hover round our coasts,
The huntsman ever gay, robust, and bold,
Defies the noxious vapour, and confides
In this delightful exercise, to raise
His drooping head, and cheer his heart with joy.

Ye vigorous youths, by smiling fortune blest
With large demesnes, hereditary wealth,
Heap'd copious by your wise forefathers care,
Hear and attend! while I the means reveal
T' enjoy those pleasures, for the weak too strong,
Too costly for the poor: To rein the steed
Swift-stretching o'er the plain, to cheer the pack,
Opening in consorts of harmonious joy,
But breathing death. What though the gripe severe
Of brazen-fisted Time, and slow disease
Creeping through every vein, and nerve unstrung,
Afflict my shatter'd frame, undaunted still,
Fix'd as a mountain ash, that braves the bolts
Of angry Jove; though blasted, yet unfallen;
Still can my soul in Fancy's mirror view
Deeds glorious once, recal the joyous scene
In all its splendours deck'd, o'er the full bowl
Recount my triumphs past, urge others on
With hand and voice, and point the winding way:
Pleas'd with that social sweet garrulity,
The poor disbanded veteran's sole delight.

First let the kennel be the huntsman's care,
Upon some little eminence erect,

And fronting to the ruddy dawn; its courts
On either hand wide opening to receive
The sun's all-cheering beams, when mild he shines,
And gilds the mountain tops. For much the pack
(Rous'd from their dark alcoves) delight to stretch
And bask in his invigorating ray:
Warn'd by the streaming light and merry lark,
Forth rush the jolly clan; with tuneful throats
They carol loud, and in grand chorus join'd
Salute the new-born day. For not alone
The vegetable world, but men and brutes
Own his reviving influence, and joy
At his approach. Fountain of light: if chance
Some envious cloud veil thy refulgent brow,
In vain the muses aid; untouch'd, unstrung,
Lies my mute harp, and thy desponding bard
Sits darkly musing o'er th' unfinish'd lay.

Let no Corinthian pillars prop the dome,
A vain expence, on charitable deeds
Better dispos'd, to clothe the tatter'd wretch,
Who shrinks beneath the blast, to feed the poor
Pinch'd with afflictive want: For use, not state,
Gracefully plain, let each apartment rise.
O'er all let cleanliness preside, no scraps
Bestrew the pavement, and no half-pick'd bones
To kindle fierce debate, or to disgust
That nicer sense, on which the sportsman's hope,
And all his future triumphs, must depend.
Soon as the growling pack with eager joy
Have lapp'd their smoking viands, morn or eve,
From the full cistern lead the ductile streams,
To wash thy court well pav'd, nor spare thy pains,
For much to health will cleanliness avail.
Seek'st thou for hounds to climb the rocky steep
And brush th' entangled covert, whose nice scent
O'er greasy fallows and frequented roads
Can pick the dubious way. Banish far off
Each noisome stench, let no offensive smell
Invade thy wide enclosure, but admit
The nitrous air and purifying breeze.

Water and shade no less demand thy care:
In a large square th' adjacent field enclose,
There plant in equal ranks the spreading elm,
Or fragrant lime; most happy thy design,
If at the bottom of thy spacious court,
A large canal, fed by the crystal brook,
From its transparent bosom shall reflect
Downward thy structure and inverted grove.
Here when the sun's too potent gleams annoy
The crowded kennel, and the drooping pack,
Restless, and faint, loll their unmoisten'd tongues,
And drop their feeble tails, to cooler shades
Lead forth the panting tribe; soon shalt thou find
The cordial breeze their fainting hearts revive:
Tumultuous soon they plunge into the stream,
There lave their reeking sides, with greedy joy
Gulp down the flying wave, this way and that
From shore to shore they swim, while clamour loud
And wild uproar torments the troubled flood:
Then on the sunny bank they roll and stretch
Their dripping limbs, or else in wanton rings
Courting around, pursuing and pursued,
The merry multitude disporting play.

But here with watchful and observant eye,
Attend their frolics, which too often end

* Gen. chap. ix. ver 3.

In bloody broils and death. High o'er thy head
Wave thy resounding whip, and with a voice
Fierce-menacing o'er-rule the stern debate,
And quench their kindling rage; for oft in sport
Begun, combat ensues, growling they snarl,
Then on their haunches rear'd, rampant they seize
Each other's throats, with teeth and claws in gore
Besmear'd, they wound, they tear, till on the ground,

Panting, half dead the conquer'd champion lies:
Then sudden all the base ignoble crowd
Loud-clamouring seize the helpless worried wretch,
And, thirsting for his blood, drag different ways
His mangled carcase on th' ensanguin'd plain.
O breasts of pity void! t' oppress the weak,
To point your vengeance at the friendless head,
And with one mutual cry insult the fall'n!
Emblem too just of man's degenerate race.

Others apart, by native instinct led,
Knowing instructor! 'mong the ranker grass
Cull each salubrious plant, with bitter juice
Concoctive stor'd, and potent to allay
Each vicious ferment. Thus the hand divine
Of Providence, beneficent and kind
To all his creatures, for the brutes prescribes
A ready remedy, and is himself
Their great physician. Now grown stiff with age,
And many a painful chase, the wise old hound,
Regardless of the frolic pack, attends
His master's side, or slumbers at his ease
Beneath the bending shade; there many a ring
Runs o'er in dreams; now on the doubtful soil
Puzzles perplex'd, or doubles intricate
Cautious unfolds, then wing'd with all his speed,
Bounds o'er the lawn to seize his panting prey:
And in imperfect whimperings speaks his joy.

A different hound for every different chase
Select with judgment; nor the timorous hare
O'ermatch'd destroy, but leave that vile offence
To the mean, murderous, coursing crew; intent
On blood and spoil. O blast their hopes, just Heaven!

And all their painful drudgeries repay
With disappointment and severe remorse.
But husband thou thy pleasures, and give scope
To all her subtle play: by nature led
A thousand shifts she tries; t' unravel these
Th' industrious beagle twists his waving tail,
Through all her labyrinths pursues, and rings
Her doleful knell. See there with countenance blithe,

And with a courtly grin, the fawning hound
Salutes thee cowering, his wide opening nose
Upward he curls, and his large floe-black eyes
Melt in soft blandishments, and humble joy!
His glossy skin, or yellow-pied, or blue,
In lights or shades by Nature's pencil drawn,
Reflects the various tints: his ears and legs
Fleck'd here and there, in gay enamel'd pride,
Rival the speckled pard; his rush-grown tail
O'er his broad back bends in an ample arch;
On shoulders clean, upright and firm he stands;
His round cat foot, strait ham, and wide-spread thighs,

And his low-dropping chest, confess his speed,

His strength, his wind, or on the steepy hill,
Or far-extended plain; in every part
So well proportion'd that the nicer skill
Of Phidias himself can't blame thy choice.
Of such compose thy pack. But here a mean
Observe, nor the large hound prefer, of size
Gigantic; he in the thick-woven covert
Painfully tugs, or in the thorny brake
Torn and embarrass'd bleeds; but if too small,
The pigmy brood in every furrow swims;
Moil'd in the clogging clay, panting they lag
Behind inglorious; or else shivering creep
Benumb'd and faint beneath the sheltering thorn.
For hounds of middle size, active and strong,
Will better answer all thy various ends,
And crown thy pleasing labours with success.

As some brave captain, curious and exact
By his fix'd standard forms in equal ranks
His gay battalion, as one man they move
Step after step, their size the same, their arms
Far-gleaming, dart the same united blaze:
Reviewing generals his merit own;
How regular! how just! And all his cares
Are well repaid, if mighty George approve.
So model thou thy pack, if honour touch
Thy generous soul, and the world's just applause.
But above all take heed, nor mix thy hounds
Of different kinds; discordant sounds shall grate
Thy ears offended, and a lagging line
Of babbling curs disgrace thy broken pack.
But if th' amphibious otter be thy chase,
Or stately stag, that o'er the woodland reigns;
Or if the harmonious thunder of the field
Delight thy ravish'd ears; the deep flew'd hound
Breed up with care, strong, heavy, slow, but sure;
Whose ears down-hanging from his thick round
head

Shall sweep the morning dew, whose clanging voice
Awake the mountain echo in her cell,
And shake the forests: The bold Talbot kind
Of these the prime; as white as Alpine snows;
And great their use of old. Upon the banks
Of Tweed, slow winding through the vale, the seat
Of war and rapine once, ere Britons knew
The sweets of peace, or Anna's dread commands
To lasting leagues the haughty rivals aw'd,
There dwelt a pilfering race; well train'd and skill'd

In all the mysteries of theft, the spoil
Their only substance, feuds and war their sport:
Not more expert in every fraudulent art
Th' arch* felon was of old, who by the tail
Drew back his lowing prize: in vain his wiles,
In vain the shelter of the covering rock,
In vain the footy cloud, and ruddy flames
That issued from his mouth; for soon he paid
His forfeit life: a debt how justly due
To wrong'd Alcides, and avenging heaven!
Veil'd in the shades of night they ford the stream,
Then prowling far and near, whate'er they seize
Becomes their prey; nor flocks nor herds are safe.
Nor stalls protect the steer, nor strong-barr'd doors
Secure the favourite horse. Soon as the morn

* Cacus, Virg. Æn. lib. viii.

Reveals his wrongs, with ghastly visage wan
The plunder'd owner stands, and from his lips
A thousand thronging curses burst their way :
He calls his stout allies, and in a line
His faithful hound he leads, then with a voice
That utters loud his rage, attentive cheers :
Soon the sagacious brute, his curling tail
Flourish'd in air, low bending plies around
His busy nose, the steaming vapour snuffs
Inquisitive, nor leaves one turf untried,
Till, conscious of the recent stains, his heart
Beats quick ; his snuffing nose, his active tail,
Attest his joy ; then with deep opening mouth,
That makes the welkin tremble, he proclaims
'Th' audacious felon ; foot by foot he marks
His winding way, while all the listening crowd
Applaud his reasonings. O'er the watery ford,
Dry sandy heaths, and stony barren hills,
O'er beaten paths, with men and beasts distain'd,
Unerring he pursues ; till at the cot
Arriv'd, and seizing by his guilty throat
The caitif vile, redeems the captive prey :
So exquisitely delicate his sense ! [quire

Should some more curious sportsman here in-
Whence this sagacity, this wondrous power
Of tracing step by step, or man or brute ?
What guide invisible points out their way,
O'er the dank marsh, bleak hill, and sandy plain ?
The courteous muse shall the dark cause reveal.
The blood that from the heart incessant rolls
In many a crimson tide, then here and there
In smaller rills disparted, as it flows
Propell'd, the ferous particles evade
'Through th' open pores, and with the ambient air
Entangling mix. As fuming vapours rise,
And hang upon the gently purling brook,
There by th' incumbent atmosphere compress'd.
The panting chase grows warmer as he flies,
And through the net-work of the skin perspires ;
Leaves a long streaming trail behind, which by
The cooler air condens'd, remains, unless
By some rude storm dispers'd, or rarified
By the meridian sun's intenser heat.
To every shrub the warm effluvia cling,
Hang on the grass, impregnate earth and skies.
With nostrils opening wide, o'er hill, o'er dale
The vigorous hounds pursue, with every breath
Inhale the grateful steam, quick pleasures sting
Their tingling nerves, while they their thanks re-
pay,

And in triumphant melody confess
The titillating joy. Thus on the air
Depend the hunter's hopes. When ruddy streaks
At eve forebode a blustering stormy day,
Or lowering clouds blacken the mountain's brow,
When nipping frosts, and the keen biting blasts
Of the dry parching east, menace the trees
With tender blossoms teeming, kindly spare
Thy sleeping pack, in their warm beds of straw
Low-sinking at their ease ; listless they shrink
Into some dark recess, nor hear thy voice
Though oft invoc'd ; or haply if thy call
Rouse up the slumbering tribe, with heavy eyes
Glaz'd, lifeless, dull, downward they drop their tails

Inverted ; high on their bent backs erect
Their pointed bristles stare, or 'mong the tufts
Of ranker weeds, each stomach-healing plant
Curious they crop, sick, spiritless, forlorn.
These inauspicious days, on other cares
Employ thy precious hours ; th' improving friend
With open arms embrace, and from his lips
Glean science, season'd with good-natur'd wit.
But if th' inclement skies and angry Jove
Forbid the pleasing intercourse, thy books
Invite thy ready hand, each sacred page
Rich with the wise remarks of heroes old.
Converse familiar with th' illustrious dead ;
With great examples of old Greece or Rome,
Enlarge thy free-born heart, and bless kind Heaven,
That Britain yet enjoys dear liberty,
That balm of life, that sweetest blessing, cheap
Though purchas'd with our blood. Well bred, polite,

Credit thy calling. See ! how mean, how low,
The bookless sauntering youth, proud of the skut
That dignifies his cap, his flourish'd belt,
And rusty couples gingling by his side.
Be thou of other mold ; and know that such
Transporting pleasures were by Heaven ordain'd
Wisdom's relief, and virtue's great reward.

BOOK II.

THE ARGUMENT.

Of the power of instinct in brutes. Two remarkable instances in the hunting of the roebuck, and in the hare going to seat in the morning. Of the variety of seats or forms of the hare, according to the change of the season, weather, or wind.
Description of the hare-hunting in all its parts, interspersed with rules to be observed by those who follow that chase. Transition to the Asiatic way of hunting, particularly the magnificent manner of the Great Mogul, and other Tartar-ian princes, taken from Monsieur Bernier, and the history of Gengiskan the Great. Concludes with a short reproof of tyrants and oppressors of mankind.

Nor will it less delight th' attentive sage
T' observe that instinct, which unerring guides
The brutal race, which mimic's reason's lore,
And oft transcends : Heaven-taught, the roe-buck swift

Loiters at ease before the driving pack
And mocks their vain pursuit, nor far he flies,
But checks his ardour, till the steaming scent
That freshens on the blade, provokes their rage.
Urg'd to their speed, his weak deluded foes
Soon flag fatigued ; strain'd to excess each nerve,
Each slacken'd sinew fails ; they pant, they foam ;
Then o'er the lawn he hounds, o'er the high hills
Stretches secure, and leaves the scatter'd crowd
To puzzle in the distant vale below.

'Tis instinct that directs the jealous hare
To choose her soft abode : With step revers'd
She forms the doubling maze ; then, ere the morn
Peeps through the clouds, leaps to her close recess,

As wandering shepherds on th' Arabian plains
No settled residence observe, but shift
Their moving camp, now, on some cooler hill
With cedars crown'd, court the refreshing breeze;
And then, below, where trickling streams distil
From some penurious source, their thirst allay,
And feed their fainting flocks: so the wise hares
Oft quit their seats, lest some more curious eye
Should mark their haunts, and by dark treacherous wiles

Plot their destruction; or perchance in hopes
Of plenteous forage, near the ranker mead,
Or matted blade, wary and close they sit.
When spring shines forth, season of love and joy,
In the moist marsh, 'mong beds of rushes hid,
They cool their boiling blood: When summer suns
Bake the cleft earth, to thick wide waving fields
Of corn full grown, they lead their helpless young:
But when autumnal torrents and fierce rains
Deluge the vale, in the dry crumbling bank
Their forms they delve, and cautiously avoid
The dripping covert: Yet when winter's cold
Their limbs benumbs, thither with speed return'd
In the long grafs they skulk, or shrinking creep
Among the wither'd leaves, thus changing still,
As fancy prompts them, or as food invites.
But every season carefully observ'd,
Th' inconstant winds, the fickle element,
The wise experienc'd huntsman soon may find
His subtle, various game, nor waste in vain
His tedious hours, till his impatient hounds,
With disappointment vex'd, each springing lark
Babbling pursue, far scatter'd o'er the fields.

Now golden Autumn from her open lap
Her fragrant bounties showers; the fields are shorn;

Inwardly smiling, the proud farmer views
The rising pyramids that grace his yard,
And counts his large increase; his barns are stor'd
And groaning saddles bend beneath their load,
All now is free as air, and the gay pack
In the rough bristly stubbles range unblam'd;
No widow's tears o'erflow, no secret curse
Swells in the farmer's breast, which his pale lips
Trembling conceal, by his fierce landlord aw'd:
But courteous now he levels every fence,
Joins in the common cry, and halloos loud,
Charm'd with the rattling thunder of the field.
Oh bear me, some kind power invisible!
To that extended lawn, where the gay court
View the swift racers, stretching to the goal;
Games more renown'd, and a far nobler train,
Than proud Elean fields could boast of old.
Oh! were a Theban lyre not wanting here,
And Pindar's voice, to do their merit right!
Or to those spacious plains, where the strain'd eye
In the wide prospect lost, beholds at last
Saron's proud spire, that o'er the hills ascends,
And pierces through the clouds. Or to thy downs,
Fair Cotswold, where the well-breath'd beagle climbs

With matchless speed, thy green aspiring brow,
And leaves the lagging multitude behind.

Hail, gentle dawn! mild blushing goddess, hail!
Rejoic'd I see thy purple mantle spread

O'er half the skies, gems pave thy radiant way,
And orient pearls from every shrub depend.
Farewell, Cleora; here deep sunk in down
Slumber secure, with happy dreams amus'd,
Till grateful steams shall tempt thee to receive
Thy early meal, or thy officious maids,
The toilet plac'd, shall urge thee to perform
Th' important work. Me other joys invite,
The horn sonorous calls, the pack awak'd
Their mattins chaunt, nor brook my long delay,
My courser hears their voice; see there, with ears
And tail erect, neighing he paws the ground;
Fierce rapture kindles in his reddening eyes,
And boils in every vein. As captive boys
Cow'd by the ruling rod and haughty frowns
Of pedagogues severe, from their hard tasks
If once dismiss'd, no limits can contain
The tumult rais'd within their little breasts,
But give a loose to all their frolic play:
So from their kennel rush the joyous pack;
A thousand wanton gaieties express
Their inward ecstacy, their pleasing sport
Once more indulg'd, and liberty restor'd.
The rising sun, that o'er th' horizon peeps,
As many colours from their glossy skins
Beaming reflects, as paint the various bow
When April showers descend. Delightful scene!
Where all around is gay, men, horses, dogs,
And in each smiling countenance appears
Fresh blooming health, and universal joy.

Huntsman, lead on! behind the clustering pack
Submiss attend, hear with respect thy whip
Loud clanging, and thy harsher voice obey:
Spare not the straggling cur that wildly roves;
But let thy brisk assistant on his back
Imprint thy just resentments; let each lash
Bite to the quick, till howling he return,
And whining creep amid the trembling crowd.

Here on this verdant spot, where nature kind
With double blessings crowns the farmer's hopes;
Where flowers autumnal spring, and the rank
mead

Affords the wandering hares a rich repast;
Throw off thy ready pack. See, where they
spread,

And range around, and dash the glittering dew.
If some staunch hound, with his authentic voice,
Avow the recent trail, the jostling tribe
Attend his call, then with one mutual cry,
The welcome news confirm, and echoing hills
Repeat the pleasing tale. See how they thread
The brakes, and up yon furrow drive along:
But quick they back recoil, and wisely check
Their eager haste; then o'er the fallow'd ground
How leisurely they work, and many a pause
Th' harmonious concert breaks; till more assur'd
With joy redoubled the low vallies ring.
What artful labyrinths perplex their way!
Ah! there she lies; how close! she pants, she doubts

If now she lives; she trembles as she sits,
With horror seiz'd. The wither'd grafs that clings

Around her head, of the same russet hue
Almost deceiv'd my sight, had not her eyes

With life full-beaming her vain wiles betray'd.
At distance draw thy pack, let all be hush'd,
No clamour loud, no frantic joy be heard,
Lest the wild hound run gadding o'er the plain
Untractable, nor hear thy chiding voice.
Now gently put her off; see how direct
To her known mew she flies! Here, huntsman, bring

(But without hurry) all thy jolly hounds,
And calmly lay them in. How low they stoop,
And seem to plough the ground! then all at once
With greedy nostrils snuff the fuming steam
That glads their fluttering hearts. As winds let loose

From the dark caverns of the blustering god,
They burst away, and sweep the dewy lawn.
Hope gives them wings while she's spur'd on by fear,

The welkin rings, men, dogs, hills, rocks, and
In the full concert join. Now, my brave youths,
Stripp'd for the chase, give all your souls to joy!
See how their courfers, than the mountain roe
More fleet, the verdant carpet skim, thick clouds
Snorting they breathe, their shining hoofs scarce print

The grass unbruised; with emulation fir'd
They strain to lead the field, top the barr'd gate,
O'er the deep ditch exulting bound, and brush
The thorny-twining hedge: The riders bend
O'er their arch'd necks; with steady hands, by turns

Indulge their speed, or moderate their rage.
Where are their sorrows, disappointments, wrongs,
Vexations, sickness, cares? All, all are gone,
And with the panting winds lag far behind.

Huntsman! her gait observe; if in wide rings
She wheel her mazy way, in the same round
Persisting still, she'll foil the beaten track,
But if she fly, and with the favouring wind
Urge her bold course; less intricate thy task:
Push on thy pack. Like some poor exil'd wretch
The frighted chase leaves her late dear abodes,
O'er plains remote she stretches far away,
Ah! never to return! For greedy death
Hovering exults, secure to seize his prey.

Hark! from yon covert, where these towering oaks

Above the humble copse aspiring rise,
What glorious triumphs burst in every gale
Upon our ravish'd ears! the hunters shout,
The clanging horns swell their sweet-winding
notes,

The pack wide opening load the trembling air
With various melody; from tree to tree
The propagated cry redoubling bounds,
And winged zephyrs waft the floating joy
Through all the regions near: afflictive birch
No more the school-boy dreads, his prison broke,
Scampering he flies, nor heeds his master's call;
The weary traveller forgets his road,
And climbs th' adjacent hill; the ploughman
leaves

Th' unfinished furrow; nor his bleating flocks
Are now the shepherd's joy! men, boys, and girls,
Desert th' unpeopled village; and wild crowds

Spread o'er the plain, by the sweet frenzy seiz'd.
Look, how she pants! and o'er yon opening glade
Slips glancing by! while, at the further end,
The puzzling back unravel wile by wile,
Maze within maze. The covert's utmost bound
Slily she skirts; behind them cautious creeps
And in that very track, so lately stain'd
By all the steaming crowd, seems to pursue
The foe she flies. Let cavillers deny
That brutes have reason; sure 'tis something more,
'Tis Heaven directs, and stratagems inspires
Beyond the short extent of human thought.
But hold—I see her from the covert break;
Sad on yon little eminence she sits;
Intent she listens with one ear erect,
Pondering, and doubtful what new course to take,
And how t' escape the fierce blood-thirsty crew,
That still urge on, and still in volleys loud
Insult her woes, and mock her sore distress.
As now in louder peals the loaded winds
Bring on the gathering storm, her fears prevail,
And o'er the plain, and o'er the mountain's ridge,
Away she flies; nor ships with wind and tide,
And all their canvass wings, scud half so fast.
Once more, ye jovial train, your courage try,
And each clean courser's speed. We scour along,
In pleasing hurry and confusion tost;
Oblivion to be wish'd. The patient pack
Hang on the scent unwearied, up they climb,
And ardent we pursue; our labouring steeds
We press, we gore; till once the summit gain'd,
Painfully panting; there we breathe a while;
Then, like a foaming torrent, pouring down
Precipitant, we smoke along the vale.
Happy the man who with unrival'd speed
Can pass his fellows, and with pleasure view
The struggling pack; how in the rapid course
Alternate they preside, and jostling push
To guide the dubious scent; how giddy youth
Oft babbling errs, by wiser age reprov'd;
How, niggard of his strength, the wise old hound
Hangs in the rear, till some important point
Rouse all his diligence, or till the chase
Sinking he finds: then to the head he springs
With thirst of glory fir'd, and wins the prize.
Huntsman, take heed; they stop in full career.
Yon crowding flocks, that at a distance gaze,
Have haply foil'd the turf. See! that old hound,
How busily he works, but dares not trust
His doubtful sense; draw yet a wider ring.
Hark! now again the chorus fills. As bells,
Sally'd a while, at once their peal renew,
And high in air the tuneful thunder rolls.
See, how they toss, with animated rage
Recovering all they lost! That eager haste
Some doubling wile foreshows. Ah! yet once more [hand
They're check'd, hold back with speed—on either
They flourish round—ev'n yet persist—'Tis right,
Away they spring; the rustling stubbles bend
Beneath the driving storm. Now the poor chase
Begins to flag, to her last shifts reduc'd.
From brake to brake she flies, and visits all
Her well-known haunts, where once she rang'd secure,

With love and plenty blest. See! there she goes,
She reels along, and by her gait betrays
Her inward weakness. See, how black she looks!
The sweat, that clogs th' obstructed pores, scarce
leaves

A languid scent. And now in open view
See, see, she flies! each eager hound exerts
His utmost speed, and stretches every nerve.
How quick she turns! their gaping jaws eludes,
And yet a moment lives; till, round enclos'd
By all the greedy pack, with infant screams
She yields her breath, and there reluctant dies.
So when the furious Bacchanals assail'd
Threïcian Orpheus, poor ill-fated bard!
Loud was the cry; hills, woods, and Hebrus'
banks,

Return'd their clamorous rage; distress'd he flies,
Shifting from place to place, but flies in vain;
For eager they pursue, till panting, faint,
By noisy multitudes o'erpower'd, he sinks
To the relentless crowd a bleeding prey.

The huntsman now, a deep incision made,
Shakes out with hands impure, and dashes down
Her reeking entrails and yet quivering heart.
These claim the pack, the bloody perquisite
For all their toils. Stretch'd on the ground she lies

A mangled corse; in her dim glaring eyes
Cold death exults, and stiffens every limb.
Aw'd by the threatening whip, the furious hounds
Around her bay; or at their master's foot,
Each happy favourite courts his kind applause,
With humble adulation cowering low.
All now is joy. With cheeks full-blown they wind

Her solemn dirge, while the loud-opening pack
The concert swell, and hills and dales return
The sadly-pleasing sounds. Thus the poor hare,
A puny, dastard animal, but vers'd
In subtle wiles, diverts the youthful train.
But if thy proud, aspiring soul disdains
So mean a prey, delighted with the pomp,
Magnificence, and grandeur of the chase;
Hear what the muse from faithful records sings.

Why on the banks of Gemna, Indian stream,
Line within line, rise the pavilions proud,
Their silken streamers waving in the wind?
Why neighs the warrior horse? From tent to tent,
Why press in crowds the buzzing multitude?
Why shines the polish'd helm, and pointed lance,
This way and that far beaming o'er the plain?
Nor Visapour nor Golconda rebel;
Nor the great Sopy, with his numerous host,
Lays waste the provinces; nor glory fires
To rob and to destroy, beneath the name
And specious guise of war. A nobler cause
Calls Aurengzebe to arms. No cities sack'd,
No mother's tears, no helpless orphan's cries,
No violated leagues, with sharp remorse
Shall sting the conscious victor: but mankind
Shall hail him good and just. For 'tis on beasts
He draws his vengeful sword! on beasts of prey
Full-fed with human gore. See, see, he comes!
Imperial Dehli, opening wide her gates,
Pours out her thronging legions, bright in arms,

And all the pomp of war. Before them sound
Clarions and trumpets, breathing martial airs,
And bold defiance. High upon his throne,
Borne on the back of his proud elephant,
Sits the great chief of Tamur's glorious race:
Sublime he sits, amid the radiant blaze
Of gems and gold. Omrahs about him crowd,
And rein th' Arabian steed, and watch his nod:
And potent rajahs, who themselves preside
O'er realms of wide extent; but here submit
Their homage pay, alternate kings and slaves.
Next these, with prying eunuchs girt around,
The fair sultanas of his court: a troop
Of chosen beauties, but with care conceal'd
From each intrusive eye; one look is death.
A cruel eastern law! (had kings a power
But equal to their wild tyrannic will)
To rob us of the sun's all-cheering ray,
Were less severe. The vulgar close the march,
Slaves and artificers; and Dehli mourns
Her empty and depopulated streets.
Now at the camp arriv'd with stern review,
Through groves of spears, from file to file he darts
His sharp experienc'd eye; their order marks,
Each in his station rang'd, exact and firm,
Till in the boundless line his sight is lost.
Not greater multitudes in arms appear'd
On these extended plains, when Ammon's son
With mighty Porus in dread battle join'd,
The vassal world the prize. Nor was that host
More numerous of old, which the great king*
Pour'd out on Greece from all th' unpeopled East;
That bridg'd the Hellespont from shore to shore,
And drank the rivers dry. Mean while in troops
The busy hunter-train mark out the ground,
A wide circumference; full many a league
In compass round; woods, rivers, hills, and plains,
Large provinces; enough to gratify
Ambition's highest aim, could reason bound
Man's erring will. Now sit in close divan
The mighty chiefs of this prodigious host.
He from the throne high-eminent presides,
Gives out his mandates proud, laws of the chase,
From ancient records drawn. With reverence low,
And prostrate at his feet, the chiefs receive
His irreversible decrees, from which
To vary is to die. Then his brave bands
Each to his station leads; encamping round,
Till the wide circle is completely form'd.
Where decent order reigns, what these command,
Those execute with speed, and punctual care;
In all the strictest discipline of war:
As if some watchful foe, with bold insult,
Hung lowering o'er their camp. The high resolve
That flies on wings through all th' encircling line,
Each motion steers, and animates the whole.
So by the sun's attractive power controll'd,
The planets in their spheres roll round his orb:
On all he shines, and rules the great machine.

Ere yet the morn dispels the fleeting mists,
The signal given by the loud trumpet's voice,
Now high in air th' imperial standard waves,
Emblazon'd rich with gold, and glittering gems;

* Xerxes.

And like a sheet of fire, through the dun gloom
Streaming meteorous. The soldiers shouts,
And all the brazen instruments of war,
With mutual clamour, and united din,
Fill the large concave. While from camp to camp
They catch the varied sounds, floating in air,
Round all the wide circumference, tigers fell
Shrink at the noise, deep in his gloomy den
The lion starts, and morsels yet unchew'd
Drop from his trembling jaws. Now all at once
Onward they march embattled, to the sound
Of martial harmony; fifes, cornets, drums,
That rouse the sleepy soul to arms, and bold
Heroic deeds. In parties here and there
Detach'd o'er hill and dale, the hunter's range
Inquisitive; strong dogs, that match in fight
The boldest brute, around their masters wait,
A faithful guard. No haunt unsearch'd, they drive

From every covert, and from every den,
The lurking savages. Incessant shouts
Re-echo through the woods, and kindling fires
Gleam from the mountain tops; the forest seems One mingling blaze: like flocks of sheep they fly,

Before the flaming brand: fierce lions, pards,
Boars, tigers, bears, and wolves; a dreadful crew
Of grim blood-thirsty foes; growling along,
They stalk indignant; but fierce vengeance still Hangs pealing on their rear, and pointed spears
Present immediate death. Soon as the night
Wrapt in her sable veil forbids the chase,
They pitch their tents, in even ranks, around
The circling camp. The guards are plac'd, and fires

At proper distances ascending rise,
And paint th' horizon with their ruddy light.
So round some island's shore of large extent,
Amid the gloomy horrors of the night,
The billows breaking on the pointed rocks,
Seem all one flame, and the bright circuit wide
Appears a bulwark of surrounding fire,
What dreadful howlings, and what hideous roar,
Disturb those peaceful shades! where erst the bird
That glads the night had cheer'd the listening groves [gloom

With sweet complainings. Through the silent
Oft they the guards assail; as oft repell'd
They fly reluctant, with hot boiling rage
Stung to the quick, and mad with wild despair.
Thus day by day they still the chase renew,
At night encamp; till now in straighter bounds
The circle lessens, and the beasts perceive
The wall that hems them in on every side.
And now their fury bursts, and knows no mean;
From man they turn, and point their ill-judg'd
rage

Against their fellow brutes. With teeth and claws
The civil war begins; grappling they tear.
Lions on tigers prey, and bears on wolves:
Horrible discord! till the crowd behind
Shouting pursue, and part the bloody fray.
At once their wrath subsides; tame as the lamb
The lion hangs his head, the furious pard,
Cow'd and subdued, flies from the face of man,
Nor bears one glance of his commanding eye.

So abject is a tyrant in distress!

At last, within the narrow plain confin'd,
A lifted field, mark'd out for bloody deeds,
An amphitheatre more glorious far
Than ancient Rome could boast, they crowd in heaps,

Dismay'd, and quite appall'd. In meet array
Sheath'd in refulgent arms, a noble band
Advance; great lords of high imperial blood,
Early resolv'd to assert their royal race,
And prove by glorious deeds their valour's growth
Mature, ere yet the callow down has spread
Its curling shade. On bold Arabian steeds
With decent pride they sit, that fearless hear
The lion's dreadful roar; and down the rock
Swift-shooting plunge, or o'er the mountain's ridge
Stretching along, the greedy tiger leave
Panting behind. On foot their faithful slaves
With javelins arm'd attend; each watchful eye
Fix'd on his youthful care, for him alone
He fears, and, to redeem his life, unmov'd
Would lose his own. The mighty Aurengzebe,
From his high elevated throne, beholds
His blooming race; revolving in his mind
What once he was, in his gay spring of life,
When vigour strung his nerves. Parental joy
Melts in his eye, and flushes in his cheek.
Now the loud trumpet sounds a charge. The shouts

Of eager hosts, through all the circling line,
And the wild howlings of the beasts within
Rend wide the welkin, flights of arrows, wing'd
With death, and javelins launch from every arm,
Gall sore the brutal bands, with many a wound
Gor'd through and through. Despair at last prevails,

When fainting nature shrinks, and rouses all
Their drooping courage. Swell'd with furious
rage,
Their eyes dart fire; and on the youthful band
They rush implacable. They their broad shields
Quick interpose; on each devoted head
Their flaming falchions, as the bolts of Jove,
Descend unerring. Prostrate on the ground
The grinning monsters lie, and their foul gore
Defiles the verdant plain. Nor idle stand
The trusty slaves; with pointed spears they pierce
Through their tough hides; or at their gaping mouths

An easier passage find. The king of brutes
In broken roarings breathes his last; the bear
Grumbles in death; nor can his spotted skin,
Though sleek it shine, with varied beauties gay,
Save the proud pard from unrelenting fate.
The battle bleeds, grim slaughter strides along,
Glutting her greedy jaws, grins o'er her prey.
Men, horses, dogs, fierce beasts of every kind,
A strange promiscuous carnage, drench'd in blood,
And heaps on heaps amass'd. What yet remain
Alive, with vain assault contend to break
Th' impenetrable line. Others, whom fear
Inspires with self-preserving wiles, beneath
The bodies of the slain for shelter creep.
Aghast they fly, or hide their heads dispers'd.
And now perchance (had Heaven but pleas'd) the work

Of death had been complete ; and Aurengzebe
By one dread frown extinguish'd half their race.
When lo ! the bright sultanas of his court
Appear, and to his ravish'd eyes display
Those charms but rarely to the day reveal'd.

Lowly they bend, and humbly sue, to save
The vanquish'd host. What mortal can deny
When suppliant beauty begs ? At his command,
Opening to right and left, the well-train'd troops
Leave a large void for their retreating foes.
Away they fly, on wings of fear upborn,
To seek on distant hills their late abodes.

Ye proud oppressors, whose vain hearts exult
In wantonness of power, 'gainst the brute race,
Fierce robbers like yourselves, a guiltless war
Wage uncontroul'd : here quench your thirst of blood ;

But learn from Aurengzebe to spare mankind.

BOOK III.

THE ARGUMENT.

Of King Edgar, and his imposing a tribute of wolves heads upon the kings of Wales : from hence a transition to fox-hunting, which is described in all its parts. Censure of an over-numerous pack. Of the several engines to destroy foxes and other wild beasts. The steel-trap described, and the manner of using it. Description of the pit-fall for the lion ; and another for the elephant. The ancient way of hunting the tiger with a mirror. The Arabian manner of hunting the wild boar. Description of the royal chase at Windsor Forest. Concludes with an address to his Majesty, and an eulogy upon mercy.

IN Albion's isle, when glorious Edgar reign'd,
He, wisely provident, from her white cliffs
Launch'd half her forests, and with numerous fleets
Cover'd his wide domain : there proudly rode
Lord of the deep, the great prerogative
Of British monarchs. Each invader bold,
Dane and Norwegian, at a distance gaz'd,
And, disappointed, gnash'd his teeth in vain.
He scour'd the seas, and to remotest shores
With swelling sails the trembling corsair fled,
Rich commerce flourish'd ; and with busy oars
Dash'd the resounding surge. Nor less at land
His royal cares ; wise, potent, gracious prince !
His subjects from their cruel foes he sav'd,
And from rapacious savages their flocks :
Cambria's proud kings (though with reluctance) paid

Their tributary wolves ; head after head,
In full account, till the woods yield no more,
And all the ravenous race extinct is lost.
In fertile pastures, more securely graz'd
The social troops ; and soon their large increase
With curling fleeces whiten'd all the plains.
But yet, alas ! the wily fox remain'd.
A subtle, pilfering foe, prowling around
In midnight shades, and wakeful to destroy.
In the full fold, the poor defenceless lamb,

Seiz'd by his guileful arts, with sweet warm blood
Supplies a rich repast. The mournful ewe,
Her dearest treasure lost, through the dun night
Wanders perplex'd, and darkling bleats in vain :
While in th' adjacent bush, poor Philomel,
(Herself a parent once, till wanton churls
Despoil'd her nest) joins in her loud laments,
With sweeter notes, and more melodious wo.

For these nocturnal thieves, huntsmen prepare
The sharpest vengeance. Oh ! how glorious 'tis
To right th' oppress'd, and bring the felon vile
To just disgrace ! Ere yet the morning peep,
Or stars retire from the first blush of day,
With thy far echoing voice alarm thy pack,
And rouse thy bold compeers. Then to the copse,
Thick with entangling grafs, or prickly furze,
With silence lead thy many-coloured hounds,
In all their beauty's pride. See ! how they range
Dispers'd, how busily this way, and that,
They cross, examining with curious nose
Each likely haunt. Hark ! on the drag I hear
Their doubtful notes, preluding to a cry
More nobly full, and swell'd with every mouth.
As straggling armies, at the trumpet's voice,
Press to their standard ; hither all repair,
And hurry through the woods ; with hasty step
Rustling, and full of hope ; now driven on heaps
They push, they strive ; while from his kennel sneaks

The conscious villain. See ! he skulks along,
Sleek at the shepherd's cost, and plump with meals
Purloin'd. So thrive the wicked here below.
Though high his brush he bear, though tipt with
It gaily shine ; yet ere the sun declin'd [white
Recal the shades of night, the pamper'd rogue
Shall rue his fate revers'd ; and at his heels
Behold the just avenger, swift to seize
His forfeit head, and thirsting for his blood.

Heavens ! what melodious strains ! how beat our hearts

Big with tumultuous joy ! the loaded gales
Breathe harmony ; and as the tempest drives
From wood to wood, through every dark recess
The forest thunders, and the mountains shake.
The chorus swells ; less various, and less sweet,
The trilling notes, when in those very groves,
The feather'd choristers salute the spring.
And every bush in concert joins ; or when
The master's hand, in modulated air,
Bids the loud organ breathe, and all the powers
Of music in one instrument combine,
An universal minstrelsy. And now
In vain each earth he tries, the doors are barr'd
Impregnable, nor is the covert safe ;
He pants for purer air. Hark ! what loud shouts
Re-echo through the groves ! he breaks away.
Shrill horns proclaim his flight. Each straggling hound

Strains o'er the lawn to reach the distant pack.
'Tis triumph all and joy. Now, my brave youths,
Now give a loose to the clean generous flead ;
Flourish the whip, nor spare the galling spur ;
But, in the madness of delight, forget
Your fears. Far o'er the rocky hills we range,
And dangerous our course ; but in the brave

True courage never fails. In vain the stream
In foaming eddies whirls; in vain the ditch
Wide gaping threatens death. The craggy steep,
Where the poor dizzy shepherd crawls with care,
And clings to every twig, gives us no pain;
But down we sweep, as stoops the falcon bold
To pounce his prey. Then up th' opponent hill,
By the swift motion flung, we mount aloft:
So ships in winter seas now sliding sink
Adown the steepy wave, then toss'd on high
Ride on the billows, and defy the storm.
What lengths we pass! where will the wand-
ing chase

Lead us bewilder'd! smooth as swallows skim
The new-shorn mead, and far more swift, we fly.
See my brave pack; how to the head they press,
Jostling in close array, then more diffuse
Obliquely wheel, while from their opening mouths
The vollied thunder breaks. So when the cranes
Their annual voyage steer, with wanton wing
Their figure oft they change, and their loud clang
From cloud to cloud rebounds. How far behind
The hunter crew, wide-straggling o'er the plain!
The panting courser now with trembling nerves
Begins to reel; urg'd by the goading spur,
Makes many a faint effort: he snorts, he foams,
The big round drops run trickling down his sides,
With sweat and blood distain'd. Look back and view

The strange confusion of the vale below,
Where four vexation reigns; see yon poor jade,
In vain th' impatient rider frets and swears;
With galling spurs harrows his mangled sides;
He can no more: his stiff unpliant limbs
Rooted in earth, unmov'd and fix'd he stands,
For every cruel curse returns a groan,
And sobs, and faints, and dies. Who without grief
Can view that pamper'd steed, his master's joy,
His minion, and his daily care, well cloth'd,
Well fed with every nicer cate; no cost,
No labour spar'd; who, when the flying chase
Broke from the copse, without a rival led
The numerous train: now a sad spectacle
Of pride brought low, and humble insolence,
Drove like a pannier'd ass, and scourg'd along.
While these, with loosen'd reins and dangling heels,
Hang on their reeling palfreys, that scarce bear
Their weights: another in the treacherous bog
Lies floundering half ingulf'd. What biting thoughts

Torments th' abandon'd crew! Old age laments
His vigour spent: the tall, plump, brawny youth
Curse his cumbersome bulk; and envies now
The short pygmean race, he whilom kenn'd
With proud insulting leer. A chosen few
Alone the sport enjoy, nor droop beneath
Their pleasing toils. Here, huntsman, from this height

Observe yon birds of prey; if I can judge,
'Tis there the villain lurks: they hover round
And claim him as their own. Was I not right?
See! there he creeps along; his brush he drags,
And sweeps the mire impure; from his wide jaws
His tongue unmoisten'd hangs; symptoms too sure

VOL VII.

Of sudden death. Ha! yet he flies, not yields
To black despair. But one loose more, and all His wiles are vain. Hark! through yon village now

The rattling clamour rings. The barns, the cots,
And leafless elms return the joyous sounds.
Through every homestead, and through every yard,
His midnight walks, panting, forlorn, he flies;
Through every hole he sneaks, through every jakes
Plunging he wades besmear'd, and fondly hopes
In a superior stench to lose his own:
But, faithful to the track, th' snerring hounds
With peals of echoing vengeance close pursue.
And now distress'd, no sheltering covert near,
Into the hen-roost creeps, whose walls with gore
Distain'd attest his guilt. There, villain, there Expect thy fate deserv'd. And soon from thence
The pack inquisitive, with clamour loud,
Drag out their trembling prize; and on his blood
With greedy transport feast. In bolder notes
Each sounding horn proclaims the felon dead:
And all th' assembled village shouts for joy.
The farmer, who beholds his mortal foe
Stretch'd at his feet, applauds the glorious deed,
And grateful calls us to a short repast:
In the full glass the liquid amber smiles,
Our native product. And his good old mate
With choicest viands heaps the liberal board,
To crown our triumphs, and reward our toils.

Here must th' instructive muse (but with respect)
Censure that numerous pack, that crowd of state,
With which the vain profusion of the great
Covers the lawn, and shakes the trembling copse.
Pompous incumbrance! A magnificence
Useless, vexatious! For the wily fox,
Safe in th' increasing number of his foes,
Kens well the great advantage: slinks behind,
And slyly creeps through the same beaten track,
And hunts them step by step: then views, escap'd,
With inward ecstacy, the panting throng
In their own footsteps puzzled, foil'd, and lost.
So when proud eastern kings summon to arms
Their gaudy legions, from far distant climes
They flock in crowds, unpeopling half a world:
But when the day of battle calls them forth
To charge the well-train'd foe, a band compact
Of chosen veterans; they press blindly on,
In heaps confus'd, by their own weapons fall
A smoking carnage scatter'd o'er the plain.

Nor hounds alone this noxious brood destroy:
The plunder'd warrener full many a wile
Devises to entrap his greedy foe,
Fat with nocturnal spoils. At close of day,
With silence drags his tail: then from the ground
Pares thin the close-graz'd turf; there with nice hand

Covers the latent death, with curious springs
Prepar'd to fly at once, when'er the tread
Of man or beast unwarily shall press
The yielding surface. By th' indented steel
With gripe tenacious held, the felon grins,
And struggles, but in vain: yet oft 'tis known,
When every art has fail'd the captive fox
Has shar'd the wounded joint, and with a limb
Compounded for his life. But, if perchance

G g

In the deep pitfall plung'd, there's no escape;
But unrepriev'd he dies, and bleach'd in air,
The jest of clowns, his reeking carcase hangs.

Of these are various kinds; not even the king
Of brutes evades this deep devouring grave:
But, by the wily African betray'd,
Heedless of fate, within its gaping jaws
Expires indignant. When the orient beam
With blushes paints the dawn; and all the race
Carnivorous, with blood full-gorg'd, retire
Into their darksome cells, there satiate snore
O'er dripping offals, and the mangled limbs
Of men and beasts; the painful forester
Climbs the high hills, whose proud aspiring tops
With the tall cedar crown'd, and taper fir,
Assail the clouds. There 'mong the craggy rocks,
And thickets intricate, trembling he views
His footsteps in the sand; the dismal road
And avenue to death. Hither he calls
His wathful bands; and low into the ground
A pit they sink, full many a fathom deep.
Then in the midst a column high is rear'd,
The butt of some fair tree; upon whose top
A lamb is plac'd, just ravish'd from his dam.
And next a wall they build, with stones and earth
Encircling round, and hiding from all view
The dreadful precipice. Now when the shades
Of night hang lowering o'er the mountain's brow;
And hunger keen, and pungent thirst of blood,
Rouse up the slothful beast, he shakes his sides,
Slow-rising from his lair, and stretches wide
His ravenous paws, with recent gore distain'd.
The forests tremble, as he roars aloud,
Impatient to destroy. O'erjoy'd he hears
The bleating innocent, that claims in vain
The shepherd's care, and seeks with piteous moan
The foodful teat; himself, alas! design'd
Another's meal. For now the greedy brute
Winds him from far; and leaping o'er the mound
To seize his trembling prey, headlong is plung'd
Into the deep abyss. Prostrate he lies
Astonn'd and impotent. Ah! what avail
Thine eye-balls flashing fire, thy length of tail,
That lashes thy broad sides, thy jaws besmear'd
With blood and offals crude, thy shaggy mane
The terror of the woods, thy stately port,
And bulk enormous, since by stratagem
Thy strength is foil'd? Unequal is the strife,
When sovereign reason combats brutal rage.

On distant Ethiopia's sun-burnt coast,
The black inhabitants a pitfall frame,
But of a different kind, and different use!
With slender poles the wide capacious mouth,
And hurdles slight, they close; o'er these is spread
A floor of verdant turf, with all its flowers
Smiling delusive, and from strictest search
Concealing the deep grave that yawns below.
Then boughs of trees they cut, with tempting fruit
Of various kinds furcharg'd; the downy peach,
The clustering vine, and of bright golden rind,
The fragrant orange. Soon as evening gray
Advances flow, besprinkling all around
With kind refreshing dews the thirsty glebe,
The stately elephant from the close shade
With step majestic strides, eager to taste

The cooler breeze, that from the sea-beat shore
Delightful breathes, or in the limpid stream
To lave his panting sides; joyous he scents
The rich repast, unweeting of the death
That lurks within. And soon he sporting breaks
The brittle boughs, and greedily devours
The fruit delicious. Ah! too dearly bought;
The price is life. For now the treacherous turf
Trembling gives way; and the unwieldy beast,
Self-sinking, drops into the dark profound.
So when dilated vapours, struggling, heave
Th' incumbent earth; if chance the cavern'd
ground

Shrinking subside, and the thin surface yield,
Down sinks at once the ponderous dome, ingulf'd
With all its towers. Subtle, delusive man!
How various are thy wiles! artful to kill
Thy savage foes, a dull unthinking race!
Fierce from his lair, springs forth the speckled pard,
Thirsting for blood, and eager to destroy;
The huntsman flies, but to his flight alone
Confides not: at convenient distance fix'd,
A polish'd mirror stops in full career
The furious brute: he there his image views;
Spots against spots with rage improving glow;
Another pard his bristly whiskers curls,
Grins as he grins, fierce menacing, and wide
Distends his opening paws; himself against Himself oppos'd, and with dread vengeance arm'd.
The huntsman, now secure, with fatal aim
Directs the pointed spear, by which transfix'd
He dies, and with him dies the rival shade.
Thus man innumerable engines forms, t' assail
The savage kind; but most the docile horse,
Swift and confederate with man, annoys
His brethren of the plains; without whose aid
The hunter's arts are vain, unskill'd to wage
With the more active brutes an equal war.
But borne by him, without the well-train'd pack,
Man dares his foe, on wings of wind secure.

Him the fierce Arab mounts, and, with his troop
Of bold compeers, ranges the desert's wild.
Where, by the magnet's aid, the traveller
Steers his untrodden course; yet oft on land
Is wreck'd, in the high-rolling waves of sand
Immerst and lost. While these intrepid bands,
Safe in their horse's speed, out-fly the storm, [prey.
And scouring round, make men and beasts their
The grisly boar is singled from his herd,
As large as that in Erimanthian woods,
A match for Hercules. Round him they fly
In circles wide; and each in passing sends
His feather'd death into his brawny sides.
But perilous th' attempt. For if the steed
Haply too near approach; or the loose earth
His footing fail, the watchful angry beast
Th' advantage spies; and at one sidelong glance
Rips up his groin. Wounded, he rears aloft,
And, plunging from his back the rider hurls
Precipitant; then bleeding spurns the ground,
And drags his reeking entrails o'er the plain.
Mean while the surly monster trots along,
But with unequal speed; for still they wound,
Swift-wheeling in the spacious ring. A wood

Of darts upon his back he bears; adown
His tortur'd sides, the crimson torrents roll
From many a gaping font. And now at last
Staggering he falls, in blood and foam expires.

But whither roves my devious muse, intent
On antique tales? While yet the royal stag
Unsung remains. Tread with respectful awe
Windsor's green glades; where Denham, tuneful bard,

Charm'd once the listening Dryads, with his song
Sublimely sweet. O! grant me, sacred shade,
To glean submits what thy full sickle leaves.

The morning sun, that gilds with trembling rays
Windsor's high towers, beholds the courtly train
Mount for the chase, nor views in all his course
A scene so gay: heroic, noble youths,
In arts and arms renown'd, and lovely nymphs
The fairest of this isle, where beauty dwells
Delighted, and deserts her Paphian grove
For our more favour'd shades: in proud parade
These shine magnificent, and press around
The royal happy pair. Great in themselves,
They smile superior; of external show
Regardless, while their inbred virtues give
A lustre to their power, and grace their court
With real splendors, far above the pomp
Of eastern kings, in all their tinsel pride.
Like troops of Amazons, the female band
Prance round their cars, not in refulgent arms
As those of old; unskill'd to wield the sword,
Or bend the bow, these kill with surer aim.

The royal offspring, fairest of the fair,
Lead on the splendid train. Anna more bright
Than summer suns, or as the lightning keen,
With irresistible effulgence arm'd,
Fires every heart. He must be more than man,
Who unconcern'd can bear the piercing ray.
Amelia, milder than the blushing dawn,
With sweet engaging air, but equal power,
Insensibly subdues, and in soft chains
Her willing captives leads. Illustrious maids,
Ever triumphant! whose victorious charms,
Without the needless aid of high descent,
Had aw'd mankind, and taught the world's great lords

To bow and sue for grace. But who is he
Fresh as a rose-bud newly blown, and fair
As opening lilies; on whom every eye
With joy and admiration dwells? See, see,
He reins his docile barb with manly grace.
Is it Adonis for the chase array'd?
Or Britain's second hope? Hail, blooming youth!
May all your virtues with your years improve,
Till in consummate worth, you shine the pride
Of these our days, and to succeeding times
A bright example. As his guard of mutes
On the great sultan wait, with eyes deject,
And fix'd on earth, no voice, no sound is heard
Within the wide serail, but all is hush'd,
And awful silence reigns; thus stand the pack
Mute and unmov'd, and cowering low to earth,
While pass the glittering court, and royal pair:
So disciplin'd those hounds, and so reserv'd,
Whose honour 'tis to glad the hearts of kings.
But soon the winding horn, and huntsman's voice,

Let loose the general chorus; far around
Joy spreads its wings, and the gay morning smiles.

Unharbour'd now the royal stag forsakes
His wonted lair; he shakes his dappled sides,
And tosses high his beamy head, the copse
Beneath his antlers bends. What doubling shifts
He tries: not more the wily hare; in these
Would still persist, did not the full-mouth'd pack
With dreadful concert thunder in his rear.
The woods reply, the hunter's cheering shouts
Float through the glades, and the wide forest rings.
How merrily they chant! their nostrils deep
Inhale the grateful steam. Such is the cry,
And such th' harmonious din, the soldier deems
The battle kindling, and the statesman grave
Forgets his weighty cares; each age, each sex,
In the wild transport joins; luxuriant joy,
And pleasure in excess, sparkling exult
On every brow, and revel unrestrain'd.

How happy art thou, man, when thou'rt no more
Thyself! when all the pangs that grind thy soul,
In rapture and in sweet oblivion lost,
Yield a short interval and ease from pain!

See the swift courser strains, his shining hoofs
Securely beat the solid ground. Who now
The dangerous pitfall fears, with tangling heath
High-overgrown? or who the quivering bog
Soft yielding to the step? All now is plain,
Plain as the strand sea-lav'd, that stretches far
Beneath the rocky shore. Glades crossing glades
The forest opens to our wondering view:
Such was the king's command. Let tyrants fierce
Lay waste the world; his the most glorious part
To check their pride; and when the brazen voice
Of war is hush'd (as erst victorious Rome)
T'employ his station'd legions in the works
Of peace; to smooth the rugged wilderness,
To drain the stagnate fen, to raise the slope
Depending road, and to make gay the face
Of nature, with th' embellishments of art.

How melts my beating heart! as I behold
Each lovely nymph, our island's boast and pride,
Push on the generous steed, that strokes along
O'er rough, o'er smooth, nor heeds the steepy hill,
Nor falters in th' extended vale below:
Their garments loosely waving in the wind,
And all the flush of beauty in their cheeks!
While at their sides their pensive lovers wait,
Direct their dubious course; now chill'd with fear
Solicitous, and now with love inflam'd.
O! grant, indulgent Heaven, no rising storm
May darken with black wings this glorious scene!
Should some malignant power thus damp our joys,
Vain were the gloomy cave, such as of old
Betray'd to lawless love the Tyrian queen.
For Britain's virtuous nymphs are chaste as fair,
Spotless, unblam'd, with equal triumph reign
In the dun gloom, as in the blaze of day.

Now the blown stag, through woods, bogs,
roads, and streams
Has measur'd half the forest; but alas!
He flies in vain, he flies not from his fears.
Though far he cast the lingering pack behind,
His haggard fancy still with horror views
The fell destroyer; still the fatal cry

Insults his ears, and wounds his trembling heart.
 So the poor fury-haunted wretch (his hands
 In guiltless blood distain'd) still seems to hear
 The dying shrieks: and the pale threatening ghost
 Moves as he moves, and as he flies, pursues
 See here his lot; up yon green hill he climbs,
 Pants on its brow a while, sadly looks back
 On his pursuers, covering all the plain;
 But wrung with anguish, bears not long the fight,
 Shoots down the steep, and sweats along the vale,
 There mingles with the herd, where once he reign'd

Proud monarch of the groves, whose clashing beam
 His rivals aw'd, and whose exalted power
 Was still rewarded with successful love.

But the base herd have learn'd the ways of men,
 Averse they fly, or with rebellious aim
 Chase him from thence: needless their impious deed,

The huntsman knows him by a thousand marks,
 Black, and imboss'd; nor are his hounds deceiv'd;
 Too well distinguish these, and never leave
 Their once devoted foe; familiar grows
 His scent, and strong their appetite to kill.

Again he flies, and with redoubled speed
 Skims o'er the lawn; still the tenacious crew
 Hang on the track, aloud demand their prey,
 And push him many a league. If haply then
 Too far escap'd, and the gay courtly train
 Behind are cast, the huntsman's clanging whip
 Stops full their bold career; passive they stand,
 Unmov'd, an humble, an obsequious crowd,
 As if by stern Medusa gaz'd to stones.

So at their general's voice whole armies halt
 In full pursuit, and check their thirst of blood,
 Soon at the king's command, like hasty streams
 Damm'd up a while, they foam, and pour along
 With fresh recruited might. The stag, who hop'd
 His foes were lost, now once more hears astunn'd,
 The dreadful din; he shivers every limb,
 He starts, he bounds; each bush presents a foe.
 Press'd by the fresh relay, no pause allow'd,
 Breathless, and faint, he falters in his pace,
 And lifts his weary limbs with pain, that scarce
 Sustain their load: he pants, he sobs appall'd;
 Drops down his heavy head to earth, beneath
 His cumbrous beams oppress'd. But if perchance
 Some prying eye surprise him; soon he rears
 Erect his towering front, bounds o'er the lawn
 With ill-dissembled vigour, to amuse

The knowing forester; who inly smiles
 At his weak shifts and unavailing frauds.
 So midnight tapers waste their last remains,
 Shine forth a while, and as they blaze expire.
 From wood to wood redoubling thunders roll,
 And bellow through the vales; the moving storm
 Thickens amain, and loud triumphant shouts,
 And horns shrill-warbling in each glade, prelude
 To his approaching fate. And now in view
 With hobbling gait, and high, exerts amaz'd
 What strength is left: to the last dregs of life
 Reduc'd, his spirits fail, on every side
 Hemm'd in, besieg'd; not the least opening left
 To gleaming hope, th' unhappy's last reserve.
 Where shall he turn? or whither fly? Despair

Gives courage to the weak. Resolv'd to die,
 He fears no more, but rushes on his foes,
 And deals his deaths around; beneath his feet
 These groveling lie, those by his antlers gor'd
 Defile th' ensanguin'd plain. Ah! see distress'd
 He stands at bay against yon knotty trunk,
 That covers well his rear, his front presents
 An host of foes. O! shun, ye noble train,
 The rude encounter, and believe your lives
 Your country's due alone. As now aloof
 The wing around, he finds his soul uprais'd,
 To dare some great exploit; he charges home
 Upon the broken pack, that on each side
 Fly diverse; then as o'er the turf he strains,
 He vents the cooling stream, and up the breeze
 Urges his course with equal violence:
 Then takes the foil, and plunges in the flood
 Precipitant; down the mid stream he wafts
 Along, till (like a ship distress'd, that runs
 Into some winding creek) close to the verge
 Of a small island, for his weary feet
 Sure anchorage he finds, there skulks immers'd.
 His nose alone above the wave draws in
 The vital air; all else beneath the flood
 Conceal'd, and lost, deceives each prying eye
 Of man or brute. In vain the crowding pack
 Draw on the margin of the stream, or cut
 The liquid wave with oary feet, that move
 In equal time. The gliding waters leave
 No trace behind, and his contracted pores
 But sparingly perspire: the huntsman strains
 His labouring lungs, and puffs his cheeks in vain:
 At length a blood-hound bold, studious to kill,
 And exquisite of sense, winds him from far;
 Headlong he leaps into the flood, his mouth
 Loud opening spends amain, and his wide throat
 Swells every note with joy; then fearless dives
 Beneath the wave, hangs on his haunch, and wounds

Th' unhappy brute, that flounders in the stream,
 Sorely distress'd, and struggling strives to mount
 The steepy shore. Haply once more escap'd,
 Again he stands at bay, amid the groves
 Of willows, bending low their downy heads.
 Outrageous transport fires the greedy pack;
 These swim the deep, and those crawl up with pain

The slippery bank, while others on firm land
 Engage; the stag repels each bold assault,
 Maintains his post, and wounds for wounds returns.
 As when some wily corsair boards a ship
 Full-freighted, or from Afric's golden coasts,
 Or India's wealthy strand, his bloody crew
 Upon her deck he flings; these in the deep
 Drop short, and swim to reach her steepy sides,
 And clinging climb aloft; while those on board
 Urge on the work of fate; the master bold,
 Press'd to his last retreat, bravely resolves
 To sink his wealth beneath the whelming wave,
 His wealth, his foes, nor unreveng'd to die.
 So fares it with the stag: so he resolves
 To plunge at once into the flood below,
 Himself, his foes, in one deep gulf immers'd.
 Ere yet he executes this dire intent,
 In wild disorder once more views the light;

Beneath a weight of woe he groans distress'd,
The tears run trickling down his hairy cheeks;
He weeps, nor weeps in vain. The king beholds
His wretched plight, and tenderness innate
Moves his great soul. Soon at his high command
Rebuk'd, the disappointed, hungry pack,
Retire submissive, and grumbling quit their prey.

Great prince! from thee what may thy subjects
hope;

So kind, and so beneficent to brutes?

O mercy, heavenly born! sweet attribute!

Thou great, thou best prerogative of power!

Justice may guard the throne, but, join'd with thee,

On rocks of adamant it stands secure,

And braves the storm beneath; soon as thy smiles

Gild the rough deep, the foaming waves subside,

And all the noisy tumult sinks in peace.

BOOK IV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Of the necessity of destroying some beasts, and preserving others for the use of man. Of breeding of hounds; the season for this business. The choice of the dog, of great moment. Of the litter of whelps. Of the number to be reared. Of setting them out to their several walks. Care to be taken to prevent their hunting too soon. Of entering the whelps. Of breaking them from running at sheep. Of the diseases of hounds. Of their age. Of madness; two sorts of it described, the dumb and outrageous madness: its dreadful effects. Burning of the wound recommended as preventing all ill consequences. The infectious hounds to be separated, and fed apart. The vanity of trusting to the many infallible cures for this malady. The dismal effects of the biting of a mad dog, upon man, described. Description of the otter hunting. The conclusion.

WHATE'ER of earth is form'd, to earth returns
Dissolv'd: the various objects we behold,
Plants, animals, this whole material mass,
Are ever changing, ever new. The soul
Of man alone, that particle divine,
Escapes the wreck of worlds, when all things fail.
Hence great the distance 'twixt the beasts that perish,

And God's bright image, man's immortal race.

The brute creation are his property,

Subservient to his will, and for him made.

As hurtful these he kills, as useful those

Preserves; their sole and arbitrary king.

Should he not kill, as erst the Samian sage

Taught unadvis'd, and Indian brachmans now

As vainly preach; the teeming ravenous brutes

Might fill the scanty space of this terrene,

Incumbering all the globe: should not his care

Improve his growing stock, their kinds might fail,

Man might once more on roots and acorns feed,

And through the deserts range, shivering, forlorn,

Quite destitute of every solace dear,
And every smiling gaiety of life.

The prudent huntsman therefore will supply
With annual large recruits, his broken pack,
And propagate their kind. As from the root
Fresh scions still spring forth and daily yield
New blooming honours to the parent tree.

Far shall his pack be fam'd, far sought his breed,

And princes at their tables feast those hounds

His hand presents, an acceptable boon. [urg'd

Ere yet the sun through the bright Ram has

His steepy course, or mother earth unbound

Her frozen bosom to the western gale;

When feather'd troops, their social leagues dis-
solv'd,

Select their mates, and on the leafless elm,

The noisy rook builds high her wicker nest,

Mark well the wanton females of thy pack,

That curl their taper tails, and frisking court

Their pyebald mates enamour'd; their red eyes

Flash fires impure; nor rest, nor food they take,

Goaded by furious love. In separate cells

Confine them now, lest bloody civil wars

Annoy the peaceful state. If left at large,

The growling rivals in dread battle join.

And rude encounter; on Scamander's streams

Heroes of old with far less fury fought,

For the bright Spartan dame, their valour's prize.

Mangled and torn thy favourite hounds shall lie,

Stretch'd on the ground; thy kennel shall appear

A field of blood: like some unhappy town

In civil broils confus'd, while discord shakes

Her bloody scourge aloft, fierce parties rage,

Staining their impious hands in mutual death.

And still the best lov'd, and bravest fall:

Such are the dire effects of lawless love.

Huntsman! these ills by timely prudent care

Prevent: for every longing dame select

Some happy paramour; to him alone

In leagues connubial join. Consider well

His lineage; what his fathers did of old,

Chiefs of the pack, and first to climb the rock,

Or plunge into the deep, or tread the brake

With thorn sharp-pointed, plash'd, and briars inwoven.

Observe with care his shape, sort, colour, size.

Nor will sagacious huntsmen less regard

His inward habits: the vain babbler shun,

Ever loquacious, ever in the wrong.

His foolish offspring shall offend thy ears

With false alarms, and loud impertinence.

Nor less the shifting cur avoid, that breaks

Illusive from the pack; to the next hedge

Devious he strays, there every muse he tries:

If haply then he cross the steaming scent,

Away he flies vain-glorious; and exults

As of the pack supreme, and in his speed

And strength unrival'd. Lo! cast far behind

His vex'd associates pant, and labouring strain

To climb the steep ascent. Soon as they reach

Th' insulting boaster, his false courage fails,

Behind he lags, doom'd to the fatal noose,

His master's hate, and scorn of all the field.

What can from such be hop'd, but a base brood

Of coward curs, a frantic, vagrant race?

When now the third revolving moon appears,
With sharpen'd horns, above th' horizon's brink;
Without Lucina's aid, expect thy hopes
Are amply crown'd; short pangs produce to light
The smoking litter, crawling helpless, blind,
Nature their guide, they seek the pouting teat
That plenteous streams. Soon as the tender dam
Has form'd them with her tongue, with pleasure
view

The marks of their renown'd progenitors,
Sure pledge of triumphs yet to come. All these Select with joy; but to the merciless flood
Expose the dwindling refuse, nor o'erload
Th' indulgent mother. If thy heart relent,
Unwilling to destroy, a nurse provide,
And to the foster-parent give the care
Of thy superfluous brood: she'll cherish kind
The alien offspring; pleas'd thou shalt behold
Her tenderness, and hospitable love.

If frolic now and playful they desert
Their gloomy cell, and on the verdant turf
With nerves improv'd, pursue the mimic chase,
Coursing around; unto the choicest friends
Commit thy valued prize: the rustic dames
Shall at thy kennel wait, and in their laps
Receive thy growing hopes, with many a kiss
Careless, and dignify their little charge
With some great title, and resounding name
Of high import. But cautious here observe
To check their youthful ardour, nor permit
The unexperienc'd youngster, immature,
Along to range the woods, or haunt the brakes
Where dodging conies sport; his nerves unstring,
And strength unequal; the laborious chase
Shall stint his growth, and his rash forward youth
Contract such vicious habits, as thy care
And late correction never shall reclaim.

When to full strength arriv'd, mature and bold,
Conduct them to the field; not all at once,
But as thy cooler prudence shall direct,
Select a few, and form them by degrees
To stricter discipline. With these consort
The staunch and steady fages of thy pack,
By long experience vers'd in all the wiles,
And subtle doublings of the various chase.
Easy the lesson of the youthful train,
When instinct prompts, and when example guides.
If the too forward youngster at the head
Press boldly on in wanton sportive mood,
Correct his haste, and let him feel abash'd
The ruling whip. But if he stoop behind
In wary modest guise, to his own nose
Confiding sure; give him full scope to work
His winding way, and with thy voice applaud
His patience, and his care; soon shalt thou view
The hopeful pupil leader of his tribe,
And all the listening pack attend his call.

Oft lead them forth where wanton lambkins
play,
And bleating dams with jealous eyes observe
Their tender care. If at the crowding flock
He bay presumptuous, or with eager haste
Pursue them scatter'd o'er the verdant plain;
In the foul fact attach'd, to the strong ram
Lie fast the rash offender. See! at first

His horn'd companion, fearful and amaz'd,
Shall drag him trembling o'er the rugged ground;
Then, with his load fatigu'd, shall turn a-head,
And with his curl'd hard front incessant peal
The panting wretch; till, breathless and astunn'd,
Stretch'd on the turf he lie. Then spare not thou
The twining whip, but ply his bleeding sides
Lash after lash, and with thy threatening voice,
Harsh echoing from the hills, inculcate loud
His vile offence. Sooner shall trembling doves
Escap'd the hawk's sharp talons, in mid air,
Assail their dangerous foe, than he once more
Disturb the peaceful flocks. In tender age
Thus youth is train'd; as curious artists bend
The taper pliant twig, or potters form
Their soft and ductile clay to various shapes.

Nor is't enough to breed; but to preserve,
Must be the huntsman's care. The staunch old hounds,

Guides of thy pack, though but in number few,
Are yet of great account; shall oft untie
The Gordian knot, when reason at a stand
Puzzling is lost, and all thy art is vain.
O'er clogging fallows, o'er dry plaster'd roads,
O'er floated meads, o'er plains with flocks distain'd
Rank-scenting, these must lead the dubious way.
As party-chiefs in senates who preside,
With pleaded reason and with well-turn'd speech,
Conduct the staring multitude; so these
Direct the pack, who with joint cry approve,
And loudly boast discoveries not their own.

Unnumber'd accidents, and various ills,
Attend thy pack, hang hovering o'er their heads,
And point the way that leads to death's dark cave.
Short is their span; few at the date arrive
Of ancient Argus in old Homer's song
So highly honour'd: kind, sagacious brute!
Not ev'n Minerva's wisdom could conceal
Thy much-lov'd master from thy nicer sense.
Dying his lord he own'd, view'd him all o'er
With eager eyes, then clos'd those eyes, well
pleas'd,

Of lesser ills the muse declines to sing,
Nor stoops so low; of these each groom can tell
The proper remedy. But O! what care,
What prudence, can prevent madness, the worst
Of maladies? Terrific pest! that blasts
The huntsman's hopes, and desolation spreads
Through all th' unpeopled kennel unrestrain'd,
More fatal than th' envenom'd viper's bite;
Or that Apulian spider's poisonous sting,
Heal'd by the pleasing antidote of sounds.

When Sirius reigns, and the sun's parching
beams

Bake the dry gaping surface, visit thou
Each ev'n and morn, with quick observant eye,
Thy panting pack. If, in dark fullen mood,
The glouting hound refuse his wonted meal,
Retiring to some close, obscure retreat,
Gloomy, disconsolate: with speed remove
The poor infectious wretch, and in strong chains
Bind him suspected. Thus that dire disease
Which art can't cure, wise caution may prevent.

But, this neglected, soon expect a change,
A dismal change, confusion, frenzy, death.

Or in some dark recess the senseless brute
Sits sadly pining : deep melancholy,
And black despair, upon his clouded brow
Hang lowering ; from his half-opening jaws
The clammy venom, and infectious froth,
Distilling fall ; and from his lungs inflam'd,
Malignant vapours taint the ambient air,
Breathing perdition : his dim eyes are glaz'd,
He droops his pensive head, his trembling limbs
No more support his weight ; abject he lies,
Dumb, spiritless, benumb'd ; till death at last
Gracious attends, and kindly brings relief.

Or, if outrageous grown, behold, alas !
A yet more dreadful scene ; his glaring eyes
Redden with fury, like some angry boar
Churning he foams ; and on his back erect
His pointed bristles rise ; his tail incurv'd
He drops, and with harsh broken howlings rends
The poison-tainted air, with rough hoarse voice
Incessant bays ; and snuffs th' infectious breeze ;
This way and that he stares aghast, and starts
At his own shade : jealous, as if he deem'd
The world his foe. If haply towards the stream
He cast his roving eye, cold horror chills
His soul ; averse he flies, trembling, appall'd.
Now frantic to the kennel's utmost verge
Raving he runs, and deals destruction round.
The pack fly diverse ; for whate'er he meets
Vengeful he bites, and every bite is death.

If now perchance through the weak fence e-
scap'd,

Far up the wind he roves, with open mouth
Inhales the cooling breeze : nor man, nor beast,
He spares implacable. The hunter-horse,
Once kind associate of his sylvan toils,
(Who haply now without the kennel's mound
Crops the rank mead, and listening hears with joy
The cheering cry, that morn and eve salutes
His raptur'd sense) a wretched victim falls.
Unhappy quadruped ! no more, alas !
Shall thy fond master with his voice applaud
Thy gentleness, thy speed ; or with his hand
Stroke thy soft dappled sides, as he each day
Visits thy stall, well pleas'd ; no more shalt thou
With sprightly neighings, to the winding horn,
And the loud opening pack in concert join'd,
Glad his proud heart. For oh ! the secret wound
Rankling inflames, he bites the ground, and dies !
Hence to the village with pernicious haste
Baleful he bends his course : the village flies
Alarm'd ; the tender mother in her arms
Hugs close the trembling babe ; the doors are barr'd,

And flying curs by native instinct taught
Shun the contagious bane ; the rustic bands
Hurry to arms, the rude militia seize
Whate'er at hand they find ; clubs, forks, or guns,
From every quarter charge the furious foe,
In wild disorder, and uncouth array : [gor'd,
Till, now with wounds on wounds oppress'd and
At one short poisonous gasp he breaths his last.

Hence to the kennel, muse, return, and view
With heavy heart that hospital of woe ;
Where horror stalks at large ! insatiate death
Sits growling o'er his prey : each hour presents

A different scene of ruin and distress,
How busy art thou, fate ! and how severe
Thy pointed wrath ! the dying and the dead
Promiscuous lie ; o'er these the living fight
In one eternal broil ; not conscious why,
Nor yet with whom. So drunkards, in their cups,
Spare not their friends, while senseless squabble
reigns.

Huntsman ! it much behoves thee to avoid
The perilous debate ! Ah ! rouse up all
Thy vigilance, and tread the treacherous ground
With careful step. Thy fires unquench'd preserve,
As erst the vestal flames ; the pointed steel
In the hot embers hide ; and if surpris'd
Thou feel'st the deadly bite, quick urge it home
Into the recent sore, and cauterize [vent :
The wound ; spare not thy flesh, nor dread th' e-
Vulcan shall save when Æsculapius fails.

Here should the knowing muse recount the means
To stop this growing plague. And here, alas !
Each hand presents a sovereign cure, and boasts
Infallibility, but boasts in vain.

On this depend, each to his separate seat
Confin'd, in fetters bound ; give each his morsel
Apart, his range in open air ; and then
If deadly symptoms to thy grief appear,
Devote the wretch, and let him greatly fall,
A generous victim for the public weal.

Sing, philosophic muse, the dire effects
Of this contagious bite on hapless man.
The rustic swains, by long tradition taught
Of leaches old, as soon as they perceive
The bite impress'd, to the sea-coasts repair.
Plung'd in the briny flood, th' unhappy youth
Now journeys home secure ; but soon shall wish
The seas as yet had cover'd him beneath
The foaming surge, full many a fathom a deep.
A fate more dismal, and superior ills
Hang o'er his head devoted. When the moon,
Closing her monthly round, returns again
To glad the night ; or when full-orb'd she shines
High in the vault of heaven ; the lurking pest
Begins the dire assault. The poisonous foam
Through the deep wound instill'd with hostile rage,
And all its fiery particles saline,
Invades th' arterial fluid : whose red waves
Tempestuous heave, and, their cohesion broke,
Fermenting boil ; intestine war ensues,
And order to confusion turns embroil'd.
Now the distended vessels scarce contain
The wild uproar, but press each weaker part
Unable to resist : the tender brain
And stomach suffer most ; convulsions shake
His trembling nerves, and wandering pungent
pains

Pinch sore the sleepless wretch ; his fluttering pulse
Oft intermits ; pensive, and sad, he mourns
His cruel fate, and to his weeping friends
Laments in vain ; to hasty anger prone,
Resents each slight offence, walks with quick step,
And wildly stares ; at last with boundless sway
The tyrant frenzy reigns : for as the dog
(Whose fatal bite convey'd th' infectious bane)
Raving he foams, and howls, and barks, and bites,
Like agitations in his boiling blood

Present like species to his troubled mind;
His nature and his actions all canine.
So (as old Homer sung) th' associates wild
Of wandering Ithacus, by Circe's charms
To swine transform'd, ran grunting through the groves,

Dreadful example to a wicked world!
See there distress'd he lies, parch'd up with thirst,
But dares not drink. Till now at last his soul
Trembling escapes, her noisome dungeon leaves,
And to some purer region wings away.

One labour yet remains, celestial maid!
Another element demands thy song.
No more o'er craggy steep, through coverts thick
With pointed thorn, and briars intricate,
Urge on with horn and voice the painful pack:
But skim with wanton wing th' irriguous vale,
Where winding streams amid the flowery meads
Perpetual glide along; and undermine
The cavern'd banks, by the tenacious roots
Of hoary willows arch'd; gloomy retreat
Of the bright scaly kind; where they at will
On the green watery reed their pasture graze,
Suck the moist soil, or slumber at their ease,
Rock'd by the restless brook, that draws aslope
Its humid train, and laves their dark abodes.
Where rages not oppression? Where, alas!
Is innocence secure? Rapine and spoil
Haunt ev'n the lowest deeps; seas have their sharks,
Rivers and ponds enclose the ravenous pike;
He in his turn becomes a prey; on him
Th' amphibious otter feasts. Just is his fate
Deserv'd: but tyrants know no bounds; nor spears,
That bristle on his back, defend the perch
From his wide greedy jaws; nor burnish'd mail
The yellow carp, nor all his arts can save
Th' insinuating eel, that hides his head
Beneath the slimy mud; nor yet escapes
The crimson-spotted trout, the river's pride,
And beauty of the stream. Without remorse,
This midnight pillager, ranging around,
Insatiate swallows all. The owner mourns
Th' unpeopled rivulet, and gladly hears
The huntsman's early call, and sees with joy
The jovial crew, that march upon its banks
In gay parade, with bearded lances arm'd.

The subtle spoiler of the beaver kind,
Far off perhaps, where ancient alders shade
The deep still pool; within some hollow trunk
Contrives his wicker couch: whence he surveys
His long purlieu, lord of the stream, and all
The finny shoals his own. But you, brave youths,
Dispute the felon's claim; try every root,
And every reedy bank; encourage all
The busy-spreading pack, that fearless plunge
Into the flood, and cross the rapid stream.
Bid rocks and caves, and each resounding shore,
Proclaim your bold defiance; loudly raise
Each cheering voice, till distant hills repeat
The triumphs of the vale. On the soft sand
See there his seal impress'd! and on that bank
Behold the glittering spoils, half-eaten fish,
Scales, fins, and bones, the leavings of his feast.
Ah! on that yielding sag-bed, see once more
His seal I view. O'er yon dank rushy marsh

The fly goose-footed prowler bends his course,
And seeks the distant shallows. Huntsman, bring
Thy eager pack; and trail him to his couch.
Hark! the loud peal begins, the clamorous joy,
The gallant chiding, loads the trembling air.

Ye Naiads fair, who o'er these floods preside,
Raise up your dripping heads above the wave,
And hear our melody. Th' harmonious notes
Float with the stream; and every winding creek
And hollow rock, that o'er the dimpling flood
Nods pendant; still improve from shore to shore
Our sweet reiterated joys. What shouts!
What clamour loud! What gay heart-cheering sounds

Urge through the breathing brags their mazy way!
Nor quires of Tritons glad with sprightlier strains
The dancing billows! when proud Neptune rides
In triumph o'er the deep. How greedily
They snuff the fishy steam, that to each blade
Rank-scenting clings! See! how the morning dew
They sweep, that from their feet besprinkling drop
Dispers'd, and leave a track oblique behind.
Now on firm land they range; then in the flood
They plunge tumultuous; or through reedy pools
Rustling they work their way: no hole escapes
Their curious search. With quick sensation now
The fuming vapour stings; flutter their hearts,
And joy redoubled bursts from every mouth
In louder symphonies. Yon hollow trunk,
That with its hoary head incurv'd salutes
The passing wave, must be the tyrant's fort,
And dread abode. How these impatient climb,
While others at the root incessant bay!
They put him down. See, there he dives along!
Th' ascending bubbles mark his gloomy way.
Quick fix the nets, and cut off his retreat
Into the sheltering deeps. Ah! there he vents!
The pack plunge headlong, and protended spears
Menace destruction: while the troubled surge
Indignant foams, and all the scaly kind,
Affrighted, hide their heads. Wild tumult reigns,
And loud uproar. Ah, there once more he vents!
See, that bold hound has seiz'd him; down they sink

Together lost: but soon shall he repent
His rash assault. See there escap'd, he flies
Half-drown'd, and clammers up the slippery bank
With ouze and blood distain'd. Of all the brutes,
Whether by nature form'd, or by long use,
This artful diver best can bear the want
Of vital air. Unequal is the fight,
Beneath the whelming element. Yet there
He lives not long; but respiration needs
At proper intervals. Again he vents;
Again the crowd attack. That spear has pierc'd
His neck; the crimson waves confess the wound.
Fix'd is the bearded lance, unwelcome guest,
Where'er he flies; with him it sinks beneath,
With him it mounts; sure guide to every foe.
Inly he groans; nor can his tender wound
Bear the cold stream. Lo! to yon sedgy bank
He creeps disconsolate: his numerous foes
Surround him, hounds and men. Pierc'd through and through,
On pointed spears they lift him high in air;

Wriggling he hangs, and grins, and bites in vain :
 Bid the loud horns, in gayly-warbling strains,
 Proclaim the felon's fate ; he dies, he dies.

Rejoice, ye scaly tribes, and leaping dance
 Above the wave, in sign of liberty
 Restor'd ; the cruel tyrant is no more.
 Rejoice secure and blest'd ; did not as yet
 Remain, some of your own rapacious kind ;
 And man, fierce man, with all his various wiles.

O happy ! if ye knew your happy state,
 Ye rangers of the fields ; whom Nature boon
 Cheers with her smiles, and every element
 Conspires to bless. What, if no heroes frown
 From marble pedestals ; nor Raphael's works,
 Nor Titian's lively tints, adorn our walls ?
 Yet these the meanest of us may behold ;
 And at another's cost may feast at will
 Our wondering eyes ; what can the owner more ?
 But vain, alas ! is wealth, not grac'd with power.
 The flowery landskip, and the gilded dome,
 And vistas opening to the wearied eye,
 Through all his wide domain ; the planted grove,
 The shrubby wilderness, with its gay choir
 Of warbling birds, can't lull to soft repose
 Th' ambitious wretch, whose discontented soul
 Is harrow'd day and night ; he mourns, he pines,
 Until his prince's favour makes him great.
 See there he comes, th' exalted idol comes !
 The circle's form'd, and all his fawning slaves
 Devoutly bow to earth ; from every mouth
 The nauseous flattery flows, which he returns
 With promises that die as soon as born.
 Vile intercourse ! where virtue has no place.
 Frown but the monarch ; all his glories fade ;
 He mingles with the throng, outcast, undone,
 The pageant of a day ; without one friend
 To soothe his tortur'd mind ; all, all are fled.
 For, though they bask'd in his meridian ray,
 The insects vanish, as his beams decline.

Not such our friends ; for here no dark design,
 No wicked interest, bribes the venal heart ;
 But inclination to our bosom leads,
 And weds them there for life ; our social cups
 Smile, as we smile ; open, and unreserv'd,
 We speak our inmost souls ; good-humour, mirth,
 Soft complaisance, and wit from malice free,
 Smooth every brow, and glow on every cheek.

O happiness sincere ! what wretch would groan
 Beneath the galling load of power, or walk
 Upon the slippery pavements of the great,
 Who thus could reign, unenvy'd and secure ?

Ye guardian powers who make mankind your care,

Give me to know wise Nature's hidden depths,
 Trace each mysterious cause, with judgment read
 Th' expanded volume, and submit to adore
 That great creative will, who at a word
 Spoke forth the wondrous scene. But if my soul
 To this gross clay confin'd flutters on earth
 With less ambitious wing ; unskill'd to range
 From orb to orb, where Newton leads the way ;
 And view with piercing eyes the grand machine,
 Worlds above worlds ; subservient to his voice,
 Who, veil'd in clouded majesty, alone
 Gives light to all ; bids the great system move,
 And changeful seasons in their turns advance,
 Unmov'd, unchang'd, himself : yet this at least
 Grant me propitious, an inglorious life,
 Calm and serene, nor lost in false pursuits
 Of wealth or honours ; but enough to raise
 My drooping friends, preventing modest want
 That dares not ask. And if, to crown my joys,
 Ye grant me health, that, ruddy in my cheeks,
 Blooms in my life's decline ; fields, woods, and
 streams,
 Each towering hill, each humble vale below,
 Shall hear my cheering voice, my hounds shall wake
 The lazy morn, and glad th' horizon round.

VIRG. Georg. lib. iii.

TO MR. HOGARTH.

PERMIT me, Sir, to make choice of you for my patron, being the greatest master in the burlesque way. In this indeed you have some advantage of your poetical brethren, that you paint to the eye ;

 yet remember, Sir, that we give speech and motion, and a greater variety to our figures. Your province is the town ; leave me a small outride in the country, and I shall be content. In this, at least, let us both agree, to make vice and folly the object of our ridicule; and we cannot fail to be of some service to mankind. I am,

SIR,

Your admirer, and

Your most humble servant,

W. S.

PREFACE.

NOTHING is more common than for us poor bards, when we have acquired a little reputation, to print ourselves into disgrace. We climb the Aonian mount with difficulty and toil; we receive the bays for which we languished; till, grasping still at more, we lose our hold, and fall at once to the bottom.

The author of this piece would not thus be felo de se, nor would he be murdered by persons unknown. But as he is satisfied, that there are many imperfect copies of this trifle dispersed abroad, and as he is credibly informed, that he shall soon be exposed to view in such an attitude, as he would not care to appear in; he thinks it most prudent, in this desperate case, to throw himself on the mercy of the public; and offer this whimsical work a voluntary sacrifice, in hope that he stands a better chance for their indulgence, now it has received his last hand, than when curtailed and mangled by others.

The poets of almost all nations have celebrated the games of their several countries. Homer began, and all the mimic tribe followed the example of that great father of poetry. Even our own Milton, who laid his scene beyond the limits of this sublunary world, has found room for descriptions of this sort, and has performed it in a more sublime manner than any who went before him. His, indeed, are sports; but they are the sports of angels. This gentleman has endeavoured to do justice to his countrymen, the British freeholders, who, when dressed in their holiday clothes, are by no means persons of a despicable figure; but eat and drink as plentifully, and fight as heartily, as the greatest hero in the Iliad. There is also some use in descriptions of this nature, since nothing gives us a clearer idea of the genius of a nation, than their sports and diversions. If we see people dancing, even in wooden shoes, and a fiddle always at their heels, we are soon convinced of the levity and volatile spirit of those merry slaves. The famous bull-feasts are an evident token of the Quixotism and romantic taste of the Spaniards. And a country-wake is too sad an image of the infirmities of our own people: we see nothing but broken heads, bottles flying about, tables overturned, outrageous drunkenness, and eternal squabble.

Thus much of the subject; it may not be improper to touch a little upon the style. One of the greatest poets and most candid critics of this age has informed us that there are two sorts of burlesque. Be pleased to take it in his own words, Spectator, Numb. 242. "Burlesque (says he) is

" of two kinds. The first represents mean persons in the accoutrements of heroes; the other, great persons acting and speaking like the basest among the people. Don Quixote is an instance of the first, and Lucian's gods of the second. It is a dispute among the critics, whether burlesque runs best in heroic, like the Dispensary; or in doggel, like that of Hudibras. I think, where the low character is to be raised, the heroic is the most proper measure; but when an hero is to be pulled down and degraded, it is best done in doggel." Thus far Mr. Addison. If therefore the heroic is the proper measure where the low character is to be raised, Milton's style must be very proper in the subject here treated of; because it raises the low character more than is possible to be done under the restraint of rhyme; and the ridicule chiefly consists in raising that low character. I beg leave to refer to the authority of Mr. Smith, in his poem upon the death of Mr. John Philips. The whole passage is so very fine, and gives so clear an idea of his manner of writing, that the reader will not think his labour lost in running it over.

But here it may be objected, that this manner of writing contradicts the rule in Horace:

"Versibus exponi tragicis res comica non vult."

Monsieur Boileau, in his dissertation upon the Joconde of de la Fontaine, quotes this passage in Horace, and observes, "Que comme il n'y a rien de plus froid, que de conter une chose grande en stile bas, aussi n'y a-t-il de plus ridicule, que de raconter une histoire comique et absurde en termes graves et serieux." But then he justly adds this exception to the general rule in Horace; "à moins que ce serieux ne soit affecté tout exprès pour rendre la chose encore plus burlesque." If the observation of that celebrated critic, Monsieur Dacier, is true, Horace himself, in the same epistle to the Piso's, and not far distant from the rule here mentioned, has aimed to improve the burlesque by the help of the sublime, in his note upon this verse:

"Debemur morti nos nostraque: five receptus

"Terrâ Neptunus"——

And upon the five following verses has this general remark: "Toutes ces expressions nobles qu'Horace entasse dans ces six vers servent à rendre plus plaisante cette chute:

"Ne dum verborum stet honos."——

"Car rien ne contribue tant au ridicule que le grand." He indeed would be severe upon himself alone, who should censure this way of writing, when he must plainly see, that it is affected on purpose, only to raise the ridicule, and give the reader a more agreeable entertainment. Nothing can improve a merry tale so much, as its being delivered with a grave and serious air. Our imaginations are agreeably surprised, and fond of a pleasure so little expected. Whereas he, who would bespeak our laughter by an affected grimace and ridiculous gestures, must play his part very well indeed, or he will fall short of the idea he has raised. It is true, Virgil was very sensible that it was difficult thus to elevate a low and mean subject:

"Nec sum animi dubius, verbis ea vincere magnum [rem.]

"Quam sit, et angustis hunc addere rebus hono-
But tells us for our encouragement in another place,

"In tenui labor, at tenuis non gloria, si quem

"Numina læva sinunt, auditque vocatus Apollo."

Mr. Addison is of the same opinion, and adds, that the difficulty is very much increased by writing in blank verse. "The English and French (says he) who always use the same words in verse as in ordinary conversation, are forced to raise their language with metaphors and figures, or by the pompousness of the whole phrase to wear off any littleness, that appears in the particular parts that compose it. This makes our blank verse, where there is no rhyme to support the expression, extremely difficult to such as are not masters of the tongue; especially when they write upon low subjects." Remarks upon Italy, p. 99. But there is even yet a greater difficulty behind: the writer in this kind of burlesque must not only keep up the pomp and dignity of the style, but an artful sneer should appear through the whole work, and every man will judge, that it is no easy matter to blend together the hero and the harlequin.

If any person should want a key to this poem, his curiosity shall be gratified: I shall, in plain words, tell him, "It is a satire against the luxury, the pride, the wantonness, and quarrelsome temper, of the middling sort of people." As these are the proper and genuine cause of that bare-faced knavery, and almost universal poverty, which reign without controul in every place; and as to these we owe our many bankrupt farmers, our trade decayed, and lands uncultivated; the author has reason to hope that no honest man, who loves his country, will think this short reproof out of season: for, perhaps, this merry way of bantering men into virtue, may have a better effect than the most serious admonitions; since many, who are proud to be thought immoral, are not very fond of being ridiculous.

CANTO I.

THE ARGUMENT.

Proposition. Invocation addressed to Mr. John Philips, author of the Cyder Poem and Splendid Shilling. Description of the Vale of Evesham. The Seat of Hobbinol; Hobbinol a great man in his village, seated in his wicker smoking his pipe, has one only son. Young Hobbinol's education, bred up with Ganderetta his near relation. Young Hobbinol and Ganderetta chosen king and queen of May. Her dress and attendants. The May-games. Twangdillo the fiddler, his character. The dancing. Ganderetta's extraordinary performance. Bagpipes good music in the Highlands. Milonides, master of the ring, disciplines the mob; proclaims the several prizes. His speech. Pastorel takes up the belt. His character, his heroic figure, his confidence. Hobbinol, by permission of Ganderetta, accepts the challenge, vaults into the ring. His honourable behaviour, escapes a scowering. Ganderetta's agony Pastorel foiled. Ganderetta not a little pleased.

WHAT old Menalcas at his feast reveal'd
I sing, strange feats of ancient prowess, deeds,
Of high renown, while all his listening guests
With eager joy receiv'd the pleasing tale.

O thou* who late on Vaga's flowery banks
Slumbering secure, with Stiom † well bedew'd,
Fallacious cask, in sacred dreams were taught
By ancient seers, and Merlin prophet old,
To raise ignoble themes with strains sublime,
Be thou my guide; while I thy track pursue
With wing unequal, through the wide expanse
Adventurous range, and emulate thy flights.

In that rich vale ‡, where with Dobunian §
fields

Cornavian || borders meet, far fam'd of old
For Montfort's * hapless fate, undaunted earl;
Where from her fruitful urn Avona pours
Her kindly torrent on the thirsty glebe,
And pillages the hills t' enrich the plains;
On whose luxuriant banks flowers of all hues
Start up spontaneous; and the teeming soil
With hasty shoots prevents its owner's prayer:
The pamper'd wanton steer, of the sharp axe
Regardless, that o'er his devoted head
Hangs menacing, crops his delicious bane,
Nor knows the price is life; with envious eye
His labouring yoke-fellow beholds his plight,
And deems him blest, while on his languid neck
In solemn sloth he tugs the lingering plough.
So blind are mortals, of each other's state
Mis-judging, self-deceiv'd. Here as supreme Stern Hobbinol in rural plenty reigns
O'er wide extended fields, his large domain.
Th' obsequious villagers, with looks submissive
Observant of his eye, or when with seed
T' impregnate earth's fat womb, or when to bring
With clamorous joy the bearded harvest home.

Here, when the distant sun lengthens the nights,
When the keen frosts the shivering farmer warn
To broach his mellow cask, and frequent blasts
Instruct the crackling billets how to blaze,
In his warm wicker-chair, whose pliant twigs
In close embraces join'd, with spacious arch
Vault this thick-woven roof, the bloated churl
Loiters in state, each arm reclin'd is prop'd
With yielding pillows of the softest down.
In mind compos'd, from short coeval tube
He sucks the vapours bland, thick curling clouds
Of smoke around his reeking temples play;
Joyous he sits, and impotent of thought
Puffs away care and sorrow from his heart.
How vain the pomp of kings! look down, ye
great,

 Simon de Montfort, killed at the battle of Evesham.

And view with envious eye the downy nest,
Where soft repose, and calm contentment dwell,
Unbrib'd by wealth, and unrestrain'd by power.

One son alone had blest his bridal bed,
Whom good Calista bore, nor long surviv'd
To share a mother's joy, but left the babe
To his paternal care. An orphan niece
Near the same time his dying brother sent,
To claim his kind support. The helpless pair
In the same cradle slept, nurs'd up with care
By the same tender hand, on the same breasts
Alternate hung with joy; till reason dawn'd,
And a new light broke out by slow degrees:
Then on the floor the pretty wantons play'd,
Gladding the farmer's heart with growing hopes,
And pleasures erst unfelt. Whene'er with cares
Oppress'd, when wearied, or alone he doz'd,
Their harmless prattle sooth'd his troubled soul.
Say, Hobbinol, what ecstasies of joy
Thrill'd through thy veins, when climbing for a kiss

With little palms they strok'd thy grizly beard,
Or round thy wicker whirl'd their rattling cars?
Thus from their earliest days bred up, and train'd,
To mutual fondness, with their stature grew
The thriving passion. What love can decay
That roots so deep! now ripening manhood curl'd
On the gay stripling's chin: her panting breasts,
And trembling blushes glowing on her cheeks,
Her secret wish betray'd. She at each mart
All eyes attracted; but her faithful shade,
Young Hobbinol, ne'er wander'd from her side.
A frown from him dash'd every rival's hopes.
For he, like Peleus' son, was prone to rage,
Inexorable, swift like him of foot
With ease could overtake his dastard foe,
Nor spar'd the suppliant wretch. And now approach'd

Those merry days, when all the nymphs and
swains,

In solemn festivals and rural sports,
Pay their glad homage to the blooming spring.
Young Hobbinol by joint consent is rais'd
To imperial dignity, and in his hand
Bright Ganderetta tripp'd the jovial queen
Of Maia's gaudy month profuse of flowers.
From each enamel'd mead th' attendant nymphs
Loaded with odorous spoils, from these select
Each flower of gorgeous dye, and garlands weave
Of party-colour'd sweets; each busy hand
Adorns the jocund queen: in her loose hair,
That to the winds in wanton ringlets plays,
The tufted cowslips breathe their faint perfumes.
On her refulgent brow, as crystal clear,
As Parian marble smooth, Narcissus hangs
His drooping head, and views his image there,
Unhappy flower! pansies of various hue,
Iris, and hyacinth, and asphodel,
To deck the nymph, their richest liveries wear,
And lavish all their pride. Not Flora's self
More lovely smiles, when to the dawning year
Her opening bosom heavenly fragrance breathes.

See on yon verdant lawn, the gathering crowd
Thickens amain; the buxom nymphs advance
Usher'd by jolly clowns: distinctions cease

Lost in the common joy, and the bold slave
Leans on his wealthy master, unrepov'd:
The sick no pains can feel, no wants the poor.
Round his fond mother's neck the smiling babe
Exulting clings; hard by decrepid age,
Prop'd on his staff with anxious thought revolves
His pleasures past, and casts his grave remarks
Among the heedless throng. The vigorous youth
Strips for the combat, hopeful to subdue
The fair-one's long disdain, by valour now
Glad to convince her coy erroneous heart,
And prove his merit equal to her charms.
Soft pity pleads his cause; blushing she views
His brawny limbs, and his undaunted eye,
That looks a proud defiance on his foes.
Resolv'd and obstinately firm he stands;
Danger nor death he fears, while the rich prize
Is victory and love. On the large bough
Of a thick-spreading elm Twangdillo sits;
One leg on Ister's banks the hardy swain
Lest undismay'd, Bellona's lightning scorch'd
His manly visage, but in pity left
One eye secure. He many a painful bruise
Intrepid felt, and many a gaping wound,
For brown Kate's sake, and for his country's weal;
Yet still the merry bard without regret
Bears his own ills, and with his sounding shell,
And comic phyz, relieves his drooping friends.
Hark, from aloft his tortur'd cat-gut squeals,
He tickles every string, to every note
He bends his plaint neck, his single eye
Twinkles with joy, his active stump beats time:
Let but this subtle artist softly touch
The trembling chords, the faint expiring swain
Trembles no less, and the fond yielding maid
Is tweedled into love. See with what pomp
The gaudy bands advance in trim array!
Love beats in every vein, from every eye
Darts his contagious flames. They frisk, they bound

Now to brisk airs, and to the speaking strings:
Attentive, in mid-way the sexes meet;
Joyous their adverse fronts they close, and press
To strict embrace, as resolute to force
And storm a passage to each other's heart:
Till by the varying notes forewarn'd back they Recoil disparted: each with longing eyes
Pursues his mate retiring, till again
The blended sexes mix; then hand in hand
Fast lock'd, around they fly, or nimbly wheel
In mazes intricate. The jocund troop,
Pleas'd with their grateful toil, incessant shake
Their uncouth brawny limbs, and knock their heels
Sonorous; down each brow the trickling balm
In torrents flows, exhaling sweets refresh
The gazing crowd, and heavenly fragrance fills
The circuit wide. So danc'd in days of yore,
When Orpheus play'd a lesson to the brutes,
The listening savages; the speckled pard
Dandled the kid, and with the bounding roe
The lion gambol'd. But what heavenly muse
With equal lays shall Ganderetta sing,
When goddess-like she skims the verdant plain,
Gracefully gliding? every ravish'd eye
The nymph attracts and every heart she wounds,

The most, transported Hobbinol! lo, now,
Now to thy opening arms she skuds along,
With yielding blushes glowing on her cheeks;
And eyes that sweetly languish; but too soon,
Too soon, alas! she flies thy vain embrace,
But flies to be pursued; nimbly she trips,
And darts a glance so tender as she turns,
That with new hopes reliev'd, thy joys revive,
Thy stature's rais'd, and thou art more than man.
Thy stately port, and more majestic air,
And every sprightly motion speaks thy love.

To the loud bag-pipe's solemn voice attend,
Whose rising winds proclaim a storm is nigh.
Harmonious blasts! that warm the frozen blood
Of Caledonia's sons to love or war,
And cheer their drooping hearts, robb'd of the sun's

Enlivening ray, that o'er the snowy Alps
Reluctant peeps, and speeds to better climes.

Forthwith in hoary majesty appears
One of gigantic size, but visage wan,
Milonides the strong, renown'd of old
For feats of arms, but, bending now with years,
His trunk unwieldy from the verdant turf
He rears deliberate, and with his plant
Of toughest virgin oak in rising aids
His trembling limbs; his bald and wrinkled front,
Entrench'd with many a glorious scar, bespeaks
Submissive reverence. He with countenance grim
Boasts his past deeds, and with redoubled strokes
Marshals the crowd, and forms the circle wide.
Stern arbiter! like some huge rock he stands,
That breaks th' incumbent waves; they throng-
ing press

In troops confus'd, and rear their foaming heads
Each above each, but from superior force
Shrinking repell'd, compose of stateliest view
A liquid theatre. With hands uplift,
And voice stentorian, he proclaims aloud
Each rural prize. "To him whose active foot
" Foils his bold foe, and rivets him to earth,
" This pair of gloves, by curious virgin hands
" Embroider'd, seam'd with silk, and fring'd with
" gold.

" To him, who best the stubborn hilts can wield,
" And bloody marks of his displeasure leave
" On his opponent's head, this beaver white
" With silver edging grac'd, and scarlet plume.
" Ye taper maidens! whose impetuous speed
" Outflies the roe, nor bends the tender grass,
" See here this prize, this rich lac'd smock be-
" hold,

" White as your bosoms, as your kisses soft.
" Blest nymph! whom bounteous heaven's pe-
" culiar grace

" Allots this pompous vest, and worthy deems
" To win a virgin, and to wear a bride."

The gifts refulgent dazzle all the crowd,
In speechless admiration fix'd, unmov'd,
Ev'n he who now each glorious palm displays,
In sullen silence views his batter'd limbs,
And sighs his vigour spent. Not so appall'd
Young Pastorel, for active strength renown'd:
Him Ida bore, a mountain shepherdess;
On the bleak wold the new-born infant lay,

Expos'd to winter snows, and northern blasts
Severe. As heroes old, who from great Jove
Derive their proud descent, so might he boast
His line paternal: but be thou, my muse!
No leaky blab, nor painful umbrage give
To wealthy 'squire, or doughty knight, or peer
Of high degree. Him every shouting ring
In triumph crown'd, him every champion fear'd,
From † Kiftsgate to remotest † Henbury.
High in the midst the brawny wrestler stands,
A stately towering object; the tough belt
Measures his ample breast, and shades around
His shoulders broad; proudly secure he kens
The tempting prize, in his presumptuous thought
Already gain'd; with partial look the crowd
Approve his claim. But Hobbinol, enrag'd
To see th' important gifts so cheaply won,
And uncontested honours tamely lost,
With lowly reverence thus accosts his queen.

" Fair goddess! be propitious to my vows;
" Smile on thy slave, nor Hercules himself
" Shall rob us of this palm: that boaster vain
" Far other port shall learn." She, with a look
That pierc'd his inmost soul, smiling applauds
His generous ardour, with aspiring hope
Distends his breast, and stirs the man within:
Yet much, alas! she fears, for much she loves.
So from her arms the Paphian queen dismiss'd
The warrior god, on glorious slaughter bent,
Provok'd his rage, and with her eyes inflam'd
Her haughty paramour Swift as the winds
Dispel the fleeting mists, at once he strips
His royal robes; and with a frown that chill'd
The blood of the proud youth, active he bounds
High o'er the heads of multitudes reclin'd:
But, as becom'd one, whose plain honest heart,
Nor passion foul, nor malice dark as hell,
But honour pure, and love divine, had fir'd,
His hand presenting, on his sturdy foe
Disdainfully he smiles; then, quick as thought,
With his left-hand the belt, and with his right
His shoulder seiz'd fast griping; his right foot
Essay'd the champion's strength: but firm he stood,
Fix'd as a mountain ash, and in his turn
Repaid the bold affront; his horny fist
Fast on his back he clos'd, and shook in air
The cumbersome load. Nor rest, nor pause allow'd,
Their watchful eyes instruct their busy feet;
They pant, they heave; each nerve, each sinew's
strain'd,

Grasping they close, beneath each painful gripe
The livid tumours rise, in briny streams
The sweat distils, and from their batter'd shins
The clotted gore distains the beaten ground.
Each swain his wish, each trembling nymph conceals

Her secret dread; while every panting breast
Alternate fears and hopes depresses or raises.
Thus long in dubious scale the contest hung,
Till Pastorel, impatient of delay,
Collecting all his force, a furious stroke
At his left ankle aim'd; 'twas death to fall,
To stand impossible. O Ganderetta!

† Two Hundreds in Gloucestershire.

What horrors seize thy soul! on thy pale cheeks
The roses fade. But wavering long in air,
Nor firm on foot, nor as yet wholly fallen,
On his right knee he slip'd, and nimbly 'scap'd
The foul disgrace. Thus on the slacken'd rope
The wingy-footed artist, frail support!
Stands tottering; now in dreadful shrieks the crowd

Lament his sudden fate, and yield him lost:
He on his hams, or on his brawny rump,
Sliding secure, derides their vain distress.
Up starts the vigorous Hobbinol undismay'd,
From mother earth like old Anteus rais'd
With might redoubled. Clamour and applause
Shake all the neighbouring hills, Avona's banks
Return him loud acclaim: with ardent eyes,
Fierce as a tiger rushing from his lair,
He grasp'd the wrist of his insulting foe.
Then with quick wheel oblique his shoulder point
Beneath his breast he fix'd, and whirl'd aloft
High o'er his head the sprawling youth he flung:
The hollow ground rebellow'd as he fell.
The crowd press forward with tumultuous din;
Those to relieve their faint expiring friend,
With gratulations these. Hands, tongues, and caps,
Outrageous joy proclaim, shrill fiddles squeak,
Hoarse bag-pipes roar, and Ganderetta smiles.

CANTO II.

THE ARGUMENT.

The fray. Tonforio, Colin, Hilderbrand, Cuddy, Cindaraxa, Talgol, Avaro, Cubbin, Collakin, Mundungo. Sir Rhadamanth the justice, attended with his guards, comes to quell the fray. Rhadamanth's speech, tumult appeas'd. Gorgonius the butcher takes up the hilts; his character. The Kistsgations consternation, look wistfully on Hobbinol; his speech. The cudgel-playing. Gorgonius knock'd down, falls upon Twandillo; his distress; his lamentation over his broken fiddle.

Long while an universal hubbub loud,
Deafening each ear, had drown'd each accent mild;
Till biting taunts and harsh opprobrious words
Vile utterance found. How weak are human minds!

How impotent to stem the swelling tide,
And without insolence enjoy success!
The vale-inhabitants, proud, and elate
With victory, know no restraint, but give
A loose to joy. Their champion Hobbinol
Vaunting they raise, above that earth-born race
Of giants old, who, piling hills on hills,
Pelion on Ossa, with rebellious aim
Made war on Jove. The sturdy mountaineers,
Who saw their mightiest fall'n, and in his fall
Their honours past impair'd, their trophies, won
By their proud fathers, who with scorn look'd
down

Upon the subject vale, fullied, despoil'd,
And level'd with the dust, no longer bear

The keen reproach. But as when sudden fire
Seizes the ripen'd grain, whose bending ears
Invite the reaper's hand, the furious god
In footy triumph dreadful rides, upborn
On wings of wind, that with destructive breath
Feed the fierce flames; from ridge to ridge he bounds

Wide-wasting, and pernicious ruin spreads:
So through the crowd from breast to breast swift flew

The propagated rage; loud vollied oaths,
Like thunder bursting from a cloud, gave signs
Of wrath awak'd. Prompt fury soon supplied
With arms uncouth; and tough well-season'd plants

Weighty with lead infus'd, on either host
Fall thick, and heavy; stools in pieces rent,
And chairs, and forms, and batter'd bowls, are hurl'd

With fell intent; like bombs the bottles fly
Hissing in air, their sharp edg'd fragments drench'd
In the warm spouting gore; heaps driven on heaps Promiscuous lie. Tonforio now advanc'd
On the rough edge of battle: his broad front
Beneath his shining helm secure, as erst
Was thine, Mambrino, stout Iberian knight!
Defied the rattling storm, that on his head
Fell innocent. A table's ragged frame
In his right hand he bore, Herculean club!
Crowds, push'd on crowds, before his potent arm,
Fled ignominious; havock, and dismay,
Hung on their rear. Collin a merry swain,
Blithe as the soaring lark, as sweet the strains
Of his soft warbling lips, that whistling cheer
His labouring team, they toss their heads well
pleas'd,

In gaudy plumage deck'd, with stern disdain
Beheld this victor proud, his generous soul
Brook'd not the foul disgrace. High o'er his head
His ponderous plough-staff in both hands he rais'd;
Erect he stood, and stretching every nerve,
As from a forceful engine, down it fell
Upon his hollow'd helm, that yielding sunk
Beneath the blow, and with its sharpen'd edge
Shear'd both his ears, they on his shoulders broad Hung ragged. Quick as thought, the vigorous youth

Shortening his staff, the other end he darts
Into his gaping jaws. Tonforio fled
Sore maim'd; with pounded teeth and clotted gore
Half-chok'd, he fled; with him the host retir'd,
Companions of his shame; all but the stout,
And erst unconquer'd Hildebrand, brave man!
Bold champion of the hills! thy weighty blows
Our fathers felt dismay'd; to keep thy post
Unmov'd, whilom thy valour's choice, now sad
Necessity compels; decrepit now
With age, and stiff with honourable wounds,
He stands unterrify'd: one crutch sustains
His frame majestic, th' other in his hand
He wields tremendous; like a mountain boar
In toils enclos'd, he dares his circling foes.
They shrink aloof, or soon with shame repent
The rash assault; the rustic heroes fall
In heaps around. Cuddy, a dextrous youth,

When force was vain, on fraudulent art rely'd :
 Close to the ground low-cowering, unperceiv'd,
 Cautious he crept, and with his crooked bill
 Cut sheer the frail support, prop of his age :
 Reeling a while he stood, and menac'd fierce
 Th' insidious swain, reluctant now at length
 Fell prone, and plough'd the dust. So the tall oak,
 Old monarch of the groves, that long had stood
 The shock of warring winds and the red bolts
 Of angry Jove, shorn of his leafy shade
 At last, and inwardly decay'd, if chance
 The cruel woodman spy the friendly spur,
 His only hold; that sever'd, soon, he nods,
 And shakes th' incumber'd mountain as he falls.

When manly valour fail'd, a female arm
 Restor'd the fight. As in th' adjacent booth
 Black Cindaraxa's busy hand prepar'd
 The smoky viands, she beheld, abash'd,
 The routed host, and all her dastard friends
 Far scatter'd o'er the plain; their shameful flight
 Griev'd her proud heart, for hurried with the stream

Ev'n Talgol too had fled, her darling boy.
 A flaming brand from off the glowing hearth
 The greasy heroine snatch'd; o'er her pale foes
 The threatening meteor shone, brandish'd in air,
 Or round their heads in ruddy circles play'd.
 Across the prostrate Hildebrand she strode,
 Dreadfully bright: the multitude appal'd
 Fled different ways, their beards, their hair in flames.
 Imprudent she pursued, till on the brink
 Of the next pool, with force united press'd,
 And waving round with huge two-handed sway
 Her blazing arms into the muddy lake
 The bold virago fell. Dire was the fray
 Between the warring elements; of old
 Thus Mulciber, and Xanthus Dardan stream
 In hideous battle join'd. Just sinking now
 Into the boiling deep, with suppliant hands
 She begg'd for life; black-ouze and filth obscene
 Hung in her matted hair; the shouting crowd
 Insult her woes, and, proud of their success,
 The dripping Amazon in triumph lead.
 Now, like a gathering storm, the rally'd troops
 Blacken'd the plain. Young Talgol from their front,

With a fond lover's haste, swift as the hind,
 That, by the huntsmen's voice alarm'd, had fled,
 Panting returns, and seeks the gloomy brake,
 Where her dear fawn lay hid, into the booth
 Impatient rush'd. But when the fatal tale
 He heard, the dearest treasure of his soul
 Purloin'd his Cindy lost; stiffen'd and pale
 A while he stood; his kindling ire at length
 Burst forth implacable, and injur'd love;
 Shot lightning from his eyes; a spit he seiz'd,
 Just reeking from the fat surloin, a long,
 Unwieldy spear; then with impetuous rage
 Press'd forward on th' embattled host, that shrunk
 At his approach. The rich Avaro first,
 His fleshy rump bor'd with dishonest wounds,
 Fled bellowing: nor could his numerous flocks,
 Nor all th' aspiring pyramids that grace
 His yard well stor'd, save the penurious clown.
 Here Cubbin fell, and there young Collakin,

Nor his fond mother's prayers nor ardent vows
 Of love-sick maids could move relentless fate.
 Where'er he rag'd, with his far-beaming lance
 He thinn'd their ranks, and all their battle swerv'd
 With many an inroad goar'd. Then cast around
 His furious eyes, if haply he might find
 The captive fair; her in the dust he spy'd
 Groveling, disconsolate; those locks, that erst,
 So bright, shone like the polish'd jet, defil'd
 With mire impure; thither with eager haste
 He ran, he flew. But when the wretched maid
 Prostrate he view'd, deform'd with gaping wounds
 And weltering in her blood, his trembling hand
 Soon dropp'd the dreaded lance; on her pale cheeks

Ghaustly he gaz'd, nor felt the pealing storm,
 That on his bare defenceless brow fell thick
 From every arm: o'erpower'd at last, down sunk
 His drooping head, on her cold breast reclin'd.
 Hail, faithful pair! if ought my verse avail,
 Nor envy's spite nor time shall e'er efface
 The records of your fame; blind British bards
 In ages yet to come, on festal days [nymphs
 Shall chant this mournful tale, while listening
 Lament around, and every generous heart
 With active valour glows, and virtuous love,
 How blind is popular fury! how perverse,
 When broils intestine rage, and force controuls
 Reason and law! As the torn vessel sinks,
 Between the burst of adverse waves o'erwhelm'd;
 So fares it with the neutral head, between Contending parties bruis'd, incessant peal'd
 With random strokes that undiscerning fall;
 Guiltless he suffers most, who least offends.
 Mundungo from the bloody field retir'd,
 Close in a corner plied the peaceful bowl;
 Incurious he, and thoughtless of events,
 Now deem'd himself conceal'd, wrapt in the cloud
 That issued from his mouth, and the thick fogs
 That hung upon his brows, but hostile rage
 Inquisitive found out the rusty swain.
 His short black tubedown his furr'd throat impell'd,
 Staggering he reel'd, and with tenacious gripe
 The bulky Jordan, that before him stood,
 Seiz'd falling; that its liquid freight disgorg'd
 Upon the prostrate clown; floundering he lay
 Beneath the muddy beverage whelm'd so late
 His prime delight. Thus the luxurious wasp,
 Voracious insect, by the fragrant dregs
 Allur'd, and in the viscous nectar plung'd,
 His filmy pennons struggling flaps in vain,
 Lost in a flood of sweets. Still o'er the plain
 Fierce onset, and tumultuous battle spread;
 And now they fall, and now they rise, incens'd
 With animated rage, while nought around
 Is heard but clamour, shout, and female cries,
 And curses mix'd with groans. Discord on high
 Shook her infernal scourge, and o'er their heads
 Scream'd with malignant joy; when lo! between
 The warring hosts appear'd sage Rhadamanth,
 A knight of high renown. Nor Quixote bold,
 Nor Amadis of Gaul, nor Hudibras,
 Mirror of knighthood, e'er could vie with thee,
 Great sultan of the vale! thy front severe,
 As humble Indians to their pagods bow,

The clowns submit approach. Themis to thee
Commits her golden balance, where she weighs
Th' abandon'd orphan's sighs, the widow's tears;
By thee gives sure redress, comforts the heart
Oppress'd with woe, and rears the suppliant knee.
Each bold offender hides his guilty head,
Astonish'd, when thy delegated arm
Draws her vindictive sword; at thy command,
Stern minister of power supreme! each ward
Sends forth her brawny myrmidons, their clubs
Blazon'd with royal arms; dispatchful haste
Sits earnest on each brow, and public care.
Encompass'd round with these his dreadful guards,
He spur'd his sober steed, grizzled with age,
And venerably dull; his stirrups stretch'd
Beneath the knightly load; one hand he fix'd
Upon his saddle-bow, the other palm
Before him spread, like some grave orator
In Athens, or free Rome, when eloquence
Subdued mankind, and all the listening crowd
Hung by their ears on his persuasive tongue.
He thus the jarring multitude address'd:

" Neighbours, and friends, and countrymen, the flower [broil?
" Of Kiftgate! ah! what means this impious
" Is then the haughty Gaul no more your care?
" Are Landen's plains so soon forgot, that thus
" Ye spill that blood inglorious, waste that strength,
" Which, well employ'd, once more might have compell'd
" The stripling Anjou to a shameful flight?
" Or by your great forefathers taught, have fix'd
" The British standard on Lutetian towers!
" O fight odious, detestable! O times
" Degenerate, of ancient honour void!
" This fact so foul, so riotous, insults
" All law, all sovereign power, and calls aloud
" For vengeance; but, my friends! too well ye know,
" How slow this arm to punish, and how bleeds
" This heart, when forc'd on rigorous extremes.
" O countrymen! all, all, can testify
" My vigilance, my care for public good,
" I am the man, who by your own free choice
" Select from all the tribes, in senates rul'd
" Each warm debate, and emptied all my stores
" Of ancient science in my country's cause.
" Wise Tacitus, of penetration deep,
" Each secret spring reveal'd; Thuanus bold
" Breath'd liberty, and all the mighty dead,
" Rais'd at my call, the British rights confirm'd:
" While Musgrave, How, and Seymour sneer'd in vain.
" I am the man, who from the bench exalt
" This voice, still grateful to your ears, this voice
" Which breaths for you alone. Where is the wretch
" Distress'd, who in the cobwebs of the law
" Entangled, and in subtle problems lost,
" Seeks not to me for aid! In shoals they come
" Neglected, feeble clients, nor return
" Unedify'd; scarce greater multitudes
" At Delphi sought the god, to learn their fate
" From his dark oracles. I am the man
" Whose watchful providence beyond the date

" Of this frail life extends, to future times
" Beneficent; my useful schemes shall steer
" The common-weal in ages yet to come. [keep
" Your children's children, taught by me, shall
" Their rights inviolable: and as Rome
" The Sibyl's sacred books, though wrote on leaves
" And scatter'd o'er the ground with pious awe
" Collected; so your sons shall glean with care
" My hallow'd fragments, every scrip divine
" Consult intent, of more intrinsic worth
" Than half a Vatican. Hear me, my friends!
" Hear me, my countrymen! Oh suffer not
" This hoary head, employ'd for you alone,
" To sink, with sorrow to the grave." He spake,
And veil'd his bonnet to the crowd. As when
The sovereign of the floods o'er the rough deep
His awful trident shakes, its fury falls,
The warring billows on each hand retire,
And foam, and rage no more. All now is hush'd,
The multitude appeas'd: a cheerful dawn
Smiles on the fields, the waving throng subsides,
And the loud tempest sinks, becalm'd in peace.

Gorgonius now with haughty strides advanc'd,
A gauntlet seiz'd, firm on his guard he stood
A formidable foe, and dealt in air
His empty blows, a prelude to the fight.
Slaughter his trade; full many a pamper'd ox
Fell by his fatal hand, the bulky beast
Dragg'd by his horns, oft at one deadly blow,
His iron fist descending, crush'd his skull,
And left him spurning on the bloody floor;
While at his feet the guiltless axe was laid.
In dubious fight of late one eye he lost,
Bor'd from its orb, and the next glancing stroke
Bruis'd fore the rising arch, and bent his nose:
Nathless he triumph'd on the well-fought stage,
Hockleian hero! Nor was more deform'd
The Cyclops blind, nor of more monstrous size,
Nor his void orb more dreadful to behold,
Weeping the putrid gore, severe revenge
Of subtle Ithacus. Terribly gay
In his buff doublet, larded o'er with fat
Of slaughter'd brutes, the well-oil'd champion shone.
Sternly he gaz'd around, with many a frown
Fierce menacing, provok'd the tardy foe.
For now each combatant, that erst so bold
Vaunted his manly deeds, in pensive mood
Hung down his head, and fix'd on earth his eyes,
Pale and dismay'd. On Hobbinol at last
Intent they gaze, on him alone their hope,
Each eye solicits him, each panting heart
Joins in the silent suit. Soon he perceiv'd
Their secret wish, and eas'd their doubting minds.

" Ye men of Kiftgate! whose wide spreading
fame
" In ancient days were sung from shore to shore,
" To British bards of old a copious theme;
" Too well, alas! in your pale cheeks I view
" Your dastard souls. O mean, degenerate race!
" But since on me ye call, each suppliant eye
" Invites my sovereign aid, lo! here I come,
" The bulwark of your fame, though scarce my brows
" Are dry from glorious toils, just now achiev'd,
" To vindicate your worth. Lo! here I swear,

" By all my great forefathers fair renown,
 " By that illustrious wicker, where they sat
 " In comely pride, and in triumphant sloth
 " Gave law to passive clowns; or on this spot
 " In glory's prime, young Hobbinol expires,
 " And from his dearest Ganderetta's arms
 " Sinks to death's cold embrace; or by this hand
 " That stranger, big with insolence, shall fall
 " Prone on the ground, and do your honour
 right."

Forthwith the hilts he seiz'd; but on his arm
 Fond Ganderetta hung, and round his neck
 Curl'd in a soft embrace. Honour and love
 A doubtful contest wag'd, but from her soon
 He sprung relentless, all her tears were vain,
 Yet oft he turn'd, oft sigh'd, thus pleasing mild:

" Ill should I merit these imperial robes,
 " Ensigns of majesty, by general voice
 " Confer'd, should pain, or death itself, avail
 " To shake the steady purpose of my soul.
 " Peace, fair-one! peace! Heaven will protect the man,

" By thee held dear, and crown thy generous love."
 Her from the list'd field the matrons sage
 Reluctant drew, and with fair speeches sooth'd.

Now front to front the fearless champions meet;
 Gorgonius, like a tower, whose cloudy top
 Invades the skies, stood lowering; far beneath
 The stripling Hobbinol with careful eye
 Each opening scans, and each unguarded space
 Measures intent. While, negligently bold,
 The bulky combatant, whose heart elate
 Disdain'd his puny foe, now fondly deem'd
 At one decisive stroke to win, unhurt,
 An easy victory; down came at once
 The ponderous plant, with fell malicious rage,
 Aim'd at his head direct; but the tough hilts,
 Swift interpos'd, elude his effort vain.

The cautious Hobbinol, with ready feet,
 Now shifts his ground, retreating; then again
 Advances bold, and his unguarded shins
 Batters secure: Each well-directed blow
 Bites to the quick; thick as the falling hail,
 The strokes redoubled peal his hollow sides:
 The multitude amaz'd with horror view
 The rattling storm, shrink back at every blow,
 And seem to feel his wounds; inly he groan'd,
 And gnash'd his teeth, and from his blood-shot eye
 Red lightning flash'd; the fierce tumultuous rage
 Shook all his mighty fabric; once again
 Erect he stands, collected, and resolv'd
 To conquer, or to die: swift as the bolt
 Of angry Jove, the weighty plant descends.
 But wary Hobbinol, whose watchful eye
 Perceiv'd his kind intent, slip'd on one side
 Declining; the vain stroke from such an height,
 With such a force impell'd, headlong drew down
 Th' unwieldy champion: on the solid ground
 He fell rebounding breathless, and astunn'd,
 His trunk extended lay; fore maim'd from out
 His heaving breast, he belch'd a crimson flood.
 Full leisurely he rose, but conscious shame
 Of honour lost his failing strength renew'd.
 Rage, and revenge, and ever-during hate,
 Blacken'd his stormy front; rash, furious, blind,

VOL. VIII.

And lavish of his blood, of random strokes
 He laid on load; without design or art
 Onward he press'd outrageous, while his foe
 Encircling wheels, or inch by inch retires,
 Wise niggard of his strength. Yet all thy care,
 O Hobbinol! avail'd not to prevent
 One hapless blow; o'er his strong guard the plant
 Lapp'd pliant, and its knotty point impress'd
 His nervous chine; he wreath'd him to and fro
 Convolv'd, yet, thus distress'd, intrepid bore
 His hilts aloft, and guarded well his head.
 So when th' unwary clown, with hasty step,
 Crushes the folded snake, her wounded parts
 Groveling she trails along, but her high crest
 Erect she bears; in all its speckled pride,
 She swells inflam'd, and with her forked tongue
 Threatens destruction. With like eager haste,
 Th' impatient Hobbinol, whom excessive pain
 Stung to his heart, a speedy vengeance vow'd,
 Nor wanted long the means; a feint he made
 With well-dissembled guile, his batter'd shins
 Mark'd with his eyes, and menac'd with his plant.
 Gorgonius, whose long-suffering legs scarce bore
 His cumbrous bulk, to his supporters frail
 Indulgent, soon the friendly hilts oppos'd;
 Betray'd, deceiv'd on his unguarded crest
 The stroke delusive fell; a dismal groan
 Burst from his hollow chest; his trembling hands
 Forsook the hilts, across the spacious ring
 Backward he reel'd, the crowd affrighted fly
 To escape the falling ruin. But, alas!
 'Twas thy hard fate, Twangdillo! to receive
 His ponderous trunk: on thee, on helpless thee,
 Headlong and heavy, the foul monster fell.
 Beneath a mountain's weight, th' unhappy bard
 Lay prostrate, nor was more renown'd thy song,
 O fear of Thrace! nor more severe thy fate.
 His vocal shell, the solace and support
 Of wretched age, gave one melodious scream,
 And in a thousand fragments strew'd the plain.
 The nymphs, sure friends to his harmonious mirth,
 Fly to his aid, his hairy breast expose
 To each refreshing gale, and with soft hands
 His temples chase; at their persuasive touch
 His fleeing soul returns; upon his rump
 He sat disconsolate; but when, alas!
 He view'd the shatter'd fragments, down again
 He sunk expiring: by their friendly care
 Once more reviv'd, he thrice essay'd to speak,
 And thrice the rising sobb his voice subdu'd.
 Till thus at last his wretched plight he mourn'd:
 " Sweet instrument of mirth! sole comfort left
 " To my declining years! whose sprightly notes
 " Restor'd my vigour, and renew'd my bloom,
 " Soft healing balm to every wounded heart!
 " Despairing, dying swains, from the cold ground
 " Uprais'd by thee, at thy melodious call,
 " With ravish'd ears receiv'd the flowing joy.
 " Gay pleasantries, and care-beguiling joke,
 " Thy sure attendants were, and at thy voice
 " All nature smil'd. But, oh, this hand no more
 " Shall touch thy wanton strings, no more with lays
 " Alternate, from oblivion dark redeem
 " The mighty dead, and vindicate their fame.
 " Vain are thy toils, O Hobbinol! and all

" Thy triumphs vain. Who shall record, brave man!
 " Thy bold exploits? who shall thy grandeur tell
 " Supreme of Kiftgate? See thy faithful bard,
 " Despoil'd, undone. O cover me, ye hills!
 " Whose vocal cliffs were taught my joyous song.
 " Or thou, fair nymph, Avona, on whose banks
 " The frolic crowd, led by my numerous strains,
 " Their orgies kept, and frisk'd it o'er the green,
 " Jocund and gay, while thy remurmuring streams
 " Danc'd by, well pleas'd. Oh! let thy friendly waves [curs'd!"
 " O'erwhelm a wretch, and hide this head ac-
 So plains the restless Philomel, her nest,
 And callow young, the tender growing hope
 Of future harmony, and frail return
 For all her cares, to barbarous churls a prey;
 Darkling she sings, the woods repeat her moan.

CANTO III.

THE ARGUMENT.

Good eating expedient for heroes. Homer praised for keeping a table. Hobbinol triumphant. Ganderetta's bill of fare. Panegyric upon ale. Gossiping over a bottle. Compliment to Mr. John Philips. Ganderetta's perplexity discovered by Hobbinol; his consolatory speech; compares himself to Guy Earl of Warwick. Ganderetta encouraged, strips for the race; her amiable figure. Fusca the gypsey, her dirty figure. Tabitha her great reputation for speed; hired to the dissenting academy at Tewksbury. A short account of Gamaliel the master, and his hopeful scholars. Tabitha carries weight. The smock race. Tabitha's fall. Fusca's short triumph, her humiliation. Ganderetta's matchless speed. Hobbinol lays the prize at her feet. Their mutual triumph. The vicissitude of human affairs, experienced by Hobbinol. Mopsa, formerly his servant, with her two children, appears to him. Mopsa's speech; assaults Ganderetta; her flight. Hobbinol's prodigious fright; is taken into custody by constables, and dragged to Sir Rhadamanth's.

THOUGH some of old, and some of modern date,
 Penurious their victorious heroes fed
 With barren praise alone; yet thou, my muse!
 Benevolent, with more indulgent eyes
 Behold th' immortal Hobbinol; reward
 With due regalement his triumphant toils.
 Let Quixotte's hardy courage, and renown
 With Sancho's prudent care be meetly join'd.
 O thou of bards supreme, Mæonides!
 What well-fed heroes grace thy hallow'd page!
 Laden with glorious spoils, and gay with blood
 Of slaughter'd hosts, the victor chief returns.
 Whole Troy before him fled, and men and gods
 Oppos'd in vain: for the brave man, whose arm
 Repell'd his country's wrongs, ev'n he, the great
 Atrides, king of kings, ev'n he prepares
 With his own royal hand the sumptuous feast.

Full to the brim, the brazen cauldrons smoke;
 Through all the busy camp the rising blaze
 Attest their joy; heroes and kings forego
 Their state and pride, and at his elbow wait
 Obsequious. On a polish'd charger plac'd,
 The bulky chine with plenteous fat inlaid,
 Of golden hue, magnificently shines
 The choicest morsels sever'd to the gods,
 The hero next, well paid for all his wounds,
 The rich repast divides with Jove; from out
 The sparkling bowl he draws the generous wine;
 Unmix'd, unmeasur'd; with unstinted joy
 His heart o'erflows. In like triumphant port
 Sat the victorious Hobbinol; the crowd
 Transported view, and bless their glorious chief:
 All Kiftgate sounds his praise with joint acclaim.
 Him every voice, him every knee confess,
 In merit, as in right, their king. Upon
 Their flowery turf, earth's painted lap, are spread
 The rural dainties; such as nature boon
 Presents with lavish hand, or such as owe
 To Ganderetta's care their grateful taste
 Delicious. For she long since prepar'd
 To celebrate this day, and with good cheer
 To grace his triumphs. Crystal gooseberries
 Are pil'd on heaps; in vain the parent tree
 Defends her luscious fruit with pointed spears.
 The ruby tinctur'd corinth clustering hangs,
 And emulates the grape; green codlings float
 In dulcet creams: nor wants the last year's store;
 The hardy nut, in solid mail secure,
 Impregnable to winter frosts, repays
 Its hoarder's care. The custard's jellied flood
 Impatient youth, with greedy joy, devours.
 Cheesecakes and pies, in various forms uprais'd,
 In well-built pyramids, aspiring stand. [suade
 Black hams, and tongues that speechless can per-
 To ply the brisk carouse, and cheer the soul
 With jovial draughts. Nor does the jolly god
 Deny his precious gifts; here jocund swains,
 In uncouth mirth delighted, sporting quaff
 Their native beverage; in the brimming glass
 The liquid amber smiles. Britons, no more
 Dread your invading foes; let the false Gaul,
 Of rule insatiate, potent to deceive,
 And great by subtle wiles, from the adverse shore
 Pour forth his numerous hosts; Iberia! join
 Thy towering fleets, once more aloft display
 Thy consecrated banners, fill thy sails
 With prayers and vows, most formidably strong
 In holy trumpery, let old Ocean groan
 Beneath the proud Armada, vainly deem'd
 Invincible; yet fruitless all their toils,
 Vain every rash effort, while our fat glebe,
 Of barley grain productive, still supplies
 The flowing treasure, and with fums immense
 Supports the throne; while this rich cordial warms
 The farmer's courage, arms his stubborn soul
 With native honour, and resistless rage. [flows
 Thus vaunt the crowd, each freeborn heart o'er-
 With Britain's glory, and his country's love.

Here, in a merry knot combin'd, the nymphs
 Pour out mellifluous streams, the balmy spoils
 Of the laborious bee. The modest maid
 But coyly sips, and blushing drinks, abash'd:

Each lover with observant eye beholds
Her graceful shame, and at her glowing cheeks
Rekindles all his fires, but matrons sage,
Better experienc'd, and instructed well
In midnight mysteries, and feast-rites old,
Grasp the capacious bowl; nor cease to draw
The spumy nectar. Healths of gay import
Fly merrily about; now Scandal fly,
Insinuating, gilds the specious tale
With treacherous praise, and with a double face
Ambiguous wantonness demurely sneers:
Till circling brimmers every veil withdraw,
And dauntless impudence appears unmask'd.
Others apart, in the cool shade retir'd,
Silurian cyder quaff, by that great bard
Enobled, who first taught my groveling muse
To mount aerial. O! could I but raise
My feeble voice to his exalted strains,
Or to the height of this great argument,
The generous liquid in each line should bound
Spirituos, nor oppressive cork subdue
Its foaming rage; but, to the lofty theme
Unequal, muse, decline the pleasing task.

Thus they luxurious, on the grassy turf,
Revel'd at large; while nought around was heard
But mirth confus'd, and undistinguish'd joy,
And laughter far resounding; serious care
Found here no place, to Ganderetta's breast
Retiring; there with hopes and fears perplex'd
Her fluctuating mind. Hence the soft sigh
Escapes unheeded, spight of all her art;
The trembling blushes on her lovely cheeks
Alternate ebb and flow; from the full glass
She flies abstemious, shuns th' untasted feast:
But careful Hobbinol, whose amorous eye
From her's ne'er wander'd, haunting still the place
Where his dear treasure lay, discover'd soon
Her secret woe, and bore a lover's part.
Compassion melts his soul, her glowing cheeks
He kiss'd, enamour'd, and her panting heart
He press'd to his; then with these soothing words,
Tenderly smiling, her faint hopes reviv'd.

"Courage, my fair! the splendid prize is thine.
"Indulgent fortune will not damp our joys,
"Nor blast the glories of this happy day.
"Hear me, ye swains! ye men of Kistgate! hear:
"Though great the honours by your hands conferr'd,
"These royal ornaments, though great the force
"Of this puissant arm, as all must own,
"Who saw this day the bold Gorgonius fall;
"Yet were I more renown'd for feats of arms,
"And knightly prowess, than that mighty Guy,
"So fam'd in antique song, Warwick's great earl,
"Who slew the giant Colbrand, in fierce fight
"Maintain'd a summer's day, and freed this realm
"From Danish vassalage; his ponderous sword,
"And massy spear, attest the glorious deed;
"Nor less his hospitable soul is seen
"In that capacious cauldron, whose large freight
"Might feast a province; yet were I like him,
"The nation's pride, like him I could forego
"All earthly grandeur, wander through the world
"A jocund pilgrim in the lonesome den,
"And rocky cave, with these my royal hands

"Scoop the cold streams with herbs and roots content,

"Mean sustenance; could I by this but gain
"For the dear fair, the prize her heart desires.
"Believe me, charming maid! I'd be a worm,
"The meanest insect, and the lowest thing
"The world despises, to enhance thy fame."
So cheer'd he his fair queen, and she was cheer'd.

Now with a noble confidence inspir'd,
Her looks assure success, now stripp'd of all
Her cumbrous vestments, beauty's vain disguise,
She shines unclouded in her native charms.
Her plaited hair behind her in a brede
Hung careless, with becoming grace each blush
Varied her cheeks, than the gay rising dawn
More lovely, when the new-born light salutes
The joyful earth, impurpling half the skies.
Her heaving breast, through the thin covering
view'd,

Fix'd each beholder's eye; her taper thighs,
And lineaments exact, would mock the skill
Of Phidias; nature alone can form
Such due proportion. To compare with her,
Oread, or Dryad, or of Delia's train,
Fair virgin huntress, for the chase array'd,
With painted quiver and unerring bow,
Were but to lessen her superior mien,
And goddess-like deport. The master's hand,
Rare artisan! with proper shades improves
His lively colouring; so here, to grace
Her brighter charms, next her upon the plain
Fusca the brown appears, with greedy eye
Views the rich prize, her tawny front erects
Audacious, and with her legs unclean,
Booted with grim, and with her freckled skin,
Offends the crowd. She of the gypsy train
Had wander'd long, and the sun's scorching rays
Imbrown'd her visage grim; artful to view
The spreading palm, and with vile cant deceive
The love-sick maid, who barter all her store
For airy visions and fallacious hope.
Gorgonius, if the current fame say true,
Her comrade once, they many a merry prank
Together play'd, and many a mile had stroll'd,
For him fit mate. Next Tabitha the tall
Strode o'er the plain, with huge gigantic pace,
And overlook'd the crowd, known far and near
For matchless speed; she many a prize had won,
Pride of that neighbouring mart, for mustard
fam'd,

Sharp-biting grain, where amicably join
The sister floods, and with their liquid arms
Greeting embrace. Here Gamaliel sage,
Of Cameronian brood, with ruling rod
Trains up his babes of grace, instructed well
In all the gainful discipline of prayer;
To point the holy leer, by just degrees
To close the twinkling eye, t' expand the palms
T' expose the whites, and with the sightless ball
To glare upon the crowd, to raise or sink
The docile voice, now murmuring soft and low
With inward accent calm, and then again

in foaming floods of rapturous eloquence,
 Let loose the storm, and thunder through the noise
 The threaten'd vengeance: every muse profane
 Is banish'd hence, and, Heliconian streams
 Deserted, the fam'd Leman lake supplies
 More plenteous draughts, of more divine import.
 Hail, happy youths! on whom indulgent Heaven
 Each grace divine bestows: nor yet denies
 Carnal beatitudes, sweet privilege
 Of saints elect! Royal prerogative!
 Here in domestic cares employ'd, and bound
 To annual servitude, frail Tabitha,
 Her pristine vigour lost, now mourns in vain
 Her sharpen'd visage, and the sickly qualms
 That grieve her soul; a prey to love, while grace
 Slept heedless by! Yet her undaunted mind
 Still meditates the prize, and still she hopes,
 Beneath th' unwieldy load, her wonted speed.
 Others of meaner fame the stately muse
 Records not; on more lofty flights intent,
 She spurns the ground, and mounts her native skies.

Room for the master of the ring; ye swains!
 Divide your crowded ranks. See! there on high
 The glittering prize, on the tall standard borne,
 Waving in air; before him march in files
 The rural minstrelsy, the rattling drum
 Of solemn sound, and th' animating horn,
 Each huntsman's joy; the tabor and the pipe,
 Companion dear at feasts, whose cheerful notes
 Give life and motion to th' unwieldy clown.
 Ev'n age revives, and the pale puking maid
 Feels ruddy health rekindling on her cheeks,
 And with new vigour trips it o'er the plain.
 Counting each careful step, he paces o'er
 Th' allotted ground, and fixes at the goal
 His standard, there himself majestic swells.
 Stretch'd in a line, the panting rivals wait
 Th' expected signal, with impatient eyes
 Measure the space between, and in conceit
 Already grasp the warm contested prize.
 Now all at once rush forward to the goal,
 And step by step, and side by side, they ply
 Their busy feet, and leave the crowd behind.

Quick heaves each breast, and quick they shoot along, [plain.
 Through the divided air, and bound it o'er the
 To this, to that, capricious fortune deals
 Short hopes, short fears, and momentary joy.
 The breathless throng with open throats pursue,
 And broken accents shout imperfect praise.
 Such noise confus'd is heard, such wild uproar,
 When on the main the swelling surges rise,
 Dash o'er the rocks, and, hurrying through the
 flood,

Drive on each other's backs, and crowd the strand.
 Before the rest till Tabitha was seen,
 Stretching amain, and whirling o'er the field;
 Swift as the shooting star that gilds the night
 With rapid transient blaze, she runs, she flies;
 Sudden she stops, nor longer can endure
 The painful course, but drooping sinks away,
 And, like that falling meteor, there she lies
 A jelly cold on earth. Fusca, with joy,
 Beheld her wretched plight; o'er the pale corse
 Insufling bounds; hope gave her wings, and now,

Exerting all her speed, step after step,
 At Ganderetta's elbow urg'd her way,
 Her shoulder pressing, and with poisonous breath
 Tainting her ivory neck. Long while had held
 The sharp contest, had not propitious Heaven,
 With partial hands, to such transcendent charms
 Dispens'd its favours. For as o'er the green
 The careless gypsy, with incautious speed,
 Push'd forward, and her rival fair had reach'd
 With equal pace, and only not o'erpass'd;
 Haply she treads, where late the merry train,
 In wasteful luxury, and wanton joy,
 Lavish had spilt the cyder's frothy flood,
 And mead with custard mix'd. Surpris'd, appall'd,
 And in the treacherous puddle struggling long,
 She slipp'd, she fell, upon her back supine
 Extended lay; the laughing multitude
 With noisy scorn approv'd her ju'd disgrace.
 As the sleek leveret skims before the pack,
 So flies the nymph, and so the crowd pursue.
 Borne on the wings of wind, the dear one flies,
 Swift as the various goddess, nor less bright
 In beauty's prime; when through the yielding air
 She darts along, and with refracted rays
 Paints the gay clouds; celestial messenger,
 Charg'd with the high behests of Heaven's great queen!

Her at the goal with open arms receiv'd
 Fond Hobbino! with active leap he seiz'd
 The costly prize, and laid it at her feet.
 Then pausing stood, dumb with excess of joy,
 Expressive silence! for each tender glance
 Betray'd the raptures that his tongue conceal'd;
 Less mute the crowd, in echoing shouts, applaud
 Her speed, her beauty, his obsequious love.

Upon a little eminence, whose top
 O'erlook'd the plain, a steep, but short ascent,
 Plac'd in a chair of state, with garlands crown'd,
 And loaded with the fragrance of the spring,
 Fair Ganderetta shone; like mother Eve
 In her gay sylvan lodge, delicious bower!
 Where nature's wanton hand, above the reach
 Of rule, or art, had lavish'd all her store,
 To deck the flowery roof; and at her side
 Imperial Hobbino! with front sublime,
 Great as a Roman consul, just return'd
 From cities sack'd, and provinces laid waste,
 In his paternal wicker fat, enthron'd.
 With eager eyes the crowd about them press,
 Ambitious to behold the happy pair.
 Each voice, each instrument, proclaims their joy
 With loudest vehemence: such noise is heard,
 Such a tumultuous din, when, at the call
 Of Britain's sovereign, the rustic bands
 O'erspread the fields; the subtle candidates
 Dissembled homage pay, and court the fools
 Whom they despise; each proud majestic clown
 Looks big, and shouts amain, mad with the taste
 Of power supreme, frail empire of a day!
 That with the setting sun extinct is lost.

Nor is thy grandeur, mighty Hobbino!
 Of longer date. Short is, alas! the reign
 Of mortal pride; we play our parts a while,
 And strut upon the stage; the scene is chang'd,
 And offers us a dungeon for a throne.

Wretched vicissitude ! for, after all
His tinsel dreams of empire and renown,
Fortune, capricious dame, withdraws at once
The goodly prospect, to his eyes presents
Her, whom his conscious soul abhor'd, and fear'd.
Lo ! pushing through the crowd, a meagre form,
With hasty step, and visage incompas'd !
Wildly she star'd : rage sparkled in her eyes,
And poverty sat shrinking on her cheeks.
Yet through the cloud that hung upon her brows,
A faded lustre broke, that dimly shone
Shorn of its beams, the ruins of a face,
Impair'd by time, and shatter'd by misfortunes.
A froward babe hung at her flabby breast,
And tugg'd for life ; but wept, with hideous moan,
His frustrate hopes, and unavailing pains.
Another o'er her bending shoulder peep'd,
Swaddled around with rags of various hue.
He kens his comrade twin with envious eye,
As of his share defrauded ; then amain
He also screams, and to his brother's cries
In doleful concert joins his loud laments.
O dire effect of lawless love ! O sting
Of pleasure past ! As when a full-freight ship,
Blest in a rich return of pearls or gold,
Or fragrant spice, or silks of costly dye,
Makes to the wish'd-for port with swelling sails,
And all her gaudy trim display'd ; o'erjoy'd
The master smiles ; but if from some small creek,
A lurking corsair the rich quarry spies,
With all her sails bears down upon her prey,
And pales of thunder from her hollow sides
Check his triumphant course ; aghast he stands
Stiffen'd with fear, unable to resist,
And impotent to fly ; all his fond hopes
Are dash'd at once ! nought now, alas ! remains
But the sad choice of slavery or death !
So far'd it with the hapless Hobbinol,
In the full blaze of his triumphant joy
Surpris'd by her, whose dreadful face alone
Could shake his steadfast soul. In vain he turns,
And shifts his place averse ; she haunts him still,
And glares upon him, with her haggard eyes,
That fiercely spoke her wrongs. Words swell'd with sighs

At length burst forth, and thus she storms enrag'd.

" Know'st thou not me ? false man ! not to
" know me

" Argues thyself unknowing of thyself,

" Puff'd up with pride, and bloated with success.

" Is injur'd Mopsa then so soon forgot ?

" Thou knew'st me once, ah ! woe is me ! thou
" didst.

" But if laborious days and sleepless nights,

" If hunger, cold, contempt, and penury,

" Inseparable guests, have thus disguis'd

" Thy once-belov'd, thy handmaid dear ; if thine

" And fortune's frowns have blasted all my charms ;

" If here no roses grow, no lilies bloom,

" Nor rear their heads on this neglected face ;

" If through the world I range a slighted shade,

" The ghost of what I was, forlorn, unknown ;

" At least know these. See ! this sweet simpering
" babe,

" Dear image of thyself ; see ! how it sprunts

" With joy at thy approach ! see, how it gilds

" Its soft smooth face, with false paternal smiles !

" Native deceit, from thee, base man, deriv'd !

" Or view this other elf, in every art

" Of smiling fraud, in every treacherous leer,

" The very Hobbinol ! ah ! cruel man !

" Wicked, ingrate ! and could'st thou then so " soon,

" So soon forget that pleasing fatal night,

" When me, beneath the flowery thorn surpris'd

" Thy artful wiles betray'd ? was there a star,

" By which thou didst not swear ? was there a
" curse,

" A plague on earth, thou didst not then invoke

" On that devoted head ; if e'er thy heart

" Prov'd haggard to my love, if e'er thy hand

" Declin'd the nuptial bond ? but, oh ! too well,

" Too well, alas ! my throbbing breast perceiv'd

" The black impending storm ; the conscious
" moon

" Veil'd in a fable cloud her modest face,

" And boding owls proclaim'd the dire event.

" And yet I love thee.—Oh ! could'st thou behold

" That image dwelling in my heart ! but why,

" Why waste I here these unavailing tears ?

" On this thy minion, on this tawdry thing.

" On this gay victim, thus with garlands crown'd,

" All, all my vengeance fall ! ye lightnings, blast

" That face accurs'd, the source of all my woe !

" Arm, arm, ye furies ! arm ; all hell break loose !

" While thus I lead you to my just revenge,

" And thus"—Up starts th' astonish'd Hobbinol

To save his better half. " Fly, fly," he cries,

" Fly, my dear life, the fiend's malicious rage."

Borne on the wings of fear, away she bounds,

And in the neighbouring village pants forlorn,

So the cours'd hare to the close covert flies,

Still trembling, though secure. Poor Hobbinol

More grievous ills attend : around him press

A multitude, with huge Herculean clubs,

Terrific band ! the royal mandate these

Insulting show : arrested, and amaz'd,

Half dead he stands ; no friends dare interpose,

But bow dejected to th' imperial scroll :

Such is the force of law. While conscious shame

Sits heavy on his brow, they view the wretch

To Rhadamanth's august tribunal dragg'd.

Good Rhadamanth ! to every wanton clown

Severe, indulgent to himself alone.

FIELD-SPORTS.

A POEM.

HUMBLY ADDRESSED TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE.

" ———— Hæc incondita solus
 " Montibus, et sylvis, studio jactabat inani."

VIRG. Ecl. ii.

FIRST PRINTED IN 1742.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE several acts of parliament in favour of Falconry are an evident proof of that high esteem our ancestors had conceived for this noble diversion. Our neighbours, France, Germany, Italy, and all the rest of Europe, have seemed to vie with one another, who should pay the greatest honours to the courageous falcon. Princes and states were her protectors; and men of the greatest genius, and most accomplished in all sorts of literature, with pleasure carried the hawk on their fists. But the princes of Asia, Turks, Tartars, Persians, Indians, &c. have greatly out-done us Europeans in the splendor and magnificence of their field-parades, both as huntsmen and falconers. For though the description of flying at the stag and other wild beasts with eagles, may be thought a little incredible, yet permit me to assure the reader that it is no fiction, but a real fact. All the ancient books of falconry give us an account of it, and the relations of travellers confirm it. But what I think puts it out of all dispute, is the description the famous Monsieur de Thou has given us in his Latin poem, "De Re Accipitraria," lately reprinted at Venice in 1735, with an Italian translation and notes.

" Hoc studio Hæmonii circumsonat aula tyranni,
 " Tercentum illi equites, quoties venabula poscit,
 " Tot pedites adsunt: longo nemus omne remugit
 " Latrantum occursum, venatorumque repulsis
 " Vocibus; heic gemini, neque enim satis esse
 " ferendo
 " Unus tantæ oneri possit, cedente petauro
 " Circum aquilam gestant, aliam totidem inde
 " ministri
 " Impositam subeunt: quarum minor illa vulcri
 " Ore canum voces fingit, nemora avia complens
 " Terrore ingenti: latebris tum excita repente
 " Infelix fera prorumpit: ruit altera demum
 " Sublimis compar magno stridore per auras;

" Involat inque oculos et provolat, atque capaces
 " Expandens per inane sinus, caligine densâ,
 " Horribilique supervolitans cœlum obruit umbrâ.
 " Nec minor intereâ obsistit: sublimis ut illa,
 " Hæc humilis sic terga volans premit et latus
 " urget:
 " Neve gradum referat tetrò, et vestigia vertat,
 " Seu caprea aut cervus sese tulit obvius illis,
 " Rostro atque ungue minax vetat, et cum com-
 " pare vires
 " Alternat socias, artemque remunerat arte.
 " Nec mora, nec requies: furiis exterrita tantis
 " Donec in insidias cæcâ convalle locatas
 " Precipitet rabidis fera mox lanianda Molossis."

I am very much obliged to those gentlemen who have read with favour my poem upon hunting: their goodness has encouraged me to make this short supplement to the Chase, and in this poem to give them some account of all the more polite entertainments of the field.

THE ARGUMENT.

Introduction, ver. 1. Description of flying at the stag with eagles, after the manner of the Asiatic princes, 7. Description of henn-hawking, 100. Of flying at the river, 179. Partridge-hawking, 232. Daring the lark with an hobby just mentioned, 235. Shooting flying, 241. Setting, 245. Angling, 261. Conclusion, 271.

ONCE more, Great Prince, permit an humble bard
 Prostrate to pay his homage at your feet;
 Then, like the morning lark from the low ground
 Towering aloft, sublime to soar, and sing;
 Sing the heart-cheering pleasure of the fields,
 The choice delight of heroes and of kings.

In earlier times, monarchs of eastern race
 In their full blaze of pride, as story tells,
 Train'd up th' imperial eagle, sacred bird!
 Hooded, with jingling bells, she perch'd on high;
 Not as when erst on golden wings she led

The Roman legions o'er the conquer'd globe,
Mankind her quarry; but a docile slave,
Tam'd to the lure, and careful to attend
Her master's voice. Behold the man renown'd,
Abbas the Great (whom all his sawning slaves
Deem'd king of kings; vain fools! They sure forgot

Greater Leonidas, and those fatal straits [heaps Blood-stain'd, where slaughter'd Persians fell on
A dreadful carnage!] See his numerous host 20
Spread wide the plains, and in their front upborne
Each on her perch, that bends beneath her weight,
Two sister eagles, stately ponderous birds!
The air's a desert, and the feather'd race
Fly to the neighbouring coverts dark retreats.
The royal pair on wing, this whirls around
In circles wide, or like the swallow skims
The ruffet plain, and mimics as she flies
(By many a sleepless night instructed well)
The hound's loud openings, or the spaniel's quest.
What cannot wakeful industry subdue! 30
Mean while that mount on high, and seems to view
A black ascending cloud; when pierc'd the gloom
Of vapours dank condens'd, the sun's bright beams
Pain not her sight: she with expanded sails
Works through th' etherial fluid; then perhaps Sees through a break of clouds this self-pois'd orb

Hard by her hand-maid moon. She looks beneath
Contemptuous, and beholds from far this earth,
This mole-hill earth, and all its busy ants 40
Labouring for life, which lasts so short a day
Just blazing and extinct. So thou, my soul,
That breath of life, which all men must perceive
But none distinctly know, when once escap'd
From this poor helpless corse, and when on high
Borne on angelic wings, look down with scorn
On this mean lessening world, and knaves grown rich;

By chance, or fraud, or insolence of power.
Now from her highest pitch, by quick degrees,
With less ambition nearer earth she tends, 50
As yet scarce visible; and high in air
Pois'd on extended wings, with sharper ken
Attentive marks whate'er is done below.
Thus some wise general from a rising ground
Observe th' embattled foe, where ferried ranks
Forbid access, or where their order loose
Invites th' attack, and points the way to fate.
All now is tumult, each heart swells with joy,
The falconers shout, and the wide concave rings,
Tremble the forests round, the joyous cries 60
Float through the vales; and rocks, and woods,
and hills

Return the varied sounds. Forth bursts the flag,
Nor trusts the mazes of his deep recess:
Fear hid him close, strange inconsistent guide!
Now hurries him aghast, with busy feet
Far o'er the spacious plain; he pants to reach
The mountain's brow, or with unsteady step
To climb the craggy cliff: the gray-hounds strain
Behind to pinch his haunch, who scarce evades
Their gaping jaws. One eagle wheeling flies 70
In airy labyrinths, or with easier wing
Skims by his side, and stuns his patient ear

With hideous cries, then peals his forehead broad,
Or at her eyes his fatal malice aims.
The other, like the bolt of angry heaven,
Darts down at once, and fixes on his back
Her griping talons, ploughing with her beak
His pamper'd chine: the blood, and sweat distill'd
From many a dripping furrow, stains the soil.
Who pities not this fury-haunted wretch 80
Embarra's'd thus, on every side distress'd?
Death will relieve him: for the gray-hounds fierce,
Seizing their prey, soon drag him to the ground:
Groaning he falls; with eyes that swim in tears
He looks on man, chief author of his woe,
And weeps, and dies. The grandees press around
To dip their sabres in his boiling blood;
Unseemly joy! 'Tis barbarous to insult
A fallen woe. The dogs, and birds of prey
Insatiate, on his reeking bowels feast, 90
But the stern falconer claims the lion's share.

Such are the sports of kings, and better far
Than royal robbery, and the bloody jaws
Of all devouring war. Each animal,
By natural instinct taught, spares his own kind:
But man, the tyrant man, revels at large,
Free-booter unrestrain'd, destroys at will
The whole creation, men and beasts his prey,
These for his pleasure, for his glory those.
Next will I sing the valiant falcon's fame 100
Aerial fights, where no confederate brute
Joins in the bloody fray; but bird with bird
Joists in mid air. Lo! at his siege the hern,
Upon the bank of some small purling brook,
Observant stands to take his scaly prize,
Himself another's game. For mark behind
The wily falconer creeps; his grazing horse
Conceals the treacherous foe, and on his fist
Th' unhooded falcon sits: with eager eyes
She meditates her prey, and, in her wild 110
Conceit, already plumes the dying bird.
Up springs the hern, redoubling every stroke,
Conscious of danger stretches far away,
With busy pennons and projected beak,
Piercing th' opponent clouds: the falcon swift
Follows at speed, mounts as he mounts, for hope
Gives vigour to her wings. Another soon
Strains after to support the bold attack,
Perhaps a third. As in some winding creek,
On proud Iberia's shore, the corsairs fly 120
Lurk waiting to surprise a British sail,
Full freighted from Hetruria's friendly ports,
Or rich Byzantium; after her r:rey scud,
Dashing the spumy waves with equal oars,
And spreading all their shrouds; she makes the main

Inviting every gale, nor yet forgets
To clear her deck, and tell th' insulting foe,
In peals of thunder, Britons cannot fear.
So flies the hern pursu'd, but fighting flies.
Warm grows the conflict, every nerve's employ'd;
Now through the yielding element they soar 131
Aspiring high, then sink at once, and rove
In trackless mazes through the troubled sky.
No rest, no peace. The falcon hovering flies
Balanc'd in air, and confidently bold
Hangs o'er him like a cloud, then aims her blow

H h iiij

Full at his destin'd head. The watchful hern
Shoots from her like a blazing meteor swift
That gilds the night, eludes her talons keen
And pointed beak, and gains a length of way. 140
Observe th' attentive crowd; all hearts are fix'd
On this important war, and pleasing hope
Glow in each breast. The vulgar and the great,
Equally happy now, with freedom share
The common joy. The shepherd-boy forgets
His bleating care; the labouring hind lets fall
His grain unsown; in transport lost, he robs
Th' expecting furrow, and in wild amaze
The gazing village point their eyes to heaven.
Where is the tongue can speak the falconer's cares,
'Twixt hopes and fears, as in a tempest tost? 151
His fluttering heart, his varying cheeks confess
His inward woe. Now like a wearied stag,
That stands at bay, the hern provokes their rage;
Close by his languid wing, in downy plumes
Covers his fatal beak, and cautious hides
The well-dissembled fraud. The falcon darts
Like lightning from above, and in her breast
Receives the latent death; down plum she falls
Bounding from earth, and with her trickling gore
Defiles her gaudy plumage. See, alas! 161
The falconer in despair, his favourite bird
Dead at his feet, as of his dearest friend
He weeps her fate; he meditates revenge,
He storms, he foams, he gives a loose to rage;
Nor wants he long the means; the hern fatigu'd,
Borne down by numbers yields, and prone on earth
He drops: his cruel foes wheeling around
Insult at will. The vengeful falconer flies
Swift as an arrow shooting to their aid; 170
Then muttering inward curses breaks his wings,
And fixes in the ground his hated beak;
Sees with malignant joy the victors proud
Smear'd with his blood, and on his marrow feast.
Unhappy bird! our fathers' prime delight!
Who fenc'd thine eyrie round with sacred laws.
Nor mighty princes now disdain to wear
Thy waving crest, the mark of high command,
With gold, and pearl, and brilliant gems adorn'd.
Now, if the crystal stream delight thee more, 180
Sportsman, lead on, where through the reedy bank
Th' insinuating waters filter'd stray
In many a winding maze. The wild-duck there
Gluts on the fattening ouse, or steals the spawn
Of teeming shoals, her more delicious feast.
How do the sun-beams on the glassy plain
Sport wanton and amuse our wondering eyes
With variously-reflected changing rays!
The murmuring stream salutes the flowery mead
That glows with fragrance; nature all around 190
Consents to bless. What sluggard now would sink
In beds of down? what miser would not leave
His bags untold for this transporting scene?
Falconer, take care, oppose thy well-train'd steed,
And sily stalk; unhood thy falcon bold,
Observe at feed the unsuspecting team
Paddling with oary feet: he's seen, they fly.
Now at full speed the falconer spurs away
T' assist his favourite hawk, she from the rest
Has singled out the mallard young and gay, 200
Whose green and azure brightens in the sun.

Swift as the wind that sweeps the desert plain,
With feet, wings, beak, he cuts the liquid sky:
Behoves him now both oar and sail; for see
Th' unequal foe gains on him as he flies.
Long holds th' aerial course; they rise, they fall,
Now skim in circling rings, then stretch away
With all their force, till at one fatal stroke
The vigorous hawk, exerting every nerve,
Trufs'd in mid-air bears down her captive prey. 210
'Tis well on earth they fall; for oft the duck
Mistrusts her coward wings, and seeks again
The kind protecting flood: if haply then
The falcon rash aim a decisive blow,
And spring to gripe her floating prey; at once
She dives beneath, and near some osier's root
Pops up her head secure; then views her foe
Just in the grasping of her fond desires,
And in full pride of triumph, whelm'd beneath
The gliding stream. Ah! where are now, proud bird! 220

Thy stately trappings, and thy silver bells,
Thy glossy plumage, and thy filken crest?
Say, tyrant of the skies! Wouldst thou not now
Exchange with thy but late desponding foe
Thy dreadful talons, and thy polish'd beak,
For her web-feet despis'd? How happy they!
Who, when gay pleasure courts, and fortune smiles,
Fear the reverse, with caution tread those paths
Where roses grow, but wily vipers creep!

These are expensive joys, fit for the great 230
Of large domains possess'd: enough for me
To boast the gentle spar-hawk on my fist,
Or fly the partridge from the bristly field,
Retrieve the covey with my busy train,
Or with my soaring hobby dare the lark.

But, if the shady woods my cares employ,
In quest of feather'd game, my spaniels beat
Puzzling th' entangled copse; and from the brake
Push forth the whirring pheasant; high in air
He waves his varied plumes, stretching away 240
With hasty wing. Soon from th' uplifted tube
The mimic thunder bursts, the leaden death
O'ertakes him; and with many a giddy whirl
To earth he falls, and at my feet expires.

When autumn smiles, all beauteous in decay,
And paints each chequer'd grove with various hues;

My setter ranges in the new-thorn fields,
His nose in air erect; from ridge to ridge
Panting he bounds, his quarter'd ground divides
In equal intervals, nor careless leaves 250
One inch untry'd. At length the tainted gales
His nostrils wide inhale; quick joy elates
His beating heart, which, aw'd by discipline
Severe, he dares not own; but cautious creeps
Low-cowering, step by step; at last attains
His proper distance; there he stops at once,
And points with his instructive nose upon
The trembling prey. On wings of wind upborne
The floating net unfolded flies; then drops,
And the poor fluttering captives rise in vain. 260

Or haply on some river's cooling bank,
Patiently musing, all intent I stand
To hook the scaly glutton. See! down sinks
My cork, that faithful monitor; his weight

My taper angle bends; surpris'd, amaz'd,
He glitters in the sun, and struggling pants
For liberty, till in the purer air
He breathes no more. Such are our pleasing cares,
And sweet amusements, such each busy drudge
Envious must wish, and all the wise enjoy. 270

Thus, most illustrious prince, have I presum'd
In my obscure sojourn to sing at ease
Rural delights, the joy, and sweet repast
Of every noble mind: and now perchance
Untimely sing; since from yon neighbouring shore
The grumbling thunder rolls; calm peace alarm'd
Starts from her couch, and the rude din of war
Sounds harsh in every ear. But righteous heaven!
Britain deserted, friendless, and alone,
Will not as yet despair: shine but in arms,
O prince, belov'd by all! patron profess'd
Of liberty! with every virtue crown'd! [cliffs,
Millions shall crowd her strand; and her white
As Teneriff, or Atlas firm, defy

The break of seas, and malice of her foes;
Nor the proud Gaul prevail where Caesar fail'd.

NOTES ON FIELD-SPORTS.

Ver. 18. Straits of Thermopylæ. See the story of Xerxes.

Ver. 103. The place where the hern takes his stand, watching his prey.

Ver. 169. This is done to prevent his hurting the hawk: they generally also break their legs.

Ver. 172. The reward of the hawk made of the brains, marrow, and blood, which they call in Italian, Soppa.

Ver. 174. No man was permitted to shoot within 600 yards of the eyrie, or nest of an hern, under great penalties.

Ver. 176. The hern's top worn at coronations here, and by the great men in Asia in their turbans.

PHÆD.

TO WILLIAM SOMERVILLE

OF WARWICKSHIRE, ESQ.

On reading several of his Excellent Poems. By Allan Ramsay.

SIR, I have read, and much admire,
Your muse's gay and easy flow,
Warm'd with that true Idalian fire
That gives the bright and cheerful glow.

I conn'd each line with joyous care,
As I can such from sun to sun;
And, like the glutton o'er his fare
Delicious, thought them too soon done.

The witty smile, nature and art,
In all your numbers so combine,
As to complete their just desert,
And grace them with uncommon shine.

Delighted we your muse regard,
When she like Pindar's spreads her wings;
And virtue, being its own reward,
Expresses by the sister springs.

Emotions tender crowd the mind,
When with the royal bard you go,
To sigh in notes divinely kind,
"The mighty fall'n on mount Gilbo."

Much surely was the virgin's joy,
Who with the Iliad had your lays;
For e'er, and since the siege of Troy,
We all delight in love and praise.

These heaven-born passions, such desire,
I never yet could think a crime;
But first-rate virtues which inspire
The soul to reach at the sublime.

But often men mistake the way,
And pump for fame by empty boast,
Like your "gilt ass," who stood to bray,
Till in a flame his tail he lost.

Him "th' incurious Benchers" hits,
With his own tale, so tight and clean,
That, while I read, streams gush, by fits
Of hearty laughter, from my e'en.

Old Chaucer, bard of vast ingine,
Fontaine and Prior, who have sung
Blyth tales the best; had they heard thine
On Lob, they'd own'd themselves out-done.

The plot's pursued with so much glee,
The too officious "dog and priest,"
The "squire oppress'd," I own for me,
I never heard a better jest.

Pope well describ'd an omber game,
And "King revenging captive queen,"
He merits; but had won more fame,
If author of your "Bowling-green."

You paint your parties, play each bowl,
So natural, just, and with such ease,
That, while I read, upon my soul!
I wonder how I chance to please.

Yet I have pleas'd, and please the best;
And sure to me laurels belong,
Since British fair, and 'mongst the best,
Somervile's consort likes my song.

Ravish'd I heard th' harmonious fair
Sing, like a dweller of the sky,
My verses with a Scotian air;
Then saints were not so blest as I.

In her the valued charms unite;
She really is what all would seem,
Gracefully handsome, wise and sweet:
'Tis merit to have her esteem.

Your noble kinsman, her lov'd mate,
Whose worth claims all the world's respect,
Met in her love a smiling fate,
Which has, and must have, good effect.

You both from one great lineage spring,
Both from de Somervile, who came,
With William, England's conquering king,
To win fair plains, and lasting fame.

Whichnour he left to's eldest son;
That first-born chief you represent:
His second came to Caledon,
From whom our Somer'le takes descent.

On him and you may fate bestow
Sweet balmy health and cheerful fire,
As long's ye'd wish to live below,
Still blest with all you would desire.

O sir! oblige the world, and spread
In print those and your other lays;
This shall be better'd while they read,
And after-ages sound your praise.

I could enlarge—but if I should
On what you've wrote, my ode would run
Too great a length—Your thoughts so crowd,
To note them all, I'd ne'er have done.

Accept this offering of a muse,
Who on her Piceland hills ne'er tires:
Nor should (when worth invites) refuse
To sing the person she admires.

AN ODE.

Humbly inscribed to the Duke of Marlborough, upon his Removal from all his Places.

" Virtus repulsæ nescia sordidæ
" Intaminatis fulget honoribus,
" Nec fumit, aut ponit secures,
" Arbitrio popularis auræ."

HOR.

WHEN, in meridian glory bright,
You shine with more illustrious rays,
Above the muse's weaker flight,
Above the poet's praise.
In vain the goddess mounts her native skies,
In vain, with feeble wings, attempts to rise;
In vain she toils to do her hero right,
Lost in excess of day, and boundless tracks of light.
The Theban swan with daring wings,
And force impetuous, soars on high,
Above the clouds sublimely sings,
Above the reach of mortal eye.

But what, alas! would Pindar do,
Were his bold muse to sing of you?
Can Chromius' strength be nam'd with yours?
Can mimic fights and sportive war
With Schellembergh's demolish'd towers,
Or Blenheim's bloody field compare?
The bard would blush at Theron's speed,
When Marlborough mounts the fiery steed;
And the despairing foe's pursued
Through towns and provinces subdued.
Fond poet, spare thy empty boast,
In vain thy chariots raise so great a dust;
See Britain's hero with whole armies flies,
To execute his vast designs,
To pass the Scheld, to force the lines,
Swift as thy smoking car, to win th' Olympic prize.
But now, when, with diminish'd light,
And beams more tolerably bright,
With less of grandeur and surprise,
Mild you descend to mortal eyes;
Your setting glories charm us more,
Than all your dazzling pomp before.
Your worth is better understood,
The hero more distinctly view'd,
Glad we behold him not so great as good.
True virtue's amiable face
Improves, when shaded by disgrace;
A lively sense of conscious worth,
Calls all her hidden beauties forth;
Darts through the gloom a lovely ray,
And, by her own intrinsic light, creates a nobler
day.

Let fickle chance with partial hands divide
Her gaudy pomp, her tinsel pride;
Who to her knaves and fools supplies
Those favours which the brave despise.
Let faction raise the saucy crowd,
And call her multitude to arms;
Let envy's vipers hiss aloud,
And rouse all hell with dire alarms:
Go shake the rocks, and bid the hills remove;
Yet still the hero's mind shall be
Unchangeable, resolv'd, and free,
Fix'd on its base, firm as the throne of Jove.
Britons, look back on those auspicious days,
On Ister's banks when your great leader stood,
And with your gasping foes incumber'd all the flood.

Or when Ramillia's bloody plain
Was fatten'd with the mighty slain;
Or when Blaregnia's ramparts were assail'd,
With force that heaven itself had scal'd.
Did then reviling pens profane
Your Marlborough's sacred name?
Did noisy tribunes then debauch the crowd?
Did their unrighteous votes blaspheme aloud?
Did mercenary tools conspire
To curse the hero whom their foes admire?
No!—The contending nations sung his praise;
While bards of every clime
Exert their most triumphant lays,
No thought too great, no diction too sublime.
Hail, glorious prince! 'tis not for thee we grieve,
For thy invulnerable fame

No diminution can receive,
 Thou, mighty man! art still the same,
 Thy purer gold eludes the flame;
 This fiery trial makes thy virtue shine,
 And persecution crowns thy brows with rays divine.
 But what, alas! shall fainting Europe do?
 How stand the shock of her imperious foe?
 What successor shall bear the weight
 Of all our cares? and prop the state?
 Since thou our Atlas art remov'd,
 O best deserving chief! and therefore best belov'd?
 To your own Blenheim's blissful seat,
 From this ungrateful world retreat;
 A gift unequal to that hero's worth,
 Who from the peaceful Thames led our bold Bri-
 tons forth,
 To free the Danube and the Rhine;
 Who by the thunder of his arms
 Shook the proud Rhône with loud alarms,
 And rais'd a tempest in the trembling Seine.
 After the long fatigues of war,
 Repose your envy'd virtues here;
 Enjoy, my lord, the sweet repast
 Of all your glorious toils,
 A pleasure that shall ever last,
 The mighty comfort that proceeds
 From the just sense of virtuous deeds, [spoils
 Content with endless fame, condemn the meaner
 Pomona calls, and Pan invites,
 To rural pleasures, chaste delights;
 The orange and the citron grove
 Will by your hand alone improve;
 Would fain their gaudy liveries wear,
 And wait your presence to revive the year.
 In this Elysium, more than blest,
 Laugh at the vulgar's senseless hate,
 The politician's vain deceit,
 The fawning knave, the proud ingrate.
 Revolve in your capacious breast
 The various unforeseen events,
 And unexpected accidents, [great.
 That change the flatt'ring scene, and overturn the Frail are our hopes, and short the date
 Of grandeur's transitory state.
 Corinthian brass shall melt away,
 And Parian marble shall decay;
 The vast Colossus, that on either shore
 Exulting stood, is now no more;
 Arts and artificers shall die,
 And in one common ruin lie.
 Behold your own majestic palace rise,
 In haste to emulate the skies;
 The gilded globes, the pointed spires:
 See the proud dome's ambitious height,
 Emblem of power and pompous state,
 Above the clouds aspires:
 Yet Vulcan's spight, or angry Jove,
 May soon its towering pride reprove,
 Its painted glories soon efface,
 Divide the ponderous roof, and shake the solid base.
 Material structures must submit to fate.
 But virtue which alone is truly great,
 Virtue like yours, my lord, shall be Secure of immortality.

Nor foreign force, nor factious rage,
 Nor envy, nor devouring age,
 Your lasting glory shall impair,
 Time shall mysterious truths declare,
 And works of darkness shall disclose;
 This blessing is reserv'd for you
 T' outlive the trophies to your merit due,
 And malice of your foes.
 If glorious actions, in a glorious cause,
 If valour negligent of praise,
 Deserving, yet retiring from applause,
 In generous minds can great ideas raise:
 If Europe sav'd, and liberty restor'd,
 By steady conduct, and a prosperous sword,
 Can claim in free-born souls a just esteem;
 Britain's victorious chief shall be
 Rever'd by late posterity,
 The hero's pattern, and the poet's theme.

O D E,

Occasioned by the Duke of Marlborough's embarking for Osiend, An. 1712.

"Interque mœrentes amicos.

"Egregius properavit exul."

HOR.

Ye powers, who rule the boundless deep,
 Whose dread commands the winds obey,
 To roll the waters on a heap,
 Or smooth the liquid way:
 Propitious hear Britannia's prayer,
 Britannia's hope is now your care,
 Whom oft to yonder distant shore,
 Your hospitable billows bore,
 When Europe in distress implor'd
 Relief from his victorious sword;
 Who, when the mighty work was done,
 Tyrants repell'd, and battles won,
 On your glad waves, proud of the glorious load,
 Through these your watery realms, in yearly triumph rode.
 To winds and seas, distress'd he flies,
 From storms at land, and faction's spight:
 Though the more sickle crowd denies,
 The winds, the seas, shall do his virtue right.
 Be hush'd, ye winds! be still, ye seas!
 Ye billows sleep at ease,
 And in your rocky caverns rest!
 Let all be calm as the great hero's breast.
 Here no unruly passions reign,
 Nor servile fear, nor proud disdain,
 Each wilder lust is banish'd hence,
 Where gentle love presides, and mild benevolence.
 Here no gloomy cares arise,
 Conscious honour still supplies,
 Friendly hope, and peace of mind,
 Such as dying martyrs find.
 Serene within, no guilt he knows,
 While all his wrongs sit heavy on his foes.
 Say, muse, what hero shall I sing,
 What great example bring,
 To parallel this mighty wrong,
 And with his graceful woes adorn my song?

Shall brave Themistocles appear
 Before the haughty Persian's throne?
 While conquer'd chiefs confess their fear,
 And shatter'd fleets his triumphs own;
 In admiration fix'd, the monarch stood,
 With secret joy, his glorious prize he view'd,
 Of more intrinsic worth than provinces subdued.
 Or faithful Aristides, sent,
 For being just, to banishment,
 He writ the rigid sentence down,
 He pitied the misguided clown.
 Or him, who, when brib'd orators misled
 The factious tribes, to hostile Sparta fled;
 The vile ingrateful crowd,
 Proclaim'd their impious joy aloud,
 But soon the fools discover'd to their cost,
 Athens in Alcibiades was lost.
 Or, if a Roman name delight thee more,
 The great Dictator's fate deplore,
 Camillus against noisy faction bold,
 In victories and triumphs old.
 Ungrateful Rome!
 Punish'd by heaven's avenging doom,
 Soon shall thy ardent vows invite him home,
 The mighty chieftain soon recall,
 To prop the falling capitol,
 And save his country from the perjur'd Gaul.
 Search, muse, the dark records of time,
 And every shameful story trace,
 Black with injustice and disgrace,
 When glorious merit was a crime;
 Yet these, all these, but faintly can express
 Folly without excuse, and madness in excess.
 The noblest object that our eyes can bless,
 Is the brave man triumphant in distress;
 Above the reach of partial fate,
 Above the vulgar's praise or hate, [depress.
 Whom no feign'd smiles can raise, no real frowns
 View him, ye Britons, on the naked shore,
 Resolv'd to trust your faithless vows no more,
 That mighty man! who for ten glorious years
 Surpass'd our hopes, prevented all our prayers.
 A name, in every clime renown'd,
 By nations bless'd, by monarchs crown'd.
 In solemn jubilees our days we spent,
 Our hearts exulting in each grand event.
 Factions applaud the man they hate, [wait.
 And with regret, to pay their painful homage
 Have I not seen this crowded shore,
 With multitudes all cover'd o'er?
 While hills and groves their joy proclaim,
 And echoing rocks return his name.
 Attentive to the lovely form they gaze:
 He with a cheerful smile,
 Glad to revisit this his parent isle,
 Flies from their incense, and escapes their praise.
 Yes, Britons, view him still unmov'd,
 Unchang'd, though less belov'd.
 His generous soul no deep resentment fires,
 But, blushing for his country's crimes, the kind good man retires.
 Ev'n now he fights for this devoted isle,
 And labours to preserve his native soil, [pares,
 Diverts the vengeance which just heaven pre-
 Accus'd, disarm'd, protects us with his prayers,

Obdurate hearts! cannot such merit move?
 The hero's valour, nor the patriot's love?
 Fly, goddess, fly this inauspicious place;
 Spurn at the vile degenerate race,
 Attend the glorious exile, and proclaim
 In other climes his lasting fame,
 Where honest hearts, unknowing to forget
 The blessings from his arms receiv'd,
 Confess with joy the mighty debt,
 Their altars rescued, and their gods reliev'd.
 Nor fails the hero to a clime unknown,
 Cities preserv'd, their great deliverer own:
 Impatient crowds about him press,
 And with sincere devotion bless.
 Those plains, of ten years war the bloody stage,
 (Where panting nations struggled to be free
 And life exchang'd for liberty)
 Retain the marks of stern Bellona's rage,
 The doubtful hind mistakes the field
 His fruitless toil so lately till'd:
 Here deep intrenchments sunk, and vales appear,
 The vain retreats of Gallic fear;
 There new-created hills deform the plain,
 Big with the carnage of the slain:
 These monuments, when faction's spite
 Has spit its poisonous foam in vain,
 To endless ages shall proclaim
 The matchless warrior's might. [right.
 The graves of slaughter'd foes shall do his valour
 These when the curious traveller
 Amaz'd shall view, and with attentive care
 Trace the sad footsteps of destructive war;
 Successive bards shall tell, [fell,
 How Marlborough fought, how gasping tyrants
 Alternate chiefs confess'd the victor's fame,
 Pleas'd and excus'd in their successor's shame.
 In every change, in every form,
 The Proteus felt his conquering arm:
 Convinc'd of weakness, in extreme despair, [war.
 They lurk'd behind their lines, and wag'd a lazy
 Nor lines nor sorts could calm the soldier's fear,
 Surpris'd he found a Marlborough there.
 Nature, nor art, his eager rage withstood,
 He measur'd distant plains, he forc'd the rapid
 flood,
 He fought, he conquer'd, he pursued.
 In years advanc'd, with youthful vigour warm'd,
 The work of ages in a day perform'd.
 When kindly gleams dissolve the winter snows
 From Alpine hills, with such impetuous haste
 The icy torrent flows;
 In vain the rocks oppose,
 It drives along enlarg'd, and lays the regions waste.
 Stop, goddess, thy presumptuous flight,
 Nor soar to such a dangerous height,
 Raise not the ghost of his departed fame,
 To pierce our conscious souls with guilty shame:
 But tune thy harp to humbler lays,
 Nor meditate offensive praise.

TO MR. ADDISON,

Occasioned by his purchasing an Estate in Warwickshire.

—En erit unquam

“ Ille dies, mihi cum liceat tua dicere facta!

"En erit, ut liceat totum mihi ferre per orbem,
"Sola Sophocleo tua carmina digna cothurno!"

VIRG.

To the gay town where guilty pleasure reigns,
The wise good man prefers our humble plains:
Neglected honours on his merit wait,
Here he retires when courted to be great,
The world resigning for this calm retreat.
His soul with wisdom's choicest treasures fraught,
Here proves in practice each sublimer thought,
And lives by rules his happy pen has taught.

Great bard! how shall my worthless muse aspire
To reach your praise, without your sacred fire?
From the judicious critic's piercing eyes,
To the best natur'd man secure she flies.

When panting virtue her last efforts made,
You brought your Clio to the virgin's aid;
Presumptuous folly blush'd, and vice withdrew,
To vengeance yielding her abandon'd crew.
'Tis true, confederate wits their forces join,
Parnassus labours in the work divine:
Yet these we read with too impatient eyes,
And hunt for you through every dark disguise;
In vain your modesty that name conceals,
Which every thought, which every word, reveals,
With like success bright beauty's goddess tries
To veil immortal charms from mortal eyes;
Her graceful port, and her celestial mien,
To her brave son betray the Cyprian queen;
Odours divine perfume her rosy breast,
She glides along the plain in majesty confess'd.
Hard was the task, and worthy your great mind,
To please at once, and to reform mankind:
Yet, when you write, truth charms with such address,

Pleads virtue's cause with such becoming grace,
His own fond heart the guilty wretch betrays,
He yields delighted, and convinc'd obeys:
You touch our follies with so nice a skill,
Nature and habit prompt in vain to ill.
Nor can it lessen the Spectator's praise,
That from your friendly hand he wears the bays;
His great design all ages shall commend,
But more his happy choice in such a friend.
So the fair queen of night the world relieves,
Nor at the sun's superior honour grieves,
Proud to reflect the glories she receives.

When dark oblivion is the warrior's lot,
His merits censur'd, and his wounds forgot:
When burnish'd helms and gilded armour rust,
And each proud trophy sinks in common dust:
Fresh blooming honours deck the poet's brows,
He shares the mighty blessings he bestows
His spreading fame enlarges as it flows.
Had not your muse in her immortal strain
Describ'd the glorious toils on Blenheim's plain,
Even Marlborough might have fought, and Dormer bled in vain.

When honour calls, and the just cause inspires,
Britain's bold sons to emulate their fires;
Your muse these great examples shall supply,
Like that to conquer, or like this to die.
Contending nations antient Homer claim,
And Mantua glories in her Maro's name;

Our happier soil the prize shall yield to none,
Ardenna's groves shall boast an Addison,
Ye silvan powers, and all ye rural gods,
That guard these peaceful shades, and blest abodes;
For your new guest your choicest gifts prepare,
Exceed his wishes, and prevent his prayer;
Grant him, propitious, freedom, health, and peace,
And as his virtues, let his stores increase.
His lavish hand no deity shall mourn,
The pious bard shall make a just return;
In fasting verse eternal altars raise,
And over-pay your bounty with his praise.

Tune every reed, touch every string, ye swains,
Welcome the stranger to these happy plains,
With hymns of joy in solemn pomp attend
Apollo's darling, and the muses' friend. [groves,
Ye nymphs, that haunt the streams and shady
Forget a while to mourn your absent loves;
In song and sportive dance your joy proclaim,
In yielding blushes own your rising flame:
Be kind, ye nymphs, nor let him sigh in vain.

Each land remote your curious eye has view'd,
That Grecian arts, or Roman arms subdu'd,
Search every region, every distant soil,
With pleasing labour and instructive toil:
Say then, accomplish'd bard! What god inclin'd?
To these our humble plains your generous mind;
Nor would you deign in Latian fields to dwell,
Which none know better, or describe so well.
In vain ambrosial fruits invite your stay,
In vain the myrtle groves obstruct your way,
And ductile streams that round the borders stray.
Your wiser choice prefers this spot of earth,
Distinguish'd by th' immortal Shakspeare's birth;
Where through the vales the fair Avona glides,
And nourishes the glebe with fattening tides;
Flora's rich gifts deck all the verdant soil,
And plenty crowns the happy farmer's toil.
Here, on the painted borders of the flood,
The babe was born; his bed with roses strow'd:
Here in an ancient venerable dome,
Oppress'd with grief, we view the poet's tomb.
Angels unseen watch o'er his hallow'd urn,
And in soft elegies complaining mourn!
While the bless'd saint, in loftier strains above,
Reveals the wonders of eternal love.
The heavens, delighted in his tuneful lays,
With silent joy attend their Maker's praise.
In heaven he sings; on earth your muse supplies
Th' important loss, and heals our weeping eyes,
Correctly great, she melts each flinty heart,
With equal genius, but superior art.
Hail, happy pair! ordain'd by turns to bless;
And save a sinking nation in distress.
By great examples to reform the crowd,
Awake their zeal, and warm their frozen blood.
When Brutus strikes for liberty and laws,
Nor spares a father in his country's cause;
Justice severe applauds the cruel deed,
A tyrant suffers, and the world is freed,
But, when we see the godlike Cato bleed,
The nation weeps; and from thy fate, oh Rome!
Learns to prevent her own impending doom.
Where is the wretch a worthless life can prize,
When senates are no more, and Cato dies?

Indulgent sorrow, and a pleasing pain,
 Heaves in each breast, and beats in every vein.
 Th' expiring patriot animates the crowd,
 Bold they demand their ancient rights aloud,
 The dear-bought purchase of their fathers' blood.
 Fair Liberty her head majestic rears,
 Ten thousand blessings in her bosom bears;
 Serene she smiles, revealing all her charms,
 And calls her free-born youth to glorious arms,
 Faction's repell'd, and grumbling leaves her prey,
 Forlorn she sits, and dreads the fatal day,
 When eastern gales shall sweep her hopes away.
 Such ardent zeal your muse alone could raise,
 Alone reward it with immortal praise.
 Ages to come shall celebrate your fame,
 And rescued Britain blest the poet's name.
 So when the dreaded powers of Sparta fail'd,
 Tyrtæus and Athenian wit prevail'd.
 Too weak the laws by wise Lycurgus made,
 And rules severe without the muses' aid:
 He touch'd the trembling strings, the poet's song
 Reviv'd the faint, and made the feeble strong;
 Recall'd the living to the dusty plain,
 And to a better life restor'd the slain.
 The victor-host amaz'd, with horror view'd
 Th' assembling troops, and all the war renew'd;
 To more than mortal courage quit the field,
 And to their foes th' unfinish'd trophies yield.

AN IMITATION OF HORACE,

BOOK IV. ODE IX.

*Inscribed to the Right Honourable James Stanhope, Esq.
 one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, afterwards Earl Stanhope.*

BORN near Avona's winding stream
 I touch the trembling lyre,
 No vulgar thoughts, no vulgar theme,
 Shall the bold muse inspire.
 'Tis immortality's her aim;
 Sublime she mounts the skies,
 She climbs the steep ascent to fame,
 Nor ever shall want force to rise,
 While she supports her flight with Stanhope's name.
 What though majestic Milton stands alone
 Inimitably great!
 Bow low, ye bards, at his exalted throne,
 And lay your labours at his feet;
 Capacious soul! whose boundless thoughts survey
 Heaven, hell, earth, sea;
 Lo, where th' embattled gods appear,
 The mountains from their seats they tear,
 And shake th' empyreal heavens with impious war!
 Yet, nor shall Milton's ghost repine
 At all the honours we bestow
 On Addison's deserving brow,
 By whom convinc'd, we own his work divine,
 Whose skilful pen has done his merit right,
 And set the jewel in a fairer light.
 Enliven'd by his bright essay
 Each flowery scene appears more gay,
 New beauties spring in Eden's fertile groves,
 And by his culture paradise improves.
 Garth, by Apollo doubly blest'd,
 Is by the god entire possess'd:

Age, unwilling to depart,
 Begs life from his prevailing skill;
 Youth, reviving from his art,
 Borrows its charms and power to kill:
 But when the patriot's injur'd fame,
 His country's honour, or his friends,
 A more extensive bounty claim,
 With joy the ready muse attends,
 Immortal honours she bestows,
 A gift the muse alone can give;
 She crowns the glorious victor's brows,
 And bids expiring virtue live.
 Nymphs yet unborn shall melt with amorous flames
 That Congreve's lays inspire;
 And Philips warm the gentle swains
 To love and soft desire.
 Ah, shun, ye fair, the dangerous sounds!
 Alas, each moving accent wounds!
 The sparks conceal'd revive again,
 The god restor'd, resumes his reign,
 In killing joys and pleasing pain.
 Thus does each bard in different garb appear,
 Each muse has her peculiar air,
 And in propriety of dress becomes more fair;
 To each, impartial Providence
 Well-chosen gifts bestows,
 He varies his munificence,
 And in divided streams the heavenly blessing flows.
 If we look back on ages past and gone,
 When infant Time his race begun,
 The distant view still lessens to our sight,
 Obscur'd in clouds, and veil'd in shades of night.
 The muse alone can the dark scenes display,
 Enlarge the prospect, and disclose the day.
 'Tis she the records of times past explores,
 And the dead hero to new life restores,
 To the brave man who for his country died,
 Erects a lasting pyramid,
 Supports his dignity and fame,
 When mouldering pillars drop his name.
 In full proportion leads her warrior forth,
 Discovers his neglected worth,
 Brightens his deeds, by envious rust o'ercastr'd,
 T' improve the present age, and vindicate the past.
 Did not the muse our crying wrongs repeat,
 Ages to come no more should know
 Of Lewis by oppression great
 Than we of Nimrod now:
 The meteor should but blaze and die,
 Depriv'd of the reward of endless infamy.
 Ev'n that brave chief, who set the nations free,
 The greatest name the world can boast,
 Without the muse's aid, shall be
 Sunk in the tide of time, and in oblivion lost.
 The sculptor's hand may make the marble live,
 Or the bold pencil trace
 The wonders of that lovely face,
 Where every charm, and every grace,
 That man can wish, or heaven can give,
 In happy union join'd, confess
 The hero born to conquer, and to bless.
 Yet vain, alas! is every art,
 Till the great work the muse complete,
 And everlasting fame impart,
 That soars aloft, above the reach of fate.

Hail, happy bard! on whom the gods bestow
 A genius equal to the vast design,
 Whose thoughts sublime in easy numbers flow,
 While Marlborough's virtues animate each line.
 How shall our trembling souls survey
 The horrors of each bloody day;
 The wreaking carnage of the plain
 Incumber'd with the mighty slain,
 The strange variety of death,
 And the sad murmurs of departing breath?
 Scamander's streams shall yield to Danube's
 flood,
 To the dark bosom of the deep pursued
 By fiercer flames, and stain'd with nobler blood.
 The gods shall arm on either side,
 Th' important quarrel to decide;
 The grand event embroil the realms above,
 And faction revel in the court of Jove;
 While heaven, and earth, and sea, and air,
 Shall feel the mighty shock and labour of the war.
 Virtue conceal'd obscurely dies,
 Lost in the mean disguise
 Of abject sloth, depress'd, unknown. [lies,
 Rough in its native bed the unwrought diamond
 Till chance, or art, reveal its worth,
 And call its latent glories forth;
 But when its radiant charms are view'd,
 Becomes the idol of the crowd,
 And adds new lustre to the monarch's crown.
 What British harp can lie unstrung,
 When Stanhope's fame demands a song?
 Upward, ye muses, take your wanton flight,
 Tune every lyre to Stanhope's praise,
 Exert your most triumphant lays,
 Nor suffer such heroic deeds to sink in endless night.
 The golden Tagus shall forget to flow,
 And Ebro leave its channel dry,
 Ere Stanhope's name to time shall bow,
 And lost in dark oblivion lie.
 Where shall the muse begin her airy flight?
 Where first direct her dubious way?
 Lost in variety of light,
 And dazzled in excess of day?
 Wisdom and valour, probity and truth,
 At once upon the labouring fancy throng,
 The conduct of old age, the fire of youth,
 United in one breast perplex the poet's song.
 Those virtues which dispers'd and rare
 The gods too thriftily bestow'd,
 And scatter'd to amuse the crowd,
 When former heroes were their care;
 T' exert at once their power divine,
 In thee, brave chief, collected shine.
 So from each lovely blooming face
 Th' ambitious artist stole a grace,
 When in one finish'd piece he strove
 To paint th' all-glorious queen of love.
 Thy provident unbiass'd mind
 Knowing in arts of peace and war,
 With indefatigable care,
 Labours the good of human kind:
 Erect in dangers, modest in success,
 Corruption's everlasting bane,
 Where injur'd merit finds redress,
 And worthless villians wait in vain.

Though fawning knaves besiege thy gate,
 And court the honest man they hate;
 Thy steady virtue charges through,
 Alike unerring to subdue,
 As when on Almanara's plain the scatter'd squadrons flew.
 Vain are th' attacks of force or art,
 Where Cæsar's arm defends a Cato's heart.
 Oh! could thy generous soul dispense
 Through this unrighteous age its sacred influence;
 Could the base crowd from thy example learn
 To trample on their impious gifts with scorn,
 With shame confounded to behold
 A nation for a trifle sold,
 Dejected senates should no more
 Their champion's absence mourn,
 Contending boroughs should thy name return;
 Thy bold Philippias should restore
 Britannia's wealth, and power, and fame,
 Nor liberty be deem'd an empty name,
 While tyrants trembled on a foreign shore.
 No swelling titles, pomp, and state,
 The trappings of a magistrate,
 Can dignify a slave, or make a traitor great.
 For, careless of external show,
 Sage nature dictates whom t' obey,
 And we the ready homage pay,
 Which to superior gifts we owe.
 Merit like thine repuls'd an empire gains,
 And virtue, though neglected, reigns.
 The wretch is indigent and poor,
 Who brooding sits o'er his ill-gotten store;
 Trembling with guilt, and haunted by his sin,
 He feels the rigid judge within.
 But they alone are bless'd, who wisely know
 T' enjoy the little which the gods bestow,
 Proud of their glorious wants, disdain
 To barter honesty for gain;
 No other ill but shame they fear,
 And scorn to purchase life too dear:
 Profusely lavish of their blood,
 For their dear friends or country's good,
 If Britain conquer, can rejoice in death,
 And in triumphant shouts resign their breath.

TO DR. MACKENZIE.

O THOU, whose penetrating mind,
 Whose heart benevolent, and kind,
 Its ever present in distress,
 Glad to preserve, and proud to bless:
 Oh! leave not Arden's faithful grove,
 On Caledonian hills to rove;
 But hear our fond united prayer,
 Nor force a county to despair.
 Let homicides in Warwick-lane,
 With hecatombs of victims slain,
 Butcher for knighthood, and for gain;
 While thou pursuest a nobler aim,
 Declining interest for fame.
 Where'er thy Maker's image dwells,
 In gilded roofs, or smoky cells,
 The same thy zeal: o'erjoy'd to save
 Thy fellow-creature from the grave:

For well thy soul can understand
 The poor man's call is God's command;
 No frail, no transient good, his fee;
 But heaven, and blest'd eternity.
 Nor are thy labours here in vain,
 The pleasure over-pays the pain.
 True happiness (if understood)
 Consists alone, in doing good;
 Speak, all ye wife, can God bestow,
 Or man a greater pleasure know?
 See where the grateful father bows!
 His tears confess how much he owes:
 His son, the darling of his heart,
 Restor'd by your prevailing art;
 His house, his name, redeem'd by you,
 His ancient honours bloom anew.
 But oh! what idioms can express
 The vast transcendant happiness
 The faithful husband feels? his wife,
 His better half, recall'd to life:
 See, with what rapture! see him view
 The shatter'd frame rebuilt by you:
 See health rekindling in her eyes!
 See baffled death give up his prize!
 Tell me, my friend, canst thou forbear,
 In this gay scene to claim a share?
 Does not thy blood more swiftly flow?
 Thy heart with secret transports glow?
 Health, life, by heaven's indulgence sent,
 And thou the glorious instrument!

Safe in thy art, no ills we fear,
 Thy hand shall plant Elysium here;
 Pale sickness shall thy triumphs own,
 And ruddy health exalt her throne.
 The fair, renew'd in all her charms,
 Shall fly to thy protecting arms;
 With gracious smiles repay thy care,
 And leave her lovers in despair.
 While multitudes applaud and bless
 Their great asylum in distress,
 My humble muse, among the crowd,
 Her joyful Pœans sings aloud.
 Could I but with Mæonian flight
 Sublimely soar through fields of light,
 Above the stars thy name should shine,
 Nor great Machaon's rival thine!
 But father Phœbus, who has done
 So much for thee his favourite son,
 His other gifts on me bestows
 With partial hands, nor hears my vows:
 Oh! let a grateful heart supply,
 What the penurious powers deny!

THE WIFE.

IMPERIAL Jove (as poets sung of old)
 Was coupled to a more imperial scold,
 A jealous, termagant, insulting jade,
 And more observant than a wither'd maid:
 She watch'd his waters with unweary'd eyes,
 And chas'd the god through every sly disguise,
 Out-brav'd his thunder with her louder voice,
 And shook the poles with everlasting noise.
 At midnight revels when the gossips met,
 He was the theme of their eternal chat:

This ask'd what form great Jove would next devise,
 And when his godship would again Taurise?
 That hinted at the wanton life he led
 With Leda, and with baby Ganymede:
 Scandals and lies went merrily about,
 With heavenly lambs-wool, and nectarial stout.
 Home she returns erect with lust and pride,
 At bed and board alike unsatisfy'd:
 The hen-peck'd god her angry presence flies,
 Or at her feet the passive thunderer lies,
 In vain: still more she raves, still more she storms,
 And heaven's high vaults echo her loud alarms:
 To Bacchus, merry blade, the god repairs,
 To drown in nectar his domestic cares,
 The fury thither too pursues the chase,
 Palls the rich juice, and poisons every glass;
 Wine, that makes cowards brave, the dying strong;
 Is a poor cordial 'gainst a woman's tongue.
 To arms! to arms! th' impetuous fury cries,
 The jolly god th' impending ruin flies:
 His trembling tigers hide their fearful heads,
 Scar'd at a fierceness which their own exceeds;
 Bottles aloft like bursting bombs resound;
 And smoking spout their liquid ruin round;
 Like storms of hail the scatter'd fragments fly,
 Bruis'd bowls and broken glass obscure the sky;
 Tables, and chairs, and stools, together huri'd,
 With universal wreck fright all the nether world.
 Such was the clamour, such great Jove's surprise,
 When by gigantic hands the mountains rise,
 To wrest his thunder, and invade the skies.
 Who would not envy Jove eternal life,
 And wish for godhead clogg'd with such a wife?
 If e'er it be my wayward fate to wed,
 Avert, ye powers, a Juno from my bed!
 Let her be foolish, ugly, crooked, old,
 Let her be whore, or any thing but scold!
 With prayers incessant for my lot I crave
 The quiet cuckold, not the hen-peck'd slave;
 Or give me peace on earth, or give it in the grave!

IN MEMORY OF THE REV. MR. MOORE.

Of humble birth, but of more humble mind,
 By learning much, by virtue more refin'd,
 A fair and equal friend to all mankind.
 Parties and sects, by fierce divisions torn,
 Forget their hatred, and consent to mourn;
 Their hearts unite in undissembled woe,
 And in one common stream their sorrows flow.
 Each part in life with equal grace he bore,
 Obliging to the rich, a father to the poor.
 From sinful riots silently he fled,
 But came unbidden to the sick man's bed.
 Manners and men he knew, and when to press
 The poor man's cause, and plead it with success.
 No penal laws he stretch'd, but won by love
 His hearers' hearts, unwilling to reprove.
 When sour rebukes and harsher language fail,
 Could with a lucky jest, or merry tale,
 O'er stubborn souls in virtue's cause prevail.
 Whene'er he preach'd, the throng attentive stood,
 Feasted with manna, and celestial food:
 He taught them how to live, and how to die;
 Nor did his actions give his words the lie.

Go, happy soul! sublimely take thy flight
Through fields of æther, in long tracks of light,
The guest of angels; range from place to place,
And view thy great Redeemer face to face.

Just God! eternal source of power and love!
Whom we lament on earth, give us above!
Oh! grant us our companion and our friend,
In bliss without alloy, and without end!

EPITAPH

Upon Hugh Lumber, Husbandman.

IN cottages and homely cells,
True piety neglected dwells;
Till call'd to heaven, her native seat,
Where the good man alone is great:
'Tis then this humble dust shall rise,
And view his judge with joyful eyes;
While haughty tyrants shrink afraid,
And call the mountains to their aid.

THE HIP. TO WILLIAM COLMORE, ESQ.

The Day after the great Meteor, in March 1715.

THIS dismal morn, when east winds blow,
And every languid pulse beats low,
With face most sorrowfully grim,
And head oppress'd with wind and whim,
Grave as an owl, and just as witty,
To thee I twang my doleful ditty;
And in mine own dull rhymes would find
Music to soothe my restless mind:
But oh! my friend, I sing in vain,
No doggrel can relieve my pain;
Since thou art gone my heart's desire,
And heaven, and earth, and sea conspire,
To make my miseries complete;
Where shall a wretched Hip retreat?
What shall a drooping mortal do,
Who pines for sunshine and for you?
If in the dark alcove I dream,
And you, or Phillis, is my theme,
While love or friendship warm my soul,
My shins are burning to a coal.
If rais'd to speculations high,
I gaze the stars and spangled sky,
With heart devout and wondering eye,
Amaz'd I view strange globes of light,
Meteors with horrid lustre bright,
My guilty trembling soul affright.
To mother earth's prolific bed,
Pensive I stoop my giddy head,
From thence too all my hopes are fled.
Nor flowers, nor grass, nor shrubs appear,
To deck the smiling infant year;
But blasts my tender blossoms wound,
And desolation reigns around.
If sea-ward my dark thoughts I bend,
O! where will my misfortunes end?
My loyal soul distracted meets
Attainted dukes, and * Spanish fleets.
Thus jarring elements unite,
Pregnant with wrongs, and arm'd with spight,

* An invasion from Spain was then expected.
VOL. VIII.

Successive mischiefs every hour
On my devoted head they pour.
Whate'er I do, where'er I go,
'Tis still an endless scene of wo.
'Tis thus disconsolate I mourn,
I faint, I die, till thy return;
'Till thy brisk wit, and humorous vein,
Restore me to myself again.
Let others vainly seek for ease,
From Galen and Hippocrates,
I scorn such nauseous aids as these.
Haste then, my dear, unbrib'd attend,
The best elixir is a friend.

TO A LADY,

Who made me a Present of a Silver Pen.

FAIR-ONE, accept the thanks I owe,
'Tis all a grateful heart can do.
If e'er my soul the muse inspire
With raptures and poetic fire,
Your kind munificence I'll praise,
To you a thousand altars raise:
Jove shall descend in golden rain,
Or die a swan; but sing in vain.
Phœbus the witty and the gay,
Shall quit the chariot of the day,
To bask in your superior ray.
Your charms shall every god subdue,
And every goddess envy you.
Add this but to your bounty's store,
This one great boon, I ask no more:
O gracious nymph, be kind as fair,
Nor with disdain neglect my prayer,
So shall your goodness be confess'd,
And I your slave entirely blest'd;
This pen no vulgar theme shall stain.
The noblest palm your gift shall gain,
To write to you, nor write in vain.

Presenting to a Lady a White Rose and a Red on the Tenth of June.

Is this pale rose offend your sight,
It in your bosom wear;
'Twill blush to find itself less white,
And turn Lancastrian there.
But, Celia, should the red be chose,
With gay vermilion bright;
'Twould sicken at each blush that glows,
And in despair turn white.
Let politicians idly prate,
Their Babels build in vain;
As uncontrollable as fate,
Imperial Love shall reign.
Each haughty faction shall obey,
And whigs and tories join,
Submit to your despotic sway,
Confess your right divine.
Yet this, my gracious monarch, own,
They're tyrants that oppress;
'Tis mercy must support your throne,
And 'tis like heaven to bless.

THE BOWLING-GREEN.

WHERE fair Sabrina's wandering currents flow,
A large smooth plain extends its verdant brow,
Here every morn while fruitful vapours feed
The swelling blade, and bless the smoking mead,
A cruel tyrant reigns: like time, the swain
Whets his unrighteous scythe, and shaves the plain.
Beneath each stroke the peeping flowers decay,
And all th' unripen'd crop is swept away,
The heavy roller next he tugs along,
Whiffs his short pipe, or roars a rural song,
With curious eye then thè press'd turf he views,
And every rising prominence subdues.

Now when each craving stomach was well-stor'd,
And church and king had travel'd round the board,

Hither at fortune's shrine to pay their court,
With eager hopes the motley tribe resort;
Attornies spruce, in their plate-button'd frocks,
And rosy parsons fat, and orthodox:
Of every sect, whigs, papists, and high-flyers,
Cornuted aldermen, and hen-peck'd squires:
Fox-hunters, quacks, scribblers in verse and prose,
And half-pay captains, and half-witted beaux;
On the green cirque the ready racers stand,
Dispos'd in pairs, and tempt the bowler's hand:
Each polish'd sphere does his round brother own,
The twins distinguish'd by their marks are known.
As the strong rein guides the well-manag'd horse,
Here weighty lead infus'd directs their course.
These in the ready road drive on with speed,
But those in crooked paths more artfully succeed.
So the tall ship that makes some dangerous bay,
With a side wind obliquely slopes her way.
Lo! there the silver tumbler fix'd on high,
The victor's prize, inviting every eye!
The champions, or consent, or chance divide,
While each man thinks his own the surer side,
And the jack leads, the skilful bowler's guide.

Bendo strip'd first, from foreign coasts he brought
A chaos of receipts, and anarchy of thought;
Where the tumultuous whims to faction prone,
Still jostled monarch Reason from her throne:
More dangerous than the porcupine his quill,
Inur'd to slaughter, and secure to kill.
Let loose, just heaven! each virulent disease,
But save us from such murderers as these:
Might Bendo live but half a patriarch's age,
Th' unpeopled world would sink beneath his rage:
Nor need t' appease the just Creator's ire
A second deluge or consuming fire.
He winks one eye, and knits his brow severe,
Then from his hand launches the flying sphere;
Out of the green the guiltless wood he hurl'd,
Swift as his patients from this nether world:
Then grinn'd malignant, but the jocund crowd
Deride his senseless rage, and shout aloud,

Next, Zadoc, 'tis thy turn, imperious priest!
Still late at church, but early at a feast.
No turkey-cock appears with better grace,
His garments black, vermilion paints his face;
His wattles hang upon his stiffen'd band.
His platter feet upon the trigger stand,
He grasps the bowl in his rough brawny hand.

Then squatting down, with his grey goggle eyes
He takes his aim, and at the mark it flies.
Zadoc pursues, and wabbles o'er the plain, [vain;
But shakes his strutting paunch, and ambles on in
For, oh! wide-erring to the left it glides,
The inmate lead the lighter wood misguides.
He sharp reproofs with kind entreaties joins,
Then on the counter side with pain reclines;
As if he meant to regulate its course,
By power attractive, and magnetic force,
Now almost in despair, he raves, he storms,
Writhes his unwieldy trunk in various forms:
Unhappy Proteus! still in vain he tries
A thousand shapes, the bowl erroneous flies,
Deaf to his prayers, regardless of his cries.
His puffing cheeks with rising rage inflame,
And all his sparkling rubies glow with shame.

Bendo's proud heart, proof against fortune's frown,

Resolves once more to make the prize his own:
Cautious he plods, surveying all the green,
And measures with his eye the space between,
But, as on him 'twas a peculiar curse,
To fall from one extreme into a worse;
Conscious of too much vigour, now for fear
He should exceed, at hand he checks the sphere,
Soon as he found its languid force decay,
And the too weak impression die away;
Quick after it he scuds, urges behind
Step after step, and now, with anxious mind,
Hangs o'er the bowl, slow-creeping on the plain,
And chides its faint efforts, and bawls amain.
Then on the guiltless green the blame to lay,
Curses the mountains that obstruct his way;
Brazen it out with an audacious face,
His insolence improving by disgrace.

Zadoc, who now with three black mugs had cheer'd

His drooping heart, and his sunk spirits rear'd,
Advances to the trigg with solemn pace,
And ruddy hope sits blooming on his face.
The bowl he pois'd, with pain his hams he bends,
On well-chose ground unto the mark it tends:
Each adverse heart pants with unusual fear,
With joy he follows the propitious sphere;
Alas! how frail is every mortal scheme!
We build on sand, our happiness a dream.
Bendo's short bowl stops the proud victor's course,
Purloins his fame, and deadens all its force.
At Bendo from each corner of his eyes
He darts malignant rays, then muttering flies
Into the bower; there, panting and half dead,
In thick mundungus clouds he hides his head.

Muse, raise thy voice, to win the glorious prize,
Bid all the fury of the battle rise:
These but the light-arm'd champions of the field,
See Griper there! a veteran well skill'd;
This able pilot knows to steer a cause
Through all the rocks and shallows of the laws:
Or if 'tis wreck'd, his trembling client saves
On the next plank, and disappoints the waves.
In this, at least, all histories agree,
That, though he lost his cause, he sav'd his fee,
When the fat client looks in jovial plight,
How complaisant the

But if th' abandon'd orphan puts his case,
 And poverty fits shrinking on his face,
 How like a cur he snarls! when at the door
 For broken scraps he quarrels with the poor.
 The farmer's oracle, when rent-day's near,
 And landlords, by forbearance, are severe;
 When huntsmen trespass, or his neighbour's swine,
 Or tatter'd crape extorts by right divine.
 Him all the rich their contributions pay;
 Him all the poor with aching hearts obey:
 He in his swanskin doublet struts along,
 Now begs, and now rebukes, the pressing throng.
 A passage clear'd, he takes his aim with care,
 And gently from his hand lets loose the sphere:
 Smooth as a swallow o'er the plain it flies,
 While he pursues its track with eager eyes;
 Its hopeful course approv'd, he shouts aloud,
 Claps both his hands, and justles through the crowd,
 Hovering a while, soon at the mark it stood,
 Hung o'er inclin'd, and fondly kiss'd the wood;
 Loud is th' applause of every betting friend,
 And peals of clamorous joy the concave rend.
 But in each hostile face, a dismal gloom
 Appears, the sad presage of loss to come;
 'Mong these, Trebellius with a mournful air
 Of livid hue, just dying with despair,
 Shuffles about, skews his chop-fallen face,
 And no whipp'd gigg so often shifts his place.
 Then gives his sage advice with wondrous skill,
 Which no man ever heeds, or ever will:
 Yet he persists, instructing to confound,
 And with his cane points out the dubious ground.

Strong Nimrod now, fresh as the rising dawn
 Appears, his sinewy limbs, and solid brawn,
 The gazing crowd admires. He nor in courts
 Delights, nor pompous balls; but rural sports
 Are his soul's joy. At the horn's brisk alarms
 He shakes the unwilling Phillis from his arms;
 Mounts with the sun, begins his bold career,
 To chase the wily fox, or rambling deer.
 So Hercules, by Juno's dread command,
 From savage beasts and monsters freed the land.
 Hark! from the covert of yon gloomy brake,
 Harmonious thunder rolls, the forests shake:
 Men, boys, and dogs, impatient for the chase,
 Tumultuous transports flush in every face;
 With ears erect the courser paws the ground,
 Hills, vales, and hollow rocks, with cheering cries
 resound;

Drive down the precipice (brave youths) with speed,
 Bound o'er the river banks, and smoke along the mead.

But whither would the devious muse pursue
 The pleasing theme, and my past joys renew?
 Another labour now demands thy song,
 Stretch'd in two ranks, behold th' expecting throng,
 As Nimrod pois'd the sphere: his arm he drew
 Back like an arrow in the Parthian yew,
 Then launch'd the whirling globe, and full as swift it flew:
 Bowls dash'd on bowls confounded all the plain,
 Safe stood the foe, well-cover'd by his train.
 Assaulted tyrants thus their guard defends,
 Escaping by the ruin of their friends.

But now, he stands expos'd, their order broke,
 And seems to dread the next decisive stroke.
 So at some bloody siege, the ponderous ball
 Batters with ceaseless rage the crumbling wall,
 (A breach once made) soon galls the naked town;
 Riots in blood, and heaps on heaps are thrown.

Each avenue thus clear'd, with aching heart
 Griper beheld, exerting all his art;
 Once more resolves to check his furious foe,
 Block up the passage, and elude the blow.
 With cautious hand, and with less force, he threw

[flew,

The well-pois'd sphere, that gently circling
 But stopping short, cover'd the mark from view.
 So little Teucer on the well-fought field,
 Securely skulk'd behind his brother's shield.

Nimrod, in dangers bold, whose heart elate,
 Nor courted fortune's smiles, nor fear'd her hate;
 Perplex'd, but not discourag'd, walk'd around,
 With curious eye examin'd all the ground;
 Not the least opening in the front was found.
 Sideway he leans, declining to the right,
 And marks his way, and moderates his might.
 Smooth-gliding o'er the plain, th' obedient sphere
 Held on its dubious road, while hope and fear
 Alternate ebb'd and flow'd in every breast:
 Now rolling nearer to the mark it press'd;
 Then chang'd its course, by the strong bias rein'd,
 And on the foe discharg'd the force that yet re-
 main'd.

Smart was the stroke, away the rival fled,
 The bold intruder triumph'd in his stead.

Victorious Nimrod seiz'd the glittering prize,
 Shouts of outrageous joy invade the skies;
 Hands, tongues, and caps, exalt the victor's fame,
 Sabrina's banks return him loud acclaim.

THE LAMENTATION OF DAVID

OVER SAUL AND JONATHAN.

PROSTRATE on earth the bleeding warrior lies,
 And Israel's beauty on the mountains dies;
 How are the mighty fallen!
 Hush'd be my sorrows, gently fall my tears,
 Lest my sad tale should reach the aliens ears:
 Bid fame be dumb, and tremble to proclaim
 In heathen Gath, or Ascalon, our shame;
 Lest proud Philistia, lest our haughty foe,
 With impious scorn insult our solemn woe.

O Gilboa! ye hills aspiring high,
 The last sad scene of Israel's tragedy:
 No fattening dews be on thy lawns distill'd,
 No kindly showers refresh the thirsty field;
 No hallow'd fruits thy barren soil shall raise,
 No spotless kids that on our altars blaze;
 Lonesome and wild shall thy bleak summits rise,
 Accurs'd by men, and hateful to the skies.
 On thee the shields of mighty warriors lay,
 The shield of Saul was vilely cast away;
 The Lord's anointed, Saul! his sacred blood
 Distain'd thy brow, and swell'd the common
 flood.

How are the mighty fallen!

Where'er their bands the royal heroes led,
 The combat thicken'd, and the mighty bled;

The slaughter'd hosts beneath their falchions die,
And wing'd with death unerring arrows fly;
Unknowing to return, still urge the foe,
As fate inflatiate, and as sure the blow.
The son, who next his conquering father fought,
Repeats the wonders his example taught:
Eager his sire's illustrious steps to trace,
And by heroic deeds assert his race.

The royal eagle thus her ripening brood
Trains to the quarry, and directs to blood:
His darling thus, the forest monarch rears,
A firm associate for his future wars;
In union terrible, they seize the prey,
The mountains tremble, and the woods obey.

In peace united, as in war combin'd,
Were Jonathan's and Saul's affections join'd,
Paternal grace with filial duty vy'd,
And love the knot of nature closer ty'd,
Ev'n fate relents, reveres the sacred band,
And undivided bids their friendship stand.
From earth to heaven enlarg'd, their joys improve,

Still fairer, brighter still they shine above
Blest in a long eternity of love.

Daughters of Israel, o'er the royal urn
Wail and lament; the king, the father, mourn.
Oh! now at least indulge a pious woe,
'Tis all the dead receive, the living can bestow.
Cast off your rich attire and proud array,
Let undissembled sorrows cloud the day:
Those ornaments victorious Saul bestow'd,
With gold your necks, your robes with purple
glow'd:

Quit crowns, and garlands, for the sable weed,
To songs of triumph let dumb grief succeed
Let all our grateful hearts for our dead patron bleed.

How are the mighty fallen!

Though thus distress'd, though thus o'erwhelm'd
with grief,

Light is the burthen that admits relief;
My labouring soul superior woes oppress,
Nor roiling time can heal, nor fate redress.
Another Saul your sorrows can remove,
No second Jonathan shall bless my love.

O Jonathan! my friend, my brother dear!
Eyes, stream afresh, and call forth every tear:
Swell, my sad heart each faltering pulse beat low,
Down sink my head beneath this weight of woe:
Hear my laments, ye hills! ye woods, return
My ceaseless groans; with me, ye turtles, mourn!
How pleasant hast thou been! each lovely grace,
Each youthful charm, fate blooming on thy face:
Joy from thine eyes in radiant glories sprung,
And manna dropt from thy persuasive tongue.
Witness, great heav'n! (from you those ardours
came)

How wonderful his love! the kindest dame
Lov'd not like him, nor felt so warm a flame.
No earthly passion to such height aspires,
And seraphs only burn with purer fires.
In vain, while honour calls to glorious arms,
And Israel's cause the pious patriot warms:
In vain, while deaths promiscuous fly below,
Nor youth can bribe, nor virtue ward the blow.

TO A YOUNG LADY,

WITH THE ILIAD OF HOMER TRANSLATED.

Go, happy volume, to the fair impart
The secret wishes of a wounded heart:
Kind advocate! exert thy utmost zeal,
Describe my passion, and my woes reveal.
Oft shalt thou kiss that hand where roses bloom,
And the white lily breathes its rich perfume;
On thee her eyes shall shine, thy leaves employ
Each faculty, and sooth her soul with joy.
Watch the soft hour, when peaceful silence reigns,
And Philomel alone like me complains:
When envious prudes no longer haunt the fair,
But end a day of calumny in prayer:
O'er Quarles or Bunyan nod, in dreams relent,
Without disguise give all their passions vent,
And mourn their wither'd charms, and youthful prime mispent.

Then by the waxen taper's glimmering light,
With thee the studious maid shall pass the night;
Shall feel her heart beat quick in every page,
And tremble at the stern Pelides' rage:
With horror view the half-drawn blade appear,
And the desponding tyrant pale with fear;
To calm that soul untam'd, sage Nestor fails,
And ev'n celestial wisdom scarce prevails.
Then lead her to the margin of the main,
And let her hear th' impatient chief complain;
Toss'd with superior storms, on the bleak shores
He lies, and louder than the billows roars.
Next the dread scene unfold of war and blood,
Hector in arms triumphant, Greece subdued;
The partial gods who with their foes conspire,
The dead, the dying, and the fleet on fire.
But tell, oh! tell the cause of all this woe,
The fatal source from whence these mischiefs flow;
Tell her 'twas love deny'd the hero fir'd,
Depriv'd of her whom most his heart desir'd.
Not the dire vengeance of the thundering Jove,
Can match the boundless rage of injur'd love.
Stop the fierce torrent, and its billows rise,
Lay waste the shores, invade both earth and skies:
Confine it not, but let it gently flow,
It kindly cheers the smiling plains below,
And everlasting sweets upon its borders grow.

To Troy's proud walls the wondering maid convey,
With pointed spires and golden turrets gay,
The work of gods: thence let the fair behold
The court of Priam, rich in gems and gold;
His numerous sons, his queen's majestic pride,
Th' aspiring domes, th' apartments stretching wide,
Where on their looms Sidonian virgins wrought,
And weav'd the battles which their lovers fought.
Here let her eyes survey those fatal charms,
The beauteous prize that set the world in arms;
Through gazing crowds, bright progeny of Jove,
She walks, and every panting heart beats love.
Ev'n sapless age new blossoms at the sight,
And views the fair destroyer with delight:
Beauty's vast power, hence to the nymph make known,

In Helen's triumphs let her read her own;

Nor blame her slaves, but lay the guilt on fate,
And pardon failings which her charms create.

Rash bard! forbear, nor let thy flattering muse,
With pleasing visions, thy fond heart abuse;
Vain are thy hopes presumptuous, vain thy
prayer,

Bright is her image, and divinely fair:
But oh! the goddess in thy arms is fleeting air.
So dreams th' ambitious man when rich Tokay,
Or Burgundy, refines his vulgar clay:
The white rod trembles in his potent hand,
And crowds obsequious wait his high command;
Upon his breast he views the radiant star,
And gives the word around him, peace or war:
In state he reigns, for one short, busy night,
But soon convinc'd by the next dawning light,
Curses the fading joys that vanish from his fight.

AN EPISTLE TO ALLAN RAMSAY.

NEAR fair Avona's silver tide,
Whose waves in soft meanders glide,
I read, to the delighted swains,
Your jocund songs and rural strains.
Smooth as her streams your numbers flow,
Your thoughts in varied beauties show,
Like flowers that on her borders grow.
While I survey, with ravish'd eyes,
His* friendly gift, my valued prize,
Where sister arts, with charms divine,
In their full bloom and beauty shine,
Alternately my soul is blest.
Now I behold my welcome guest,
That graceful, that engaging air,
So dear to all the brave and fair.
Nor has th' ingenious artist shown
His outward lineaments alone,
But in th' expressive draught design'd,
The nobler beauties of his mind;
True friendship, love, benevolence,
Unstudied wit, and manly sense.
Then, as your book I wander o'er,
And feast on the delicious store
(Like the laborious busy bee,
Pleas'd with the sweet variety),
With equal wonder and surprise,
I see resembling portraits rise.
Brave archers march in bright array,
In troops the vulgar line the way.
Here the droll figures flyly sneer,
Or coxcombs at full length appear.
There woods and lawns, a rural scene,
And swains that gambol on the green,
Your pen can act the pencil's part
With greater genius, fire, and art.

Believe me, bard, no hunted hind
That pants against the southern wind,
And seeks the stream through unknown ways;
No matron in her teeming days,
E'er felt such longings, such desires,
As I to view those lofty spires,
Those domes, where fair Edina shrouds
Her towering head amid the clouds.

* Lord Somerville was pleased to send me his own picture, and Mr. Ramsay's works.

But oh! what dangers interpose!
Vales deep with dirt, and hills with snows,
Proud winter floods with rapid force,
Forbid the pleasing intercourse.
But sure we bards, whose purer clay,
Nature has mixt with less alloy,
Might soon find out an easier way.
Do not sage matrons mount on high,
And switch their broom-sticks through the sky;
Ride post o'er hills, and woods, and seas,
From Thule to th' Hesperides†?
And yet the men of Gresham own
That this and stranger feats are done,
By a warm fancy's power alone.
This granted; why can't you and I
Stretch forth our wings, and cleave the sky?
Since our poetic brains, you know,
Than theirs must more intensely glow.
Did not the Theban swan take wing,
Sublimely soar, and sweetly sing?
And do not we of humbler vein,
Sometimes attempt a loftier strain,
Mount sheer out of the reader's sight,
Obscurely lost in clouds and night?

Then climb your Pegasus with speed,
I'll meet thee on the banks of Tweed:
Not as our fathers did of yore,
To swell the flood with crimson gore;
Like the Cadmean murdering brood,
Each thirsting for his brother's blood.
For now all hostile rage shall cease;
Lull'd in the downy arms of peace,
Our honest hands and hearts shall join,
O'er jovial banquets, sparkling wine.
Let Peggy at thy elbow wait,
And I shall bring my bonny Kate.
But hold—oh! take a special care,
T' admit no prying kirkman there;
I dread the penitential chair.
What a strange figure should I make,
A poor abandon'd English rake;
A squire well born, and six foot high,
Perch'd in that sacred pillory?
Let spleen and zeal be banish'd thence,
And troublesome impertinence,
That tells his story o'er again:
Ill-manners and his saucy train,
And self-conceit, and stiff-rumpr pride,
That grin at all the world beside;
Foul scandal, with a load of lies,
Intrigues, rencounters, prodigies;
Fame's busy hawker, light as air,
That feeds on frailties of the fair:
Envy, hypocrisy, deceit,
Fierce party-rage, and warm debate;
And all the hell-hounds that are foes
To friendship and the world's repose.
But mirth instead, and dimpling smiles,
And wit, that gloomy care beguiles;
And joke, and pun, and merry tale,
And toasts, that round the table sail:
While laughter, bursting through the crowd
In volleys, tells our joys aloud.

† The Scilly islands were so called by the ancients.

Hark! the shrill piper mounts on high,
 The woods, the streams, the rocks reply,
 To his far-sounding melody.
 Behold each labouring squeeze prepare
 Supplies of modulated air.
 Observe Croudero's active bow,
 His head still noddling to and fro,
 His eyes, his cheeks, with raptures glow.
 See, see the bashful nymphs advance,
 To lead the regulated dance;
 Flying still, the swains pursuing,
 Yet with backward glances wooing.
 This, this shall be the joyous scene;
 Nor wanton elves that skim the green
 Shall be so blest, so blythe, so gay,
 Or less regard what dotards say.
 My Rose shall then your Thistle greet,
 The Union shall be more complete;
 And, in a bottle and a friend,
 Each national dispute shall end.

ANSWER TO THE ABOVE EPISTLE,

BY ALLAN RAMSAY.

SIR, I had your's, and own my pleasure,
 On the receipt, exceeded measure.
 You write with so much spirit and glee,
 Sae smooth, sae strong, correct, and free;
 That any he (by you allow'd
 To have some merit) may be proud.
 If that's my fault, bear you the blame,
 Wha've lent me sic a lift to fame.
 Your ain tours high, and widens far,
 Bright glanting like the first-rate star,
 And all the world bestow due praise
 On the collection of your lays;
 Where various arts and turns combine,
 Which even in parts first poets shine:
 Like Mat and Swift ye sing with ease,
 And can be Waller when you please.
 Continue, sir, and shame the crew
 That's plagu'd with having nought to do,
 Who fortune in a merry mood
 Has overcharg'd with gentle blood,
 But has deny'd a genius fit
 For action or aspiring wit;
 Such kenna how t' employ their time,
 And think activity a crime:
 Aught they to either do, or say,
 Or walk, or write, or read, or pray!
 When money, their Factotum, 's able
 To furnish them a numerous rabble,
 Who will, for daily drink and wages,
 Be chairmen, chaplains, clerks, and pages:
 Could they, like you, employ their hours
 In planting these delightful flowers,
 Which carpet the poetic fields,
 And lasting funds of pleasure yields;
 Nae mair they'd gaunt and gove away;
 Or sleep or loiter out the day,
 Or waste the night damning their faults
 In deep debauch, and bawdy brawls:
 Whence pox and poverty proceed
 An early eild, and spirits dead.
 Reverse of you;—and him you love,
 Whose brighter spirit tours above

The mob of thoughtless lords and beaux,
 Who in his ilka action shows
 " True friendship, love, benevolence,
 " Unstudy'd wit, and manly sense."
 Allow here what you've said your sell,
 Nought can b' exprest so just and well:
 To him and her, worthy his love,
 And every blessing from above,
 A son is given, God save the boy,
 For theirs and every Som'ril's joy.
 Ye wardins round him take your place,
 And raise him with each manly grace;
 Make his meridian virtues shine,
 To add fresh lustres to his line:
 And many may the mother see
 Of such a lovely progeny.

Now, sir, when Boreas nae mair thuds
 Hail, snaw and fleet, frae blacken'd clouds;
 While Caledonia's hills are green,
 And a' her straths delight the een;
 While ilka flower with fragrance blows,
 And a' the year its beauty shows;
 Before again the winter lour,
 What hinders then your northern tour?
 Be sure of welcome: nor believe
 Those wha an ill report would give
 To Ed'nburgh and the land of cakes,
 That nought what's necessary lacks.
 Here plenty's goddess frae her horn
 Pours fish and cattle, claith and corn,
 In blyth abundance;—and yet mair,
 Our men are brave, our ladies fair.
 Nor will North Britain yield for south
 Of ilka thing, and fellows couth,
 To any but her sister South.—

True, rugged roads are cursed drieigh,
 And speats aft roar frae mountains high:
 The body tires—poor tottering clay,
 And likes with ease at hame to stay;
 While fauls stride warlds at ilka stend,
 And can their widening views extend.
 Mine sees you, while you chearfu' roam
 On sweet Avona's flowery howm,
 There recollecting, with full view,
 Those follies which mankind pursue;
 While, conscious of superior merit,
 You rise with a correcting spirit;
 And, as an agent of the gods,
 Lash them with sharp satyric rods:
 Labour divine!—Next, for a change,
 O'er hill and dale I see you range,
 After the fox or whidding hare,
 Confirming health in purest air;
 While joy frae heights and dales resounds,
 Rais'd by the hola, horn and hounds:
 Fatigu'd, yet pleas'd, the chase outrun,
 I see the friend and setting sun,
 Invite you to the temperate bicker,
 Which makes the blood and wit flow quicker.
 The clock strikes twelve, to rest you bound,
 To save your health by sleeping sound.
 Thus with cool head and healsome breast
 You see new day stream frae the east:
 Then all the muses round you shine,
 Inspiring every thought divine;

Be long their aid—Your years and blessings,
Your servant Allan Ramsay wishes.

TO ALLAN RAMSAY,

Upon his publishing a second Volume of Poems.

HAIL, Caledonian bard! whose rural strains
Delight the listening hills, and cheer the plains!
Already polish'd by some hand divine,
Thy purer ore what furnace can refine?
Careless of censure, like the sun, shine forth,
In native lustre, and intrinsic worth.
To follow nature is by rules to write,
She led the way, and taught the Stagirite.
From her the critic's taste, the poet's fire,
Both drudge in vain, till she from heaven inspire:
By the same guide instructed how to soar,
Allan is now what Homer was before.

Ye chosen youths! who dare like him aspire,
And touch with bolder hand the golden lyre!
Keep nature still in view; on her intent,
Climb by her aid the dangerous steep ascent
To lasting fame. Perhaps a little art
Is needful, to plane o'er some rugged part;
But the most labour'd elegance and care,
T' arrive at full perfection must despair.
Alter, blot out, and write all o'er again,
Alas! some venial sins will yet remain.
Indulgence is to human frailty due,
Ev'n Pope has faults, and Addison a few;
But those, like mists that cloud the morning ray,
Are lost and vanish in the blaze of day.
Though some intruding pimple find a place
Amid the glories of Clarinda's face,
We still love on, with equal zeal adore,
Nor think her less a goddess than before.
Slight wounds in no disgraceful scars shall end,
Heal'd by the balm of some good-natur'd friend.
In vain shall canker'd Zoilus assail,
While Spence presides, and candour holds the scale.
His generous breast, nor envy fours, nor spite,
Taught by his * founder's motto how to write,
Good manners guides his pen. Learn'd without pride,

In dubious points not forward to decide,
If here and there uncommon beauties rise,
From flower to flower he roves with glad surprise.
In failings no malignant pleasure takes,
Nor rudely triumphs over small mistakes.
No nauseous praise, no biting taunts offend,
W' expect a censor, and we find a friend.
Poets, improv'd by his correcting care,
Shall face their foes with more undaunted air,
Stripp'd of their rags, shall like Ulysses shine,
With more heroic port, and grace divine.
No pomp of learning, and no fund of sense,
Can e'er atone for lost benevolence.
May Wykeham's sons, who in each art excel,
And rival ancient bards in writing well, [sing,
While from their bright examples taught they
And emulate their flights with bolder wing.
From their own frailties learn the humbler part,
Mildly to judge in gentleness of heart!

* William of Wykeham, "Manners maketh man."

Such critics, Ramsay, jealous for our fame,
Will not with malice insolently blame,
But lur'd by praise the haggard muse reclaim. }
Retouch each line till all is just and neat,
A whole of proper parts, a work almost complete.
So when some beauteous dame, a reigning toast,
The flower of Forth, and proud Edina's boast,
Stands at her toilet in her tartan plaid,
In all her richest head-geer trimly clad,
The curious hand-maid, with observant eye,
Corrects the swelling hoop that hangs awry;
Through every plait her busy fingers rove,
And now she plies below, and then above,
With pleasing tattle entertains the fair,
Each ribbon smooths, adjusts each rambling hair,
Till the gay nymph in her full lustre shine,
And Homer's Juno was not half so fine.

TO THE

AUTHOR OF THE ESSAY ON MAN.

WAS ever work to such perfection wrought;
How elegant the diction! pure the thought!
Not sparingly adorn'd with scatter'd rays,
But one bright beauty, one collected blaze:
So breaks the day upon the shades of night,
Enlivening all with one unbounded light.

To humble man's proud heart, thy great design;
But who can read this wondrous work divine,
So justly plann'd, and so politely writ,
And not be proud, and boast of human wit?

Yet just to thee, and to thy precepts true,
Let us know man, and give to God his due;
His image we, but mix'd with coarse alloy,
Our happiness to love, adore, obey;
To praise him for each gracious boon bestow'd,
For this thy work, for every lesser good,
With prostrate hearts before his throne to fall,
And own the great Creator all in all.

The muse, which should instruct, now entertains,
On trifling subjects, in enervate strains;
Be it thy task to set the wanderer right,
Point out her way in her aerial flight;
Her noble mien, her honours lost restore,
And bid her deeply think, and proudly soar.
Thy theme sublime, and easy verse, will prove
Her high descent, and mission from above.

Let others now translate; thy abler pen
Shall vindicate the ways of God to men;
In virtue's cause shall gloriously prevail,
When the bench frowns in vain, and pulpits fail.
Made wise by thee, whose happy style conveys
The purest morals in the softest lays,
As angels once, so now we mortals bold
Shall climb the ladder Jacob view'd of old;
Thy kind reforming muse shall lead the way
To the bright regions of eternal day.

EPISTLE TO MR. THOMSON,

ON THE FIRST EDITION OF HIS SEASONS.

So bright, so dark, upon an April day,
The sun darts forth, or hides his various ray;

So high, so low, the lark aspiring sings,
 Or drops to earth again with folded wings;
 So smooth, so rough, the sea that laves our shores,
 Smiles in a calm, or in a tempest roars.
 Believe me, Thomson, 'tis not thus I write,
 Severely kind, by envy sour'd or spite:
 Nor would I rob thy brows to grace my own;
 Such arts are to my honest soul unknown.
 I read thee over as a friend should read,
 Griev'd when you fail, o'erjoy'd when you succeed.
 Why should thy muse, born so divinely fair,
 Want the reforming toilet's daily care?
 Dress the gay maid, improve each native grace,
 And call forth all the glories of her face:
 Studiously plain, and elegantly clean,
 With unaffected speech, and easy mien,
 Th' accomplish'd nymph, in all her best attire,
 Courts shall applaud, and prostrate crowds admire.
 Discretely daring, with a stiffen'd rein,
 Firm in thy seat the flying steed restrain.
 Though few thy faults, who can perfection boast?
 Spots in the sun are in his lustre lost:
 Yet ev'n those spots expunge with patient care,
 Nor fondly the minutest error spare.
 For kind and wise the parent, who reproves
 The slightest blemish in the child he loves.
 Read Philips much, consider Milton more;
 But from their dross extract the purer ore.
 To coin new words, or to restore the old,
 In southern bards is dangerous and bold;
 But rarely, very rarely, will succeed,
 When minted on the other side of Tweed.
 Let perspicuity o'er all preside—
 Soon shalt thou be the nation's joy and pride.
 The rhiming, jingling tribe, with bells and song,
 Who drive their limping Pegasus along,
 Shall learn from thee in bolder flights to rise
 To scorn the beaten road, and range the skies.
 A genius so refin'd, so just, so great,
 In Britain's isle shall fix the muse's seat,
 And new Parnassus shall at home create:
 Rules from thy works each future bard shall draw,
 Thy works, above the critic's nicer law,
 And rich in brilliant gems without a flaw.

TO THE RIGHT MONOURABLE
 LADY ANNE COVENTRY.

Upon viewing her fine Chimney-piece of Shell-work.

THE greedy merchant ploughs the sea for gain,
 And rides exulting o'er the watery plain:
 While howling tempests, from their rocky bed,
 Indignant break around his careful head.
 The royal fleet the liquid waste explores,
 And speaks in thunder to the trembling shores;
 The voice of wrath awak'd the nations hear,
 The vanquish'd hope, and the proud victors fear;
 Those quit their chain, and these resign their palm,
 While Britain's awful flag commands a calm.
 The curious sage, nor gain nor fame pursues,
 With other eyes the boiling deep he views;
 Hangs o'er the cliff inquisitive to know
 The secret causes of its ebb and flow;

Whence breathe the winds that ruffle its smooth
 face,
 Or ranks in classes all the fishy race,
 From those enormous monsters of the main,
 Who in their world, like other tyrants, reign,
 To the poor cockle-tribe, that humble band,
 Who cleave to rocks, or loiter on the strand.
 Yet ev'n their shells the forming hand divine
 Has, with distinguish'd lustre, taught to shine.
 What bright enamel! and what various dyes!
 What lively tints delight our wondering eyes!
 Th' Almighty painter glows in every line:
 How mean, alas! is Raphael's bold design,
 And Titian's colouring, if compar'd to thine!
 Justly supreme! let us thy power revere,
 Thou fill'st all space! all-beauteous every where,
 Thy rising sun with blushes paints the morn,
 Thy shining lamps the face of night adorn;
 Thy flowers the meads, thy nodding trees the hills;
 The vales thy pastures green, and bubbling rills;
 Thy coral groves, thy rocks that amber weep,
 Deck all the gloomy mansions of the deep;
 Thy yellow sands distinct with golden ore,
 And these thy variegated shells the shore.
 To all thy works such grandeur hast thou lent,
 And such extravagance of ornament.
 For the false traitor, man, this pomp and show!
 A scene so gay, for us poor worms below!
 No—for thy glory all these beauties rise,
 Yet may improve the good, instruct the wise.

You, madam, sprung from Beaufort's royal line,
 Who, lost to courts, can in your closet shine,
 Best know to use each blessing he bestows,
 Best know to praise the power from whence it flows.
 Shells in your hand the Parian rock defy,
 Or agat, or Egyptian porphyry—
 More glossy they, their veins of brighter dye.
 See! where your rising pyramids aspire,
 Your guests surpris'd the shining pile admire!
 In future times, if some great Phidias rise,
 Whose chissel with his mistress nature vies,
 Who, with superior skill, can lightly trace
 In the hard marble block the softest face:
 To crown this piece, so elegantly neat,
 Your well-wrought busto shall the whole complete;
 O'er your own work from age to age preside,
 Its author once, and then its greatest pride.

ADDRESS

To his Elbow-chair new-clothed.

My dear companion, and my faithful friend!
 If Orpheus taught the listening oaks to bend;
 If stones and rubbish, at Amphion's call,
 Danc'd into form, and built the Theban wall;
 Why shouldst not thou attend my humble lays,
 And hear my grateful harp resound thy praise?
 True, thou art spruce and fine, a very beau;
 But what are trappings and external show?
 To real worth alone I make my court;
 Knaves are my scorn, and coxcombs are my sport,
 Once I beheld thee far less trim and gay;
 Ragged, disjointed, and to worms a prey;
 The safe retreat of every lurking mouse;
 Derided, shunn'd; the lumber of my house!

Thy robe how chang'd from what it was before !
 Thy velvet robe, which pleas'd my fires of yore !
 'Tis thus capricious fortune wheels us round ;
 Aloft we mount—then tumble to the ground.
 Yet grateful then, my constancy I prov'd ;
 I knew thy worth ; my friend in rags I lov'd ;
 I lov'd thee more ; nor, like a courtier, spurn'd
 My benefactor, when the tide was turn'd.
 With conscious shame, yet frankly, I confess,
 That in my youthful days—I lov'd thee less.
 Where vanity, where pleasure call'd, I stray'd ;
 And every wayward appetite obey'd.
 But sage experience taught me how to prize
 Myself ; and how, this world : she bade me rise
 To nobler flights regardless of a race
 Of factious emmets ; pointed where to place
 My bliss, and lodg'd me in thy soft embrace.

Here on thy yielding down I sit secure ;
 And, patiently, what heaven has sent, endure ;
 From all the futile cares of business free ;
 Not fond of life, but yet content to be :
 Here mark the fleeting hours ; regret the past ;
 And seriously prepare to meet the last.

So safe on shore the pension'd sailor lies ;
 And all the malice of the storm defies :
 With ease of body blest, and peace of mind,
 Pities the restless crew he left behind ;
 Whilst, in his cell, he meditates alone
 On his great voyage, to the world unknown.

SONG.

As o'er Asteria's fields I rove,
 The blissful seat of peace and love,
 Ten thousand beauties round me rise,
 And mingle pleasure with surprise.
 By nature blest in every part,
 Adorn'd with every grace of art,
 This paradise of blooming joys
 Each raptur'd sense, at once, employs.

But when I view the radiant queen,
 Who form'd this fair enchanting scene ;
 Pardon, ye grotts ! ye crystal floods !
 Ye breathing flowers ! ye shady woods !
 Your coolness now no more invites ;
 No more your murmuring stream delights ;
 Your sweets decay, your verdure's flown ;
 My soul's intent on her alone.

PARAPHRASE UPON A FRENCH SONG.

" Venge moi d'une ingrate maitresse,
 " Dieu du vin, j'implore bon yvresse."

KIND relief in all my pain,
 Jolly Bacchus ! hear my prayer,
 Vengeance on th' ingrateful fair !
 In thy smiling cordial bowl,
 Drown the sorrows of my soul,
 All thy deity employ,
 Gild each gloomy thought with joy,
 Jolly Bacchus ! save, oh save,
 From the deep devouring grave,
 A poor, despairing, dying swain.

Haste away,
 Haste away,
 Lash thy tigers, do not stay,
 I'm undone if thou delay.
 If I view those eyes once more,
 Still shall love, and still adore,
 And be more wretched than before.
 See the glory round her face !
 See her move !
 With what a grace !—
 Ye gods above !

Is she not one of your immortal race ?—

Fly, ye winged Cupids, fly,
 Dart like lightning through the sky :
 Would ye in marble temples dwell,
 The dear-one to my arms compel ;
 Bring her in bands of myrtle tied :
 Bid her forget, and bid her hide,
 All her scorn, and all her pride.
 Would ye that your slave repay
 A smoking hecatomb each day ;
 O restore
 The beauteous goddess I adore ;
 O restore, with all her charms,
 The faithless vagrant to my arms !

HUDIBRAS AND MILTON RECONCILED.

TO SIR ADOLPHUS OUGHTON.

" Si fractus illabatur orbis,
 " Impavidum ferient ruinæ."—HOR.

DEAR knight, how great a drudge is he
 Who would excel in poetry !
 And yet how few have learnt the art,
 T' inform the head, or touch the heart !
 Some, with a dry and barren brain,
 Poor rogues ! like costive lap-dogs strain ;
 While others with a flux of wit,
 The reader and their friends besh-t.
 Would you (Sir Knight) my judgment know ?
 He still writes worst who writes so-so.
 In this the mighty secret lies,
 To elevate and to surprise :
 Thus far my pen at random run,
 The fire was out, the clock struck one.
 When, lo ! strange hollow murmurs from without,
 Invade my ears. In every quarter rous'd,
 The warring winds rush from their rocky caves
 Tumultuous ; the vapours dank, or dry,
 Beneath their standards rang'd, with lowering front
 Darken the welkin. At each dreadful shock
 Oaks, pines, and elms, down to their mother earth
 Bend low their suppliant heads : the nodding
 towers
 Menace destruction, and old Edrick's house
 From its foundation shakes. The bellowing clouds
 Burst into rain, or gild their sable skirts
 With flakes of ruddy fire ; fierce elements
 In ruin reconcil'd ! redoubled peals
 Of ceaseless thunder roar. Convulsions rend
 The firmament. The whole creation stands
 Mute and appall'd, and trembling waits its doom.
 And now perhaps, dear friend, you wonder
 In this dread scene of wind, rain, thunder,

What a poor guilty wretch could do;
Then hear—(for, faith, I tell you true)
I water'd, shook my giddy head,
Gravely broke wind, and went to bed.

UPON

MIRANDA'S LEAVING THE COUNTRY.

The sun departing hides his head,
The lily and the rose are dead,
The birds forget to sing;
The cooing turtles now no more
Repeat their amorous ditties o'er,
But watch th' approaching spring.

For soon the merry month of May
Restores the bright all-cheering ray;
Soft notes charm every grove:
The flowers ambrosial incense breathe,
And all above, and all beneath,
Is fragrance, joy, and love.

So when Miranda hence retires,
Each shepherd only not expires:
How rueful is the scene!
How the dull moments creep along!
No sportive dance, nor rural song,
No gambols on the green.

Yet, when the radiant nymph appears,
Each field its richest livery wears,
All nature's blith and gay;
The swains transported with delight,
After a long and gloomy night,
Bless the reviving day.

While thus, indulgent to our prayer
Kind heaven permitted us to share
A blessing so divine;
While smiling hope gave some relief,
And joys alternate sooth'd our grief,
What shepherd could repine?

But now—her fatal loss we mourn,
Never, oh! never to return
To these deserted plains;
Undone, abandon'd to despair,
Alas! 'tis winter all the year
To us unhappy swains.

Ye little loves, lament around;
With empty quivers strew the ground,
Your bows unbent lay down;
Harmless your wounds, pointless your darts,
And frail your empire o'er our hearts,
Till she your triumphs crown.

Ye nymphs, ye fawns, complaining sigh;
Ye graces, let your tresses fly,
The sport of every wind:
Ye mimic echoes tell the woods,
Repeat it to the murmuring floods,
She's gone! she's gone! unkind!

Break, shepherds, break each tuneless reed,
Let all your flocks at random feed,
Each flowery garland tear;
Since wit and beauty quit the plain,
Past pleasures but enhance our pain,
And life's not worth our care.

TO PHYLLIS.

Though close immur'd, poor captive maid!
Young Danaë play'd a wanton's part;
The gold that in her lap was laid,
Soon found a passage to her heart.

Ambitious Semele, beguil'd
By Juno's unrelenting hate,
Amid the bright destruction smil'd,
Enjoy'd her god, and dy'd in state.

The swan on Leda's whiter breast,
Artful deceiver! nestling lay,
With joy she clasp'd her downy guest,
Fond of a bird so soft and gay.

What boon can faithful merit share,
Where interest reigns, or pride, or show?
'Tis the rich banker wins the fair,
The garter'd knight, or feather'd beau.

No more my panting heart shall beat,
Nor Phyllis claim one parting groan?
Her tears, her vows, are all a cheat,
For woman loves herself alone.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

THE EARL OF HALIFAX,

With the Fable of the two Springs.

O HALIFAX! a name for ever dear
To Phœbus, and which all the Nine revere;
Accept this humble pledge of my esteem,
So justly thine, benevolence my theme.
In mystic tales, and parables, of old
Grave eastern seers instructive lessons told;
Wise Greece from them receiv'd the happy plan
And taught the brute to pedagogue the man.
The matron Truth appears with better grace,
When well-wrought fables veil her reverend face:
Dry precept may instruct, but can't delight,
While pleasing fictions all our powers excite.
Our busy minds each faculty employ,
And range around, and start their game with joy;
Pleas'd with the chase, make the rich prey their own,

And glory in the conquests they have won.
Fable alone can crown the poet's brow,
Upon his works immortal charms bestow:
And 'twere a sin that method to disprove,
Which Heaven has fix'd by sanctions from above.
My humble muse in calm retirement roves
Near mossy fountains, and near shady groves:
Yet there, ev'n there, her loyal hands would raise
Some rural trophy to her monarch's praise;
Instruct those fountains and those groves to show,
What copious blessings from his bounty flow;
While flowers and shrubs bless his propitious aid,
His urn refreshing, or protecting shade.
Great friend of human kind! thy pious hand
Nor wounds to kill, nor conquers to command.
Let haughty tyrants of false glory dream,
Without remorse pursue the bloody scheme;
To fame forbidden tread the lawless way,
And o'er the ravag'd world extend their sway.

'Tis thine, great George, to guard thy favourite isle
 From open force, and every secret wile,
 To raise th' oppress'd, to make the captives smile;
 To pay just heaven what righteous monarchs owe,
 And, like that heaven, to bless the world below:
 To build new temples, to repair the old,
 To bring the straggling sheep into the fold,
 And by wise laws restore an age of gold.
 Ye blissful seats where Tame and Isis join,
 Lovely retirement of the sacred Nine,
 Parent of arts, and once my sweet abode,
 Can ye forget the blessings he bestow'd?
 Can sophistry prevail against that prince,
 Whose mercy and beneficence convince?
 Oh! touch each tuneful string, let every muse
 From all her stores her noblest Pæans choose;
 Pay what she can in tributary lays,
 And to his virtue grant supplies of praise.
 To all the world your grateful hearts make known,
 And in your monarch's fame record your own.
 His fame—which envy's breath can never blast,
 But ages yet to come shall join the past,
 And Brunswick's glory with the world shall last.

A SONG FOR THE LUTE.

GENTLY, my lute, move every string,
 Soft as my sighs, reveal my pain;
 While I, in plaintive numbers, sing
 Of slighted vows, and cold disdain.
 In vain her airs, in vain her art,
 In vain she frowns when I appear;
 Thy notes shall melt her frozen heart;
 She cannot hate, if she can hear.
 And see she smiles! through all the groves
 Triumphant Iō-Pæans sound:
 Clap all your wings, ye little loves;
 Ye sportive graces, dance around.
 Ye listening oaks, bend to my song;
 Not Orpheus play'd a nobler lay:
 Ye savages, about me throng;
 Ye rocks, and harder hearts, obey.
 She comes, she comes, relenting fair!
 To fill with joy my longing arms;
 What faithful lover can despair,
 Who thus with verse, and music, charms?

THE COQUET.

WHEN tortur'd by the cruel fair
 And almost mad with wild despair,
 My fleeting spirits rove;
 One cordial glance restores her slave,
 Redeems me from the gaping grave,
 And soothes my soul to love.
 Thus in a sea of doubt I'm toss'd,
 Now sunk, now thrown upon the coast;
 What wretch can long endure
 Such odd, perplexing pangs as these,
 When neither mortal the disease,
 Nor yet complete the cure?

Proud tyrant! since to save, or kill,
 Depends on thy capricious will,
 This milder sentence give;
 Reverse my strange, untoward fate,
 Oh! let me perish by thy hate,
 Or by thy kindness live!

THE SUPERANNUATED LOVER.

DEAD to the soft delights of love,
 Spare me, O! spare me, cruel boy:
 Nor seek in vain that heart to move,
 Which pants no more with amorous joy.
 Of old, thy faithful hardy swain,
 (When smit with fair Pastora's charms)
 I serv'd thee many a long campaign,
 And wide I spread thy conquering arms.
 Now, mighty God, dismiss thy slave,
 To feeble age let youth succeed;
 Recruit among the strong and brave,
 And kindly spare an invalid.
 Adieu, fond hopes, fantastic cares,
 Ye killing joys, ye pleasing pains!
 My soul for better guests prepares,
 Reason restor'd, and virtue reigns.
 But why, my Cloc, tell me why?
 Why trickles down this silent tear?
 Why do these blushes rise and die?
 Why stand I mute when thou art here?
 Ev'n sleep affords my soul no rest,
 Thee bathing in the stream I view;
 With thee I dance, with thee I feast,
 Thee through the gloomy grove pursue.
 Triumphant god of gay desires!
 Thy vassal's raging pains remove;
 I burn, I burn, with fierce fires,
 Oh! take my life, or crown my love.

ADVICE TO THE LADIES.

WHO now regards Chloris, her tears, and her whining,
 Her sighs and fond wishes, and awkward repining?
 What a pother is here, with her amorous glances,
 Soft fragments of Ovid, and scraps of romances!
 A nice prude at fifteen! and a romp in decay!
 Cold December affects the sweet blossoms of May;
 To fawn in her dotage, and in her bloom spurn us,
 Is to quench love's bright torch, and with touch-
 wood to burn us.
 Believe me, dear maids, there's no way of evading;
 While ye pish, and cry nay, your roses are fading;
 Though your passion survive, your beauty will dwindle,
 And our languishing embers can never rekindle.
 When bright in your zeniths we prostrate before ye,
 When ye set in a cloud, what fool will adore ye?
 Then, ye fair, be advis'd, and snatch the kind blessing,
 And show your good conduct by timely possessing.

ANACREONTIC.

TO CLOE DRINKING.

WHEN, my dear Cloe, you resign
 One happy hour to mirth and wine,
 Each glass you drink still paints your face
 With some new victorious grace :
 Charm in reserve my soul surprise,
 And by fresh wounds your lover dies.
 Who can resist thee, lovely fair !
 That wit ! that soft engaging air !
 Each panting heart its homage pays,
 And all the vassal world obeys.
 God of the grape, boast now no more
 Thy triumphs on far Indus' shore :
 Each useless weapon now lay down,
 Thy tigers, car, and ivy crown ;
 Give but this juice in full supplies,
 And trust thy fame to Cloe's eyes.

TO A DISCARDED TOAST.

CELIA, confess 'tis all in vain,
 To patch the ruins of thy face ;
 Nor of ill-natur'd time complain,
 That robs it of each blooming grace.
 If love no more shall bend his bow,
 Nor point his arrows from thine eye,
 If no lac'd fop, nor feather'd beau,
 Despairing at thy feet shall die :
 Yet still, my charmer, wit like thine
 Shall triumph over age and fate ;
 Thy setting beams with lustre shine,
 And rival their meridian height.
 Beauty, fair flower ! soon fades away,
 And transient are the joys of love ;
 But wit, and virtue, ne'er decay,

THE PERJUR'D MISTRESS.

From Horace, Epod. xv. ad Næram.

'Twas night, and heaven intent with all its eyes
 Gaz'd on the dear deceitful maid ;
 A thousand pretty things she said,
 A thousand artful tricks she play'd,
 From me, deluded me, her falsehood to disguise.
 She clasp'd me in her soft encircling arms,
 She press'd her glowing cheek to mine,
 The clinging ivy, or the curling vine,
 Did never yet so closely twine ; [charms?
 Who could be man and bear the lustre of her
 And thus she swore : by all the powers above,
 When winter storms shall cease to roar,
 When summer suns shall shine no more,
 When wolves their cruelty give o'er,
 Næra then, and not till then, shall cease to love.
 Ah ! false Næra ! perjur'd fair ! but know,
 I have a soul too great to bear
 A rival's proud insulting air,
 Another may be found as fair, [you.
 As fair, ungrateful nymph ! and far more just than

Shouldst thou repent, and at my feet be laid,
 Dejected, penitent, forlorn,
 And all thy former follies mourn,
 Thy proffer'd passion I would scorn :
 The gods shall do me right on that devoted head,
 And you, spruce sir, who insolently gay,
 Exulting, laugh at my disgrace,
 Boast with vain airs, and stiff grimace,
 Your large estate, your handsome face,
 Proud of a fleeting bliss, the pageant of a day :
 You too shall soon repent this haughty scorn ;
 When, fickle as the sea or wind,
 The prostitute shall change her mind,
 To such another coxcomb kind ; [turn.
 Then shall I clap my wings, and triumph in my

TO A YOUNG LADY,

Who spent the Night in Tears, upon a Report that her Brother was to fight a Duel the next Morning.

PASTORA weeps, let every lover mourn,
 Her grief is no less fatal than her scorn :
 Those shining orbs inflict an equal pain,
 O'erflown with tears, or pointed with disdain.
 When doubts and fears invade the tender breast,
 Where peace, and joy, and love should ever rest ;
 As flowers depriv'd of the sun's genial ray,
 Earthward we bend, and silently decay ;
 In spite of all philosophy can do,
 Our hearts relent, the bursting torrents flow, }
 We feel her pains, and propagate her woe.
 Each mournful muse laments the weeping fair,
 The graces all their comely tresses tear,
 Love drags his wings, and droops his little head,
 And Venus mourns as for Adonis dead.
 Patience, dear maid, nor without cause complain,
 O lavish not those precious drops in vain :
 Under the shield of your prevailing charms, }
 Your happy brother lives secure from harms,
 Your bright resemblance all my rage disarms.
 Your influence unable to withstand,
 The conscious steel drops from my trembling hand ;
 Low at your feet the guilty weapon lies,
 The foe repents, and the fond lover dies.
 Æneas thus by men and gods pursued,
 Feeble with wounds, defil'd with dust and blood,
 Beauty's bright goddess interpos'd her charms,
 And sav'd the hopes of Troy from Grecian arms.

TO DR. M——

READING MATHEMATICS.

VAIN our pursuits of knowledge, vain our care,
 The cost and labour we may justly spare.
 Death from this coarse alloy refines the mind,
 Leaves us at large t' expatiate unconfin'd ;
 All science opens to our wondering eyes,
 And the good man is in a moment wise.

FROM MARTIAL.

EPIG. xlvii.

WOULD you, my friend, find out the true receipt,
 To live at ease, and stem the tide of fate ;

The grand elixir thus you must infuse,
And these ingredients to be happy choose:
First an estate, not got with toil and sweat,
But unincumber'd left, and free from debt:
For let that be your dull forefather's care,
To pinch and drudge for his deserving heir;
Fruitful and rich, in land that's sound and good,
That fills your barns with corn, your hearth with wood;

That cold nor hunger may your house infest,
While flames invade the skies, and pudding crowns
the feast.

A quiet mind, serene, and free from care,
Nor puzzling on the bench, nor noisy at the bar;
A body sound, that physic cannot mend;
And the best physic of the mind, a friend,
Equal in birth, in humour, and in place,
Thy other self, distinguish'd but by face;
Whose sympathetic soul takes equal share
Of all thy pleasure, and of all thy care.

A modest board, adorn'd with men of sense,
No French ragouts, nor French impertinence,
A merry bottle to engender wit,
Not over-dos'd, but quantum sufficit:
Equal the error is in each excess,
Nor dullness less a sin, than drunkenness.

A tender wife dissolving by thy side,
Easy and chaste, free from debate and pride,
Each day a mistress, and each night a bride.
Sleep undisturb'd, and at the dawn of day,
The merry horn, that chides thy tedious stay;
A horse that's clean, sure-footed, swift, and sound,
And dogs that make the echoing cliffs resound;
That sweep the dewy plains, out-fly the wind,
And leave domestic sorrows far behind. [past,
Pleas'd with thy present lot, nor grudging at the Nor fearing when thy time shall come, nor hoping for thy last.

TO A GENTLEMAN,

WHO MARRIED HIS CAST MISTRESS.

From Horace, Book III. Ode ix.

D. WHILE I was yours, and yours alone,
Proud, and transported with your charms,
I envy'd not the Persian throne,
But reign'd more glorious in your arms.

B. While you were true, nor Suky fair
Had chas'd poor Bruny from your breast;
Not Ilia could with me compare,
So fam'd, or so divinely blest.

D. In Suky's arms entranc'd I lie,
So sweetly sings the warbling fair!
For whom most willingly I'd die,
Would fate the gentle syren spare.

B. Me Billy burns with mutual fire,
For whom I'd die, in whom I live,
For whom each moment I'd expire,
Might he, my better part, survive.

D. Should I once more my heart resign,
Would you the penitent receive?
Would Suky scorn'd atone my crime?
And would my Bruny own her slave?

B. Though brighter he than blazing star,
More fickle thou than wind or sea,
With thee, my kind returning dear,
I'd live, contented die with thee.

A DAINY NEW BALLAD:

Occasioned by a Clergyman's Widow of seventy years of age, being married to a young Exciseman.

THERE liv'd in our good town,
A relick of the gown,
A chaste and humble dame;
Who, when her man of God
Was cold as any clod,
Dropt many a tear in vain.

But now, good people, learn all,
No grief can be eternal;
Nor is it meet, I ween,
That folks should always whimper,
There is a time to simper,
As quickly shall be seen.

For love, that little urchin,
About this widow lurching,
Had flily fix'd his dart;
The silent creeping flame
Boil'd fore in every vein,
And glow'd about her heart.

So when a pipe we smoke,
And from the flint provoke
The sparks that twinkling play;
The touch-wood old and dry
With heat begins to fry,
And gently wastes away.

With art she patch'd up nature,
Reforming every feature,
Restoring every grace:
To gratify her pride,
She stopp'd each cranney wide,
And painted o'er her face.

Nor red, nor eke the white,
Was wanting to invite,
Nor coral lips that pout;
But, oh, in vain she tries!
With darts to arm those eyes
That dimly squint about.
With order and with care,
Her pyramid of hair
Sublimely mounts the sky;
And, that she might prevail,
She bolster'd up her tail,
With rumps three stories high.

With many a rich perfume,
She purify'd her room,
As there was need, no doubt;
For on these warm occasions,
Offensive exhalations
Are apt to fly about.

On beds of roses lying,
Expecting, wishing, dying,
Thus languish'd for her love
The Cyprian queen of old,
As merry bards have told,
All in a myrtle grove.

In pale of mother church,
She fondly hop'd to lurch,
But, ah me! hop'd in vain;
No doctor could be found,
Who this her case profound
Durst venture to explain.

At length a youth full smart,
Who oft by magic art
Had div'd in many a hole;
Or kilderkin, or tun,
Or hoghead, 'twas all one,
He'd found it with his pole.

His art, and eke his face,
So suited to her case,
Engag'd her love-sick heart;
Quoth she, my pretty Diver,
With thee I'll live for ever,
And from thee never part.

For thee my bloom reviving,
For thee fresh charms arising,
Shall melt thee into joy;
Nor doubt, my pretty sweeting,
Ere nine months are completing,
To see a bonny boy.

As ye have seen, no doubt,
A candle when just out,
In flames break forth again;
So shone this widow bright,
All blazing in despatch
Of threescore years and ten.

CANIDIA'S EPITHALAMIUM.

UPON THE SAME.

TIME as malevolent, as old,
To blast Canidia's face,
(Which once 'twas rapture to behold)
With wrinkles and disgrace.

Not so in blooming beauty bright,
Each envying virgin's pattern,
She reign'd with undisputed right
A * priestess of St. Cattern.

Each sprightly soph, each brawny thrum,
Spent his first runnings here;
And hoary doctors dribbling come,
To languish and despair.

Low at her feet the prostrate arts
Their humble homage pay;
To her the tyrant of their hearts,
Each bard directs his lay.

But now, when impotent to please,
Alas! she would be doing;
Reversing nature's wise decrees,
She goes herself a-wooing.

Though brib'd with all her pelf, the swain
Most awkwardly complies;
Press'd to bear arms, he serves in pain,
Or from his colours flies.

So does an ivy, green when old,
And sprouting in decay;

* She was bar-keeper at the Cattern-wheel in Oxford.

In juiceless, joyless arms infold
A sapling young and gay.

The thriving plant, if better join'd,
Would emulate the skies;
But, to that wither'd trunk confin'd,
Grows sickly, pines, and dies.

HUNTING-SONG.

BEHOLD, my friend, the rosy-finger'd morn,
With blushes on her face,
Peeps o'er yon azure hill;
Rich gems the trees enchain,
Pearls from each bush distil,
Arise, arise, and hail the light new-born.

Hark! hark! the merry horn calls, Come away:
Quit, quit the downy bed;
Break from Amynta's arms;
Oh, let it ne'er be said,
That all, that all her charms,

Though she's as Venus fair, can tempt thy stay.

Perplex thy soul no more with cares below,
For what will pelf avail!

Thy courser paws the ground,
Each beagle cocks his tail,
They spend their mouths around,

While health, and pleasure, smiles on every brow.

Try, huntsmen, all the brakes, spread all the plain,
Now, now, she's gone away,
Strip, strip, with speed pursue;
The jocund god of day,
Who fain our sport would view,

See, see, he flogs his fiery steeds in vain.

Pour down, like a flood from the hills, brave boys,
On the wings of the wind
The merry beagles fly;
Dull sorrow lags behind:
Ye shrill echoes, reply;

Catch each flying sound, and double our joys.

Ye rocks, woods, and caves, our music repeat:
The bright spheres thus above,
A gay refulgent train,
Harmoniously move
O'er yon celestial plain

Like us whirl along, in concert so sweet.

Now Puss threads the brakes, and heavily flies,
At the head of the pack
Old Fidler bears the bell,
Every foil he hunts back,
And aloud rings her knell,

Till, forc'd into view, she pants, and she dies.

In life's dull round thus we toil, and we sweat;
Diseases, grief, and pain,
An implacable crew,
While we double in vain,
Unrelenting pursue,

Till, quite hunted down, we yield with regret.

This moment is ours, come live while we may,
What's decreed by dark fate
Is not in our own power,
Since to-morrow's too late,
Take the present kind hour:

With wine cheer the night, as sports bless the day

A TRANSLATION OF HORACE, EP. X.

Horace recommends a Country Life, and dissuades his Friend from Ambition and Avarice.

HEALTH to my friend lost in the smoky town,
From him who breathes in country air alone,
In all things else thy soul and mine are one;
And like two aged long acquainted doves,
The same our mutual hate, the same our mutual
loves,

Close, and secure, you keep your lazy nest,
My wandering thoughts won't let my pinions rest:
O'er rocks, seas, woods, I take my wanton flight,
And each new object charms with new delight,
To say no more, my friend, I live, and reign,
Lord of myself: I've broke the servile chain,
Shook off with scorn the trifles you desire,
All the vain empty nothings fops admire.
Thus the lean slave of some fat pamper'd priest
With greedy eyes at first views each luxurious feast;

But, quickly cloy'd, now he no more can eat
Their godly viands, and their holy meat:
Wisely ambitious to be free and poor,
Longs for the homely scraps he loth'd before.
Seek'st thou a place where nature is observ'd,
And cooler reason may be mildly heard;
To rural shades let thy calm soul retreat,
These are th' Elysian fields, this is the happy seat,
Proof against winter's cold, and summer's heat,
Here no invidious care thy peace annoys,
Sleep undisturb'd, uninterrupted joys;
Your marble pavements with disgrace must yield
To each smooth plain, and gay enamel'd field:
Your muddy aqueducts can ne'er compare
With country streams, more pure than city air;
Our yew and bays enclos'd in pots ye prize,
And mimic little beauties we despise.
The rose and woodbine marble walls support,
Holly and ivy deck the gaudy court:
But yet in vain all shifts the artist tries,
The discontented twig but pines away and dies.
The house ye praise that a large prospect yields,
And view with longing eyes the pleasure of the fields;

'Tis thus ye own, thus tacitly confess,
Th' inimitable charms the peaceful country blest.
In vain from nature's rules we blindly stray,
And push th' uneasy monitrix away:
Still she returns, nor lets our conscience rest,
But night and day inculcates what is best,
Our truest friend, though an unwelcome guest
As soon th' unskilful fool that's blind enough,
To call rich Indian damask Norwich stuff,
Shall become rich by trade, as he be wise,
Whose partial soul and undiscerning eyes
Can't at first sight, and at each transient view,
Distinguish good from bad, or false from true.
He that too high exalts his giddy head
When fortune smiles, if the jilt frowns, is dead:
Th' aspiring fool, big with his haughty boast,
Is the most abject wretch when all his hopes are lost.
Sit loose to all the world, nor aught admire,
These worthless toys too fondly we desire;

Since when the darling's ravish'd from our heart,
The pleasure's over-balance'd by the smart.
Confine thy thoughts, and bound thy loose desires,
For thrifty nature no great cost requires:
A healthy body, and thy mistress kind,
A humble cot, and a more humble mind:
These once enjoy'd, the world is all thy own,
From thy poor cell despise the tottering throne,
And wakeful monarchs in a bed of down.
The stag well-arm'd, and with unequal force,
From fruitful meadows chas'd the conquer'd horse;
The haughty beast that stomach'd the disgrace,
In meaner pastures not content to graze,
Receives the bit, and man's assistance prays.
The conquest gain'd, and many trophies won,
His false confederate still rode boldly on;
In vain the beast curs'd his perfidious aid,
He plung'd, he rear'd, but nothing could persuade

The rider from his back, or bridle from his head.
Just so the wretch that greedily aspires,
Unable to content his wild desires;
Dreading the fatal thought of being poor,
Loses a prize worth all his golden ore,
The happy freedom he enjoy'd before.
About him still th' uneasy load he bears,
Spurr'd on with fruitless hopes, and curb'd with anxious fears.

The man whose fortune fit not to his mind,
The way to true content shall never find;
If the shoe pinch, or if it prove too wide,
In that he walks in pain, in this he treads aside.
But you, my friend, in calm contentment live,
Always well pleas'd with what the god, shall give;
Let not base shining pelf thy mind deprave,
Tyrant of fools, the wise man's drudge and slave;
And me reprove if I shall crave for more,
Or seem the least uneasy to be poor.
Thus much I write, merry, and free from care,
And nothing covet, but thy presence here.

THE MISER'S SPEECH.

FROM HORACE, EPOD. II.

HAPPY the man, who, free from care,
Manures his own paternal fields,
Content, as his wise fathers were,
T' enjoy the crop his labour yields.
Nor usury torments his breast,
That barter happiness for gain,
Nor war's alarms disturb his rest,
Nor hazards of the faithless main:
Nor at the loud tumultuous bar,
With costly noise, and dear debate,
Proclaims an everlasting war;
Nor fawns on villains basely great.
But for the vine selects a spouse,
Chaste emblem of the marriage-bed,
Or prunes the too luxuriant boughs,
And grafts more happy in their stead.
Or hears the lowing herds from far,
That fatten on the fruitful plains,
And ponders with delightful care,
The prospect of his future gains.

Or shears his sheep that round him graze,
And droop beneath their curling loads;
Or plunders his laborious bees
Of balmy nectar, drink of gods!

His cheerful head when Autumn rears,
And bending boughs reward his pains,
Joyous he plucks the luscious pears,
The purple grape his finger stains.

Each honest heart's a welcome guest,
With tempting fruit his tables glow,
The gods are bidden to the feast,
To share the blessings they bestow.

Under an oak's protecting shade,
In flowery meads profusely gay,
Supine he leans his peaceful head,
And gently loiters life away.

The vocal streams that murmuring flow,
Or from their springs complaining creep,
The birds that chirp on every bough,
Invite his yielding eyes to sleep.

But, when bleak storms and lowering Jove
Now sadden the declining year,
Through every thicket, every grove,
Swift he pursues the flying deer.

With deep-hung hounds he sweeps the plains;
The hills, the vallies, smoke around:
The woods repeat his pleasing pains,
And echo propagates the sound.

Or, push'd by his victorious spear,
The grisly boar before him flies,
Betray'd by his prevailing fear
Into the toils, the monster dies.

His towering falcon mounts the skies,
And cuts through clouds his liquid way;
Or else with fly deceit he tries
To make the lesser game his prey.

Who, thus possess'd of solid joy,
Would love, that idle imp, adore?
Cloe's coquet, Myrtilla's coy,
And Phyllis is a perjur'd whore.

Adieu, fantastic idle flame!
Give me a profitable wife,
A careful, but obliging dame,
To soften all the toils of life:

Who shall with tender care provide,
Against her weary spouse return,
With plenty see his board supply'd,
And make the crackling billets burn:

And while his men and maids repair
To fold his sheep, to milk his kine,
With unbought dainties feast her dear,
And treat him with domestic wine.

I view with pity and disdain
The costly trifles coxcombs boast,
Their Bourdeaux, Burgundy, Champaign,
Though sparkling with the brightest toast.

Pleas'd with sound manufacture more,
Than all the stum the knaves impose,
When the vain cully treats his whore,
At Brawn's, the Mitre, or the Rose.

Let fops their sickly palates please,
With luxury's expensive store,
And feast each virulent disease
With dainties from a foreign shore.

I, whom my little farm supplies,
Richly on nature's bounty live;
The only happy are the wise,
Content is all the gods can give.

While thus on wholesome cates I feast,
Oh, with what rapture I behold
My flocks in comely order haste
T' enrich with soil the barren fold!

The languid ox approaches slow,
To share the food his labours earn:
Painful he tugs th' inverted plough,
Nor hunger quickens his return.

My wanton swains, uncouthly gay,
About my smiling hearth delight,
To sweeten the laborious day,
By many a merry tale at night.

Thus spoke old Gripe, when bottles three
Of Burton ale, and sea-coal fire,
Unlock'd his breast; resolv'd to be
A generous, honest, country 'squire.

That very night his money lent,
On bond, or mortgage, he call'd in,
With lawful use of six per cent.
Next morn, he put it out at ten.

FABLE I.

The Captive Trumpeter.

"— Quo non præstantior alter
"Ære ciere viros, Martemque accendere cantu."
VIRG.

A PARTY of hussars of late
For prog and plunder scour'd the plains,
Some French Gens d'Armes surpris'd, and beat,
And brought their trumpeter in chains.

In doleful plight, th' unhappy bard
For quarter begg'd on bended knee,
Pity, Messieurs! In truth 'tis hard
To kill a harmless enemy.

These hands, of slaughter innocent,
Ne'er brandish'd the destructive sword,
To you or yours no hurt I meant,
O take a poor musician's word.

But the stern foe, with generous rage,
Scoundrel! reply'd, thou first shalt die,
Who, urging others to engage,
From fame and danger basely fly.

The brave by law of arms we spare,
Thou by the hangman shalt expire;
'Tis just, and not at all severe,
To stop the breath that blew the fire.

FABLE II.

The bald-pated Welshman, and the Fly.

"— Qui non moderabitur iræ, [mens,
"Infectum volet esse, dolor quod suaserit et
"Dum pœnas odio per vim festinat inulto."
HOR.

A 'SQUIRE of Wales, whose blood ran higher
Than that of any other 'squire,

Hasty and hot; whose peevish honour
 Reveng'd each flight was put upon her,
 Upon a mountain's top one day
 Expos'd to Sol's meridian ray;
 He fum'd, he rav'd, he curs'd, he swore,
 Exhal'd a sea at every pore:
 At last, such insults to evade,
 Sought the next tree's protecting shade;
 Where, as he lay dissolv'd in sweat,
 And wip'd off many a rivulet,
 Off in a pet the beaver flies,
 And flaxen wig, time's best disguise,
 By which, folks of maturer ages
 Vie with smooth beaux, and ladies pages:
 Though 'twas a secret rarely known,
 Ill-natur'd age had cropt his crown,
 Grubb'd all the covert up, and now
 A large smooth plain extends his brow.
 Thus as he lay with numskul bare,
 And courted the refreshing air,
 New persecutions still appear,
 A noisy fly offends his ear.
 Alas! what man of parts and sense
 Could bear such vile impertinence?
 Yet so discourteous is our fate,
 Fools always buz about the great.
 This insect now, whose active spight,
 Teaz'd him with never-ceasing bite,
 With so much judgment play'd his part,
 He had him both in tierce and quart:
 In vain with open hands he tries
 To guard his ears, his nose, his eyes;
 For now at last, familiar grown,
 He perch'd upon his worship's crown,
 With teeth and claws his skin he tore,
 And stuff'd himself with human gore.
 At last, in manners to excel,
 Untruss'd a point, some authors tell.
 But now what rhetoric could assuage
 The furious 'squire, stark mad with rage?
 Impatient at the foul disgrace,
 From insect of so mean a race;
 And plotting vengeance on his foe,
 With double fist he aims a blow:
 The nimble fly escap'd by flight,
 And skip'd from this unequal fight.
 Th' impending stroke with all its weight
 Fell on his own beloved pate.
 Thus much he gain'd by this adventurous deed,
 He foul'd his fingers, and he broke his head.

MORAL.

Let senates hence learn to preserve their state,
 And scorn the fool, below their grave debate,
 Who by th' unequal strife grows popular and
 great.

Let him buz on, with senseless rant defy
 The wise, the good; yet still 'tis but a fly.
 With puny foes the toil 's not worth the cost,
 Where nothing can be gain'd, much may be lost:
 Let cranes and pigmies in mock-war engage,
 A prey beneath the generous eagle's rage.
 True honour o'er the clouds sublimely wings;
 Young Ammon scorns to run with less than kings.

FABLE III.

The Ant and the Fly.

"Quem res plus nimio delectavere secundæ,
 "Mutatæ quatiens." HOR.

THE careful ant that meanly fares,
 And labours hardly to supply,
 With wholesome cates and homely tares;
 His numerous working family;
 Upon a visit met one day
 His cousin fly, in all his pride,
 A courtier insolent and gay,
 By Goody Maggot near ally'd:
 The humble insect humbly bow'd,
 And all his lowest congees paid,
 Of an alliance wondrous proud
 To such a huffing tearing blade.
 The haughty fly look'd big, and swore
 He knew him not, nor whence he came
 Huff'd much, and with impatience bore
 The scandal of so mean a claim.
 Friend Clodpate, know, 'tis not the mode
 At court, to own such clowns as thee,
 Nor is it civil to intrude
 On flies of rank and quality.
 I—who, in joy and indolence,
 Converse with monarchs and grandees,
 Regaling every nicer sense
 With olios, soups, and fricassees;
 Who kiss each beauty's balmy lip,
 Or gently buz into her ear,
 About her snowy bosom skip,
 And sometimes creep the Lord knows where!
 The ant, who could no longer bear
 His cousin's insolence and pride,
 Toss'd up his head, and with an air
 Of conscious worth, he thus reply'd:
 Vain insect! know, the time will come,
 When the court-sun no more shall shine,
 When frosts thy gaudy limbs benumb,
 And damps about thy wings shall twine;
 When some dark nasty hole shall hide
 And cover thy neglected head,
 When all this lofty swelling pride
 Shall burst, and shrink into a shade:
 Take heed, lest fortune change the scene:
 Some of thy brethren I remember,
 In June have mighty princes been,
 But begg'd their bread before December.

MORAL.

This precious offspring of a t—d
 Is first a pimp, and then a lord;
 Ambitious to be great, not good,
 Forgets his own dear flesh and blood.
 Blind goddess! who delight'st in joke,
 O fix him on thy lowest spoke;
 And since the scoundrel is so vain,
 Reduce him to his filth again.

FABLE IV.

The Wolf, the Fox, and the Ape.

"Clodius accusat Mæchos, Catilina Cethegum."
Juv.

THE wolf impeach'd the fox of theft,
The fox the charge deny'd;
To the grave ape the case was left,
In justice to decide.

Wise Pug with comely buttocks sate,
And nodded o'er the laws,
Distinguish'd well through the debate,
And thus adjudg'd the cause:

The goods are stole, but not from thee,
Two pickled rogues well met,
Thou shalt be hang'd for perjury,
He for an arrant cheat.

MORAL.

Hang both, judicious brute, 'twas bravely said,
May villains always to their ruin plead!
When knaves fall out, and spitefully accuse,
There's nothing like the reconciling noose.
O hemp! the noblest gift propitious heaven
To mortals with a bounteous hand has given,
To stop malicious breath, to end debate,
To prop the shaking throne, and purge the state.

FABLE V.

The Dog and the Bear.

"—Delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi,
"Seditione, dolis, scelere, atque libidine et irâ
"Iliacos intra muros, peccatur, et extra."

Hor.

TOWSER, of right Hockleian fire,
A dog of mettle and of fire,
With Urfin grim, an errant bear,
Maintain'd a long and dubious war:
Oft Urfin on his back was toft,
And Towser many a collop lost;
Capricious fortune would declare,
Now for the dog, then for the bear.
Thus having try'd their courage fairly,
Brave Urfin first desir'd a parly;
Stout combatant (quoth he) whose might
I've felt in many a bloody fight,
Tell me the cause of all this pother,
And why we worry one another?
That's a moot point, the cur reply'd,
Our masters only can decide.
While thee and I our hearts blood spill,
They prudently their pockets fill;
Halloo us on with all their might,
To turn a penny by the fight.
If that's the case, return'd the bear,
'Tis time at last to end the war;
Thou keep thy teeth, and I my claws,
To combat in a nobler cause;
Sleep in a whole skin, I advise,
And let them bleed, who gain the prize.

MORAL.

Parties enrag'd on one another fall,
The butcher and the bear-ward pocket all.

FABLE VI.

The Wounded Man, and the Swarm of Flies.

"E malis minimum."—

SQUALID with wounds, and many a gaping sore,
A wretched Lazar lay distress'd;
A swarm of flies his bleeding ulcers tore,
And on his putrid carcase feast.

A courteous traveller, who pass'd that way,
And saw the vile Harpeian brood,
Offer'd his help the monstrous crew to slay,
That rioted on human blood.

Ah! gentle sir, th' unhappy wretch reply'd,
Your well-meant charity refrain;
The angry gods have that redress deny'd,
Your goodness would increase my pain.

Fat, and full-fed, and with abundance cloy'd,
But now and then these tyrants feed;
But were, alas! this pamper'd brood destroy'd,
The lean and hungry would succeed.

MORAL.

The body politic must soon decay,
When swarms of insects on its vitals prey;
When blood-suckers of state, a greedy brood,
Feast on our wounds, and fatten with our blood.
What must we do in this severe distress?
Come, doctor, give the patient some redress:
The quacks in politics a change advise,
But cooler counsels should direct the wise.
'Tis hard, indeed; but better this, than worse;
Mistaken blessings prove the greatest curse.
Alas! what would our bleeding country gain,
If, when this viperous brood at last is slain,
The teeming Hydra pullulates again;
Seizes the prey with more voracious bite,
To satisfy his hungry appetite?

FABLE VII.

The Wolf and the Dog.

"Hunc ego per Syrtes, Libyæque extrema tri-
"umphum
"Ducere maluerim, quam ter capitolia curru
"Scandere Pompeii, quam frangere colla Jugur-
"thæ." Luc.

A PROWLING wolf that scour'd the plains,
To ease his hunger's griping pains;
Ragged as courtier in disgrace,
Hide-bound, and lean, and out of case;
By chance a well-fed dog espy'd,
And being kin, and nearly'd,
He civilly salutes the cur,
How do you, cuz? Your servant, sir!
O happy friend! how gay thy mien!
How plump thy sides how sleek thy skin!
Triumphant plenty shines all o'er,
And the fat melts at every pore!

While I, alas ! decay'd and old,
With hunger pin'd, and stiff with cold,
With many a howl, and hideous groan,
Tell the relentless woods my moan.
Pr'ythee, my happy friend, impart
Thy wond'rous, cunning, thriving art.
Why, faith, I'll tell thee as a friend,
But first thy surly manners mend;
Be complaisant, obliging, kind,
And leave the wolf for once behind.
The wolf, whose mouth began to water,
With joy and rapture gallop'd after,
When thus the dog : At bed and board,
I share the plenty of my lord ;
From every guest I claim a fee,
Who court my lord by bribing me :
In mirth I revel all the day,
And many a game at romps I play :
I fetch and carry, leap o'er sticks,
And twenty such diverting tricks.
'Tis pretty, faith, the wolf reply'd,
And on his neck the collar spy'd :
He starts, and without more ado
He bids the abject wretch adieu :
Enjoy your dainties, friend ; to me
The noblest feast is liberty.
The famish'd wolf upon these desert plains,
Is happier than a fawning cur in chains.

MORAL.

Thus bravely spoke the nurse of ancient Rome,
Thus the starv'd Swifs, and hungry Grifons roam,
On barren hills, clad with eternal snow,
And look with scorn on the prim slaves below.
Thus Cato 'scap'd by death the tyrant's chains,
And walks unhackled in th' Elysian plains.
Thus, Britons, thus your great forefathers stood
For liberty, and fought in seas of blood.
To barren rocks, and gloomy woods confin'd,
Their virtues by necessity refin'd,
Nor cold, nor want, nor death, could shake their steady mind.
No faucy Druid then durst cry aloud,
And with his slavish cant debauch the crowd :
No passive legions in a scoundrel's cause
Pillage a city, and affront the laws.
The state was quiet, happy, and serene,
For Boadicea was the Briton's queen ;
Her subjects their just liberties maintain'd,
And in her people's hearts the happy monarch
reign'd.

FABLE VIII.

The Oyster.

“ — In jus
“ Acres procurrunt, magnum spectaculum uter-
“ que.” Hor.

Two comrades, as grave authors say,
(But in what chapter, page, or line,
Ye critics, if ye please, define)
Had found an oyster in their way.
Contest and foul debate arose,
Both view'd at once with greedy eyes,
Both challeng'd the delicious prize,
And high words soon improv'd to blows.

Actions on actions hence succeed,
Each hero's obstinately stout,
Green bags and parchments fly about,
Pleadings are drawn, and counsel fee'd.

The parson of the place, good man !
Whose kind and charitable heart
In human ills still bore a part,
Thrice shook his head, and thus began :

Neighbours and friends, refer to me
This doughty matter in dispute,
I'll soon decide th' important suit,
And finish all without a fee.

Give me the oyster then—'tis well—
He opens it, and at one sup
Gulps the contested trifle up,
And, smiling, gives to each a shell.

Henceforth let foolish discord cease,
Your oyster's good as e'er was eat ;
I thank you for my dainty treat,
God bless you both, and live in peace.

MORAL.

Ye men of Norfolk and of Wales,
From this learn common sense ;
Nor thrust your neighbours into goals
For every slight offence.

Banish those vermin of debate,
That on your substance feed ;
The knaves, who now are serv'd in plate,
Would starve, if fools agreed.

FABLE IX.

The Sheep and the Bush.

“ Lætus forte tuâ vives sapienter.” Hor.

A SHEEP, well-meaning brute ! one morn
Retir'd beneath a spreading thorn,
A pealing storm to shun ;
Escap'd indeed both rain and wind,
But left, alas ! his fleece behind :
Was it not wisely done ?

MORAL.

Beneath the blast while pliant osiers bend,
The stubborn oak each furious wind shall rend ;
Discreetly yield, and patiently endure,
Such common evils as admit no cure.
These fate ordains, and Heaven's high will hath sent :
In humble littleness submit content.
But those thy folly brings, in time prevent.

FABLE X.

The Frog's Choice.

“ Ω πόποι, οἷον ὅη νῦν θείας βροτοὶ ἀπὸ πόντου·
Εξ ἡμεῶν γὰρ φασὶ κακ' ἔμμεναι· οἱ δὲ καὶ αὐτοὶ
Σφῆσι κατασθαλίῃσιν ὑπὲρ μοῖρον ἀλγὶ ἔχουσιν.”

In a wild state of nature, long
The frogs at random liv'd,
The weak a prey unto the strong,
With anarchy oppress'd and griev'd.

At length the lawless rout,
 Taught by their sufferings, grew devout :
 An embassy to Jove they sent,
 And begg'd his highness would bestow
 Some settled form of government,
 A king to rule the fens below.
 Jove, smiling, grants their odd request,
 A king th' indulgent power bestow'd,
 (Such as might suit their genius best)
 A beam of a prodigious size,
 With all its cumbersome load,
 Came tumbling from the skies.
 The waters dash against the shore,
 The hollow caverns roar ;
 The rocks return the dreadful sound,
 Convulsions shake the ground.
 The multitude with horror fled,
 And in his oozy bed
 Each skulking coward hid his head.

When all is now grown calm again,
 And smoothly glides the liquid plain,
 A frog more resolute and bold,
 Peeping with caution from his hold ;
 Recover'd from his first surprise,
 As o'er the wave his head he popt,
 He saw—but scarce believ'd his eyes,
 On the same bank where first he dropt,
 Th' imperial lubber lies,
 Stretch'd at his ease, careless, content :
 Is this the monarch Jove has sent,
 (Said he) our warlike troops to lead ?
 Ay ! 'tis a glorious prince indeed !
 By such an active general led,
 'The routed mice our arms shall dread,
 Subdued shall quit their claim :
 Old Homer shall recant his lays,
 For us new trophies raise,
 Sing our victorious arms, and justify our fame.
 Then laughing impudently loud,
 He soon alarm'd the dastard crowd.
 'The croaking nations with contempt
 Behold the worthless indolent,
 On wings of winds, swift scandal flies,
 Libels, lampoons, and lies,
 Hoarse treasons, tuneless blasphemies.
 With active leap at last upon his back they stride,
 And on the royal loggerhead in triumph ride.

Once more to Jove their prayers address,
 And once more Jove grants their request :
 A stork he sends of monstrous size,
 Red lightning flashing in his eyes ;
 Rul'd by no block, as heretofore,
 The gazing crowds press'd to his court ;
 Admire his stately mien, his haughty port,
 And only not adore.
 Addresses of congratulation,
 Sent from each loyal corporation,
 Full-freight with truth and sense,
 Exhausted all their eloquence.
 But now, alas ! 'twas night ; kings must have meat ;
 The Grand Vizier first goes to pot,
 Three Bassas next, happy their lot !
 Gain'd Paradise by being eat.
 And this, said he, and this is mine,
 And this, by right divine :

In short, 'twas all for public weal,
 He swallow'd half a nation at a meal.
 Again they beg Almighty Jove,
 This cruel tyrant to remove.
 With fierce resentment in his eyes,
 The frowning thunderer replies ;
 Those evils which yourselves create,
 Rash fools ! ye now repent too late ;
 Made wretched by the public voice,
 Not through necessity, but choice ! [curse,
 Be gone !—Nor wrest from heaven some heavier
 Better bear this, this stork, than worse.

MORAL.

Oppress'd with happiness, and sick with ease,
 Not heaven itself our fickle minds can please.
 Fondly we wish, cloy'd with celestial store,
 The leeks and onions which we loath'd before :
 Still roving, still desiring, never pleas'd,
 With plenty starv'd, and ev'n with health diseas'd.
 With partial eyes each present good we view,
 Nor covet what is best, but what is new.
 Ye powers above, who make mankind your care,
 To bless the suppliant, reject his prayer !

FABLE XI.

Liberty and Love ; or, the two Sparrows.

“ — Dos est uxor, lites.” OVID.

A SPARROW and his mate,
 (Believe me, gentle Kate)
 Once lov'd like I and you ;
 With mutual ardour join'd,
 No turtles e'er so kind,
 So constant, and so true.
 They hopp'd from spray to spray,
 They bill'd, they chirp'd all day,
 They cuddled close all night ;
 To bliss they wak'd each morn,
 In every bush and thorn,
 Gay scenes of new delight.
 At length the fowler came,
 (The knave was much to blame)
 And this dear pair trapp'd ;
 Both in one cage confin'd,
 Why, faith and troth, 'twas kind ;
 Nay, hold—that must be scann'd.
 Fair liberty thus gone,
 And one coop'd up with one,
 'Twas awkward, new, and strange ;
 For better and for worse,
 O dismal, fatal curse !
 No more abroad to range.
 No carols now they sing,
 Each droops his little wing,
 And mourns his cruel fate ;
 Clouds on each brow appear,
 My honey, and my dear,
 Is now quite out of date.
 They pine, lament, and moan,
 'Twould melt an heart of stone,
 To hear their sad complaint :
 Nor he supply'd her wants,
 Nor she refrain'd from taunts,
 That might provoke a fain.

Hard words improve to blows;
For now, grown mortal foes,
They peck, they scratch, they scream;
The cage lies on the floor,
The wires are stain'd with gore,
It swells into a stream.

Dear Kitty, would you know
The cause of all this woe,
It is not hard to guess;
Whatever does constrain,
Turns pleasure into pain,
'Tis choice alone can bless.

When both no more are free,
Infernal I must be,
And you lose all your charms;
My smother'd passion dies,
And even your bright eyes,
Necessity disarms.

Then let us love, my fair,
But unconstrain'd as air,
Each join a willing heart;
Let free-born souls disdain
To wear a tyrant's chain,
And act a nobler part.

FABLE XII.

The two Springs.

" — Errat longè meâ quidem sententiâ
" Qui imperium credat gravius esse aut stabilius
" Vi quod sit, quàm illud quod amicitia adjungi-
" tur." TER.

Two sister springs, from the same parent hill,
Born on the same propitious day,
Through the cleft rock distil:
Adown the reverend mountain's side,
Through groves of myrtle glide,
Or through the violet beds obliquely stray.
The laurel, each proud victor's crown,
From them receives her high renown,
From them the curling vine
Her clusters big with racy wine,
To them her oil the peaceful olive owes,
And her vermilion blush the rose.
The gracious streams in smooth meanders flow,
To every thirsty root dispense
Their kindly cooling influence,
And paradise adorns the mountain's brow.
But oh! the sad effect of pride!
These happy twins at last divide.
" Sister (exclaims th' ambitious spring)
" What profit do these labours bring?
" Always to give, and never to enjoy,
" A fruitless and a mean employ!
" Stay here inglorious if you please,
" And loiter out a life of indolence and ease:
" Go, humble drudge, each thistle rear,
" And nurse each shrub, your daily care,
" While, pouring down from this my lofty source,
" I deluge all the plain,
" No dams shall stop my course,
" And rocks oppose in vain.

" See where my foaming billows flow,
" Above the hills my waves aspire,
" The shepherds and their flocks retire,
" And tallest cedars as they pass in sign of homage
" bow.
" To me each tributary spring
" Its supplemental stores shall bring,
" With me the rivers shall unite,
" The lakes beneath my banners fight,
" Till the proud Danube and the Rhine
" Shall own their fame eclips'd by mine;
" Both gods and men shall dread my watery sway,
" Nor these in cities safe, nor in their temples
" they."

Away the haughty boaster flew
Scarce bade her sister stream a cool adieu,
Her waves grow turbulent and bold,
Not gently murmuring as of old,
But roughly dash against the shore,
And toss their spumy heads, and proudly roar.
The careful farmer with surprise,
Sees the tumultuous torrent rise;
With busy looks the rustic band appear, [year.
To guard their growing hopes, the promise of the
All hands unite, with dams they bound
The rash rebellious stream around;
In vain she foams, in vain she raves,
In vain she curls her feeble waves,
Besieg'd at last on every side,
Her source exhausted and her channel dry'd, }
(Such is the fate of impotence and pride!)
A shallow pond she stands confin'd,
The refuge of the croaking kind.
Rushes and sags, an inbred foe,
Choke up the muddy pool below;
The tyrant sun on high
Exacts his usual subsidy;
And the poor pittance that remains,
Each gaping cranny drains.
Too late the fool repents her haughty boast,
A nameless nothing, in oblivion lost.
Her sister spring, benevolent and kind,
With joy sees all around her blest,
The good she does, into her generous mind
Returns again with interest.
The farmer oft invokes her aid
When Sirius nips the tender blade;
Her streams a sure elixir bring,
Gay plenty decks the fields, and a perpetual spring,
Where'er the gardener smooths her easy way,
Her ductile streams obey.
Courteous she visits every bed,
Narcissus rears his drooping head, }
By her diffusive bounty fed.
Reviv'd from her indulgent urn,
Sad Hyacinth forgets to mourn,
Rich in the blessings she bestows
All nature smiles where'er she flows.
Enamour'd with a nymph so fair,
See where the river gods appear,
A nymph so eminently good,
The joy of all the neighbourhood;
They clasp her in their liquid arms,
And riot in th' abundance of her charms,

Like old Alpheus fond, their wanton streams they
join'd,

Like Arethusa she, as lovely, and as kind,
Now swell'd into a mighty flood,
Her channel deep and wide,
Still she persists in doing good,
Her bounty flows with every tide.
A thousand rivulets in her train
With fertile waves enrich the plain :
The scaly herd, a numerous throng,
Beneath her silver billows glide along,
Whose still increasing shoals supply
The poor man's wants, the great one's luxury :
Here all the feather'd troops retreat,
Securely ply their oary feet,
Upon her floating herbage gaze,
And with their tuneful notes resound her praise.
Here flocks and herds in safety feed,
And fatten in each flowery mead :
No beasts of prey appear

The watchful shepherd to beguile,
No monsters of the deep inhabit here,
Nor the voracious shark, nor wily crocodile ;
But Delia and her nymphs, chaste sylvan queen,
By mortals prying eyes unseen,
Bathe in her flood, and sport upon her borders
green.

Here merchants, careful of their store,
By angry billows tost,
Anchor secure beneath her shore,
And bless the friendly coast.
Soon mighty fleets in all their pride
Triumphant on her surface ride :
The busy trader on her banks appears,
An hundred different tongues she hears.
At last, with wonder and surprise,
She sees a stately city rise ;
With joy the happy flood admires
The lofty domes, the pointed spires ;
The porticos, magnificently great,
Where all the crowding nations meet ;
The bridges that adorn her brow,
From bank to bank their ample arches stride,
Through which her curling waves in triumph
glide,

And in melodious murmurs flow.
Now grown a port of high renown,
The treasure of the world her own,
Both Indies with their precious stores,
Pay yearly tribute to her shores.
Honour'd by all, a rich, well-peopled stream,
Nor father Thames himself of more esteem.

MORAL.

The power of kings (if rightly understood)
Is but a grant from heaven of doing good ;
Proud tyrants, who maliciously destroy,
And ride o'er ruins with malignant joy ;
Humbled in dust, soon to their cost shall know
Heaven our avenger, and mankind their foe ;
While gracious monarchs reap the good they sow :
Blessing, are blest'd ; far spread their just renown,
Consenting nations their dominion own,
And joyful happy crowds support their throne.
In vain the powers of earth and hell combine,
Each guardian angel shall protect that line,
Who by their virtues prove their right divine.

FABLE XIII.

The Bald Bachelor.

Being a paraphrase upon the Second Fable in the Second Book of Phædrus.

" Frigidus in venerem senior, frustra que laborem
" Ingratum trahit : et si quando at prælia ventum
" est,
" Ut quondam in stipulis magnus sine viribus ignis,
" Incassum furit. Ergo animos ævumque notabis
" Præcipue."— VIRG. Georg. lib. iii.

A BACHELOR, who, past his prime,
Had been a good one in his time,
Had scour'd the streets, had whor'd, got drunk,
Had fought his man, and kept his punk :
Was sometimes rich, but oftener poor,
With early duns about his door ;
Being a little off his mettle,
Thought it convenient now to settle :
Grew wondrous wise at forty-five,
Resolving to be grave, and thrive.
By chance he cast his roguish eye
Upon a dame who liv'd hard by ;
A widow debonair and gay,
October in the dress of May ;
Artful to lay both red and white,
Skill'd in repairs, and, ev'n in spite
Of time and wrinkles, kept all tight.
But he, whose heart was apt to rove,
An arrant wanderer in love ;
Besides this widow, had Miss Kitty,
Juicy and young, exceeding witty :
On her he thought, serious or gay,
His dream by night, his toast by day ;
He thought, but not on her alone,
For who would be confin'd to one ?
Between them both strange work he made ;
Gave this a ball, or masquerade ;
With that, at serious ombre play'd :
The self-same compliments he spoke,
The self-same oaths he swore, he broke ;
Alternately on each bestows
Frail promises and short-liv'd vows.
Variety ! kind source of joy !
Without whose aid all pleasures cloy ;
Without thee, who would ever prove
The painful drudgeries of love ?
Without thee, what indulgent wight
Would read what we in garrets write !
But, not to make my tale perplex'd,
And keep more closely to my text ;
'Tis fit the courteous reader know
This middle-aged man had been a beau.
But, above all, his head of hair
Had been his great peculiar care ;
To which his serious hours he lent,
Nor deem'd the precious time mispent.
'Twas long, and curling, and jet black,
Hung to the middle of his back ;
Black, did I say ? Ay, once 'twas so,
But cruel time had smok'd the beau,
And powder'd o'er his head with snow.

As an old horse that had been hard rid,
 Or from his master's coach discarded,
 Forc'd in a tumbrel to go filler,
 Or load for some poor rogue a miller;
 On his grave noddle, o'er his eyes,
 Black hairs and white promiscuous rise;
 Which chequer o'er his reverend pate,
 And prove the keffel more sedate:
 So with this worthy 'squire it far'd,
 Yet he nor time nor labour spar'd,
 But, with excessive cost and pains,
 Still made the best of his remains.
 Each night beneath his cap he furl'd it,
 Each morn in modish ringlets curl'd it;
 Now made his comely tresses shine,
 With orange-butter, jessamine;
 Then with sweet powder and perfumes
 He purify'd his upper rooms.
 So when a jockey brings a mare,
 Or horse, or gelding, to a fair,
 Though he be spavin'd, old, and blind,
 With founder'd feet, and broken wind;
 Yet, if he's master of his trade,
 He'll curry well, and trim the jade,
 To make the cheat go glibly down,
 And bubble some unwary clown.
 What woman made of flesh and blood,
 So sweet a gallant e'er withstood?
 They melt, they yield, both, both are smitten,
 The good old puss, and the young kitten;
 And, being now familiar grown,
 Each look'd upon him as her own;
 No longer talk'd of dear, or honey,
 But of plain downright matrimony.
 At that dread word his worship started,
 And was (we may suppose) faint-hearted;
 Yet, being resolv'd to change his state,
 Winks both his eyes, and trusts to fate.
 But now new doubts and scruples rise,
 To plague him with perplexities;
 He knew not which, alas! to choose,
 This he must take, and that refuse.
 As when some idle country lad
 Swings on a gate, his wooden pad;
 To right, to left, he spurs away,
 But neither here nor there can stay;
 Till, by the catch surpris'd, the lout
 His journey ends, where he set out:
 Ev'n so this dubious lover stray'd,
 Between the widow and the maid;
 And, after swinging to and fro,
 Was just in equilibrio.
 Yet still a lover's warmth he shows,
 And makes his visits and his bows;
 Domestic grown, both here and there,
 Nor Pug, nor Shock, were half so dear:
 With bread and butter, and with tea,
 And madam's toilet, who but he?
 There fix'd a patch, or broke a comb;
 At night, the widow's drawing-room.
 O sweet vicissitude of love!
 Who would covet heaven above,
 Were men but thus allow'd to rove?
 But, alas! some curs'd event,
 Some unexpected accident,

Humbles our pride, and shows the odds
 Between frail mortals and the gods:
 This by the sequel will appear
 A truth most evident and clear.
 As on the widow's panting breast
 He laid his peaceful head to rest,
 Dreaming of pleasures yet in store,
 And joys he ne'er had felt before;
 His grizly locks appear display'd,
 In all their pomp of light and shade,
 Alas! my future spouse, said she,
 What do mine eyes astonish'd see?
 Marriage demands equality.
 What will malicious neighbours say,
 Should I, a widow young and gay,
 Marry a man both old and gray?
 Those hideous hairs!—with that a tear
 Did in each crystal sluice appear;
 She fetch'd a deep sigh from her heart,
 As who should say, Best friends must part!
 Then mus'd a while; there is but one,
 But this expedient left alone,
 To save that dear head from disgrace;
 Here, Jenny, fetch my tweaser-case.
 To work then went the treacherous fair,
 And grubb'd up here and there a hair:
 But, as she meant not to renew
 His charms, but set her own to view;
 And by this foil more bright appear,
 In youthful bloom when he was near,
 The cunning gipsy nipt away
 The black, but slyly left the gray.
 O Delilah! perfidious fair!
 O sex ingenious to ensnare!
 How faithless all your doings are!
 Whom nature form'd your lord, your guide,
 You his precarious power deride,
 Tool of your vanity and pride.
 The 'squire, who, thus deceiv'd, ne'er dreamt
 What the deceitful traitress meant;
 Thrice kiss'd her hand, and then retir'd,
 With more exalted thoughts inspir'd:
 To his fair Filly next repairs,
 With statelier port, and youthful airs.
 Lord! sir—(said she) you're mighty gay,
 But I must tell you by the way,
 That no brood goose was e'er so gray.
 Here, let this hand eradicate
 Those foul dishonours of your pate,
 For she, poor thing! whose virgin heart,
 Unskill'd in every female art,
 In pure simplicity believ'd
 His youth might this way be retriev'd;
 At least his age disguis'd, and she,
 From spiteful prudes, and censure free;
 With earnest diligence and care,
 Grubb'd by the roots each grizzled hair;
 Some few black hairs she left behind,
 But not one of the silver kind.
 But when she saw what work she'd made,
 His bald broad front, without a shade,
 And all his hatchet face display'd,
 With scarce six hairs upon a side,
 His large out-spreading lugs to hide:

She laugh'd, she scream'd; and Nan and Bess,
 In concert laugh'd, and scream'd no less.
 Home sculk'd the 'squire, and hid his face,
 Sore smitten with the foul disgrace:
 Softly he knock'd, but trusty John,
 Who knew his hour was twelve, or one,
 Rubb'd both his eyes, and yawn'd, and swore,
 And quickly blunder'd to the door.
 But starting back at this disaster,
 Vow'd that old Nick had hagg'd his master:
 The landlady, in sore affright,
 Fell into fits, and swoon'd out-right;
 The neighbourhood was rais'd, and call'd,
 The maids miscarry'd, children bawl'd,
 The cur, whom oft his bounty fed,
 With many a scrap and bit of bread;
 Now own'd him not, but in the throng
 Growl'd at him as he sneak'd along.
 To bed he went, 'tis true, but not
 Or clos'd his eyes, or slept one jot;
 Not Nisus was in such despair,
 Spoil'd of his kingdom and his hair:
 Not ev'n Belinda made such moan,
 When her dear favourite lock was gone.
 He fum'd, he ray'd, he curs'd amain,
 And all his past life ran o'er again;
 Damn'd every female bite to Tyburn,
 From mother Eve, to mother Wyburn,
 Each youthful vanity abjur'd,
 Whores, box and dice, and claps ill-cur'd;
 And, having lost by female art
 This darling idol of his heart,
 Those precious locks, that might out-vie
 The trim-curl'd God who lights the sky;
 Resolv'd to grow devout and wise,
 Or what's almost the same—precise;
 Canted, and whin'd, and talk'd most odly,
 Was very slovenly and godly
 (For nothing makes devotion keen,
 Like disappointment and chagrin):
 In fine, he set his house in order,
 And piously put on a border.

MORAL.

To you, gay sparks, who waste your youthful
 Old Æsop sends this monitory rhyme; [prime,
 Leave, leave, for shame your trulls at Sh—er hall,
 And marry in good time, or not at all.
 Of all the monsters Smithfield e'er could show,
 There's none so hideous as a batter'd beau.
 Trust not the noon of life, but take the morn;
 Will Honeycomb is every female's scorn.
 Let him be rich, high-born, book-learn'd, and wife,
 Believe me, friends, in every woman's eyes,
 'Tis back, and brawn, and sinew, wins the prize.

FABLE XIV.

The Fortune Hunter.

"Fortuna sævo læta negotio, et

"Iudum insolentem ludere pertinax

"Transmutat incertos honores." HER.

CANTO I.

SOME authors, more abstruse than wife,
 Friendship confine to stricter ties,

Require exact conformity,
 In person, age, and quality;
 Their humours, principles, and wit,
 Must, like exchequer tallies, hit.
 Others, less scrupulous, opine
 That hands and hearts in love may join,
 Though different inclinations sway,
 For Nature's more in fault than they.
 Whoe'er would sift this point more fully,
 May read St. Evremond and Tully;
 With me the doctrine shall prevail
 That's à propos to form my tale.

Two brethren (whether twins or no
 Imports not very much to know)
 Together bred; as fam'd their love
 As Leda's brats begot by Jove:
 As various too their tempers were;
 That brisk, and frolic, debonair;
 This more considerate and severe.
 While Bob, with diligence would pore
 And con by heart his battle door,
 Frank play'd at romps with John the groom,
 Or switch'd his hobby round the room.
 The striplings now too bulky grown,
 To make dirt-pies, and lounge at home,
 With aching hearts to school are sent,
 Their humours still of various bent:
 The silent, serious, solid boy,
 Came on apace, was daddy's joy,
 Construed, and pars'd, and said his part,
 And got Quæ-genus all by heart.
 While Franky, that unlucky rogue,
 Fell in with every whim in vogue,
 Valued not Lilly of a straw,
 A rook at chuck, a dab at taw.
 His bum was often brush'd, you'll say,
 'Tis true, now twice, then thrice a day:
 So leeches at the breech are fed,
 To cure vertigos in the head.
 But, by your leave, good doctor Freind,
 Let me this maxim recommend;
 "A genius can't be forc'd;" nor can
 You make an ape an alderman:
 The patch-work doublet well may suit,
 But how would furs become the brute?
 In short, the case is very plain,
 When maggots once are in the brain,
 Whole loads of birch are spent in vain.
 Now to pursue this hopeful pair
 To Oxford, and the Lord knows where,
 Would take more ink than I can spare.
 Nor shall I here minutely score
 The volumes Bob turn'd o'er and o'er,
 The laundresses turn'd up by Frank,
 With many a strange diverting prank;
 'Twould jade my muse, though better fed,
 And kept in body clothes and bread,
 When bristles on each chin began
 To sprout, the promise of a man,
 The good old gentleman expir'd,
 And decently to heaven retir'd:
 The brethren, at their country seat,
 Enjoy'd a pleasant, snug retreat;
 Their cellars and their barns well stor'd,
 And plenty smoking on their board:

Ale and tobacco for the vicar,
 For gentry sometimes better liquor.
 Judicious Bob had read all o'er
 Each weighty stay'd philosopher,
 And therefore rightly understood
 The real from th' apparent good;
 Substantial blifs, intrinsic joys,
 From bustle, vanity, and noise;
 Could his own happiness create,
 And bring his mind to his estate:
 Liv'd in the same calm, easy round,
 His judgment clear, his body sound;
 Good humour, probity, and sense,
 Repaid with peace and indolence:
 While rakish Frank, whose active soul
 No bounds, no principle control,
 Flies o'er the world where pleasure calls,
 To races, masquerades, and balls;
 At random roves, now here, now there,
 Drinks with the gay, and toasts the fair.
 As when the full-fed resty steed
 Breaks from his groom, he flies with speed;
 His high-arch'd neck he proudly rears,
 Upon his back his tail he bears,
 His main upon his shoulders curls,
 O'er every precipice he whirls,
 He plunges in the cooling tides,
 He laves his shining pamper'd sides,
 He snuffs the females on the plain,
 And to his joy he springs amain,
 To this, to that, impetuous flies,
 Nor can the stud his lust suffice;
 Till nature flags, his vigour spent,
 With drooping tail, and nerves unbent,
 The humble beast returns content,
 Waits tamely at the stable door,
 As tractable as e'er before.
 This was exactly Franky's case;
 When blood ran high he liv'd apace;
 But pockets drain'd, and every vein,
 Look'd silly, and came home again.
 At length extravagance and vice,
 Whoring and drinking, box and dice,
 Sunk his exchequer; cares intrude,
 And duns grow troublesome and rude.
 What measures shall poor Franky take
 To manage wisely the last stake,
 With some few pieces in his purse,
 And half a dozen brats at nurse?
 Pensive he walk'd, lay long a-bed,
 Now bit his nails, then scratch'd his head,
 At last resolv'd: Resolv'd! on what?
 There's not a penny to be got;
 The question now remains alone,
 Whether 'tis best to hang or drown.
 Thank you for that, good friendly devil!
 You're very courteous, very civil;
 Other expedients may be try'd,
 The man is young, the world is wide,
 And, as judicious authors say,
 "Every dog shall have his day;"
 What if we ramble for a while?
 Seek Fortune out, and court her smile,
 Act every part in life to win her,
 First try the saint, and then the sinner;

Prefs boldly on; flighted, pursue;
 Repuls'd, again the charge renew;
 Give her no rest, attend, entreat,
 And stick at nothing to be great.
 Fir'd with these thoughts, the youth grew vain,
 Look'd on the country with disdain;
 Where Virtue's fools her laws obey,
 And dream a lazy life away;
 Thinks poverty the greatest sin,
 And walks on thorns till he begin:
 But first before his brother laid
 The hopeful scheme, and begg'd his aid,
 Kind Bob was much abash'd, to see
 His brother in extremity,
 Reduc'd to rags for want of thought,
 A beggar, and not worth a groat.
 He griev'd full sore, gave good advice,
 Quoted his authors grave and wise,
 All who with wholesome morals treat us,
 Old Seneca and Epictetus.
 What's my unhappy brother doing?
 Whither rambling? whom pursuing
 An idle, tricking, giddy jade,
 A phantom, and a fleeting shade;
 Grasp'd in this coxcomb's arms a while,
 The false jilt fawns, then a fond smile;
 On that she leers, he like the rest
 Is soon a bubble and a jest;
 But live with me, just to thyself,
 And scorn the bitch, and all her pelf;
 Fortune's ador'd by fools alone,
 The wise man always makes his own.
 But 'tis, alas! in vain t' apply
 Fine sayings and philosophy,
 Where a poor youth's o'erheated brain,
 Is sold to interest and gain,
 And pride and fierce ambition reign.
 Bob found it so, nor did he strive
 To work the nail that would not drive;
 Content to do the best he could,
 And as became his brotherhood,
 Gave him what money he could spare,
 And kindly paid his old arrear,
 Bought him his equipage and clothes,
 So thus supply'd away he goes,
 For London town he mounts, as gay
 As tailors on their wedding-day.
 Not many miles upon the road,
 A widow's stately mansion stood;
 What if dame Fortune should be there?
 (Said Frank) 'tis ten to one, I swear:
 I'll try to find her in the crowd,
 She loves the wealthy and the proud.
 Away he spurs, and at the door
 Stood gallant gentry many a score,
 Penelope had never more.
 Here tortur'd cats-gut squeals amain,
 Guittars in softer notes complain,
 And lutes reveal the lover's pain.
 Frank, with a careless, easy mien,
 Sung her a song, and was let in.
 The rest with envy burst, to see
 The stranger's odd felicity.
 Low bow'd the footman at the stairs,
 The gentleman at top appears;

And is your lady, sir, at home?
 Pray walk into the drawing-room.
 But here my muse is too well bred,
 To prattle what was done or said;
 She lik'd the youth, his dress, his face,
 His calves, his back, and every grace:
 Supper was serv'd, and down they sit,
 Much meat, good wine, some little wit.
 The grace-cup drunk, or dance, or play;
 Frank chose the last, was very gay,
 Had the good luck the board to strip,
 And punted to her ladyship.

The clock strikes one, the gentry bow'd,
 Each to his own apartment show'd;
 But Franky was in piteous mood,
 Slept not a wink; he raves, he dies,
 Smit with her jointure and her eyes.
 Restless as in a lion's den,
 He sprawl'd and kick'd about till ten:
 But, as he dreamt of future joys,
 His ear was startled with a noise,
 Six trumpets and a kettle-drum;
 Up in a hurry flies the groom,
 Lord, sir! get dress'd, the colonel's come:
 Your horse is ready at the door,
 You may reach Uxbridge, sir, by four.
 Poor Franky must in haste remove,
 With disappointment vex'd, and love;
 To dirt abandon'd, and despair,
 For lace and feather won the fair.

Now for the town he jogs apace,
 With leaky boots and sun-burnt face;
 And, leaving Acton in his rear,
 Began to breathe sulphureous air.
 Arriv'd at length, the table spread,
 Three bottles drunk, he reels to bed.
 Next morn his busy thoughts begun,
 To rise and travel with the sun;
 Whims heap'd on whims his head turn'd round,
 But how dame Fortune might be found,
 Was the momentous grand affair,
 His secret wish, his only care.
 Damme, thought Franky to himself,
 I'll find this giddy wandering elf;
 I'll hunt her out in every quarter.
 Till she bestow the staff or garter:
 I'll visit good Lord Sunderland,
 Who keeps the jilt at his command;
 Or else some courteous duchess may
 Take pity on a runaway.
 Dress'd to a pink, to court he flies,
 At this levee, and that he plies;
 Bows in his rank, an humble slave,
 And meanly fawns on every knave;
 With maids of honour learns to chat,
 Fights for this lord, and pimps for that.
 Fortune he sought from place to place,
 She led him still a wild-goose chase;
 Always prepar'd with some excuse,
 The hopeful youngster to amuse;
 Was busy, indispos'd, was gone
 To Hampton-court, or Kensington;
 And, after all her wiles and dodgings,
 She slipp'd clear off, and bilk'd her lodgings.
 Jaded, and almost in despair,
 A gamester whisper'd in his ear;

Who would seek Fortune, sir, at court?
 At H—l's is her chief resort;
 'Tis there her midnight hours she spends,
 Is very gracious to her friends;
 Shows honest men the means of thriving,
 The best, good-natur'd goddess living.
 Away he trudges with his rook,
 Throws many a main, is bit, is broke;
 With dirty knuckles, aching head,
 Disconsolate he sneaks to bed.

CANTO II.

How humble, and how complaisant,
 Is a proud man reduc'd to want!
 With what a silly, hanging face,
 He bears his unforeseen disgrace!
 His spirits flag, his pulse beats low,
 The gods, and all the world his foe;
 To thriving knaves a ridicule,
 A butt to every wealthy fool.
 For where is courage, wit, or sense,
 When a poor rake has lost his pence?
 Let all the learn'd say what they can,
 'Tis ready money makes the man;
 Commands respect where'er we go,
 And gives a grace to all we do.
 With such reflections Frank distress'd,
 The horrors of his soul express'd:
 Contempt, the basket, and a gaol,
 By turns his restless mind assail;
 Aghast the dismal scene he flies,
 And death grows pleasing in his eyes:
 For since his rhino was all flown,
 To the last solitary crown,
 Who would not, like a Roman, dare
 To leave that world he could not share?
 The pistol on his table lay,
 And death fled hovering o'er his prey;
 There wanted nothing now to do,
 But touch the trigger, and adieu.
 As he was saying some short prayers,
 He heard a wheezing on the stairs,
 And looking out, his aunt appears;
 Who from Moorfields, breathless and lame,
 To see her graceless godson came:
 The salutations being past,
 Coughing, and out of wind, at last
 In his great chair she took her place,
 How does your brother? is my niece
 Well marry'd? when will Robin settle?
 He answer'd all things to a tittle;
 Gave such content in every part,
 He gain'd the good old beldam's heart.
 "Godson," said she, "alas! I know
 Matters with you are but so-so:
 "You're come to town, I understand,
 "To make your fortune out of hand;
 "Your time and patrimony lost,
 "To beg a place, or buy a post.
 "Believe me, godson, I'm your friend;
 "Of this great town, this wicked end
 "Is ripe for judgment; Satan's seat,
 "The sink of sin, and hell complete.
 "In every street of trulls a troop,
 "And every cook-wench wears a hoop;

"Sodom was less deform'd with vice,
 "Lewdness of all kinds, cards and dice."
 Frank blush'd (which, by the way, was more Than ever he had done before);
 And own'd it was a wretched place,
 Unfit for any child of grace.
 The good old aunt o'erjoyed to see
 These glimmerings of sanctity;
 "My dear," said she, "this purse is yours,
 "It cost me many painful hours;
 "Take it, improve it, and become
 "By art and industry a plumb.
 "But leave, for shame, this impious street,
 "All over mark'd with cloven feet;
 "In our more holy quarter live,
 "Where both your soul and stock may thrive;
 "Where righteous citizens repair,
 "And heaven and earth the godly share,
 "Gain this by jobbing, that by prayer.
 "At Jonathan's go smoke a pipe,
 "Look very serious, dine on tripe;
 "Get early up, late close your eyes,
 "And leave no stone unturn'd to rise:
 "Then each good day at Salter's-Hall
 "Pray for a blessing upon all."

Lowly the ravish'd Franky bows,
 While joy sat smiling on his brows;
 And without scruple, in a trice,
 He took her money and advice.
 Not an extravagant young heir,
 Beset with duns, and in despair,
 When joyful tidings reach his ear,
 And dad retires by heaven's commands,
 To leave his chink to better hands;
 Not wandering sailors almost lost,
 When they behold the wish'd-for coast;
 Not culprit when the knot is plac'd,
 And kind reprove arrives in haste;
 E'er felt a joy in such excess,
 As Frank reliev'd from this distress.
 A thousand antic tricks he play'd,
 The purse he kiss'd, swore, curs'd and pray'd;
 Counted the pieces o'er and o'er,
 And hugg'd his unexpected store;
 Built stately castles in the air,
 Supp'd with the great, enjoy'd the fair;
 Pick'd out his title and his place,
 Was scarce contented with your Grace.
 Strange visions working in his head,
 Frantic, half mad, he strolls to bed;
 Sleeps little; if he sleeps, he dreams
 Of sceptres, and of diadems.
 "Fortune," said he, "shall now no more
 "Trick and deceive me as of yore:
 "This passport shall admittance gain,
 "In spite of all the jilt's disdain:
 "'Tis this the tyrant's pride disarms,
 "And brings her blushing to my arms;
 "This golden bough my wish shall speed,
 "And to th' Elysian fields shall lead."
 The morn scarce peep'd, but up he rose,
 Impatient huddled on his clothes;
 Call'd the next coach, gave double pay,
 And to 'Change-Alley whirl'd away.
 'Tis here dame Fortune every day
 Opens her booth, and shows her play;

Here laughing sits behind the scene,
 Dances her puppets here unseen,
 And turns her whimsical machine.
 Powel, with all his wire and wit,
 To her great genius must submit:
 Exact at twelve the goddess shows.
 And fame aloud her trumpet blows;
 Harangues the mob with shams and lies,
 And bids their actions fall, or rise.
 Old Chaos here his throne regains;
 And here in odd confusion reigns;
 All order, all distinction lost,
 Now high, now low, the fools are tost.
 Here lucky coxcombs vainly rear
 Their giddy heads, there in despair
 Sits humbled pride, with downcast look,
 Bankrupts restor'd, and misers broke,
 Strange figures here our eyes invade,
 And the whole world in masquerade;
 A carman in a hat and feather,
 A lord in frieze, his breeches leather:
 Tom Whiplash in his coach of state,
 Drawn by the tits he drove of late:
 A colonel of the bold train-bands,
 Selling his equipage and lands.
 Hard by a cobbler bidding fair,
 For the gold chain, and next lord mayor:
 A butcher blustering in the crowd,
 Of his late purchas'd 'scutcheon proud,
 Retains his cleaver for his crest,
 His motto too beneath the rest,
 "Virtue and merit is a jest."
 Two toasts with all their trinkets gone,
 Padding the streets for half a-crown:
 A daggled countess and her maid,
 Her house-rent and her slaves unpaid,
 A tailor's wife in rich brocade.
 All sects, all parties, high and low,
 At fortune's shrine devoutly bow;
 Nought can their ardent zeal restrain,
 Where each man's godliness is gain.
 From taverns, meeting-houses, stews,
 Atheists and Quakers, bawds and Jews,
 Statesmen and fidlers, beaux and porters,
 Blue aprons here, and there blue garters.
 As human race of old began
 From stones and clods, transform'd to man,
 So from each dunghill, strange surprise!
 In troops the recent gentry rise,
 Of mushroom growth, they wildly stare,
 And ape the great with awkward air:
 So Pinkethman upon the stage,
 Mounting his ass in warlike rage,
 With simpering Dicky for his page,
 In Lee's mad rant, with monkey face,
 Burlesques the prince of Ammon's race.
 Industrious Frank, among the rest,
 Bought, sold, and cavil'd, bawl'd and press'd;
 Lodg'd in a garret on the spot,
 Follow'd instructions to a jot,
 The praying part alone forgot.
 Learnt every dealing term of art,
 And all th' ingenious cant by heart;
 Nor doubted but he soon should find
 Dame Fortune complaisant and kind.

After her oft he call'd aloud,
 But still she vanish'd in the crowd;
 Now with smooth looks and tempting smiles
 The faithless hypocrite beguiles;
 Then with a cool and scornful air,
 Bids the deluded wretch despair;
 Takes pet without the least pretence,
 And wonders at his insolence.
 Thus with her fickle humours vex'd,
 And between hopes and fears perplex'd;
 His patience quite worn out at last
 Resolves to throw one desperate cast.
 " 'Tis vain," said he, " to whine and woo,
 " 'Tis one brisk stroke the work must do.
 " Fortune is like a widow won,
 " And trackles to the bold alone;
 " I'll push at once and venture all,
 " At least I shall with honour fall."
 But, curse upon the treacherous jade,
 Who thus his services repaid;
 When now he thought the world his own,
 He bought a bear, and was undone.

CANTO III.

As here is something in a face,
 An air, and a peculiar grace,
 Which boldest painters cannot trace;
 That more than features, shape, or hair,
 Distinguishes the happy fair;
 Strikes every eye, and makes her known
 A ruling toast through all the town:
 So in each action 'tis success
 That gives it all its comeliness;
 Guards it from censure and from blame,
 Brightens and burnishes our fame.
 For what is virtue, courage, wit,
 In all men, but a lucky hit?
 But, vice versâ, where this fails,
 The wisest conduct nought avails;
 The man of merit soon shall find
 The world to prosperous knaves inclin'd,
 Himself the last of all mankind.
 Too true poor Frank this thesis found,
 Bankrupt; despoil'd, and run aground,
 In durance vile detain'd and lost,
 And all his mighty projects crost:
 With grief and shame at once oppress'd,
 Tears swell his eyes, and sighs his breast;
 A poor, forlorn, abandon'd rake,
 Where shall he turn? what measures take?
 Betray'd, deceiv'd, and ruin'd quite,
 By his own greedy appetite;
 He mourns his fatal lust of pelf,
 And curses Fortune and himself:
 In limbo pent, would fain get free,
 Importunate for liberty.
 So when the watchful hungry mouse,
 At midnight prowling round the house,
 Winds in a corner toasted cheese,
 Glad the luxurious prey to seize;
 With whiskers curl'd, and round black eyes,
 He meditates the luscious prize,
 Till caught, trepann'd, laments too late
 The rigorous decrees of fate;

Restless his freedom to regain,
 He bites the wire, and climbs in vain.
 The wretched captive thus distress'd,
 His busy thoughts allow no rest:
 Fond on each project to depend,
 Kind hope his only faithful friend;
 Odd whimsies floating in his brain,
 He plots, contrives, but all in vain,
 Approves, rejects, and thinks again.
 As when the shipwreck'd wretch is tost
 From wave to wave, and almost lost,
 Beat by the billows from the shore,
 Returns half drown'd, and hugs once more
 The friendly plank he grasp'd before:
 So Frank, when all expedients fail,
 To save his carcase from a gaol,
 Eat up with vermin and with care,
 And almost sinking in despair,
 Resolves once more to make his court
 To his old aunt, his last resort:
 Takes pen in hand, now writes, now tears,
 Then blots his paper with his tears,
 Ransacks his troubled soul, to raise
 Each tender sentiment and phrase;
 And every lame excuse supplies
 With artful colouring and disguise;
 Kind to himself, lays all the blame
 On Fortune, that capricious dame:
 In short informs her all was lost,
 And sends it by the penny-post.
 Soon as the ancient nymph had read
 The fatal scroll, she took her bed,
 Cold palsies seize her trembling head;
 She groans, she sighs, she sobs, she smears
 Her spectacles and beard with tears;
 Her nose that wont to sympathise
 With all th' o'erflowings of her eyes,
 Adown in pearly drops distils,
 Th' united stream each chasm fills.
 Geneva now, nor Nants will do,
 Her toothless gums their hold let go;
 And on the ground, O fatal stroke!
 The short coæval pipe is broke:
 With vapours chok'd, entranc'd she lies,
 Belches, and prays, and f—ts, and dies,
 But sleep, that kind restorative,
 Recall'd her soul, and bid her live;
 With cooler thoughts the case she weigh'd,
 And brought her reason to her aid.
 Away she hobbles, and with speed
 Resolves to see the captive freed;
 Wipe off this stain and foul disgrace,
 And vindicate her ancient race.
 With her a sage director comes,
 More weighty than a brace of plumbs,
 A good man in the city cant,
 Where cash, not morals, makes the saint.
 T' improve a genius so polite,
 The clumsy thing was dubb'd a knight:
 Fortune's chief confident and friend,
 Grown fat by many a dividend;
 And still her favour he retains,
 By want of merit and of brains;
 On her top spoke sublime he sits,
 The jest and theme of sneering wits;

For fools in fortune's pillory plac'd
 Are mounted to be more disgrac'd.
 This rich old Hunk, as Woodcock wife,
 Was call'd the younker to advise :
 " Young man," said he, " refrain from tears,
 " While joyful tidings bless thine ears ;
 " Up and be doing, boy, and try
 " To conquer fate by industry ;
 " For know that all of mortal race,
 " Are born to losses and disgrace :
 " Ev'n I broke twice, I, heretofore
 " A tailor despicably poor,
 " In every hole for shelter crept,
 " On the same bulk, botch'd, lous'd, and slept,
 " With scarce one penny to prepare
 " A friendly halter in despair ;
 " My credit like my garment torn,
 " Threadbare, and ragged, over-worn :
 " But soon I patch'd it up again,
 " These busy hands, this working brain,
 " Ne'er ceas'd from labour, pain, and sweat,
 " Till fortune smil'd, and I was great.
 " Now at each pompous city feast,
 " Who but Sir Tristram ? Every guest
 " Respectful bows. In each debate,
 " My nod must give the sentence weight :
 " On me prime ministers attend,
 " And — Aislabie's my friend :
 " In embryo each bold project lies,
 " Till my consenting purse supplies.
 " This hand—nay do not think me vain,
 " Soften'd the Swede, and humbled Spain.
 " To me the fair, whom all adore,
 " Address their prayers, and own my power ;
 " When the poor toast by break of day
 " Has punted all her gold away,
 " Undress'd, and in her native charms,
 " She flies to these indulgent arms ;
 " She curls each dimple in her face
 " To win the good Sir Tristram's grace ;
 " Offers her brilliants with a smile,
 " That might an achoret beguile ;
 " And when my potent aid is lent,
 " Away the dear-one wheels content.
 " He that can money get, my boy,
 " Shall every other good enjoy ;
 " Be rich, and every boon receive,
 " That man can wish, or Heaven can give.
 " Now to the means, dear youth, attend,
 " By which thy sorrows soon shall end :
 " Thy good old aunt resolves to bail
 " Her hopeful godson out of gaol ;
 " But what is freedom to the poor ?
 " The man who begs from door to door
 " Is free ; in lazy wretchedness
 " He lives, till Heaven his substance bless ;
 " But, having learnt to cog and chouse,
 " To cut a purse, or break a house,
 " Then soon he mends his own apparel,
 " Eats boil'd and roast, and taps his barrel ;
 " Drinks double bub, with all his might,
 " And hugs his doxy every night :
 " Thy sprightly genius ne'er shall lie
 " Depress'd by want and penury ;
 " Go, with a prosperous merry gale,
 " To the South Seas adventurous sail ;

" Fat Plenty dwells on these rich shores,
 " Abundance opens all her stores ;
 " Ingots and pearls for beads are sold,
 " And rivers glide on sands of gold ;
 " Profit and Pleasure hand in hand,
 " Smile on the fields, and bless the land ;
 " The swains unlabour'd harvests reap,
 " Fountains run wine, and whores are cheap,
 " Fortune is always true and kind,
 " Nor veers, as here, with every wind ;
 " Not, as in these penurious isles,
 " Retail her blessings and her smiles ;
 " But deals by wholesale with her friends,
 " And gluts them with her dividends.
 " Then haste, set sail, the ship's unmoor'd,
 " And waits to take thee now on board."
 The youth o'erjoy'd this project hears,
 From his flock-bed his head he rears,
 And waters all his rags with tears.
 In short, he took his friend's advice,
 Pack'd up his baggage in a trice ;
 Dancing for joy, on board he flew,
 With all Potosi in his view.

CANTO IV.

BEHOLD the youth just now set free
 On land, immur'd again at sea ;
 Stow'd with his cargo in the hold,
 In quest of other worlds for gold.
 He who so late regal'd at ease,
 On olives, soups, and fricassees ;
 Drank with the witty and the gay,
 Sparkling Champaign, and rich Tokay ;
 Now breaks his fast with Suffolk cheese,
 And bursts at noon with pork and pease ;
 Instead of wine, content to sip,
 With noisy tars, their nauseous flip :
 Their breath with chew'd mundungus sweet,
 Their jests more fulsome than their meat.
 While thunder rolls, and storms arise,
 He snoring in his hammock lies ;
 In golden dreams enjoys the night,
 And counts his bags with vast delight.
 Mountains of gold erect his throne,
 Each precious gem is now his own ;
 Kind Jove descends in golden fleet,
 Pactolus murmurs at his feet ;
 The sea gives up its hoarded store,
 Possessing all he covets more.
 O gold ! attractive gold ! in vain
 Honour and conscience would restrain
 Thy boundless universal reign.
 To thee each stubborn virtue bends,
 The man oblig'd betrays his friends ;
 The patriot quits his country's cause,
 And sells her liberty and laws ;
 The pious prude's no longer nice,
 And ev'n lawn sleeves can flatter vice.
 At thy too absolute command,
 Thy zealots ransack sea and land :
 Where'er thy beams thy power display,
 The swarming insects haste away,
 To bask in thy refulgent ray.
 Now the bold crew with prosperous wind,
 Leave the retreating land behind ;

Fearless they quit their native shore,
 Albion's cliffs are seen no more.
 Then on the wide Atlantic borne,
 Their rigging and their tackle torn;
 Danger in various shapes appears,
 Sudden alarms, and shivering fears.
 Here, might some copious bard dilate
 And show fierce Neptune drawn in state;
 While guards of Triton's clear his way,
 And Nereids round his chariot play;
 Then bid the stormy Boreas rise,
 And forked lightning cleave the skies;
 The ship nigh foundering in the deep,
 Or bounding o'er the ridgy steep:
 Describe the monsters of the main,
 The Phocæ, and their finny train,
 Tornados, hurricanes, and rain.
 Spouts, shoals, and rocks of dreadful size,
 And pirates lurking for their prize;
 Amazing miracles rehearse,
 And turn all Dampier into verse.
 My negligent and humble muse
 Less ambitious aims pursues;
 Content with more familiar phrase,
 Nor deals in such embroider'd lays;
 Pleas'd if my rhyme just measure keeps,
 And stretch'd at ease my reader sleeps.
 Hibernian matrons thus of old,
 Their soporific stories told;
 To sleep in vain the patient strove,
 Perplex'd with business, cross'd in love;
 Till soothing tales becalm'd his breast,
 And lull'd his troubled soul to rest.
 Suffice it only to recite,
 They drank all day, they snor'd all night:
 And, after many moons were past,
 They made the wish'd-for shores at last.
 Frank, with his cargo in his hand,
 Leap'd joyful on the golden strand;
 Open'd his toy-shop in the port,
 Trinkets of various size and sort;
 Bracelets and combs, bodkins and tweezers,
 Bath-metal rings, and knives, and scissars;
 And in one lucky day got more
 Than Bubble-boy in half a score:
 For Fortune now, no longer coy,
 Smil'd on her darling favourite boy;
 No longer from his arms retir'd,
 But gave him all his heart desir'd,
 Ah! thoughtless youth! in time beware,
 And shun the treacherous harlot's snare;
 The wiser savages behold,
 Who truck not liberty for gold;
 Proof against all her subtle wiles,
 Regardless of her frowns or smiles;
 If frugal Nature want supplies,
 The lance or dart unerring flies:
 The mountain boar their prey descends,
 Or the fat kid regales their friends;
 The jocund tribe, from sun to sun,
 Feast on the prize their valour won.
 Cease, babbling muse, thy vain advice,
 'Tis thrown away on avarice:
 Bid hungry lions quit their prey,
 Or streams that down the mountains stray

Divert their course, return again,
 And climb the steep from whence they came.
 Unblest with his ill-gotten store,
 Th' insatiate youth still craves for more;
 To counsel deaf, t' examples blind,
 Scrapes up whatever he can find.
 Now master of a vessel grown,
 With all the glittering freight his own,
 To Fortune still he makes his court,
 And coasts along from port to port.
 Each rolling tide brings fresh supplies,
 And heaps on heaps delight his eyes.
 Through Panama's delicious bay,
 The loaded vessel ploughs her way;
 With the rich freight oppress'd the sails,
 And summons all the friendly gales,
 Frank on her deck triumphant stood,
 And view'd the calm transparent flood;
 Let book-learn'd sots, said he, adore
 Th' aspiring hills that grace thy shore;
 Thy verdant isles, the groves that bow
 Their nodding heads, and shade thy brow;
 Thy face serene, thy gentle breast.
 Where syrens sing, and halcyons rest;
 Propitious flood! on me bestow
 The treasures of thy depths below;
 Which long in thy dark womb have slept,
 From age to age securely kept.
 Scarce had he spoke, when, strange surprise!
 Th' indignant waves in mountains rise,
 And hurricanes invade the skies;
 The ship against the shoals was struck,
 And in a thousand pieces broke;
 But one poor trusty plank, to save
 Its owner from the watery grave;
 On this he mounts, is cast on shore,
 Half dead, a bankrupt as before:
 Spiritless, fainting, and alone,
 On the bare beach he makes his moan.
 Then climbs the ragged rock, t' explore
 If aught was driving to the shore,
 The poor remains of all his store:
 With greedy diligence prepar'd
 To save what'er the waves had spar'd.
 But, oh! the wretch expects in vain
 Compassion from the furious main;
 Men, goods, are sunk. Mad with despair
 He beat his breast, he tore his hair:
 Then leaning o'er the craggy steep,
 Look'd down into the boiling deep;
 Almost resolv'd to cast himself,
 And perish with his dear, dear self.

CANTO V.

If Heaven the thriving trader bless,
 What fawning crowds about him press!
 But, if he fail, distress'd and poor,
 His mob of friends are seen no more;
 For all men hold it meet to fly
 Th' infectious breath of poverty.
 Poor Frank, deserted and forlorn,
 Curses the day that he was born:
 Each treacherous crony hides his face,
 Or starts whene'er he haunts the place.

His wealth thus lost, with that his friends,
On Fortune still the youth depends :
One smile, said he, can soon restore
A bankrupt wretch, and give him more ;
She will not, sure, refuse her aid ?
Fallacious hope ! for the false jade
That very day took wing, was flown,
And on her wonted journey gone
(Intent her costly goods to sell)
From Panama to Portobel :

Five hundred mules her baggage bear,
And groan beneath the precious ware,
The goddess rides sublime in air ;
And hence conveys a fresh supply,
For pride, debate, and luxury.
Frank, when he heard th' unwelcome news,
Like a staunch hound the chase pursues,
Takes the same rout, doubles his speed,
Nor doubts her help in time of need.

O'er the wide waste, through pathless ways,
The solitary pilgrim strays ;
Now on the swampy desert plain,
Through brakes of mangroves works with pain ;
Then climbs the hills with many a groan,
And melts beneath the torrid zone.
With berries and green plantains fed,
On the parch'd earth he leans his head ;
Fainting with thirst, to heaven he cries,
But finds no stream but from his eyes.
Ah, wretch ! thy vain laments forbear,
And for a worse extreme prepare ;
Sudden the lowering storms arise,
The bursting thunder rends the skies,
Aflant the ruddy lightning flies ;
Darts through the gloom a transient ray,
And gives a short, but dreadful day :
With pealing rain the woods resound,
Convulsions shake the solid ground.
Benumb'd with cold, but more with fear,
Strange phantoms to his mind appear,
The wolves around him howl for food,
The ravenous tigers hunt for blood,
And canibals more fierce than they (Monsters who make mankind their prey)
Riot and feast on human gore,
And, still insatiate, thirsts for more.
Half dead at every noise he hears,
His fancy multiplies his fears ;
Whate'er he read or heard of old,
Whate'er his nurse or Crusoe told,
Each tragic scene his eyes behold :
Things past as present fear applies.
Their pains he bears, their deaths he dies.

At length the sun began to peep,
And gild the surface of the deep,
Then on the reeking moisture fed,
The scatter'd clouds before him fled,
The rivers shrunk into their bed :
Nature revives ; the feather'd throng
Salute the morning with a song.
Frank with his fellow-brutes arose,
Yet dreaming still he saw his foes,
Reels to and fro, laments and grieves,
And starting, doubts if yet he lives.
At last his spirits mend their pace,
And hope sat dawning on his face ;

Ev'n such is human life, said he,
A night of dread and misery,
Till heaven relents, relieves our pain,
And sun-shine days return again.
O Fortune ! who dost now bestow,
Frowning, this bitter cup of woe,
Do not thy faithful slave destroy,
But give th' alternative of joy.
Then many a painful step he takes,
O'er hills and vales, through woods and brakes ;
No sturdy desperate buccancer
E'er suffer'd hardships more severe.
Stubborn, incorrigibly blind,
No dangers can divert his mind ;
His tedious journey he pursues,
At last his eye transported views
Fair Portobel, whose rising spires
Inflame his heart with new desires.
Secure of Fortune's grace, he smiles,
And flattering hope the wretch beguiles.
Though nature calls for sleep and food,
Yet stronger avarice subdued ;
Ev'n shameful nakedness and pain,
And thirst and hunger, plead in vain :
No rest he gives his weary feet,
Fortune he seeks from street to street ;
Careful in every corner pries,
Now here, now there, impatient flies,
Wherever busy crowds resort,
The change, the market, and the port ;
In vain he turns his eye-balls round,
Fortune was no where to be found ;
The jilt, not many hours before,
With the Plate-fleet had left the shore
Laughs at the credulous fool behind,
And joyful scuds before the wind.
Poor Frank forsaken on the coast,
All his fond hopes at once are lost.
Aghast the swelling sails he views,
And with his eye the fleet pursues,
Till, lessen'd to his wearied sight,
It leaves him to despair and night.
So when the faithless Theseus fled
The Cretan nymph's deserted bed,
Awak'd, at distance on the main,
She view'd the prosperous perjur'd swain,
And call'd th' avenging gods in vain.
Prostrate on earth till break of day,
Senseless and motionless he lay,
Till tears at last find out their way ;
Gush like a torrent from his eyes,
In bitterness of soul he cries,
" O Fortune ! now too late I see,
" Too late, alas ! thy treachery.
" Wretch that I am, abandon'd, lost,
" About the world at random tost,
" Whither, oh, whither shall I run ?
" Sore pinch'd with hunger, and undone.
" In the dark mines go hide thy head
" Accurs'd, exchange thy sweat for bread,
" Skulk under ground, in earth's dark womb
" Go, slave, and dig thyself a tomb :
" There's gold enough ; pernicious gold !
" To which long since thy peace was sold ;
" Vain helpless idol ! canst thou save
" This shatter'd carcase from the grave ?

" Restless disturber of mankind,
 " Canst thou give health, or peace of mind?
 " Ah, no! deceiv'd the fool shall be
 " Who puts his confidence in thee.
 " Fatally blind, my native home
 " I left, in this rude world to roam;
 " O brother! shall I view no more
 " Thy peaceful bowers? fair Albion's shore?
 " Yes (if kind Heaven my life shall spare)
 " Some happy moments yet I'll share,
 " In thy delightful blest retreat,
 " With thee condemn the rich and great;
 " Redeem my time mispent, and wait
 " Till death relieve th' unfortunate."

Adversity, sage useful guest,
 Severe instructor, but the best;
 It is from thee alone we know
 Justly to value things below;
 Right reason's ever faithful friend,
 To thee our haughty passions bend;
 Tam'd by thy rod, poor Frank at last
 Repents of all his follies past;
 Resign'd, and patient to endure
 Those ills, which Heaven alone can cure.
 With vain pursuits and labours worn,
 He meditates a quick return,
 Longs to revisit yet once more,
 Poor prodigal! his native shore.
 In the next ship for Britain bound,
 Glad Frank a ready passage found;
 Nor vessel now, nor freight his own,
 He fears no longer Fortune's frown;
 No property but life his share,
 Life a frail good not worth his care;
 Active and willing to obey,
 A merry mariner, and gay,
 He hands the sails, and jokes all day.
 At night no dreams disturb his rest,
 No passions riot in his breast;
 For, having nothing left to lose,
 Sweet and unbroken his repose:
 And now fair Albion's cliffs are seen,
 And hills with fruitful herbage green:
 His heart beats quick, the joy that ties
 His faltering tongue bursts from his eyes.
 At length, thus hail'd the well-known land,
 And kneeling kiss'd the happy strand.
 " And do I then draw native air,
 " After an age of toil and care?
 " O welcome parent isle! no more
 " The vagrant shall desert thy shore,
 " But, flying to thy kind embrace,
 " Here end his life's laborious race."
 So when the flag, intent to rove,
 Quits the safe park and sheltering grove,
 Tops the high pale, strolls unconfin'd,
 And leaves the lazy herd behind,
 Blest in his happy change a while,
 Corn fields and flowery meadows smile,
 The pamper'd beast enjoys the spoil;
 Till on the next returning morn,
 Alarm'd, he hears the fatal horn;
 Before the staunch, blood-thirsty hounds,
 Panting, o'er hills unknown he bounds,
 With clamour every wood resounds:

He creeps the thorny brakes with pain,
 He seeks the distant stream in vain,
 And now, by sad experience wise,
 To his dear home the rambler flies;
 His old enclosure gains once more,
 And joins the herd he scorn'd before.

Nor are his labours finish'd yet,
 Hunger and thirst, and pain and sweat,
 And many a tedious mile remains,
 Before his brother's house he gains.
 Without one doit his purse to bless,
 Nor very elegant his dress;
 With a tarr'd jump, a crooked hat,
 Scarce one whole shoe, and half a hat;
 From door to door the stroller skipp'd,
 Sometimes reliev'd, but oftener whipp'd;
 Sun-burnt and ragged, on he fares,
 At last the mansion-house appears,
 Timely relief for all his cares.
 Around he gaz'd, his greedy sight
 Devours each object with delight;
 Through each known haunt transported roves,
 Gay smiling fields, and shady groves,
 Once conscious of his youthful loves.
 About the hospitable gate
 Crowds of dejected wretches wait;
 Each day kind Bob's diffusive hand,
 Cheer'd and refresh'd the tatter'd band,
 Proud the most godlike joy to share,
 He fed the hungry, cloth'd the bare.
 Frank amongst these his station chose,
 With looks revealing inward woes;
 When, lo! with wonder and surprise,
 He saw dame Fortune in disguise;
 He saw, but scarce believ'd his eyes.
 Her fawning smiles, her trickling air,
 Th' egregious hypocrite declare;
 A gipsy's mantle round her spread,
 Of various dye, white, yellow, red;
 Strange feats she promis'd, clamour'd loud,
 And with her cant amus'd the crowd:
 There every day impatient ply'd,
 Push'd to get in, but still deny'd;
 For Bob, who knew the subtle whore,
 Thrust the false vagrant from his door.
 But, when the stranger's face he view'd,
 With no deceitful tears bedew'd,
 His boding heart began to melt,
 And more than usual pity felt:
 He trac'd his features o'er and o'er,
 That spoke him better born, though poor,
 Though cloth'd in rags, genteel his mien,
 That face he somewhere must have seen:
 Nature at last reveals the truth,
 He knows, and owns the hapless youth.
 Surpris'd, and speechless, both embrace,
 And mingling tears o'erflow each face;
 Till Bob thus eas'd his labouring thought,
 And this instructive moral taught.
 Welcome, my brother, to my longing arms,
 Here on my bosom rest secure from harms;
 See Fortune there, that false delusive jade,
 To whom thy prayers and ardent vows were paid:
 She (like her sex) the fond pursuer flies;
 But slight the jilt, and at thy feet she dies

Now safe in port, indulge thyself on shore,
Oh, tempt the faithless winds and seas no
more;

Let unavailing toils, and dangers past,
Though late, this useful lesson teach at last,
True happiness is only to be found
In a contented mind, a body sound,
All else is dream, a dance on fairy ground:
While restless fools each idle whim pursue,
And still one wish obtain'd creates a new,
Like froward babes, the toys they have, detest,
While still the newest trifle pleases best:
Let us, my brother, rich in wisdom's store,
What Heaven has lent, enjoy, nor covet more;
Subdue our passions, curb their saucy rage,
And to ourselves restore the golden age.

THE DEVIL OUTWITTED,

A TALE.

A VICAR liv'd on this side Trent,
Religious, learn'd, benevolent,
Pure was his life, in deed, word, thought,
A comment on the truths he taught:
His parish large, his income small,
Yet seldom wanted wherewithal;
For against every merry tide
Madam would carefully provide.
A painful pastor; but his sheep,
Alas! within no bounds would keep;
A scabby flock, that every day
Run riot, and would go astray.
He thump'd his cushion, fretted, vex'd,
Thump'd o'er again each useful text;
Rebuk'd, exhorted, all in vain,
His parish was the more profane:
The scrubs would have their wicked will,
And cunning Satan triumph'd still.
At last, when each expedient fail'd,
And serious measures nought avail'd,
It came into his head, to try
The force of wit and raillery.
The good man was by nature gay,
Could gibe and joke as well as pray;
Not like some hide-bound folk, who chase
Each merry smile from their dull face,
And think pride zeal, ill-nature grace.
At christenings and each jovial feast,
He singled out the sinful beast:
Let all his pointed arrows fly,
Told this and that, look'd very fly,
And left my masters to apply.
His tales were humorous, often true,
And now and then set off to view
With lucky fictions and sheer wit,
That pierc'd where truth could never hit.
The laugh was always on his side,
While passive fools by turns deride;
And, giggling thus at one another,
Each jeering lout reform'd his brother;
Till the whole parish was with ease
Sham'd into virtue by degrees:
Then be advis'd, and try a tale,
When Chrysoptom and Austin fail.

VOL. VIII.

THE OFFICIOUS MESSENGER,

A TALE.

MAN, of precarious science vain,
Treats other creatures with disdain;
Nor Pug nor Shock have common sense,
Nor even Pol the least pretence,
Though she prates better than us all,
To be accounted rational.
The brute creation here below,
It seems, is nature's puppet-show;
But clock-work all, and mere machine,
What can these idle gimcracks mean?
Ye world-makers of Gresham-hall,
Dog Rover shall confute you all;
Shall prove that every reasoning brute
Like Ben of Bangor can dispute;
Can apprehend, judge, syllogize;
Or like proud Bently criticize:
At a moot point, or odd disaster,
Is often wiser than his master.
He may mistake sometimes, 'tis true,
None are infallible but you.
The dog whom nothing can mislead
Must be a dog of parts indeed:
But to my tale; hear me, my friend,
And with due gravity attend.
Rover, as heralds are agreed,
Well-born, and of the setting breed,
Rang'd high, was stout, of nose acute,
A very learn'd and courteous brute.
In parallel lines his ground he beat,
Not such as in one centre meet,
In those let blundering doctors deal,
His were exactly parallel.
When tainted gales the game betray,
Down close he sinks, and eyes his prey.
Though different passions tempt his soul,
True as the needle to the pole,
He keeps his point, and panting lies,
The floating net above him flies,
Then, dropping, sweeps the fluttering prize.
Nor this his only excellence:
When surly farmers took offence,
And the rank corn the sport deny'd,
Still faithful to his master's side,
A thousand pretty pranks he play'd,
And cheerful each command obey'd:
Humble his mind, though great his wit,
Would lug a pig, or turn the spit;
Would fetch and carry, leap o'er sticks,
And forty such diverting tricks.
Nor Partridge, nor wise Gadbury,
Could find lost goods so soon as he;
Bid him go back a mile or more,
And seek the glove you hid before,
Still his unerring nose would wind it,
If above ground, was sure to find it;
Whimpering for joy his master greet,
And humbly lay it at his feet.
But hold—it cannot be deny'd,
That useful talents misapply'd,
May make wild work. It hapt one day,
'Squire Lobb, his master, took his way,

L 1

New shav'd, and smug, and very tight,
 To compliment a neighbouring knight;
 In his best trowsers he appears
 (A comely person for his years);
 And clean white drawers, that many a day
 In lavender and rose-cakes lay.
 Across his brawny shoulders strung,
 On his left side his dagger hung;
 Dead-doing blade! a dreadful guest,
 Or in the field, or at the feast.
 No Franklin carving of a chine
 At Christide, ever look'd so fine.
 With him obsequious Rover trudg'd,
 Nor from his heels one moment budg'd:
 A while they travell'd, when within
 Poor Lobb perceiv'd a rumbling din:
 Then warring winds, for want of vent,
 Shook all his earthly tenement.
 So in the body politic
 (For states sometimes, like men, are sick)
 Dark faction mutters through the crowd,
 Ere bare-fac'd treason roars aloud:
 Whether crude humours undigested
 His labouring entrails had infested,
 Or last night's load of bottled ale,
 Grown mutinous, was breaking gaol:
 The cause of this his awkward pain,
 Let Johnston or let H——th explain;
 Whose learned noses may discover,
 Why nature's stink pot thus ran over.
 My province is th' effect to trace,
 And give each point its proper grace,
 Th' effect, O lamentable case!
 Long had he struggled, but in vain,
 The factious tumult to restrain:
 What should he do? Th' unruly rout
 Press'd on, and it was time, no doubt,
 T' unbutton, and to let all out.
 The trowsers soon his will obey!
 Not so his stubborn drawers, for they,
 Beneath his hanging paunch close ty'd,
 His utmost art and pains defy'd:
 He drew his dagger on the spot,
 Resolv'd to cut the Gordian knot.
 In the same road just then pass'd by (Such was the will of destiny)
 The courteous curate of the place,
 Good-nature shone o'er all his face;
 Surpris'd the flaming blade to view,
 And deeming slaughter must ensue,
 Off from his hack himself he threw,
 Then without ceremony seiz'd
 The 'squire impatient to be eas'd.
 "Lord! Master Lobb, who would have thought
 "The fiend had e'er so strongly wrought;
 "Is suicide so slight a fault?
 "Rip up thy guts, man! What—go quick "To hell? Outrageous lunatic!
 "But, by the blessing, I'll prevent
 "With this right hand, thy foul intent."
 Then gripp'd the dagger fast: the 'squire,
 Like Pelus' son, look'd pale with ire;
 While the good man like Pallas stood,
 And check'd his eager thirst for blood,
 At last, when both a while had strain'd,
 Strength, join'd with zeal, the conquest gain'd.

The curate in all points obey'd,
 Into the sheath returns the blade:
 But first th' unhappy 'squire he swore,
 T' attempt upon his life no more.
 With sage advice his speech he clos'd,
 And left him (as he thought) compos'd.
 But was it so, friend Lobb? I own,
 Misfortune seldom comes alone;
 Satan supplies the swelling tide,
 And ills on ills are multiply'd.
 Subdued and all his measures broke,
 His purpose and intent mistook;
 Within his drawers, alas! he found
 His guts let out without a wound:
 For, in the conflict straining hard,
 He left his postern gate unbarr'd;
 Most wofully bedawb'd, he moans
 His piteous case, he sighs, he groans.
 To lose his dinner, and return,
 Was very hard, not to be borne:
 Hunger, they say, parent of arts,
 Will make a fool a man of parts.
 The sharp-set 'squire resolves at last,
 Whate'er beset him, not to fast;
 He mus'd a while, chaf'd, strain'd his wits,
 At last on this expedient hits;
 To the next brook with sober pace
 He tends, preparing to uncase,
 Straddling and muttering all the way,
 Curs'd inwardly th' unlucky day.
 The coast now clear, no soul in view,
 Off in a trice his trowsers drew;
 More leisurely his drawers, for care
 And caution was convenient there:
 So fast the plaister'd birdlime stuck,
 The skin came off with every pluck,
 Sorely he gaul'd each brawny ham;
 Nor other parts escap'd, which shame
 Forbids a bashful muse to name.
 Not without pain the work achiev'd,
 He scrubb'd and wash'd the parts aggriev'd;
 Then, with nice hand and look sedate,
 Folds up his drawers, with their rich freight,
 And hides them in a bush, at leisure
 Resolv'd to fetch his hidden treasure:
 The trusty Rover lay hard by,
 Observing all with curious eye.
 Now rigg'd again, once more a beau,
 And matters fix'd in statu quo,
 Brisk as a snake in merry May,
 That just has cast his slough away,
 Gladsome he caper'd o'er the green,
 As he presum'd both sweet and clean;
 For, oh! amongst us mortal elves,
 How few there are smell out themselves!
 With a mole's ear, and eagle's eye,
 And with a blood-hound's nose, we fly
 On others' faults implacably.
 But where's that ear, that eye, that nose,
 Against its master will depose?
 Ruddy Miss Prue, with golden hair,
 Stinks like a pole-cat or a bear,
 Yet romps about me every day,
 Sweeter, she thinks, than new-made hay.
 Lord Plausible, at Tom's and Will's,
 Whose poisonous breath in whispers kills.

Still buzzes in my ear, nor knows
What fatal secrets he bestows :
Let him destroy each day a score,
'Tis mere chance-medley, and no more.
In fine, self-love bribes every sense,
And all at home is excellence.

The 'squire arriv'd in decent plight
With reverence due salutes the knight ;
Compliments past, the dinner-bell
Rung quick and loud, harmonious knell
To greedy Lobb ! Th' Orphean lyre
Did ne'er such rapturous joy inspire ;
Though this the savage throng obey,
That hunger tames more fierce than they.
In comely order now appear
The footmen loaded with good cheer,
Her ladyship brings up the rear.
Simpering she lisps, " Your servant, sir—
" The ways are bad, one can't well stir
" Abroad—or 'twere indeed unkind
" To leave good Mrs. Lobb behind—
" She's well, I hope—Master, they say,
" Comes on apace—How's Miss, I pray ?"
Lobb bow'd, and cring'd ; and, muttering low,
Made for his chair, would fain fall-to.
These weighty points adjusted, soon
My lady brandishes her spoon.
Unhappy Lobb, pleas'd with his treat,
And minding nothing but his meat,
Too near the fire had chose his seat :
When, oh ! th' effluvia of his bum
Begin amain to scent the room,
Ambrosial sweets, and rich perfume.
The flickering footman stopt his nose ;
The chaplain too, under the rose,
Made awkward mouths ; the knight took snuff ;
Her ladyship began to huff ;
" Indeed, Sir John—pray, good my dear—
" 'Tis wrong to make your kennel here—
" Dogs in their place are good, I own—
" But in the parlour—foh !—be gone."

Now Rockwood leaves th' unfinished bone,
Banish'd for failings not his own ;
No grace ev'n Fidler could obtain,
And favourite Virgin fawn'd in vain.
The servants, to the stranger kind,
Leave trusty Rover still behind ;
But Lobb, who would not seem to be
Defective in civility,
And, for removing of all doubt,
Knitting his brows, bids him get out :
By signs expresses his command,
And to the door points with his hand.
The dog, or through mistake or spight
(Grave authors have not set us right) ;
Fled back the very way he came,
And in the bush soon found his game ;
Brought in his mouth the savoury load,
And at his master's elbow stood.
O Lobb ! what idioms can express
Thy strange confusion and distress,
When on the floor the drawers display'd
The fulsome secret had bewray'd ?
No traitor, when his hand and seal
Produc'd his dark designs reveal,

E'er look'd with such a hanging face,
As Lobb half dead at this disgrace.
Wild-staring, thunder-struck, and dumb,
While peals of laughter shake the room ;
Each fash thrown up to let in air,
The knight fell backward in his chair,
Laugh'd till his heart-strings almost break ;
The chaplain giggled for a week ;
Her ladyship began to call,
For hartshorn, and her Abigail ;
The servants chuckled at the door,
And all was clamour and uproar.
Rover, who now began to quake,
As conscious of his foul mistake,
Trusts to his heels to save his life ;
The 'squire sneaks home, and beats his wife ;

THE INQUISITIVE BRIDEGROOM :

A TALE.

FRANK PLUME, a spark about the town,
Now weary of intriguing gown,
Thought it advisable to wed,
And choose a partner of his bed,
Virtuous and chaste—Aye, right—but where
Is there a nymph that's chaste as fair ?
A blessing to be priz'd, but rare.
For continence penurious heaven
With a too sparing hand has given ;
A plant but seldom to be found,
And thrives but ill on British ground.
Should our adventurer haste on board,
And see what foreign foils afford ?
Where watchful dragons guard the prize,
And jealous dons have Argus' eyes,
Where the rich casket, close immur'd,
Is under lock and key secur'd ?
No—Frank, by long experience wise,
Had known these forts took by surprise ;
Nature in spite of art prevail'd,
And all their vigilance had fail'd.
The youth was puzzled—should he go
And scale a convent ? would that do ?
Is nuns-flesh always good and sweet ?
Fly-blown sometimes, not fit to eat.
Well—he resolves to do his best,
And prudently contrives this test ;
If the last favour I obtain,
And the nymph yield, the case is plain :
Marry'd, she'll play the same odd prank
With others—she's no wife for Frank.
But, could I find a female heart
Impregnable to force or art,
That all my batteries could withstand,
The sap, and even sword in hand ;
Ye gods ! how happy should I be,
From each perplexing thought set free ;
From cuckoldom, and jealousy !
The project pleas'd. He now appears,
And shines in all his killing airs,
And every useful toy prepares,
New opera tunes, and billet-doux,
The clouded cane, and red-heel'd shoes ;
Nor the clock-stocking was forgot,
Th' embroider'd coat, and shoulder-knot :

L. I ij

All that a woman's heart might move,
 The potent trumpery of love.
 Here importunity prevails,
 There tears in floods, or sighs in gales.
 Now, in the lucky moment try'd,
 Low at his feet the fair one dy'd,
 For Strephon would not be deny'd.
 Then, if no motives could persuade,
 A golden shower debauch'd the maid,
 The mistress truckled, and obey'd.
 To modesty a sham pretence
 Gain'd some, others impertinence;
 But most, plain downright impudence.
 Like Cæsar, now he conquer'd all,
 The vassal sex before him fall;
 Where'er he march'd, slaughter ensued,
 He came, he saw, and he subdued.
 At length a stubborn nymph he found,
 For bold Camilla stood her ground;
 Parry'd his thrusts with equal art,
 And had him both in tierce and quart:
 She kept the hero still in play,
 And still maintain'd the doubtful day.
 Here he resolves to make a stand,
 Take her, and marry out of hand.
 The jolly priest soon ty'd the knot,
 The luscious tale was not forgot,
 Then empty'd both his pipe and pot.
 The posset drunk, the stocking thrown,
 The candles out, the curtains drawn,
 And sir and madam all alone;
 "My dear (said he) I strove, you know,
 "To taste the joys you now bestow,
 "All my persuasive arts I try'd,
 "But still relentless you deny'd;
 "Tell me, inexorable fair,
 "How could you, thus attack'd, forbear?"
 "Swear to forgive what's past (she cry'd);
 "The naked truth shan't be deny'd."
 He did; the baggage thus reply'd:
 Deceiv'd so many times before
 By your false sex, I rashly swore,
 To trust deceitful man no more.

BACCHUS TRIUMPHANT:

A TALE.

"For shame, said Ebony, for shame,
 "Tom Ruby, troth, you're much to blame,
 "To drink at this confounded rate,
 "To guzzle thus, early and late."
 Poor Tom, who just had took his whet,
 And at the door his uncle met,
 Surpris'd and thunder-struck, would fain
 Make his escape, but, oh! in vain.
 Each blush, that glow'd with an ill grace,
 Lighted the flambeaux in his face;
 No loop-hole left, no slight pretence,
 To palliate the foul offence.
 "I own (said he) I'm very bad—
 "A sot—incurably mad—
 "But, sir—I thank you for your love,
 "And by your lectures would improve:
 "Yet, give me leave to say, the street
 "For conference is not so meet.

"Here in this room—nay, sir, come in—
 "Expose, chastise me for my sin;
 "Exert each trope, your utmost art,
 "To touch this senseless, flinty heart.
 "I'm conscious of my guilt, 'tis true,
 "But yet I know my frailty too;
 "A slight rebuke will never do
 "Urge home my faults—come in, I pray—
 "Let not my soul be cast away."
 Wife Ebony, who deem'd it good
 T' encourage by all means he could
 These first appearances of grace,
 Follow'd up stairs, and took his place.
 The bottle and the crust appear'd,
 And wily Tom demurely sneer'd.
 "My duty, sir!"—"Thank you, kind Tom!"—
 "Again, an't please you!"—"Thank you!"
 "Come—"
 "Sorrow is dry—I must once more—"
 "Nay, Tom, I told you at the door
 "I would not drink—what! before dinner?—
 "Not one glass more, as I'm a sinner—
 "Come, to the point in hand; is't fit
 "A man of your good sense and wit
 "Those parts which heaven bestow'd should drown,
 "A butt to all the sots in town?
 "Why, tell me, Tom—what fort can stand
 "(Though regular, and bravely man'd)
 "If night and day the fierce foe plies
 "With never-ceasing batteries;
 "Will there not be a breach at last?"—
 "Uncle, 'tis true—forgive what's past."
 "But if nor interest, nor fame,
 "Nor health, can your dull soul reclaim,
 "Hast not a conscience, man? no thought
 "Of an hereafter? dear are bought
 "These sensual pleasures."—"I relent,
 "Kind sir—but give your zeal a vent—"
 Then, pouting, hung his head; yet still
 Took care his uncle's glass to fill,
 Which as his hurry'd spirits sunk,
 Unwittingly, good man! he drunk.
 Each pint, alas! drew on the next,
 Old Ebony stuck to his text,
 Grown warm, like any angel spoke,
 Till intervening hickups broke
 The well-strung argument. Poor Tom
 Was now too forward to reel home.
 That preaching still, this still repenting,
 Both equally to drink consenting,
 Till both brimful could swill no more,
 And fell dead drunk upon the floor.
 Bacchus, the jolly god, who fate
 Wide-straddling o'er his tun in state,
 Close by the window side, from whence
 He heard this weighty conference;
 Joy kindling in his ruddy checks,
 Thus the indulgent godhead speaks:
 "Frail mortals know, reason in vain
 "Rebels, and would disturb my reign.
 "See there the sophister o'erthrown,
 "With stronger arguments knock'd down
 "Than e'er in wrangling schools were known!
 "The wine that sparkles in this glass
 "Smooths every brow, gilds every face:

" As vapours when the sun appears,
 " Far hence anxieties and fears :
 " Grave ermine smiles, lawn sleeves grow gay,
 " Each haughty monarch owns my sway,
 " And cardinals and popes obey :
 " Ev'n Cato drank his glass, 'twas I
 " Taught the brave patriot how to die
 " For injur'd Rome and liberty ;
 " 'Twas I who with immortal lays
 " Inspir'd the bard that sung his praise.
 " Let dull unsociable fools
 " Loll in their cells, and live by rules ;
 " My votaries, in gay delight
 " And mirth, shall revel all the night ;
 " Act well their parts on life's dull stage,
 " And make each moment worth an age."

THE NIGHT-WALKER RECLAIMED :

A TALE.

IN those blest days of jubilee,
 When pious Charles set England free
 From canting and hypocrisy ;
 Most graciously to all restoring
 Their ancient privilege of whoring ;
 There liv'd, but 'tis no matter where,
 The son of an old cavalier ;
 Of ancient lineage was the 'squire,
 A man of mettle and of fire ;
 Clean-shap'd, well-limb'd, black-ey'd, and tall,
 Made a good figure at a ball,
 And only wanted wherewithal.
 His pension was ill-paid and strait,
 Full many a loyal hero's fate :
 Often half starv'd, and often out
 At elbows, an hard case, no doubt.
 Sometimes perhaps a lucky main
 Prudently manag'd in Long-Lane
 Repair'd the thread-bare beau again ;
 And now and then some secret favours,
 The kind returns of pious labours,
 Enrich'd the strong and vigorous lover,
 His honour liv'd a while in clover.
 For (to say truth) it is but just,
 Where all things are decay'd but lust,
 That ladies of maturer ages
 Give citron water and good wages.

Thus far Tom Wild had made a shift,
 And got good helps at a dead list ;
 But John, his humble meagre slave,
 One foot already in the grave,
 Hide-bound as one of Pharaoh's kine,
 With good Duke Numps was forc'd to dine :
 Yet still the thoughtful serious elf
 Would not be wanting to himself ;
 Bore up against both tide and wind,
 Turn'd every project in his mind,
 And each expedient weigh'd, to find
 A remedy in this distress.
 Some god—(nay, fir, suppose no less,
 For in this hard and knotty case,
 T' employ a god is no disgrace ;
 Though Mercury be sent from Jove,
 Or Iris wing it from above)

Some god, I say, inspir'd the knave,
 His master and himself to save.

As both went supperless to bed
 One night (first scratching of his head)
 " Alas !" quoth John, " fir, 'tis hard fare
 " To suck one's thumbs, and live on air ;
 " To reel from pillar unto post,
 " An empty shade, a walking ghost ;
 " To hear one's guts make piteous moan,
 " Those worst of duns, and yet not one,
 " One mouldy scrape to satisfy
 " Their craving importunity.
 " Nay—good your honour please to hear :"
 (And then the varlet dropt a tear)
 " A project form'd in this dull brain,
 " Shall set us all adrift again ;
 " A project, fir, nay, let me tell ye,
 " Shall fill your pockets, and my belly.
 " Know then, old Gripe is dead of late,
 " Who purchas'd at any easy rate,
 " Your manor-house and fine estate.
 " Nay, stare not, fir : by G— 'tis true
 " The devil for once has got his due :
 " The rascal has left every penny,
 " To his old maiden sister Jenny :
 " Go, clasp the dowdy in your arms,
 " Nor want you bread, though she want charms ;
 " Cajole the dirty drab, and then
 " The man shall have his mare again ;
 " Clod-Hall is your's, your house, your rents,
 " And all your lands, and tenements."
 " Faith, John," said he, (then lick'd his chops)
 " This project gives indeed some hopes :
 " But curst hard the terms, to marry,
 " To stick to one, and never vary ;
 " And that one old and ugly too :
 " Frail mortals tell me what to do ?"
 " For that," said John, " trust me ; my treat
 " Shan't be one ill-dress'd dish of meat ;
 " Let but your honour be my guest,
 " Variety shall crown the feast."
 " 'Tis done," reply'd Tom Wild, " 'tis done,
 " The flag hangs out, the fort is won ;
 " Ne'er doubt my vigorous attacks,
 " Come to my arms, my * Sycorax ;
 " Bold in thy right we mount our throne,
 " And all the island is our own."

Well—forth they rode, both Squire and John ;

Here might a florid bard make known,
 His horse's virtues, and his own ;
 A thousand prodigies advance,
 Retailing every circumstance.
 But I, who am not over-nice,
 And always love to be concise,
 Shall let the courteous reader guess
 The squire's accoutrements and dress.

Suppose we then the gentle youth
 Laid at her feet, all love, all truth ;
 Haranguing it in verse and prose,
 A mount her forehead white with snows,
 Her cheeks the lily and the rose ;

* See Dryden's Tempest, altered from Shakspeare.

Her ivory teeth, her coral lips,
 Her well-turn'd ears, whose ruby tips
 Afford a thousand compliments,
 Which he, fond youth, profusely vents:
 The pretty dimple in her chin,
 The den of love, who lurks within.
 But, oh! the lustre of her eyes,
 Nor stars, nor moon, nor sun suffice,
 He vows, protests, raves, sinks, and dies.
 Much of her breasts he spoke, and hair,
 In terms most elegant and rare;
 Call'd her the goddess he ador'd,
 And in heroic fustian soar'd.
 For, though the youth could well explain
 His mind in a more humble strain;
 Yet Ovid and the wits agree,
 That a true lover's speech should be
 In rapture and in simile.

Imagine now, all points put right,
 The fiddles and the wedding-night;
 Each noisy steeple rock'd with glee,
 And every bard sung merrily:
 Gay pleasure wanton'd unconfin'd,
 The men all drunk, the women kind:
 Clod-Hall did ne'er so fine appear,
 Floating in posset and strong beer.
 Come, muse, thou flatt'ring house-wife, tell,
 Where's our friend John? I hope he's well;
 Well! Ay, as any man can be,
 With Susan in the gallery.
 Sue was a lass buxom and tight,
 The chamber maid and favourite;
 Juicy and young, just fit for man,
 Thus the sweet dialogue began.

"Lard, sir," quoth Sue, "how brisk, how gay,

"How spruce our master look'd to-day!
 "I'm sure no king was e'er so fine,
 "No sun more gloriously can shine."
 "Alas, my dear, all is not gold
 "That glisters, as I've read of old,
 "And all the wise and learned say,
 "The best is not without alloy."

"Well, master John, name if you can
 "A more accomplish'd gentleman.
 "Beside (else may I never thrive)
 "The best good-natur'd 'squire alive."
 "John shrugg'd, and shook his head. "Nay sure
 "You by your looking so demure
 "Have learnt some secret fault; if so,
 "Tell me, good John, nay pr'ythee do,
 "Tell me, I say, I long to know.
 "Safe as thy gold in thy strong box,
 "This breast the dark deposit locks,
 "These lips no secrets shall reveal."

"Well—let me first affix my seal:
 Then kiss'd the soft obliging fair.
 "But hold—now I must hear you swear,
 "By all your virgin charms below,
 "No mortal e'er this tale shall know."
 She swore; then thus the cunning knave,
 With look most politic and grave,
 Proceeds: "Why—faith and troth, dear Sue,
 "This jewel has a flaw, 'tis true;
 "My master's generous, and all that,
 "Not faulty but unfortunate."

"Why will you keep one in suspense?
 "Why teaze one thus?"—"Have patience,
 "The youth has failings, there's no doubt,
 "And who, my Suky, is without?
 "But should you tell—nay that I dread"—
 "By heaven, and by my maidenhead—
 "Now speak, speak quick."—"He who denies
 "Those pouting lips, those roguish eyes,
 "Must sure be more than man—then know,
 "My dearest, since you'll have it so;
 "My master Wild not only talks
 "Much in his sleep, but also walks;
 "Walks many a winter night alone,
 "This way and that, up stairs and down:
 "Now, if disturb'd, if by surprise
 "He's rous'd, and slumbers quit his eyes;
 "Lord, how I tremble! how I dread
 "To speak it! Thrice beneath the bed,
 "Alas! to save my life I fled:
 "And twice behind the door I crept,
 "And once out of the window leapt.
 "No raging bedlam just got loose
 "Is half so mad; about the house
 "Frantic he runs; each eye-ball glares,
 "He raves, he foams, he wildly stares;
 "The family before him flies,
 "Whoe'er is overtaken dies.
 "Opiates, and breathing of a vein,
 "Scarce settle his distemper'd brain,
 "And bring him to himself again.
 "But, if not cross'd, if let alone
 "To take his frolic, and be gone;
 "Soon he returns from whence he came,
 "No lamb more innocent and tame."

Thus having gain'd her point, to bed
 In haste the flickering gipsy fled;
 The pungent secret in her breast
 Gave such sharp pangs, she could not rest:
 Prim'd, charg'd, and cock'd, her next desire
 Was to present, and to give fire.
 Sleepless the tortur'd Susan lay,
 Tossing and tumbling every way,
 Impatient for the dawn of day.
 So labours in the sacred shade,
 Full of the god, the Delphic maid:
 So wind, in hypocondrics pent,
 Struggles and heaves to find a vent;
 In labyrinths intricate it roars,
 Now downward sinks, then upward soars;
 Th' uneasy patient groans in vain,
 No cordials can relieve his pain;
 Till at the postern gate, enlarg'd,
 The bursting thunder is discharg'd.
 At last the happy hour was come,
 When call'd into her lady's room;
 Scarce three pins stuck into her gown,
 But out it bolts, and all is known.
 Nor idle long the secret lies,
 From mouth to mouth improv'd it flies,
 And grows amain in strength and size:
 For fame, at first of pigmy birth,
 Walks cautiously on mother earth;
 But soon (as ancient bards have said)
 In clouds the giant hides her head.
 To council now the gossips went,
 Madam herself was president;

Th' affair is banded pro and con,
 Much breath is spent, few conquests won.
 At length dame Hobb, to end the strife,
 And madam Blouse the parson's wife,
 In this with one consent agree,
 That, since th' effect was lunacy
 If wak'd, it were by much the best,
 Not to disturb him in the least:
 Ev'n let him ramble if he please;
 Troth, 'tis a comical disease;
 The worst is to himself: when cold
 And shivering he returns, then fold
 The vagrant in your arms; he'll rest
 With pleasure on your glowing breast.
 Madam approv'd of this advice,
 Issued her orders in a trice;

"That none henceforth presume to stir,
 Or thwart th' unhappy wanderer."

John, when his master's knock he heard,
 Soon in the dressing-room appear'd,
 Archly he look'd, and slyly leer'd.

"What game?" says Wild. "Oh! never more,

"Pheasants and partridge in great store;

"I wish your ammunition last!"

And then reveal'd how all had past.

Next thought it proper to explain

His plot, and how he laid his train:

"The coast is clear, sir, go in peace,

"No dragon guards the golden fleece."

Here, muse, let fable night advance,

Describe her state with elegance;

Around her dark pavilion spread

The clouds; with poppies crown her head;

Note well her owls, and bats obscene;

Call her an Æthiopian queen;

Or, if you think 'twill mend my tale,

Call her a widow with a veil;

Of specters and hobgoblins tell,

Or say 'twas midnight, 'tis as well.

Well then—'twas midnight, as was said,

When Wild starts upright in his bed,

Leaps out, and, without more ado,

Takes in his room a turn or two;

Opening the door, soon out he stalks,

And to the next apartment walks;

Where on her back there lay poor Sue,

Alas! friend John, she dreamt of you.

Wak'd with the noise, her master known,

By moon-light and his brocade gown,

Frighted she dares not scream, in bed

She sinks, and down she pops her head;

The curtains gently drawn, he springs

Between the sheets, then closely clings.

Now, muse, relate what there he did:

Hold, impudence!—it must be hid!—

He did—as any man would do

In such a case—did he not, Sue?

Then up into the garret flies,

Where Joan, and Dol, and Betty lies;

A leash of lasses all together,

And in the dog-days—in hot weather;

Why, faith, 'twas hard—he did his best,

And left to Providence the rest.

Content the passive creatures lie,

For who in duty could deny?

Was non-resistance ever thought

By modern casuists a fault?

Were not her orders strict and plain?

All struggling dangerous and vain?

Well, down our younker trips again;

Much wishing, as he reel'd along,

For some rich cordial warm and strong.

In bed he quickly tumbled then,

Nor wak'd next morn till after ten.

Thus night by night he led his life,

Blessing all females but his wife;

Much work upon his hands there lay,

More bills were drawn than he could pay;

No lawyer drudg'd so hard as he,

In Easter Term or Hillary;

But lawyers labour for their fee:

Here no self-interest or gain,

The pleasure balances the pain.

So the great sultan walks among

His troop of lasses fair and young:

So the town-bull in Opentide,

His lowing lovers by his side,

Revels at large in nature's right,

Curb'd by no law, but appetite;

Frisking his tail, he roves at pleasure,

And knows no stint, and keeps no measure.

But now the ninth revolving moon

(Alas! it came an age too soon;

Curse on each hasty fleeting night!)

Some odd discoveries brought to light,

Strange tympanies the women seize,

An epidemical disease;

Madam herself with these might pass

For a clean-shap'd and taper lass.

'Twas vain to hide th' apparent load,

For hoops were not then à la-mode;

Sue, being question'd, and hard press'd,

Blubbering the naked truth confess'd:

"Were not your orders most severe,

"That none should stop his night-career?

"And who durst wake him? troth not I;

"I was not then prepar'd to die."

"Well Sue, said she, thou shalt have grace,

"But then this night I take thy place,

"Thou mine, my night-clothes on thy head,

"Soon shall he leave thee safe in bed:

"Lie still, and stir not on thy life,

"But do the penance of a wife;

"Much pleasure hast thou had; at last

"'Tis proper for thy sins to fast."

This point agreed, to bed she went,

And Sue crept in, but ill-content:

Soon as th' accustom'd hour was come,

The younker sally'd from his room,

To Sue's apartment whipt away,

And like a lion seiz'd his prey;

She clasp'd him in her longing arms,

Sharp-set, she feasted on his charms.

He did whate'er he could; but more

Was yet to do, encore, encore!

Fain would he now clope, she clasp'd

Him still, no bur e'er stuck so fast.

At length the morn with envious light

Discover'd all: in what sad plight

L 1 iiiij

Poor man, he lay! abash'd, for shame
 He could not speak, not ev'n one lame
 Excuse was left. She, with a grace
 That gave new beauties to her face;
 And with a kind obliging air
 (Always successful in the fair),
 Thus soon reliev'd him from despair.
 "Ah! generous youth, pardon a fault,
 "No foolish jealousy has taught;
 "'Tis your own crime, open as day,
 "To your conviction paves the way.
 "Oh! might this stratagem regain
 "Your love! let me not plead in vain;
 "Something to gratitude is due,
 "Have I not given all to you?"
 Tom star'd, look'd pale, then in great haste
 Slipp'd on his gown; yet thus at last
 Spoke faintly, as amaz'd he stood,
 "I will, my dear, be very good."

THE HAPPY DISAPPOINTMENT:

A TALE.

In days of yore, when belles and beaux
 Left masquerades and puppet-shows,
 Deserted ombre and basset,
 At Jonathan's to squeeze and sweat;
 When sprightly rakes forsook champaign,
 The play-house, and the merry main,
 Good mother Wyburn and the stews,
 To smoke with brokers, stink with Jews:
 In fine, when all the world run mad
 (A story not less true than sad);
 Ned Smart, a virtuous youth, well known
 To all this chaste and sober town,
 Got every penny he could rally,
 To try his fortune in 'Change-Alley:
 In haste to loll in coach and six,
 Bought bulls and bears, play'd twenty tricks,
 Amongst his brother lunatics,
 Transported at his first success,
 A thousand whims his fancy bless,
 With scenes of future happiness.
 How frail are all our joys below!
 Mere dazzling meteors, flash and show!
 Oh, fortune! false deceitful whore!
 Caught in thy trap with thousands more,
 He found his rhino funk and gone,
 Himself a bankrupt, and undone.
 Ned could not well digest this change,
 Forc'd in the world at large to range;
 With Babel's monarch turn'd to grass,
 Would it not break an heart of brass?
 'Tis vain to sob and hang the lip;
 One penny left, he buys a flip,
 At once his life and cares to lose,
 Under his ear he fits the noose.
 An hook in an old wall he spies,
 To that the fatal rope he ties:
 Like Curtius now, at one bold leap
 He plung'd into the gaping deep;
 Nor did he doubt in hell to find
 Dealings more just, and friends more kind.
 As he began to twist and sprawl,
 The loosen'd stones break from the wall;

Down drops the rake upon the spot,
 And after him an earthen pot:
 Reeling he rose, and gaz'd around,
 And saw the crock lie on the ground;
 Surpris'd, amaz'd, at this odd sight,
 Trembling, he broke it in a fright;
 When, lo! at once came pouring forth
 Ingots, and pearls, and gems of worth.
 O'erjoy'd with fortune's kind bequest,
 He took the birds, but left the nest;
 And then, to spy what might ensue,
 Into a neighbouring wood withdrew;
 Nor waited long. For soon he sees
 A tall black man sculk through the trees;
 He knew him by his shuffling pace,
 His thread-bare coat and hatchet face:
 And who the devil should it be,
 But sanctify'd Sir Timothy!
 His uncle by his mother's side,
 His guardian, and his faithful guide.
 This driveling knight, with pockets full,
 And proud as any Great Mogul,
 For his wife conduct had been made
 Director of the jobbing trade:
 And had most piously drawn in
 Poor Ned and all his nearest kin.
 The greedy fools laid out their gold,
 And bought the very stock he sold;
 Thus the kind knave convey'd their pelf,
 By bocus pocus, to himself;
 And, to secure the spoils he got,
 Form'd this contrivance of the pot.
 Here every night, and every morn,
 Devout as any monk new shorn,
 The prostrate hypocrite implores
 Just heaven to bless his hidden stores;
 But, when he saw dear mammon flown,
 The plunder'd hive, the honey gone,
 No jilted bully, no bilk'd hack,
 No thief when beadles flay his back,
 No losing rook, no carted whore,
 No sailor when the billows roar,
 With such a grace e'er curs'd and swore.
 Then, as he por'd upon the ground,
 And turn'd his haggard eyes around,
 The halter at his feet he spy'd,
 "And is this all that's left?" he cry'd:
 "Am I thus paid for all my cares,
 "My lectures, repetitions, prayers?
 "'Tis well—there's something sav'd at least,
 "Welcome, thou faithful, friendly guest;
 "If I must hang, now all is lost,
 "'Tis cheaper at another's cost;
 "To do it at my own expence,
 "Would be downright extravagance."
 Thus comforted, without a tear,
 He fix'd the noose beneath his ear,
 To the next bough the rope he ty'd,
 And most heroically dy'd.
 Ned, who behind a spreading tree,
 Beheld this tragi-comedy,
 With hearty curses rung his knell,
 And bid him thus his last farewell.
 "Was it not, uncle, very kind,
 "In me, to leave the rope behind?"

" A legacy so well bestow'd,
 " For all the gratitude I ow'd.
 " Adieu, Sir Tim ; by heaven's decree,
 " Soon may thy brethren follow thee,
 " In the same glorious manner swing,
 " Without one friend to cut the string;
 " That hence rapacious knaves may know,
 " Justice is always sure, though slow."

A PADLOCK FOR THE MOUTH:

A TALE.

JACK DIMPLE was a merry blade,
 Young, amorous, witty, and well made;
 Discreet?—Hold, sir—nay, as I live,
 My friend, you're too inquisitive:
 Discretion, all men must agree,
 Is a most shining quality,
 Which like leaf-gold makes a great show,
 And thinly spread sets off a beau.
 But, sir, to put you out of pain,
 Our youngster had not half a grain,
 A leaky blab, rash, faithless, vain.
 The victories his eyes had won,
 As soon as e'er obtain'd, were known;
 For trophies rear'd, the deed proclaim
 Spoils hung on high expose the dame,
 And love is sacrific'd to fame.
 Such insolence the sex alarms,
 The female world is up in arms;
 Th' outrageous Bacchanals combine,
 And brandish'd tongues in concert join.
 Unhappy youth! where wilt thou go
 'T' escape so terrible a foe?
 Seek shelter on the Libyan shore,
 Where tigers and where lions roar?
 Sleep on the borders of the Nile,
 And trust the wily crocodile?
 'Tis vain to shun a woman's hate,
 Heavy the blow, and sure as fate.
 Phyllis appear'd among the crowd,
 But not so talkative and loud,
 With silence and with care suppress'd
 The glowing vengeance in her breast,
 Resolv'd, by stratagem and art,
 To make the saucy villain smart.
 The cunning baggage had prepar'd,
 Pomatum, of the finest lard,
 With strong astringents mix'd the mess,
 Alom, and vitriol, &c. S.
 Arsenic, and bole. But I want time
 To turn all Quincy into rhyme,
 'Twould make my diction too sublime.
 Her grandame this receipt had taught,
 Which Bendo from Grand Cairo brought,
 An able styptic (as 'tis said)
 To fodder a crack'd maidenhead.
 This ointment being duly made,
 The jilt upon her toilet laid:
 The sauntering cully soon appears,
 As usual, vows, protests, and swears;
 Careless an opera tune he hums,
 Plunders her patch-box, breaks her combs,
 As up and down the monkey play'd,
 His hand upon the box he laid,
 The fatal box. Pleas'd with her wiles,
 The treacherous Pandora smiles,

" What's this?" cries Jack. " That box!" said she.
 " Pomatum; what else should it be?"
 But here 'tis fit my reader knows
 'Twas March, when blustering Boreas blows,
 Stern enemy to belles and beaux.
 His lips were sore; rough, pointed, torn,
 The coral bristled like a thorn.
 Pleas'd with a cure so à-propos,
 Nor jealous of so fair a foe,
 The healing ointment thick he spread,
 And every gaping cranny fed.
 His chops begin to glow and shoot,
 He strove to speak, but, oh! was mute,
 Mute as a fish, all he could strain,
 Were some horse gutturals forc'd with pain.
 He stamps, he raves, he sobs, he sighs,
 The tears ran trickling from his eyes;
 He thought but could not speak a curse,
 His lips were drawn into a purse.
 Madam no longer could contain,
 Triumphant joy bursts out amain;
 She laughs, she screams, the house is rais'd,
 Through all the street th' affair is blaz'd:
 In shoals now all the neighbours come,
 Laugh out, and press into the room.
 Sir Harry Taudry and his bride,
 Miss Tulip deck'd in all her pride;
 Wife Madam Froth, and widow Babble,
 Coquettes and prudes, a mighty rabble.
 So great a concourse ne'er was known
 At Smithfield, when a monster's shown;
 When bears dance jiggs with comely mien,
 When witty Punch adorns the scene,
 Or frolic Pug plays Harlequin.
 In vain he strives to hide his head,
 In vain he creeps behind the bed,
 Ferreted thence, expos'd to view,
 The crowd their clamorous shouts renew:
 A thousand taunts, a thousand jeers,
 Stark dumb, the passive creature hears.
 No perjur'd villain nail'd on high,
 And pelted in the pillory,
 His face besmear'd, his eyes, his chops,
 With rotten eggs and turnip-tops,
 Was e'er so maul'd. Phyllis, at last,
 To pay him for offences past,
 With sneering malice in her face,
 Thus spoke, and gave the coup-de-grace:
 " Lard! how demure, and how precise
 " He looks! silence becomes the wife.
 " Vile tongue! its master to betray,
 " But now the prisoner must obey,
 " I've lock'd the door, and keep the key.
 " Learn hence, what angry woman can,
 " When wrong'd by that false traitor man;
 " Who boasts our favours, soon or late,
 " The treacherous blab shall feel our hate."

THE WISE BUILDER:

A TALE.

Wise Socrates had built a farm,
 Little, convenient, snug, and warm,
 Secur'd from rain and wind:
 A gallant whisper'd in his ear,
 " Shall the great Socrates live here,
 " To this mean cell confin'd?"

"The furniture's my chiefest care,"
 Reply'd the sage; "here's room to spare,
 "Sweet sir, for I and you;
 "When this with faithful friends is fill'd,
 "An ampler palace I shall build;
 "Till then, this cot must do."

THE TRUE USE OF THE LOOKING-GLASS.

A TALE.

TOM CAREFUL had a son and heir,
 Exact his shape, genteel his air,
 Adonis was not half so fair.
 But then, alas! his daughter Jane
 Was but so-so, a little plain.
 In mam's apartment, as one day
 The little romp and hoyden play,
 Their faces in the glass they view'd,
 Which then upon her toilet stood;
 Where, as Narcissus vain, the boy
 Beheld each rising charm with joy;
 With partial eyes survey'd himself,
 But for his sister, poor brown elf,
 On her the self-enamour'd chit
 Was very lavish of his wit.
 She bore, alas! what'er she could,
 But 'twas too much for flesh and blood;
 What female ever had the grace
 To pardon scandal on her face?
 Disconsolate away she flies,
 And at her daddy's feet she lies;
 Sighs, sobs, and groans, calls to her aid,
 And tears, that readily obey'd;
 Then aggravates the vile offence,
 Exerting all her eloquence:
 The cause th' indulgent father heard,
 And culprit summon'd soon appear'd;
 Some tokens of remorse he show'd,
 And promis'd largely to be good.
 As both the tender father press'd
 With equal ardour to his breast,
 And smiling kiss'd, "Let there be peace,"
 Said he; "let broils and discord cease:
 "Each day, my children, thus employ
 "The faithful mirror; you, my boy,
 "Remember that no vice disgrace
 "The gift of heaven, that beauteous face:
 "And you, my girl, take special care
 "Your want of beauty to repair
 "By virtue, which alone is fair."

MAHOMET ALI BEG:

OR, THE FAITHFUL MINISTER OF STATE.

A LONG descent, and noble blood,
 Is but a vain fantastic good,
 Unless with inbred virtues join'd,
 An honest, brave, and generous mind.
 All that our ancestors have done,
 Nations reliev'd, and battles won;
 The trophies of each bloody field,
 Can only then true honour yield,
 When, like Argyll, we scorn to owe,
 And pay that lustre they bestow;
 But, if, a mean degenerate race,
 Slothful we faint, and slack our pace,
 Lag in the glorious course of fame,
 Their great achievements we disclaim.

Some bold plebeian soon shall rise,
 Stretch to the goal, and win the prize.
 For, since the forming hand of old,
 Cast all mankind in the same mold;
 Since no distinguish'd clan is blest
 With finer porcelain than the rest;
 And since in all the ruling mind
 Is of the same celestial kind;
 'Tis education shows the way
 Each latent beauty to display;
 Each happy genius brings to light,
 Conceal'd before in shades of night:
 So diamonds from the gloomy mine,
 Taught by the workman's hand to shine,
 On Cloe's ivory bosom blaze,
 Or grace the crown with brilliant rays.
 Merit obscure shall raise its head,
 Though dark obstructing clouds o'erspread;
 Heroes, as yet unsung, shall fight
 For slaves oppress'd, and injur'd right;
 And able statesmen prop the throne,
 To Battle-Abbey-Roll * unknown.
 Sha Abbas, with supreme command,
 In Persia reign'd, and bless'd the land;
 A mighty prince, valiant and wise,
 Expert, with sharp discerning eyes,
 To find true virtue in disguise.
 Hunting (it seems) was his delight,
 His joy by day, his dream by night:
 The sport of all the brave and bold,
 From Nimrod, who, in days of old,
 Made men as well as beasts his prey,
 To mightier George, whose milder sway
 Glad happy crowds with pride obey.
 In quest of his fierce savage foes,
 Before the sun the monarch rose,
 The grizly lion to engage,
 By baying dogs provok'd to rage;
 In the close thicket to explore,
 And push from thence the bristled boar:
 Or to pursue the flying deer,
 While deep-mouth'd hounds the vallies cheer;
 And echo from repeating hills
 His heart with joy redoubled fills.
 Under a rock's projecting shade,
 A shepherd boy his seat had made,
 Happy as Cræsus on his throne,
 The riches of the world his own.
 Content on mortals here below,
 Is all that heaven can bestow.
 His crook and scrip were by him laid,
 Upon his oaten pipe he play'd;
 His flocks securely couch'd around,
 And seem'd to listen to the sound.
 Returning from the chase one day,
 The king by chance had lost his way:
 Nor guards, nor nobles, now attend;
 But one young lord, his bosom friend.
 Now tir'd with labour, spent with heat,
 They sought this pleasant cool retreat;
 The boy leap'd active from his seat,
 And, with a kind obliging grace,
 Offer'd the king unknown his place.

* A record which contained the names of the chief men that came over with the Conqueror.

The Persian monarch, who so late,
 Lord of the world, rul'd all in state;
 On cloth of gold and tiffue trod,
 Whole nations trembling at his nod;
 With diamonds and with rubies crown'd,
 And girt with fawning slaves around;
 Behold him now : his canopy
 Th' impending rock, each shrub, each tree,
 That grew upon its shaggy brow,
 To their great prince observant bow;
 Yield, as in duty bound, their aid,
 And blest him with a friendly shade,
 On the bare flint, he sits alone,
 And, oh! would kings this truth but own,
 The safer and the nobler throne!
 But where do I digress? 'tis time
 To check this arrogance of rhyme.
 As the judicious monarch view'd
 The stripling's air, nor bold nor rude,
 With native modesty subdued;
 The blush that glow'd in all its pride
 Then trembled on his cheeks and dy'd.
 He grew inquisitive to trace
 What soul dwelt in that lovely case:
 To every question, serious, gay,
 The youth reply'd without delay;
 His answers for the most part right,
 And taking, if not apposite:
 Unstudy'd, unaffected sense,
 Mix'd with his native diffidence.
 The king was charm'd with such a prize,
 And stood with wonder in his eyes;
 Commits his treasure to the care
 Of the young lord; bids him not spare
 For cost, or pains, t' enrich his breast
 With all the learning of the east.
 He bow'd, obey'd, well cloth'd, well fed,
 And with his patron's children bred;
 Still every day the youth improv'd,
 By all admir'd, by all belov'd.

Now the first curling down began
 To give the promise of a man;
 To court he's call'd, employ'd, and train'd,
 In lower posts, yet still he gain'd
 By candour, courtesy, and skill,
 The subjects love, the king's good will.
 Employ'd in greater matters now,
 No flatteries, no bribes, could bow
 His stubborn soul; true to his trust,
 Firm, and inexorably just,
 In judgment ripe, he soon became
 A Walpole, or a Walsingham;
 And, wakeful for the public peace,
 No dragon guards the golden fleece
 With half that vigilance and care.
 His busy eyes kenn'd every where;
 In each dark scheme knew how to dive,
 Though cunning Dervises contrive
 Their plots, disguis'd with shams and lies,
 And cloak'd with real perjuries.
 Now high in rank the peer is plac'd,
 And Ali Beg with titles grac'd;
 No bounds his master's bounties know,
 His swelling coffers overflow,
 And he is puzzled to bestow;

Perplex'd and studious to contrive
 To whom, and how, not what to give;
 His pious frauds conceal the name,
 And screen the modest man from shame.
 Whoe'er would heavenly treasures raise,
 Must grant the boon, escape the praise.
 But his immense and endless gain
 No private charities could drain:
 On public works he fix'd his mind,
 The zealous friend of human kind.
 Convenient inns on each great road
 At his own proper costs endow'd,
 To weary caravans afford
 Refreshment, both at bed and board.
 From Thames, the Tiber, and the Rhine,
 Nations remote with Ali dine;
 In various tongues his bounty's blest,
 While with surprise the stranger guest
 Does here on unbought dainties feast:
 See stately palaces arise,
 And gilded domes invade the skies.
 Say, muse, what lords inhabit here?
 Nor favourite eunuch, prince, nor peer?
 The poor, the lame, the blind, the sick,
 The idiot, and the lunatic.
 He curb'd each river's swelling pride,
 O'er the reluctant murmuring tide
 From bank to bank his bridges stride.
 A thousand gracious deeds were done,
 Bury'd in silence and unknown.

At length, worn out with years and care,
 Sha Abbas dy'd; left his young heir
 Sha Sefi, unexperienc'd, raw,
 By his stern father kept in awe;
 To the seraglio's walls confin'd,
 Barr'd from the converse of mankind.
 Strange jealousy! a certain rule,
 To breed a tyrant and a fool.
 Still Ali was prime minister,
 But had not much his master's ear;
 Walk'd on unfaithful, slippery ground,
 Till an occasion could be found
 To pick a quarrel; then, no doubt,
 As is the mode at court—turn out.
 Sha Sefi, among eunuchs bred,
 With them convers'd, by them was led;
 Beardless, half-men! in whose false breasts,
 Nor joy, nor love, nor friendship, rests.
 There spight and pining envy dwell,
 And rage as in their native hell;
 For, conscious of their own disgrace
 Each excellence they would debase,
 And vent their spleen on human race.
 This Ali found. Strange senseless lies
 And inconsistent calumnies
 They buz into the monarch's ears,
 And he believes all that he hears.
 "Great prince," said they, "Ali, your slave—
 "Whom we acknowledge wise and brave—
 "Yet pardon us—we can't but see
 "His boundless pride and vanity:
 "His bridges triumph o'er each tide,
 "In their own channels taught to glide.
 "Each beggar, and each lazy drone,
 "His subject, more than yours, is grown:

" And for a palace leaves his cell,
 " Where Xerxes might be proud to dwell.
 " His inns for travellers provide,
 " Strangers are list'd on his side:
 " In his own house how grand the scene!
 " Tissues and velvets are too mean,
 " Gold, jewels, pearls, unheard expence!
 " Suspected, bold, magnificence!
 " Whence can this flood of riches flow?
 " Examine his accounts, you'll know:
 " Your eye on your exchequer cast,
 " The secret will come out at last."

Ali next morn (for 'twas his way
 To rise before the dawn of day)
 Went early to the council-board,
 Prostrate on earth, his king ador'd.
 The king, with countenance severe,
 Look'd sternly on his minister:
 " Ali," said he, " I have been told,
 " Great treasures, both in gems and gold,
 " Were left, and trusted to your care;
 " 'Mong these, one gem exceeding rare,
 " I long to view; which was (they said)
 " A present from the sultan made,
 " The finest that the world e'er saw,
 " White, large, and fair, without a flaw."
 Th' unblemish'd Ali thus reply'd,
 " Great sir! it cannot be deny'd,
 " 'Tis brilliant, beautiful, and clear,
 " The Great Mogul has not its peer.
 " Please it your majesty, to go
 " Into the treasury below,
 " You'll wonder at its piercing ray,
 " The sun gives not a nobler day."

Together now they all descend;
 Poor Ali had no other friend,
 But a soul faithful to its trust,
 The sure asylum of the just.
 In proper classes now are seen
 The diamonds bright, and emeralds green;
 Pearls, rubies, sapphires, next appear,
 Dispos'd in rows with nicest care.
 The king views all with curious eyes,
 Applauds with wonder and surprise,
 Their order and peculiar grace,
 Each thing adapted to its place;
 The rest with envious leer behold,
 And stumble upon bars of gold.
 Next, in an amber box, is shown
 The noblest jewel of the crown:
 " This, sir," said he, " believe your slave,
 " Is the fine gem the sultan gave;
 " Around it dart its beams of light,
 " No comet e'er was half so bright."
 The king with joy the gem admires,
 Well-pleas'd, and half-convinc'd, retires.
 " Ali," said he, " with you I dine;
 " Your furniture, I'm told, is fine."
 Wife Ali, for this favour show'd,
 Humbly with lowest reverence bow'd.

At Ali's house now every hand
 Is busy at their lord's command;
 Where at th' appointed hour resort
 The king and all his splendid court.
 Ali came forth his prince to meet,
 And, lowly bowing, kiss'd his feet.

On all his compliments bestows,
 Civil alike to friends and foes.
 The king, impatient to behold
 His furniture of gems and gold,
 From room to room the chase pursued,
 With curious eyes each corner view'd,
 Ransack'd th' apartments o'er and o'er,
 Each closet search'd, unlock'd each door;
 But all he found was plain and coarse,
 The meanest Persian scarce had worse;
 These Ali for convenience bought,
 Nor for expensive trifles fought.
 One door a prying eunuch spy'd,
 With bars and locks well fortify'd,
 And now, secure to find the prize,
 Show'd it the king with joyful eyes.
 " Ali," said he, " that citadel
 " Is strong, and baricadoed well?
 " What have you there?" Ali reply'd,
 " Oh, sir, there's lodg'd my greatest pride;
 " There are the gems I value most,
 " And all the treasures I can boast."
 All now convinc'd of his disgrace,
 Triumph appear'd in every face.
 The monarch doubted now no more;
 The keys are brought, unlock'd the door,
 When, lo! upon the wall appear
 His shepherd's weeds hung up with care,
 Nor crook nor scrip was wanting there;
 Nor pipe that tun'd his humble lays,
 Sweet solace of his better days!
 Then, bowing low, he touch'd his breast,
 And thus the wondering king address'd:
 " Great Prince! your Ali is your slave,
 " To you belong whate'er I have;
 " Goods, house, are yours, nay yours this head,
 " For speak the word, and I am dead:
 " These moveables, and these alone,
 " I may with justice call my own.
 " Your royal sire, Abbas the Great,
 " Whom nations prostrate at his feet
 " On earth ador'd; whose soul at rest,
 " In paradise a welcome guest,
 " * Enjoys its full, and fragrant bowers,
 " Or wantons upon beds of flowers,
 " While the pure stream, in living rills,
 " From rocks of adamant distils,
 " And black-ey'd nymphs attend his nod,
 " Fair daughters of that blest abode:
 " By his command, I left the plain,
 " An humble, but contented swain.
 " Nor sought I wealth, nor power, nor place;
 " All these were owing to his grace;
 " 'Twas his mere bounty made me great,
 " And fix'd me here, in this high seat,
 " The mark of envy. Much he gave,
 " But yet of nought depriv'd his slave:
 " He touch'd not these. Alas! whose spite,
 " Whose avarice, would these excite?
 " My old, hereditary right!
 " Grant me but these, Great Prince, once more,
 " Grant me the pleasure to be poor,
 " This scrip, these homely weeds, I'll wear,
 " The bleating flocks shall be my care;

* Such is the Paradise the Turks expect.

"Th' employ that did my youth engage,
 "Shall be the comfort of my age."
 The king, amaz'd at such a scorn
 Of riches, in a shepherd born;
 "How soars that soul," said he, "above
 "The courtier's hate, or monarch's love!
 "No power such virtue can efface,
 "No jealous malice shall disgrace.
 "Wealth, grandeur, pomp, are a mere cheat,
 "But this is to be truly great."
 While tears ran trickling down his face,
 He clasp'd him in a close embrace;
 Then caus'd himself to be undrest,
 And cloth'd him in his royal vest:
 The greatest honour he could give,
 Or Persian subjects can receive.

THE SWEET-SCENTED MISER.

TELL me, my noble generous friend,
 With what design, and to what end,
 Do greedy fools heap up with care
 That pelf, which they want heart to share?
 What other pleasure can they know,
 But to enjoy, or to bestow?
 Acts of benevolence and love
 Give us a taste of heaven above;
 We imitate th' immortal powers,
 Whose sun-shine, and whose kindly showers,
 Refresh the poor and barren ground,
 And plant a paradise around:
 But this mean, sneaking avarice,
 Is a collection of all vice.
 Where this foul weed but taints the place,
 Nor virtue grows, nor worth, nor grace;
 The soul a desert waste remains,
 And ghastly desolation reigns.
 But where will these grave morals tend?
 Pardon my zeal, dear courteous friend;
 The province of my humbler vein,
 Is not to preach, but entertain.

Gripe, from the cradle to the grave,
 Was good for nothing, but to save;
 Mammon his God; to him alone
 He bow'd, and his short creed was known:
 On his thumb-nail it might be wrote,
 "A penny sav'd's a penny got."
 This rich poor man was jogging down,
 Once on a time, from London town;
 With him his son, a handy lad:
 To dress his daddy—or his pad:
 Among his dealers he had been,
 And all their ready cash swept clean.
 Gripe, to save charges on the road,
 At each good house cramm'd in a load:
 With boil'd and roast his belly fill'd,
 And greedily each tankard swill'd:
 How savoury, how sweet the meat!
 How good the drink when others treat!
 Now on the road Gripe trots behind,
 For weighty reasons (as you'll find):
 The boy soon long'd to take a whet,
 His horse at each sign made a set,
 And he spurr'd on with great regret.
 This the old man observ'd with pain,
 "Ah! son," said he, "the way to gain
 "Wealth (our chief good) is to abstain;

"Check each expensive appetite,
 "And make the most of every mite:
 "Consider well, my child, O think
 "What numbers are undone by drink!
 "Hopeful young men! who might be great,
 "Die well, and leave a large estate;
 "But, by lewd comrades led astray,
 "Guzzling, throw all their means away.
 "Tom Dash, of parts acute and rare,
 "Can split a fraction to a hair;
 "Knows Wingate better than his creed,
 "Can draw strong ale, or a weak deed;
 "By precedents a bond can write,
 "Or an indenture tripartite;
 "Can measure land, pasture, or wood,
 "Yet never purchas'd half a rood.
 "Whom all these liberal arts adorn,
 "Is he not rich! as sheep new shorn!
 "The reason need not far be sought,
 "For three-pence gain'd, he spends a groat.
 "There's Billy Blowse, that merry fellow,
 "So wondrous witty when he's mellow;
 "Ale and mundungus, in despite
 "Of nature, make the clown polite.
 "When those rich steams chafe his dull head,
 "What flowers shoot up in that hot-bed!
 "His jests, when fogs his temples shroud,
 "Like the sun bursting through a cloud,
 "Blaze out, and dazzle all the crowd:
 "They laugh, each wag's exceeding gay,
 "While he, poor ninny! jokes away
 "By night, whate'er he gets by day.
 "To these examples I might add
 "A 'squire or two, troth full as bad;
 "Who, doom'd by heaven for their sins,
 "Mind nothing but their nipperkins:
 "But these, at this time, shall suffice;
 "By saving, boy, that is, be wise."

Now, muse, come hold thy nose, and tell
 What doleful accident befel;
 His horse set hard, an ancient hack,
 That twice ten years carry'd a pack,
 But such a cargo ne'er before;
 He had him cheap, and kept him poor;
 His bowels stuff'd with too much meat,
 He sat uneasy in his seat,
 And riggled often to and fro,
 With painful gripings gnaw'd below.
 His distance yet in hope to gain,
 For the next inn he spurs amain;
 In haste alights, and scuds away,
 But time and tide for no man stay.
 No means can save whom heaven has curst,
 For out th' impetuous torrent burst.
 Struck dumb, aghast at first he stood,
 And scratch'd his head in pensive mood:
 But, wisely judging 'twas in vain
 To make an outcry, and complain,
 Of a bad bargain made the best,
 And lull'd his troubled soul to rest.
 Back he return'd with rueful face,
 And shuffled through the house apace;
 My landlady screams out in haste,
 "Old gentleman, ho!—where so fast?
 "Before you go, pray pay your shot,
 "This young man here has drunk a pot."

"A pot!" said Gripe; "oh, the young rogue!"
 "Ah, ruinous, expensive dog!"
 And, muttering curses in his ear,
 Look'd like a witch with hellish leer;
 But, finding 'twas in vain to fret,
 Pull'd out his catskin, paid the debt.

This point adjusted, on they fare,
 Ambrosial sweets perfume the air:
 The younker, by the fragrant scent,
 Perceiving now how matters went,
 Laugh'd inwardly, could scarce contain,
 And kept his countenance with pain.
 At last he cries, "Now, sir, an't please,
 "I hope you're better, and at ease."
 "Better, you booby!—'tis all out"—
 "What's out?" said he. "You drunken lout!"
 "All in my trowfers—well—no matter—
 "Not great—th' expence of soap and water;
 "This charge—if times are not too hard,
 "By management may be repair'd:
 "But, oh! that damn'd confounded pot!
 "Extravagant, audacious sot;
 "This, this indeed, my soul does grieve,
 "There's two-pence lost without retrieve!"

THE INCURIOUS BENCHER.

At Jenny Mann's, where heroes meet,
 And lay their laurels at her feet;
 The modern Pallas, at whose shrine
 They bow, and by whose aid they dine:
 Colonel Brocade among the rest
 Was every day a welcome guest.
 One night as carelessly he stood,
 Cheering his reins before the fire,
 (So every true-born Briton should)
 Like that, he chaf'd, and fum'd, with ire.
 "Jenny," said he, "'tis very hard,
 "That no man's honour can be spar'd;
 "If I but sup with Lady Duchs, }
 "Or play a game at ombre, such is
 "The malice of the world, 'tis said,
 "Although his Grace lay drunk in bed,
 "'Twas I that caus'd his aching head.
 "If Madam Doodle would be witty,
 "And I am summon'd to the city,
 "To play at blind-man's-buff, or so,
 "What won't such hellish malice do?
 "If I but catch her in a corner,
 "Humph—'tis, Your servant, Colonel Horner:
 "But rot the sneering fops, if e'er
 "I prove it, it shall cost them dear;
 "I swear by this dead-doing blade,
 "Dreadful examples shall be made:
 "What—can't they drink bohea and cream,
 "But (d—n them) I must be their theme?
 "Other men's business let alone,
 "Why should not coxcombs mind their own?"
 As thus he rav'd with all his might (How insecure from Fortune's spight,
 Alas! is every mortal wight!)
 To show his ancient spleen to Mars,
 Fierce Vulcan caught him by the a—
 Stuck to his skirts, insatiate varlet!
 And fed with pleasure on the scarlet.
 Hard by, and in the corner, fate
 A Bencher grave, with look sedate,

Smoking his pipe, warm as a toast,
 And reading over last week's post;
 He saw the foe the fort invade,
 And soon smelt out the breach he made:
 But not a word—a little fly
 He look'd, 'tis true, and from each eye
 A side-long glance sometimes he sent,
 To bring him news, and watch th' event.
 At length, upon that tender part
 Where honour lodges (as of old Authentic Hudibras has told)
 The blustering colonel felt a smart.
 Sore griev'd for his affronted bum,
 Frisk'd, skip'd, and bounce'd about the room;
 Then turning short, "Zounds, sir!" he cries—
 "Pox on him, had the fool no eyes?"
 "What! let a man be burnt alive!"
 "I am not, sir, inquisitive"
 (Reply'd Sir Gravity) "to know
 "Whate'er your honour's pleas'd to do;
 "If you will burn your tail to tinder,
 "Pray what have I to do to hinder?
 "Other mens business let alone,
 "Why should not coxcombs mind their own?"
 Then, knocking out his pipe with care,
 Laid down his penny at the bar;
 And, wrapping round his frieze furtout,
 Took up his crab-tree, and walk'd out.

THE BUSY INDOLENT:

A TALE.

JACK CARELESS was a man of parts,
 Well skill'd in the politer arts,
 With judgment read, with humour writ:
 Among his friends past for a wit:
 But lov'd his ease more than his meat,
 And wonder'd knaves could toil and cheat,
 T' expose themselves by being great. }
 At no levees the suppliant bow'd;
 Nor courted for their votes the crowd:
 Nor riches nor preferment sought,
 Did what he pleas'd, spoke what he thought.
 Content within due bounds to live,
 And what he could not spend, to give:
 Would whiff his pipe o'er nappy ale,
 And joke, and pun, and tell his tale;
 Reform the state, lay down the law,
 And talk of lords he never saw;
 Fight Marlborough's battles o'er again,
 And push the French on Blenheim's plain;
 Discourse of Paris, Naples, Rome,
 Though he had never stirr'd from home:
 'Tis true he travel'd with great care,
 The tour of Europe—in his chair.
 Was loth to part without his load,
 Or move till morning peep'd abroad.
 One day this honest, idle rake,
 Nor quite asleep, nor well awake,
 Was lolling in his elbow chair,
 And building castles in the air;
 His nipperkin (the port was good)
 Half empty at his elbow stood,
 When a strange noise offends his ear,
 The din increas'd as it came near,
 And in his yard at last he view'd
 Of farmers a great multitude;

Who that day, walking of their rounds,
 Had disagreed about their bounds;
 And sure the difference must be wide,
 Where each does for himself decide.
 Volleys of oaths in vain they swear,
 Which burst like guiltless bombs in air; [oaf!]
 And, "Thou'rt a knave!" and, "Thou'rt an
 Is banded round with truth enough.
 At length they mutually agree,
 His worship should be referee,
 Which courteous (Jack consents to be:
 Though for himself he would not budge)
 Yet for his friends an arrant drudge;
 A conscience of this point he made,
 With pleasure readily obey'd,
 And shot like lightning to their aid.
 The farmers, summon'd to his room,
 Bowing with awkward reverence come.
 In his great chair his worship sate,
 A grave and able magistrate:
 Silence proclaim'd, each clack was laid,
 And flippant tongues with pain obey'd.
 In a short speech, he first computes
 The vast expence of law disputes,
 And everlasting chancery suits.
 With zeal and warmth he railed then
 Pack'd juries, sheriffs, talesters!
 And recommended in the close,
 Good neighbourhood, peace, and repose.
 Next weigh'd with care each man's pretence,
 Perus'd records, heard evidence,
 Observ'd, reply'd, hit every blot,
 Unravel'd every Gordian knot;
 With great activity and parts,
 Inform'd their judgments, won their hearts;
 And, without fees, or time mispent,
 By strength of ale and argument,
 Dispatch'd them home, friends and content.
 Trusty, who at his elbow sate,
 And with surprise heard the debate,
 Astonish'd, could not but admire
 His strange dexterity and fire;
 His wise discernment and good sense,
 His quickness, ease, and eloquence.
 "Lord! sir," said he, "I can't but chide:
 "What useful talents do you hide!
 "In half an hour you have done more
 "Than Puzzle can in half a score,
 "With all the practice of the courts,
 "His cases, precedents, reports."
 Jack with a smile reply'd, "'Tis true,
 "This may seem odd, my friend, to you,
 "But give me not more than my due.
 "No hungry judge nods o'er the laws,
 "But hastens to decide the cause:
 "Who hands the oar, and drags the chain,
 "Will struggle to be free again.
 "So lazy men and indolent,
 "With cares oppress'd, and business spent,
 "Exert their utmost powers and skill,
 "Work hard; for what? Why, to sit still.
 "They toil, they sweat, they want no fee,
 "For ev'n sloth prompts to industry.
 "Therefore, my friend, I freely own
 "All this address I now have shown,

"Is mere impatience, and no more,
 "To lounge and loiter as before:
 "Life is a span, the world an inn—
 "Here, firrah, t' other nipperkin."

THE YEOMAN OF KENT:

A TALE.

A YEOMAN bold (suppose of Kent)
 Liv'd on his own, and paid no rent;
 Manur'd his own paternal land,
 Had always money at command,
 To purchase bargains, or to lend,
 T' improve his stock, or help a friend:
 At Cressy and Poictiers, of old,
 His ancestors were bowmen bold;
 Whose good yew bows, and sinews strong,
 Drew arrows of a cloth-yard long;
 For England's glory, strew'd the plain
 With barons, counts, and princes slain.
 Belov'd by all the neighbourhood,
 For his delight was doing good:
 At every mart his word a law,
 Kept all the shuffling knaves in awe.
 How just is heaven, and how true,
 To give to such desert its due!
 'Tis in authentic legions said,
 Two twins at once had bless'd his bed;
 Frank was the eldest, but the other
 Was honest Numps, his younger brother;
 That, with a face effeminate,
 And shape too fine and delicate,
 Took after his fond mother Kate,
 A Franklin's daughter. Numps was rough,
 No heart of oak was half so tough,
 And true as steel, to cuff, or kick,
 Or play a bout at double stick,
 Who but friend Numps? While Frank's delight
 Was more (they say) to dance, than fight;
 At Whiston-ales king of the May,
 Among the maids, brisk, frolic, gay,
 He tript it on each holiday.
 Their genius different, Frank would roam
 To town; but Numps, he staid at home.
 The youth was forward, apt to learn,
 Could soon an honest living earn;
 Good company would always keep,
 Was known to Falstaff in East-cheap:
 Threw many a merry main, could bully,
 And put the doctor on his cully;
 Ply'd hard his work, and learnt the way,
 To watch all night, and sleep all day.
 Flush'd with success, new rigg'd, and clean,
 Polite his air, genteel his mien:
 Accomplish'd thus in every part,
 He won a buxom widow's heart.
 Her fortune narrow; and too wide,
 Alas! lay her concerns, her pride:
 Great as a duchess, she would scorn
 Mean fare, a gentlewoman born;
 Poor and expensive! on my life
 'Twas but the devil of a wife.
 Yet Frank, with what he won by night,
 A while liv'd tolerably tight;

And spouse, who sometimes sate till morn
At cribbage, made a good return.
While thus they liv'd from hand to mouth,
She laid a bantling to the youth;
But whether 'twas his own or no,
My authors don't pretend to know.
His charge enhanc'd, 'tis also true
A lying-in 's expensive too,
In cradles, whittles, spice-bowls, sack,
Whate'er the wanton gossips lack;
While scandal thick as hail-shot flies,
Till peaceful bumpers seal their eyes.
Frank deem'd it prudent to retire,
And visit the good man his fire;
In the stage-coach he seats himself,
Loaded with madam and her elf;
In her right hand the coral plac'd,
Her lap a China orange grac'd:
Pap for the babe was not forgot;
And lullaby's melodious note,
That warbled in his ears all day.
Shorten'd the rugged, tedious way.

Frank, to the mansion-house now come,
Rejoic'd to find himself at home;
Neighbours around, and cousins went
By scores, to pay their compliment.
The good old man was kind, 'tis true,
But yet a little shock'd, to view
A 'squire so fine, a sight so new.
But above all, the lady fair
Was pink'd, and deck'd beyond compare;
Scarce a shrieve's wife at an assize
Was dress'd so fine, so roll'd her eyes:
And master too in all his pride,
His silver rattle by his side,
Would shake it oft, then shrilly scream,
More noisy than the yeoman's team;
With tassels and with plumes made proud,
While jingling bells ring out aloud.
The good old dame, ravish'd outright,
Ev'n doated on so gay a sight;
Her Frank, as glorious as the morn;
Poor Numps was look'd upon with scorn.

With other eyes the yeoman sage
Beheld each youth; nought could engage
His wary and discerning heart,
But sterling worth and true desert.
At last, he could no longer bear
Such strange sophisticated ware;
He cries (enrag'd at this odd scene)
"What can this foolish coxcomb mean,
"Who, like a pedlar with his pack,
"Carries his riches on his back?
"Soon shall this blockhead sink my rents,
"And alienate my tenements,
"Which long have stood in good repair,
"Nor sunk, nor rose, from heir to heir;
"Still the same rent without advance,
"Since the Black Prince first conquer'd France:
"But now, alas! all must be lost,
"And all my prudent projects crost.
"Brave honest race! Is it thus then
"We dwindle into gentlemen?
"But I'll prevent this foul disgrace,
"This butterfly from hence I'll chase."

He saddles Ball without delay,
To London town directs his way;
There at the Herald's office he Took out his coat, and paid his fee,
And had it cheap, as wits agree.
A lion rampant, stout and able,
Argent the field, the border sable;
The gay escutcheon look'd as fine,
As any new-daub'd country sign.
Thus having done what he decreed,
Home he returns with all his speed:
"Here, son," said he, "since you will be
"A gentleman in spite of me;
"Here, sir, this gorgeous bauble take,
"How well it will become a rake!
"Be what you seem: this is your share;
"But honest Numps shall be my heir;
"To him I'll leave my whole estate,
"Lest my brave race degenerate.

THE HAPPY LUNATIC.

TO DOCTOR M——. A TALE.

WHEN saints were cheap in good Nol's reign,
As sinners now in Drury-Lane;
Wrapt up in mysteries profound,
A saint perceiv'd his head turn round:
Whether the sweet and savoury wind,
That should have been discharg'd behind,
For want of vent had upward fled,
And seiz'd the fortrefs of his head;
Ye sage philosophers, debate:
I solve no problems intricate.
That he was mad, to me is clear,
Else why should he, whose nicer ear
Could never bear church-music here,
Dream that he heard the blest above,
Chanting in hymns of joy and love?
Organs themselves, which were of yore
The music of the scarlet whore,
Are now with transport heard. In fine,
Ravish'd with harmony divine,
All earthly blessings he defies,
The guest and favourite of the skies.
At last, his too officious friends
The doctor call, and he attends;
The patient cur'd, demands his fee.
"Curse on thy farting pills and thee," Reply'd the saint: "ah! to my cost
"I'm cur'd; but where's the heaven I lost?
"Go, vile deceiver, get thee hence,
"Who'd barter paradise for sense?"
Ev'n so bemus'd (that is, posselt),
With raptures fir'd, and more than blest?
In pompous epic, towering odes,
I strut with heroes, feast with gods;
Enjoy by turns the tuneful quire,
For me they touch each golden lyre.
Happy delusion! kind deceit!
Till you, my friend, reveal the cheat;
Your eye severe, traces each fault,
Each swelling word, each tinsel thought.
Cur'd of my frenzy, I despise
Such trifles, stript of their disguise,
Convinc'd, and miserably wise.

THE LIFE OF PATTISON.

OF the personal history of William Pattison, a youth of a very extraordinary genius, few particulars have been transmitted by his contemporaries; and for these we are chiefly indebted to the anonymous editor of his poems, who was enabled to perform "this act of justice to his memory," by a casual acquaintance, the inspection of his literary correspondence, and the communications of his friends "in the north, and at Cambridge."

As the researches which have been made in the two seminaries of Appleby, and Sidney College, to which this unfortunate scholar belonged, have furnished no new memorials of his person or his genius, the present writer must content himself with repeating the few melancholy incidents, which have hitherto formed the slender history of his life.

He was born at Peasmarsh, near Rye, in the county of Sussex, in 1706, of a family in no respect illustrious; his father being a farmer at that place, who rented a considerable estate belonging to the Earl of Thanet.

In his early childhood, having discovered the most promising marks of lively parts, and a great propensity to learning, and his father being unable to give him a suitable education, he obtained the patronage of the Earl of Thanet, who placed him at the free-school of Appleby, in Westmoreland, under the tuition of Mr. Banks, a teacher of eminent learning and abilities.

After the death of Mr. Banks, he continued about two years under the care of his successor, Mr. Thomas Nevinson of Queen's College, Oxford, during which time he chiefly applied himself to the study of classical literature and poetry.

About this time, he became acquainted with the Rev. Mr. Noble, schoolmaster at Kirkby Stephen, a man of letters, and an excellent critic in poetry, who used frequently to read the classics with him, taught him how to discern the beauties and the faults of authors, described to him the difference between false wit and judicious writing, and gave him such instructions towards the advancement of his knowledge, and the refinement of his taste, as proved very advantageous to him in the prosecution of his studies.

Mr. Nevinson being presented to a living in Northumberland, resigned the school, and was succeeded by Mr. Richard Yates of Queen's College (the presentation to the school being in that College), under whose care he continued about a year.

While he was at school, he happened to contract a debt, of about ten pounds, for books, to three booksellers in Penrith, who rudely demanded payment. Having no money, nor any friend who could advance him that sum, he wrote an Ode upon Christmas Day, and presented it to Sir Christopher Musgrave, Bart. at Edenhall, who was so much pleased with it, that he ordered his chaplain to pay immediately what money he owed for books.

Some time after, he addressed an Ode to John Tuston, Esq., nephew to the Earl of Thanet, in which his acknowledgments to the Tuston family are finely expressed, and for which he was very handsomely rewarded.

Shortly after, he ridiculed the pretensions of three poetical coxcombs, who, at that time, pestered the school with their nonsensical rhymes, by the following transposition of Dryden's fine epigram on Milton,

M m ij

THE LIFE OF PATTISON.

*Three poetasters in one age were born,
And all at once did Appleby adorn;
The first in penury of thought surpass,
In rumbling cant the next, in both the last;
The force of dulness could no farther go,
To make a third, she joined the former two.*

Though he avowed, upon every occasion, the obligations he was under to the Thanet family, yet he had the misfortune, by some misunderstanding, to experience the neglect of his noble patron before he left Appleby; in consequence of which, his election to Queen's College, Oxford, pursuant to the foundation, was prevented, and he returned home to his parents. He left Appleby school in 1723; and the year following, he was sent to Sidney College, Cambridge, "wholly through means of his mother's indulgence, whom he ever declared to be the most tender, as his father was one of the most rigid parents."

As soon as he was settled in the University, he wrote an Epistle to a Friend in the north, which contains an elegant and interesting description of a college life.

At Cambridge, as at Appleby, poetry was his favourite pursuit, and angling the chief alleviation of his studies; for he was always averse to the public disputations, and on a particular occasion, shewed his resentment at being carried to the schools by the wranglers.

*As the brute world to father Adam came,
Requesting, with inquiring looks, a name,
To every beast a title he assign'd,
And nominated all the sylvan-kind.
So savage multitudes about me throng;
Did Adam's talent but to me belong!
Yet though they cheat the world by their disguise,
They are but asses to poetic eyes.*

He was considered as a youth of much hope; and the proofs which he exhibited of intellectual energy, and literary powers, procured him the acquaintance of the most distinguished scholars in the University.

While his poetical compositions obtained him a high reputation among men of wit and learning, his companionable talents, and the festivity of his conversation, procured him a ready admission to the circles of elegance and fashion.

Few men came into company better qualified to please, or to instruct; but it was his misfortune to split on the rock of misapplication; for he made that which should have been only an amusement, his principal pursuit, and suffered himself to be deluded from the rugged paths of study, by the fascination of elegant society, and the dreams of a warm and voluptuous imagination. This latter disposition led him into some juvenile imprudences, which exposed him to the censure of his tutor, whose temper, it is said, was ill qualified to reconcile him to the discipline of the College.

The grounds of the quarrel between him and his tutor cannot at this time be known; but it appears, from his epistolary correspondence, that "the rigour with which his tutor treated him was not easy to brook, and he could very ill bear restraint;" and he tells of himself, "that it was the threats of expulsion, and the dread of such a scandal, which made him cut his name out of the College book."

He left the University, whatever was the cause, in thoughtless gaiety, by deputing his gown to make his apology in the following verses, which he pinned upon it, at his departure:

*Whoever gives himself the pains to stoop,
And take my venerable tatters up,
To his presuming inquisition I,
In loco Pattisoni thus reply:
Tir'd with the senseless jargon of the gown,
My master left the college for the town;
Where, from pedantic drudgery secur'd,
He laughs at follies, which he once endur'd;
And scorns his precious minutes to regale,
With wretched college wit, and college ale;*

THE LIFE OF PATTISON.

Far nobler pleasures open to his view,
Pleasures for ever sweet, for ever new!
Bright wit, soft beauty, and ambition's fire
Inflame his bosom, and his muse inspire;
While to his few, but much endearing friends,
His love and humble service he commends.

His most sincere friends expressed their concern at his departure, and strongly urged him either to return, or at least to make an apology for his behaviour to the master and fellows of the college. The former he could not be persuaded to, but the latter he readily complied with, in a state of his case, which he transmitted in a letter to one of his friends.

"The world is ever inclined," says he, "to suspect us of partiality, when we speak of ourselves; and it is unnatural for a person to condemn himself, when he has an adversary so ready as mine to deal with, I was going to say, so powerful, without considering the validity of his accusations, which must be proved. If they are found to be true, I shall, with a great deal of resignation, submit to the censures of mankind; and when he has honestly acquitted himself from the same charge to his conscience, I invite him to throw the first stone. Here is a field of satire opened for me; but I scorn to draw upon a naked man, and shall content myself. But I hope, the absolute necessity of such a proceeding will, in some measure, excuse me to that usual indulgence, which the master and the fellows have ever favoured me with, especially since it is the last offence I am likely to be guilty of."

In support of the charge against his tutor, the following authorities are produced from his epistolary correspondence.

"I advise you," says Mr. Wase, of Sidney College, "to send a decent epistle to the master, with an impartial account of the ill treatment which you have met with under B——; display therein his severe usage in moving terms, and urge, that he was the chief cause of your abrupt departing hence. B—— is not as yet returned; the fellows begin in an open manner to complain of his misbehaviour to them, and disbonesty to his creditors; they have met together twice, to consult some means of redressing the grievance of college servants and others."

"B—— threatens," says Mr. Wase in another letter, "to give you trouble; but on what score is unknown to me. He seems exceedingly incensed at your leaving college, counter to his permission; and, for the defence of his own reputation with regard to you, exposes his accounts, and letters from your friends, to every curious eye, and takes no small pains to enumerate, in emphatical words, what mighty services he has done, and what vast kindnesses he always showed you, whilst in college. He opened his books, to my view, yesterday morning, wherein I perceive you stand indebted to him, all matters justly calculated, but for a mere trifle; for he has your caution-money in his custody, being ten pounds, and exhibition money, &c. to receive on your account; all which will near amount to a complete disbursement of himself, &c."

"I know of no severities from his tutor," says Mr. Webber, of Peasmarsh, "but what were necessary to make him sensible of his doings, and to know to whom he was indebted for his favours, which I am sure he was to Mr. B——."

The last account, if not wholly true, is rendered extremely probable, by the circumstances that may reasonably be supposed to have misguided a young, enthusiastic, ambitious mind, like that of Pattison. But whatever offices of friendship his tutor might shew him while under his care, it was ungenerous to expose his private affairs after his departure; all obligations being cancelled, when a public declaration is made of them.

The apology which he made, to avert the reproach of expulsion, met with a reception so very favourable, as renders it sufficiently probable, that he had not been guilty of any of those gross immoralities, which require the infliction of the severest statutable animadversion. So unwilling was the society to lose him, that his exhibition was kept in suspense for some time, in expectation of his return to college. His friends took occasion, from this circumstance, to renew their solicitations, and with some hopes of success. "I will be at Cambridge," says he, in a letter to Mr. Wase, "by next Division; for I am afraid I cannot dispatch affairs before."

But he only talked of returning: his determination, which seems never to have been very steady, soon yielded to the fascinating pleasures of irresistible London. "I meet every day," he adds,

"with very great encouragement among persons of distinction, and, in short, live so happily, that I begin to be in love with the town."

This happiness was but of short duration; and his life became the forfeit of his imprudence, in not returning to college, after his friends had prepared the way for his kind reception.

Upon his leaving the University, in 1726, he had recommendations to many persons of distinguished rank and abilities in London, by whom he was encouraged to publish a collection of his poems by subscription. He seems to have been introduced to Pope, to whom he addressed an epistle, and who promoted the subscription to his Miscellany; and he lived in habits of familiar intimacy and correspondence with Eusden and Harte.

When the persons of distinction, by whom he was caressed and applauded, became quite tired out, by repeated acts of friendship, he subsisted, for some time, on the casual profits of the subscription, till, at length, that resource failed, and he appears, by the following letter, to have been reduced to such extreme indigence, as to be no longer able to procure the necessaries of life.

"If you was ever touched," says he, "with a sense of humanity, consider my condition; what I am, my proposals will inform you; what I have been, Sidney College, in Cambridge, can witness; what I shall be some few hours hence, I tremble to think.—Spare my blushes!—I have not enjoyed the common necessaries of life for these two days."

What effect this application met with is unknown; a suspicion is insinuated, that it was disregarded, as well as a similar application to Southerne; but it would be a dishonour to human nature to suppose, that so small a request as only a subscription to his miscellany, met with a denial.

In this distress, which was aggravated by a drooping indisposition, he found a friend in Mr. H. Curll, bookseller in the Strand, who received him into his house, in the beginning of June 1727, where he remained about a month, chiefly employed in transcribing his poems for the press, in order to fulfil his engagements to his subscribers.

Shortly after, when a considerable part of the collection was printed, he was seized with the small pox, and attended by Dr. Pellet (by the recommendation of his friend Eusden), who had him conveyed to the house of a nurse, eminent for her skill and care in that disease, in St. Clement's parish.

No care was wanting on the part of Dr. Pellet to have saved him, and the greatest hopes appeared of his recovery; but he had laid his afflictions to heart, and all medicinal prescriptions were ineffectual. A sudden and unexpected turn of the disease put an end to his life, and to the hopes he had raised in all that knew him, of becoming one of the most eminent poets of our nation, July 11. 1727, in the 21st year of his age. He was buried in the upper church yard, belonging to St. Clement Danes in the Strand.

On his death bed, he expressed a strong desire to be reconciled to his father, who had withdrawn the allowance he made him at Cambridge; but he not only, while he was alive, denied him this satisfaction, but even refused, after his death, to perform the last offices to his remains.

The editor of his poems observes, "that though the small-pox contributed to deprive us of so great a genius, yet it was his dying declaration: His heart was broke, through the misfortunes he had fallen under; which," he adds, "I wish I could not say, were wholly owing to himself. It must be declared, that his sufferings were inexpressible; and to sum up all in the words of his friend Mr. Harte: He was miserably unfortunate, to my knowledge."

The Miscellany, for which he took subscriptions, was printed for H. Curll, in the Strand, in 1728, under the title of, The Poetical works of Mr. William Pattison, late of Sidney College, Cambridge; which included Verses to Mr. John Saunders, The Hour-Glass, The Nightingale and Shepherd, The Court of Venus, Orpheus and Eurydice, and Verses to Mr. Mitchell, published in his lifetime.

It appears, by his letters, that he intended to print a second volume of Miscellanies, which were transcribed for the press by himself, consisting of seven epistles of an intended version of Ovid; Sappho to Phaon, Paris to Helen, Penelope to Ulysses, Ariadne to Theseus, Oenone to Paris, Dido to Æneas, Laodamia to Proteuslaus, with some other classical translations and occasional poems. He intended also, to write a poem on Angling, in five cantos.

The compiler of this collection thinks he has seen somewhere the Poetical Works of Pattison mentioned in two volumes; but the second volume, if it was indeed printed, has eluded his inquiries.

The poems which were published, and those which were printed, but not published, in his lifetime, with the omission of a few little pieces offensive to decency, are now, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry.

Of his familiar manners and habits of study, the following account is given by one of the friends of his youth, and the companions of his studies :

" Mr. Pattison was a man of great speculation, and consequently a lover of solitude. Of all the books he ever read, Spenser's "Faery Queen" delighted him most. He had read that book through several times ; and I do not question, but his mind received a richness from these romantic representations and paradisaical descriptions. He was no less pleased to see any of these representations realized. There is a place near Appleby, which, by reason of the near resemblance it has to some descriptions in Cowley, he called Cowley's Walk. On one side of the walk is a huge rock, grown over with moss, and ivy climbing to the sides of it, and, in some parts, little trees spring out of the crevices of the rock. At the bottom thereof grows a wild row of trees, but very irregular ; and indeed every part of it looks aged and venerable. In this rock there is a cave naturally arched over the top, in form of a canopy, and the borders of the arch are edged round with ivy, which hangs down and overshades the place, and from hence he called it Hederinda. At the foot of this cave, there runs a stream of water quite through the walk, and the walk is a level plain, which has on one hand the water, and the trees and a precipice on the other. In winter time it looks very full of horror, when nothing remains but rugged rocks and empty wastes ; whereas in the spring time, the singing of the birds, the fragrantcy of the flowers, and the murmuring of the stream, greatly contribute to the embellishment of the place, and render it exceedingly delightful. Many an agreeable afternoon has he amused away in this place with a friend or two, and many a moonlight night has he retired thither to indulge himself in that sadly pleasing melancholy which the awful solemnity of the place necessarily produces.

" He was a great admirer of angling. A great inducement to his becoming a fisher, might probably proceed from that pleasant gloom of thought, which the murmuring of the stream naturally inspired him with, and which is the same cast of mind, that inclined him to admire Cowley's Walk. He was so much a lover of this diversion, that he used frequently to sit up late, and sometimes whole summer nights, upon the banks of his Ituna, with his angle in his hand. Here he used very often to write verses ; and I have heard him say, that many of his lines owed their smoothness and harmony to these streams. Here it was he wrote that agreeable philosophical poem, The Morning Contemplation.

" He was naturally of a facetious fancy, and showed a greater mastery in no kind of writing more than in the burlesque manner. Add to this, that his panegyric was always genteel, but never fustian, and his satire poignant, but never scurrilous."

Next to the "Faery Queen," he was an enthusiastic admirer of Browne's "Britannia's Pastorals," " an imperfect copy of which he had purchased for a shilling, and which, through his misfortunes, was the whole library he left behind him."

The friend, to whom he addressed the Epistle from Cambridge, says, in a letter, " that even at school an early fondness after Ovid's Epistles began to dawn in his breast ;" and, " that as to a new translation, he knew none more equal to the undertaking." He farther confirms his opinion, by the specimen Pattison sent him, in this definitive sentence of his versification, " your's is that in Englisch, which Ovid's is in Latin." His friend, Harte, sent him a letter, only two days before his death, containing some judicious remarks on his version of Ovid, which is preserved in the Memoirs of his Life, and is the most valuable article in his epistolary correspondence.

To his amiable qualities, and agreeable manners, his school-fellows and fellow-collegians bear ample testimony. He loved and esteemed, and was esteemed and beloved by Mr. Taylor, Mr. Roche, Mr. Dickinson, Mr. Hulse, Mr. Ward, Mr. Wase, and Mr. Bunce of Cambridge ; and held an amicable correspondence with Pope, Eusden, and Harte, and retained the affectionate regard of Mr. Yates, of Appleby school, Mr. Noble, of Kirkby Stephen school, and of his dear friend and school-fellow, designed under the poetical name of Florio. Benevolence of disposition, and sensibility of temper, in an excessive degree, seem to have been his peculiar characteristics. If, in some instances, he courted too assiduously, the company of particular circles, it ought to be observed, that one so able to communicate as well as to receive pleasure, was always welcome. He was, by constitutional temper, as well as by benevolent dispositions, and by sprightly talents, a most agreeable companion. It will always be reflected upon with regret, that his companionable talents, and endearing qualities, procured him no useful connection, nor any solid and lasting advantage. He brought cares on himself, as many other young men of genius have done, to drive away care from others, who, placed by fortune above injury, first seduced him from the great work of life, and then suffered him, after much anxiety and much trouble, to die of a broken heart.

As a poet, the pretensions of Pattison seem not to have been hitherto sufficiently considered or allowed. His compositions, though little known, are characterised by a degree of tenderness, terseness, refinement, and harmony, which entitles them to the attention of the readers of poetry. They possess a considerable portion of the strong imagination of Spenser and Milton, and the rich melody of Dryden and Pope. The piece of most conspicuous merit in his works, is the Epistle of Abelard to Eloisa, in answer to Pope's inimitable Epistle of "Eloisa to Abelard". It is evidently the production of a man of sensibility and genius; and for flowing description, passionate language, picturesque imagery, and pathetic exclamation, is only inferior to the production of Pope, of which it is an imitation, even to the cadence of the verse. It is impossible to read it without experiencing the alternate impulse of desire, pity, or rage; and lastly, the freezing languor of irrecoverable despair. It has not been exceeded by the compositions of Cawthorne and Warwick on the same subject. The Epistles of Rosamond to Henry, and Henry to Rosamond, abound in natural and tender sentiments, and apposite imagery. The fragment of an Epistle from Yarrico to Inkle is truly Ovidian; it is much to be regretted, that it is unfinished. The Morning Contemplation abounds in excellent morality, enlivened by a variety of appropriate imagery, and many of the ornaments of true poetry. The verses on the 5th of November are vigorously written. They abound in sublime description, vivid imagery, and striking metaphors.

The College Life contains some animated, expressive, and harmonious lines. The liveliness of the description evinces a most vigorous imagination. The Hour Glass deserves every praise. The morality and the poetry are equally conspicuous. His translations from Strada, Claudian, and Virgil, are, in general, classical and spirited, and remarkable for the harmony and elegance of the verse. His Festum Lustrale shews what a master he was of the Latin language. The description is lively, humorous, and just. Of his amatory, humorous and occasional pieces, the poetical merit is much beyond his years; but they are scarcely to be inspected with all the severity of criticism. Considerable allowances are to be made for the exercises of a school-boy, for the incorrect effusions of momentary passion; for a few lines thrown together to please a female, or to amuse a school-fellow; and perhaps not less for the hasty and involuntary productions of indigence and necessity, calculated for the sole purpose of procuring a subsistence.

"He had an uncommon genius," says Mr. Webber, "for English poetry, and he was so taken with it, as to be negligent of other arts of learning, even of such as must be necessary for the composition of a good poet."

"It is too late now to say, that I wish he had behaved so, as to tarry longer where he was, giving the world now and then a specimen of what they might hope from him in time, and then have launched forth, as his judgment, when more mature, should direct him."

The life of Pattison, whose talents raised him high in the opinion of his intimate acquaintance and friends, but failed to procure him the comforts or even the necessities of life, cannot conclude more properly than in the emphatic words of Dr. Johnson, which the writer of this narrative wishes were written in letters of adamant, on the heart of every man of genius in the world.

"Those who, in confidence of superior capacities or attainments, disregard the common maxims of life, should remember, that nothing can atone for the want of prudence; that negligence and irregularity long continued, will make knowledge useless, wit ridiculous, and genius contemptible."

DEDICATION,

TO THE EARL OF PETERBOROW.

MY LORD,

As the Laurel and the Myrtle, are the undoubted trophies of your worth, the Bays is always sure of finding your protection.

And when your Lordship is assured, that, the author of these poems desired they might be placed next to those of his dear friend Mr. Harte, it is but fulfilling his request to ask this favour, which, it is hoped, will not be denied by your Lordship.

If posterity can be told he had the honour to please a Mordaunt, the remainder of his papers shall speedily be offered up at the shrine of merit; if otherwise, warned by the fate of their predecessors, it is resolved that, with their author, they shall rest in peace.

I am,

Your Lordship's

Most obedient

Humble servant,

LUCASIA,

MISCELLANEOUS POEMS.

O D E.

To John Tufton, Esq. Nephew to the Earl of Thanet.

NOR heaps of gold nor monuments as high
 As the ambition of the great,
 Can buy one moment tow'rd's eternity,
 Or change the fix'd decrees of fate;
 'Tis verse alone can give a name,
 And crown our actions with eternal fame:
 Thus mighty Cæsar's triumphs live,
 Not in his monuments, but those his poets give.
 In fields of death, the bleeding warriors toil,
 And brave the loudest storms of fate;
 They die to make eternal fame their spoil,
 And pawn their life for being great:
 To virtue, verse this fame can give,
 Virtue by verse, by virtue poets live;
 For her they tune their numbers high;
 For virtue is the burning glass of poetry.
 But, ah! where does this heavenly goddess
 dwell?
 Where does her blessed seat remain?
 We search the palace, and the hermit's cell,
 We search, but search, alas, in vain!
 Gold is the load-stone of the great,
 And vulgar souls must catch the glitt'ring bait;
 The scale of justice sinks with gold,
 And impious bribes to win the cause, must damn
 the soul.
 In Tufton, muse behold the deity,
 With him begin to grace your song;
 All that is great, and good in him, you see,
 To him your voice, and lyre, belong;
 He rais'd you from a low degree,
 Then let your numbers raise him to the sky;
 Offer what gifts the muse can give,
 He gave you fame, then make his fame to live.
 But, ah, my muse, your colours are too faint,
 Your strength too weak, your theme too great,
 Alas! in vain, your pencil strives to paint,
 What mortal cannot imitate:
 But if he smile, then stretch your wing,
 And tune his praises on a bolder string;
 Then ev'ry tongue shall speak his fame,
 And critics spare my verse, protected with his name.
 Thus gold, at first, is but a sluggish mass,
 Whilst it lies cover'd in the earth;

But when 'tis coin'd, the awful monarch's face
 Makes it a god, and gives it birth;
 The world the sudden god adore,
 And humbly own his universal power;
 Sceptres and kings are in his hand,
 And nature reverences his supreme command.

To my School-Fellow, Mr. William Pattison, upon his Departure from Appleby School.

LEND me thy muse, thy merits to proclaim,
 And give thy worth its just intrinsic fame;
 My muse too humble, and my lays too slow,
 My wings too slender, and my verse too low.
 To me a while, my friend, thy muse impart,
 Grief chills my vigour, and disarms my heart;
 Thy verse alone can tell thy boundless praise,
 Thy lays alone are worthy of thy lays.

Say, never-dying, ever tuneful nine,
 How oft the bard attended at your shrine,
 How oft he rais'd the voice, and tun'd the string,
 How oft he sung your fame,—how oft shall sing.

Ye verdant trees, that in green order rear
 Your waving tresses in the fluid air;
 In a more formidable prospect stand,
 With nodding foilage on poetic land.
 Ye purling streams, that run by Cowley's side,
 Have learn'd, by him, in smoother feet to glide;
 His verse discover'd Hederinda's shade,
 With age and ivy, memorable made:
 The rock affords her never-dying bays,
 To crown her poet with immortal praise.

Your lovely Laura's name shall never die,
 But live coeval with eternity.
 Venus, and all the goddesses around,
 Drest in your verse, with surer light'nings wound
 The little loves, and smiles in numbers roll,
 And Cupid's arrows steal upon the soul.

But now no more the Naiads prattling play,
 But in soft silence slumber out the day;
 Cupid's full quiver, and the court of love,
 The chequer'd scene of Hederinda's grove,
 No more, alas! its wonted joy displays,
 He's gone, that dress'd them in vivific lays:
 He's gone—in Homer no delights abound,
 No sweet variety in Virgil's found,
 Nor music which can heal a lover's wound!
 Sorrow, like the prismatic glass does show
 One undistinguish'd spectacle of woe;

His presence ev'ry sweetest joy improv'd
Still lov'd, and honour'd, by the muse he lov'd.

December 7th, 1723.

YARICO TO INKLE:

AN EPISTLE.

DEAR, faithless man! if e'er that cruel breast
Love's pleasing toys, and soft delights, confess;
Distress like mine, may sure thy pity move,
For tender pity is the child of love!
But can compassion from thy bosom flow?
Source of my wrongs, and fountain of my woe!
Wilt thou repentant, soften at my grief,
Melt at my tears, and lend a late relief!
What have I done? ah! how deserv'd thy hate?
Or was this vengeance treasur'd up by fate?
Then will I mourn my fate's severe decree,
Nor charge a guilt so black, so base on thee;
For O! I know, ah no! I knew, thy mind
Soft as the dove, and as the turtle kind;
How have I seen thy gentle bosom move,
And heave, contagious, to some tale of love!
How have I heard thee paint the faithfull'st pair,
Describe their bliss, and e'en their raptures share!
Then have thy lips, with sweet transition swore
Thy love more lasting, and thy passion more!

And what, is truth, if signs like these deceive!
Signs! that might win the wariest to believe.

THE COLLEGE LIFE.

TO A FRIEND.

Sid. Coll. Cantab. March 15. 1724-5.

SIR,

FROM sacred shades, and academic groves,
Where, lost in thought, a musing fancy roves;
What kind endearing numbers shall I send,
To meet the critic in the fondling friend?

Here learned solitudes salute our eyes,
And the gay scenes in real raptures rise;
Through classic shades majestic domes aspire,
And dimly from the piercing eye retire.
Deep through the groves old Cam serenely flows,
Free from the prattling Naiads babbling noise.
His nymphs in gentle silence move along,
And hear their murmurs in some soft'ning song;
Till by the forcing torrent borne away,
They mourn because they can no longer stay:
Poetic hills the wide horizon bound,
And wall the learned paradise around.

But yet—though all things with my soul agree,
Pall'd are my joys, and tasteless without thee;
These visionary pleasures but renew
The real happiness I found in you;
Where venerable Cowley's sacred shade
The sweetest scene of solitude is made;
When stretch'd at ease, amusingly we lay,
How tunefully the minutes danc'd away.

Oh! soothe me, fancy, with some pleasing dream,
And gently waft me to Ituna's stream—

Hark! the soft, balmy, breathing breezes blow—
Hark! Hederinda's warbling murmurs flow—
Here oft I left the busy world behind,
And found the better part, in you refin'd.

But would you know how I divide my time,
Betwixt my studies, business, and my rhyme?

Wak'd, by the promise of a day, we rise,
And with our souls salute the dawning skies;
All summon'd, to devotion's fane repair,
And piously begin the day with prayer;
Thence, led by reason's glimmering light, descry
The dark recesses of philosophy;
Through classic groves the wily wanton trace,
And logically urge the puzzling chase.

But when the sounds of the presaging bell
Noon's pleasurable invitation tell;
Moods, methods, figures, swim before my sight,
And syllogisms wing their airy flight.
Confus'd the fairy vision flits away—
And no ideas, but of dinner, stay.

Thus, fabled hags, at midnight's solemn noon,
With magic spells enchant the labouring moon;
But when the cock proclaims the springing light,
Each horrid phantom disappears in night.

Now, those, whom recreating toils invite,
Pour'd on the plain, indulge their lov'd delight;
Now flies aloft in air the whirling ball,
Anxious, the learned rabble wait its fall;
Pursu'd by wafting caps the fury flies,
Rises in height, and lessens in the skies.

Thus healthfully refresh'd, we leave the plain,
For pleasure oft repeated, is but pain.
Next we survey the vast capacious ball,
And take long journies o'er the learned wall;
Or from her tender birth Britannia trace, [race.
And all her glories center'd in great Brunswick's
The dark original of time renew,
And bring three thousand wond'ring years to view.

Now to the muses soft retirements fly,
Or soar with Milton, or with Waller sigh;
Each fav'rite bard o'er pays my curious view,
For who can fail to please who charms like you.

To find us thus, Apollo takes his way,
To sooth the sultry labours of the day;
The tuneful muses charm his list'ning ears,
And in soft sounds he bears away his cares.

Thus, dearest Florio, thus my faithful friend,
In learned luxury my time I spend;
Till length'ning shades the setting sun display,
And falling dews lament the falling day:
Then, lost in thought, where aged Cam divides
Those verdant groves that paint his azure tides,
With musing pleasure I reflect around,
And stand enchanted on poetic ground.
Straight to my glancing thought those bards appear,
That fill'd the world with fame, and charm'd us
Here Spenser, Cowley, and that awful name [here:
Of mighty Milton, flourish'd into fame;
From these amusing groves, his copious mind,
The blooming shades of paradise design'd.
In these retirements, Dryden fann'd his fire,
And gentle Waller tun'd his tender lyre;

Hail! happy bards, whilst thus I think I hear
Your tuneful melody improve my ear,
With rev'rence I approach each sacred shade,
Perhaps by your creating numbers made.
Delusion helps my fancy as I walk,
Hears waters murmur, and soft echoes talk;
Through the dim shade its sacred poet fees,
Or hears his music in the wafted breeze.

Here Locke and Newton through the world were known,

And made unravell'd nature's works their own;
Too soon we lost those fav'rites of the sky,
Yet, Florio may the double loss supply.
Haste, then, my friend, nor let me mourn your stay,
Lo! the world suffers by your long delay—
Let prosp'rous fortune on your will attend,
And in your happy wishes bless your friend.

THE JEALOUS SHEPHERD:

A PASTORAL.

It happen'd once upon a summer's day,
When lads and lassies go to making hay;
The weary mowers laid themselves adown,
To take a bottle and a nap at noon;
When Bootyflub (for so was call'd the swain
That languish'd under Dorothy's disdain)
While others slept, by love was kept awake,
To mourn his fate, and mend his Dolly's rake.

Dolt as I am, (complains the love-sick lout)
Not to consider what I am about?
Here I employ my little stock of art,
But who, alas! shall mend my broken heart?
None can that work perform but Dorothy,
And that will ne'er be done by cruelty;
For still she persecutes me with disdain,
Laughs at my woes, and banters all my pain.

Ah, Dolly! Dolly! can you be so dull,
To leave your lover for a fopish fool?
A butterfly the cabbages destroys,
On you a butterfly his breath employs—
I say no more—my meaning you may guess—
Perhaps you had been pleas'd, had I said less.

But yet there was a time, or else I dream'd,
When Bootyflub in your good graces seem'd;
Then, if you knew I kiss'd a lass at town,
How have I seen you pout, and fret, and frown?
Nay, once you told me, that I need not roam,
For charity should still begin at home.
These jealous hints, or I mistake them, prove
The greatest and the surest signs of love;
Yet, if you lov'd, methinks you cou'd not be
So kind to Floripert, so cross to me.

Remember, how, to jealousy betray'd,
You scolded at the parson's pretty maid;
When with inquiring looks you pass'd the house,
And catch'd me keeping up the damsel's cows;
Your scornful eyes with jealous fury burn'd,
On her they glanc'd, and then on me they turn'd;

I took the hint, and fear'd what might ensue,
So stooping, seem'd to buckle up my shoe,
Then left the lass, and sneak'd away to you.

Alas! alas! that I your love believ'd!
I lov'd, and in my turn am thus deceiv'd,
Nor dare I of my cruel fate complain,
Or, if I do, alas! 'tis all in vain.
For ever curst be that detested day,
When from the last May-fair we took our way,
Remember how you forg'd a false excuse
Your easy natur'd lover to abuse.
No fondling father call'd you back again,
A better reason! 'twas your fondling swain;
And if I meet him e'er alone, I vow,
I'll surely beat the puppy black and blue.
I mark'd the watchful coxcomb all the day,
And kept him from his meditated prey;
Invited him to exercise the ball,
And bravely give, or bravely ward a fall:
So should we both our pleading merits show,
And you, though blind, the difference might know:
But all I urg'd, I urg'd alas! in vain,
Nor would he glory give, nor could he gain.

Ah, Dolly! Dolly! where were all your vows,
When cheese-cakes lur'd you to the tavern-house;
Your vows were as your cheese-cakes sweet, yet weak!

And can you both alike together break?
But if you do so—you, with equal ease, [please.
Can make new vows, and cheese-cakes when you

And could you then your Bootyflub forget,
And in another's lap so kindly sit?
Around his neck your fondling arms you flung,
And learn'd the silly catches which he sung.
Whilst unconcern'd at home you hear me sing,
Or tunefully torment the rosin'd string;
Your favour every way I try to gain,
But dance, or fiddle; sing, or pipe; in vain.

Oh learn at last a flatterer to hate,
And think on Susan Silly's cruel fate:
Her pride poor honest Hobbinol despis'd,
And vainly Tommy Taudry's folly priz'd.
But now, too late, she sees herself undone,
Her portion squander'd, and her honour gone—
What better canst thou hope from such a flame,
But love refuses what my rage would name.

How chang'd is Dolly now, from what she was
When first—Ah, had I never spy'd the lass!
The very time I perfectly can tell,
For love remembers every thing too well!

Sure, I can ne'er forget the Sunday morn,
Though from her mem'ry so soon 'tis worn:
A goodly bible in my hand I took,
And very gravely thought to read my book;
When through the window, by a luckless chance,
Heedless, I cast a customary glance;
'Twas there I saw the pretty Dolly walk,
Fair, and upright as roses on their stalk:
So trimly was the tidy damsel dress'd,
That, spite of all the flowers, she seem'd the best.
Sometimes to smell a pretty rose she stopp'd,
Pleas'd with the smell, the pretty rose she cropp'd;
Then in her snowy breast the fav'rite plac'd,
Her sweeter breast the blushing fav'rite grac'd;
But then! how did I wish myself between
Her swelling bosom, and the flower, unseen?

But as I wish'd, I found a pleasing smart,
I know not how, begin to melt my heart:
Nay, all my limbs with such a shiv'ring shook,
That I the chillness for an ague took.
Ah, had it been one, I had felt less harm,
For I can cure an ague with a charm!
Now, all my spells and charms but trifles prove,
Far stronger are the magic charms of love.

But when I found she smil'd to see me look,
I pleas'd as well, soon laid aside my book,
And, boldly blithsome, to the garden went,
Where she, as well as I, knew what I meant,
Yet seemingly my searching sight to shun,
Behind an apple-tree the gipsy run;
But soon I found the amorous deceit,
And forc'd a kiss, to reconcile the cheat.
But forc'd it so, that when she seem'd to strive
To keep it most, the more she seem'd to give.
Remember then, my lovely faithless maid,
What oaths, what vows, what promises, you made;
Think for your own, if not your lover's sake,
How bad it is a binding oath to break.

But while I thus these silly tales repeat,
I find myself already in a sweat:
What shall I do, too well she knows my love,
And her coy coldness does the scorner prove.

Well then—when shadows length'ning o'er the vale,
Call forth the milk-maid, with her cleanly pail,
To my old sweat-heart Cicily will I go,
And more than all my former kindness show;
Conduct the girl along the crowded mead,
And to tease Dolly, through the pasture lead;
Perhaps I'll whisper out some secret place,
And kiss her too before her jealous face;
Then let her rival cry, and frown, and fret,
And in my cruelty her own forget.
Then let her be as much, or more afraid
Of Cicily, than she was the parson's maid.
So shall my scorn, and counterfeit disdain
Revive her love, if any love remain.

Sid. Col. April 5. 1725.

TO MR. JOHN SAUNDERS,

Occasioned by a sight of some of his Paintings at Cambridge.

WHEN nature, from her unexhausted mine,
Resolves to make some mighty science shine;
Her embryo seeds inform the future birth
Improve the soul, and animate the earth;
From thence, an Homer, or Apelles, rise,
A Shakspeare, or a Saunders, strike our eyes;
And, lo! the promis'd wonder charms my view,
The old Apelles rivall'd in the new!
See! like the sun, his beams their pow'r disclose,
Like him, he paints his progress, as he goes;
Renews the opening spring's enlivening dye,
Or bids rich autumn ripen to the eye.

Let some, elaborately vain, impart
The cold effects of industry, and art,
The warmer draughts deserve a nobler name,
Nature's thy art, as nature is thy theme,

Taught by thy touch, the lily fairer blows,
A softer damask blushes in the rose,
And a more gay creation from thy pencil flows. }
Nor flowers, nor fruits alone, improv'd we see,
But beauty owes her empire half to thee:
How bloom Belinda's never-fading charms!
How, in thy paint, the fair perfection warms!
What pure vermilion tinctures every grace!
How all the goddess brightens in her face!
The mimic rolling eye, now seems to move,
Dawns into life, and kindles into love;
Struck, at each look, a captive of thy art,
I sigh! and fancy arrows in my heart:
Confounded at thy nice creative hand, [stand.
Think the draught lives, and, like some picture,

Would thus each nymph, with providential care,
Ensure her charms, and shine for ever fair,
How might she brave the dire, detested rage,
Of spleen, small-pox, or all-devouring age!
Then, when old time should bid the roses die,
Pale the red pouting lip and dim the sparkling eye,
Then might the fair a bright reversion save,
Bloom in her death, and triumph in her grave:
Then Cælia, spight of that bewitching frown,
Would see thy paint more lasting than her own.

But lo! more glorious aims thy hand pursues,
More glorious scenes attract the ravish'd muse:
Silent I stand, and, lost in wonder see,
A godhead shrouded in mortality!
What majesty eclips'd the shades display!
How the light kindles with eternal day!
What beams of love! what pitying tears are seen!
Meltingly sad, yet solemnly serene!

O happy artist! live for ever blest! [thy breast?
Whence dawn'd this heaven-sprung image in
Sure some kind angel, studious in thy art,
Ting'd the bright dyes, and quicken'd every part;
Hence, like their great original they shine,
Appear as human, but are all divine!
What may not now thy lively touch command?
What may not owe new glories to thy hand?
Thy wond'rous hand not only nature drew,
But copied ev'n the Lord of Nature too.

Sid. Col. Feb. 9. 1725-6.

TO MR. SAUNDERS,

Occasioned by the breaking of the Glass of Mr. Eusden's Picture.

OFT have I thought thy wonder-working art,
Could more than nature's outward form impart,
But now my eyes convinc'd the truth believe,
For lo! the picture more than seems to live,
Pleas'd to decide mistrusting reason's strife,
Breaks through the glass, and startles into life.

BURLESQUE.

DEAR HULSE,

WHEN Ovid in his exile wrote,
Low was his verse, and barren was his thought;
My case is just the same, and for to mock it,
The muse keeps equal tenor with my pocket;
And for th' assurance of a moderate poet,
I think these lines are proof enough to show it.

Rest that, howe'er, as 'twill—can I be-fong ye,
Se as to get a little cash among ye;

This week, by carrier Hafwel, you may send it,
And, may the gods that guard the roads defend it!
With that inspir'd, a gorgeous sword I'll buy me,
And, plum'd with hopes, to good Sir Robert hie me.

Present myself with this new-modell'd trifle,
Which, should he chance to like, I'll lay my life,
he'll

Make every wish, a bard can frame, succeed,
And then my muse, and I, are made indeed! [me,
But stay—One word forgot—with love commend
To all such honest fellows as befriend me
With their subscriptions—But I cannot on
For rhyme—And so excuse your Pattison.

P. S. Septemb. the twenty-fifth, or twenty-sixth
As to my lodging, for a date, t'en't fix'd.

N. B. For memorandum, you may put once
More, your direction to your friend, at Button's.

A SESSION OF THE CAMBRIDGE POETS.

By a vacant preferment Apollo thought fit
To settle the bays, and establish a wit,
For his trusty friend Roche, by much merit and
grace,

Had obtain'd in Elysium the laureat's place;
Accordingly, to the fam'd borders of Cam,
Descended the god, with a goddess's hight fame,
The figure she wore, as Dan Virgil declares,
Was illumin'd with eyes, and becluster'd with ears,
(And faith, as you'll find, she had of them all,
To pick one good poet, and hear ev'ry cali.)
A trumpet she blew, for a trumpet she bore,
As the laudable custom informs us of yore.

Thick as bees, when they swarm to the tinkling
brass,

The bards flock around her, and darken the place;
Each pretender, for such was Apollo's command,
Brought his works, and conducted his muse in his hand:

But, good Lord! how his godship at first was amaz'd,

To find the chaste nine to such numbers were rais'd?

However, to banish immodest suspicions,
He order'd a silence, and heard the petitions.

B——ll * first, as the candidates jostled along,
With a gate most affected, emerg'd from the throng.

Apollo observ'd somewhat odd in his look,
And, giving a beck, thus the goddess bespoke:
Pr'thee, what's that same fellow? Some half-wit-
ed beau?

I don't know as ever I've seen him till now —
Nor can I remember, I think, replies Fame,
To have heard of his worth, or so much as his name:
But odds, I will lay, by those papers there brought,

* A junior bachelor of Trinity-College, who, in a translation of a poem printed in the University, at his own cost, impertinently begged pardon for the word emerg'd in its proper sense.

'Tis the same, who the place in the Memoirs has bought—— *

Say you so, cries Apollo, and is he so vain?
Yet pshaw; 'tis the only place that he can gain.
The bard now elate with ambition appear'd,
Propos'd his pretence, and desir'd to be heard;
When Apollo straight bid him his labours produce,
And, for his authority, bring him his muse.
More hasty, than wisely, the labours were shown,
But, alas! for the muse, the fly gipsy was flown,
For her birth it was mortal, nor could her feign'd
power

Stand the test of the godhead she mimick'd before;
O'eraw'd by the deity no longer could stay,
But, like Spenser's false Florimel, faded away!

De V——I in the tumult ran bawling aloud,
And swore that he ought to be heard by the god,
And heard too he was, for the god cut him short,
And ask'd what pretensions could draw him to court!

What pretension! cries he; but the godhead replies,
Before you are witty, pray learn to be wise,
And if, as they say, you are lunatic grown,
For I hear you converse with my sister the moon,
In secret confinement, a purge or two try,
And let your own essay bum-fodder supply.

Next Ch——y roll'd onward, a bard of renown,
For bulk and bombast super-eminent grown,
Of lampoons and Pindarics huge bundles he brought,

But the burden was light, because barren of thought,
From railing at friends, falsely smiling he came,
Detraction his pleasure, ambition his aim.

But Apollo soon knew him, notwithstanding all art,
For your gods, at first sight, can discover the heart.
And told him, that pride, and inhuman backbitings,
Were the worst of all evils,—except his own writ-
Ay, I see, cries the god, I see your excuse—[ings;
But hang it, that's nothing in shape of a muse!—
I suppose that it's term'd, by you mortals here, fa-ture, [ture.

But we gods have thought fit to bename it ill-na-
Besides such a bulk, for high flights was ne'er made well——

And I mortally hate the remembrance of Shadwell.

Little R——th took the hint, and right archly
declar'd,

That if body diminutive distinguish'd the bard,
Then his cause it was just,—but to humour the joke,
With an affable air, thus the deity spoke:
And told him, he could not heroics right suit,
For his body, at full length, was scarce more than one foot.

Ho, Ward! cries the god, as he saw him stand by,
Come forward a little, and don't be so shy—
I know you are modest; but harkee between us,
Here, look ye this token, 'twas sent you by Venus—
For her ladyship told me, some few days ago,
She came down in the form of a nymph † that you
know,

* It is credibly reported, that he gave a certain sum for the mention of his performances in the memoirs of literature.
† Mrs. F——er.

And, pleas'd with a copy or two of your verses,
Presents you this myrtle—'twas wreath'd by the graces—
Here, take't,—'tis as good as my laureat's place is.

Hulse next he beheld with poetical rage,
And told him, 'twas pity he was not at age;
Nor mind, cries the god, those dull fools, that defire to
Eclipse that bright merit—they ne'er can aspire to;
Just so, in a morning, I see, as I rise
Black fogs, and dull vapours usurping my skies—
But two dramatists here, the mere scum of the gang,
Broke the simile short, and began to harangue;
Four acts of a play, cries the one I have writ,
And had I a plot, then the work were complete;
My characters—go, cries the god, scribbling elf,
And learn first to get thee a good one thyself.

As Pattison stood unconcern'd in the crowd,
Apollo beheld him, and call'd him aloud;
Declaring his manners, though perhaps not his wit,
His identical self to a nicety hit;
Alike their employments, alike their delight,
Both rambled all day, and both tippled all night;
Both us'd the same haunts, both pursu'd the like game,

And Laura and Thetis but differ'd in name.
Now the bard, without doubt, the reason acquir'd,
But Woman and Fate, both against him conspir'd,
For, unhappily! just as he drew up more nigh,
A pretty tight damsel came tripping it by;
No longer the laurel attracted his eyes,
They were fix'd on a far more desirable prize—
His highness he thank'd; but resigning his lays,
Declar'd, that a nymph was far better than bays.

Apollo now, tir'd with debates and confusion,
Was glad to draw his affairs to conclusion,
And, sick at the numbers still swarming around,
Thrice Tayr he call'd, but no Tayr was found:
Not here? (cries the god) oh! I guess at his stay—
He stole a few poems of mine t'other day—
But, however, I forgive him the cunning device,
And, since his are my labours, be his too my prize.
1725-6.

ROSAMOND TO HENRY:

AN EPISTLE.

Qualis populeâ mærens Philomela sub Umbrâ
Flet Noctem ramoque sedens, miserabile Carmen
Integrat, et mæstis latè Loca Questibus implet.
VIRG. Georg.

FROM these lone shades, and ever-gloomy bowers,
Once the dear shade of Henry's foster hours!
What tender strains of passion can impart
The pangs of absence to an amorous heart!
Far, far too faint the powers of language prove,
Language that flow interpreter of love!
Souls pair'd like ours, like ours to union wrought,
Converse by silent sympathy of thought;
O then, by that mysterious art, divine
The wild impatience of my breast, by thine!

And to conceive what I would say to thee,
Conceive, my love, what thou would'st say to me!

As in the tenderness of soul I sigh,
Methinks I hear thy tender soul reply;
And as in thought, o'er heaps of heroes slain,
I trace thy progress on the fatal plain,
Perhaps thy thought explores me through the grove,

And, soft'ning, steals an interval of love.
In the deep covert of a bow'ring shade
Describes my posture, languishingly laid!
Now, sadly solac'd with the murmur'ing springs,
Now, melting into tears, the softest things!
And how the feign'd ideas all agree!
So bowers the shade, so melt my tears for thee!
Here, as in Eden, once we blissful lay:
How oft night stole, unheeded, on the day!
Our soft-breath'd raptures charm'd the listening
grove,

And all was harmony, for all was love!

But hark! the trumpet sounds! see discords
rise!

'Tis honour calls; from me my Henry flies!
Honour, to him, more bright than Rosamonda's
eyes!

Not thus my honour with his passion strove,
His sighs I pity, and indulg'd his love:
He then cry'd, honour was an empty name,
And love a sweeter recompence than fame.

Oh! had I liv'd in some obscure retreat,
Securely fair, and innocently sweet;
How had I bless'd some humble shepherd's arms!
How kept my fame as spotless as my charms!
Then, hadst thou ne'er beheld these eyes of mine,
Nor they bewail'd the fatal power of thine!
Dear fatal power! to me for ever dear—
Fix'd in my tender breast, and rooted there!
For ever in my tender breast remain—
And be for ever a delightful pain!

With what surprise those glories first I view'd,
That in one moment my whole heart subdu'd!
With such resistless beams, so fierce they shone,
Not such the dazzling radiance of thy crown!
Sent from thy crown I never felt a dart;
The lover, not the monarch, won my heart:
Nor e'er the monarch with such charms appears,
As when the lovers soften'd dress he wears:
As when he, silent, deigns my breast to seek,
And looks such language, as no tongue can speak.

Whene'er my crimes (if love a crime can be,
If 'tis a crime to live, and die for thee!)
In hideous forms arise, and cloud my soul,
One thought on Henry can that gloom controul:
No more my breast alternate passions move,
The frosts of honour melt before the fires of love.

Again, I must repeat that fatal hour, [bower;
Which snatch'd my Henry from his Woodstock
When mad Bellona, with tumult'ous cries,
The hero rous'd, and drown'd the lover's sighs.
Stretch'd on my downy couch, at ease I lay,
And sought by reading to beguile the day;
With am'rous strains I sooth'd a grateful fire,
And all the woman glow'd with soft desire.

Till, as I wish'd, I heard the vocal breeze,
Proclaim my Henry rustling through the trees;
O'erjoy'd, I ran to meet thy longing arms,
And taste a dear remembrance of thy charms;
But soon I saw some sad conceal'd surprise,
Fade on thy cheeks, and languish on thy eyes;
Through each dissembled smile, a sorrow stole,
And whisper'd out the secret of thy soul.
What this could mean, uncertain to divine.
No fault I knew, yet fear'd some fault was mine.
But soon thy love dispell'd those airy fears,
Dispell'd alas!—but brought too solid cares.
For as with hands, entwin'd in hands, we walk'd,
Of love, and hapless lovers, still thou talk'd:
Thy tears of pity answer'd each sad moan,
And in their seeming mis'ries, wept thy own.
“I cannot leave her!”—I o'erheard thee say,—
Pierc'd to the soul, I sunk, and dy'd away.
What art restor'd me, thou alone can'st tell,
For thy kind arms embrac'd me, as I fell.
My opening eyes, fix'd on thy beauties, hung,
And my ears drunk the cordial of thy tongue.
Again my thoughts return with killing pain,
Within thy arms I sink, and swoon again:
Again thou dost my sweet physician prove,
From death to life alternately I move,
Now dead by anguish, now reviv'd by love.
But when, without disguise, truth I found,
My agonizing sorrows knew no bound:
My locks I tore, then, all entranc'd, I lay,
Till by degrees my grief to words gave way,
And soft I cry'd,—Oh! stay, my Henry, stay.
One moment more! add yet, and yet, a kiss!—
Oh! give me thine, and take my soul in this!
Farewell!—perhaps, farewell for ever!—oh!
Who can sustain so dire a weight of woe?

Ah, wretched maid! alas, a maid no more!
No herbs that spotless title can restore!
Ah, who shall now protect thy injur'd fame?
Who shield thy weakness from th' assaults of shame?

Who lull thy anxious soul to balmy rest,
If Henry, dearest Henry, flies thy breast?

Yet, though he flies, your wings, ye angels,
spread,
And hover, guardians, o'er my Henry's head,
Who knows but this kind pray'r is pour'd too late,
And he already struggles with his fate?
Already, wounded, pants, and gasps in death,
And Rosamonda is his latest breath?

Propitious Heaven! vouchsafe a gracious ear!
Grant, these be only phantoms of my fear:
Heav'n still is gracious, if true suppliants pray;
And lo!—the foul chimæras fleet away!
Transporting prospects to my wishes rise,
Beam on my soul, and brighten in my eyes!
He lives! he lives! I see his banner spread,
And laurels, wreath'd round the gay victor's head!
Ye winds! convey the news to Albion's floods!
Ye floods! rebound it to the joyous woods!
Ye joyous woods! your tuneful choirs prepare
To hail my hero from the toils of war!

Delusive scenes! too beautiful to stay!
They fade in visionary streaks away.

Alas! no lovely Henry now is nigh!
His genius took his form to soothe my eye.
No more I seem his melting voice to hear!
Peace! babbling fountains! nor abuse my ear.
Ye flowers! ye streams! ye gales, no longer move!
For ah! how strong is fancy, join'd with love!

O! frail inconstancy of mortal state!
One hour dejected, and the next elate!
Rais'd by false hopes, or by false fears deprest,
How different passions sway the human breast!
Now smiling pleasures, with fair charms, invite,
Now frowning horrors, with black trains, affright.
Future distrusts the present joys controul,
And fancy triumphs o'er the reas'ning soul.

As mid the trees I solitary rove,
The trees awake some image of my love:
Where'er their arms in am'rous foldings join,
My longing arms I spread to fold in thine.
The beauteous flow'rs thy face reflected bear,
(If flow'rs in beauty may with thee compare),
Their wasted fragrances thy breath inspire,
And my soul kindles with ideal fire!

The thick-weav'd shades, and grove encircling
grove,
Are emblems of th' eternity of love,
My blushing guilt the crimson roses paint,
And I, like roses, unsupported faint:
Like their's my youthful charms (if charms) consume,
For love, a closer canker, eats my bloom.

How blest might other nymphs survey these scenes,
Fountains and shades, and hills, and flow'ry greens?
Prospects on prospects, might detain the sight,
And still variety give new delight.
But, I with thee, should find in deserts ease;
Without thee, not even Paradise could please.
Wilds, by thy presence, gardens would appear,
Gardens are wilds since Henry is not here.
Let grottos sink, or porticos arise?
Heedless I view them with unpleasur'd eyes:
Their mantling umbrage cools the noon-day fire,
But what can cool a lover's fierce desire?

In the deep bosom of a darksome shade,
By baleful yew and mournful cypress made;
A widow turtle weeps her ravish'd love,
And sorrowfully solaces the grove,
Sometimes my passion I aloud disclose;
The widow'd turtle, answering, cooes her woes.

Bred by my hand, my sorrow's sad relief,
A little linnet learns to sigh my grief;
Taught by my voice, and by obedience tame,
The pretty lisper whistles Henry's name:
Perch'd on my head, the sylvan syren sings,
And tunes the harsher notes of gurgling springs.

Embosom'd in a vale, thou know'st the shade,
Fast by the murmurs of a soft cascade;
There, while one night full beams of Cynthia play,
(Warm was the night) with wand'rings tir'd, I lay,
Till, by degrees, the falling waters clos'd
My eye-lids, and my weary'd limbs repos'd.
Sudden the fairy monarch I behold,
Near he approach'd, and thus my fate foretold:

'Twas the same Oberon*, that once we saw Circle the green, and give his dancers law.)

Unhappy nymph! thy beauty is thy crime,
And must such beauty perish in its prime!
No more great Henry shall enjoy these charms
Nor thou ill fated fair adorn his arms!
Cropt like an opening rose thy fall I fear!
But rise and supplicate the vengeance near.

Then (as methought) I wak'd with threaten'd woes

Emerging from thick shades, a phantom rose.
One hand sustain'd—a short, but naked sword,—
And one a golden bowl, with poison stor'd.
The jealous queen, the frowning form express'd,
It spoke, and aim'd the dagger at my breast.

Arise! nor ask thy crime—but choose thy fate,
Know prayers are vain—repentance is too late!
Vengeance is mine—Here! drink this poison'd
Or this keen dagger drinks thy guilty soul? [bowl,
It ceas'd: convulsions in my bosom strove,
My curdling blood scarce in stiff tides could move.
Thrice I cry'd Henry, with a feeble sound,
And thrice I started at the sad rebound!
Ev'n echo now grew frightful: with surprise
Trembling I lay, nor dar'd t' unveil my eyes,
Till warbling birds proclaim'd the morning light,
And told me 'twas a vision of the night;
Yet not the morn could chase my gloomy care,
But winds and trees, alarm'd my soul with fear;
While waving boughs, that in the sun-beams
play'd,

Seem'd to show daggers in each pointed shade.

Why was I form'd with such a coward mind?
The sport of shadows, or a rustling wind!
Nerves, better strung, did manly spirits warm,
Glad would I part with every female charm,
Then, cas'd in steel, the front of battle dare,
And, with great Henry, rouse the soul of war!
This arm shall guard the hero from the foe,
Repel the storm, or intercept the blow;
And should my weakness in the warrior fail,
The soft-beseeching woman should prevail;
For thee, I'll soothe each proud insulting foe,
And melt him with petitionary woe;
With thee, in every hardy hazard join,
In dangers save thy life, to make it mine.
By night, compose thy harass'd soul to rest,
And hush it on the pillow of my breast;
With patient eyes eternal vigils keep,
And court good angels to protect thy sleep.

Alas! in vain I urge my frustrate will,
I find myself a feeble woman still;
The feeble woman to my breast returns,
For Henry's gone, and Rosamonda mourns!
O! see my eyes their streaming anguish pour,
O! hear my sighs increase the swelling shower;
What can I more than shed my tears and sighs?
Poor woman's strength alone in weakness lies?

But whether is ungovern'd fancy flown?
Thoughts of impossibilities be gone!
Guilt claims no miracles, nor heav'n conspires
To aid my crimes, and fan my lawless fires.

* King of the fairies.
VOL. VIII.

Life irksome grows; detested is the light,
And my soul dreads the visions of the night.
Swift let me to some hallow'd convent go.—
Can I for ever Henry leave?—ah! no:—
But O lost innocence!—I lost a name:—
O honour!—broken is the bubble, fame.
Are my sins monstrous? Do invented crimes,
Alike unknown to past, or present times,
Demand red vengeance? Some peculiar curse?—
Crowds stand recorded for the same,—or worse.
Have I, unpitying, heard the poor complain,
Or seen the wretched weep, and weep in vain?
Have I my flame feign'd for a sordid end?
E'er wrong'd a foe, or e'er betray'd a friend?
Not to my charge such crimes has malice brought,
Love, only love, is my unbounded fault:
A fault, that sure may heav'n to pity move,
Since half of heav'n ('tis said) consists in love.

Ah! foolish nymph!—Here, view the queen!
the laws!—

But there, view Henry, as th' enchanting cause!
By such a cause the priestesses would retire,
And quit the vestal for a nobler fire.

I will again th' immortal powers implore;
Brave Henry for Britannia's sake restore!
In him she lives, to him her joys are due,
And only sends her earliest thanks to you.
But oh! my lord, my darling lord, beware!
Tempt not too bold the dangers of the war!
Think, when thou seest the fate impelling dart,
O! think it aim'd at Rosamonda's heart!
Were but each breast as soft as mine! no more
Should tumults rise, or martial thunders roar:
Heroes should scorn the glories of the field,
And the fam'd laurel to the myrtle yield:
For sweeter passions, sweeter strifes inspire,
And love alone should set the soul on fire.

May then these eyes in tears no longer mourn,
But cheerful hail their Henry's wish'd return!
O! swift, victorious, hush the war's alarms!
Swift, if thy Rosamonda boasts some charms,
Fly on the wings of love, and conquest to her arms!

October 20. 1725.

HENRY TO ROSAMOND:

AN EPISTLE.

SHALL then his beauteous Rosamonda mourn,
Nor Henry's soul the soft complaint return!
O cease, my fair! I deeply feel thy smart,
And all thy sorrows double in my heart:
Far from my breast, ye scenes of war! remove,
Far from my breast, be every scene but love;
Soft rising thoughts as when, in Woodstock-
bowers,
Joyful, we lov'd away the laughing hours.

Now midnight-rest relieves the soldier's care,
Hush'd are the drums, and every voice of war;
Faint gleam the fires along the dewy field,
And faint the noise, that sleeping couriers yield;
Yet love, the lordly tyrant of my breast,
Alarms my soul, and interrupts my rest;
In vain a nation's cares the monarch move,
For ah! far greater is the monarch Love!

N 4

Warm from my lips, thy tender letter lies,
And every word is magic to my eyes;
Weeping, I read, and hear thy soft-breath'd woes,
And all the warrior in the lover lose:
Then I by fancy vanish'd joys restore,
Feast on false love, and act past pleasures o'er.
Fancy can soothe my soul with pleasing dreams
While tented Galia, bowery Woodstock seems;
Led by delusive steps, in thought, I rove,
Through well known greens, and every winding
grove.

There, haply on some flowery bank reclin'd
My sweet-reposing Rosamonda find;
When then (for then thy secret thoughts I see)
In pious slumbers breath'st thy soul to me;
Dissolv'd with joy, and feasting on thy charms,
I clasp thee in imaginary arms;
And then—ah then!—I seem sincerely blest—
Then only Rosamonda, knows the rest—

O glories! empires! crowns! how weak ye prove,
If thus out-rivalled by a dream of love!
O love! what toys thy real sweets bestow,
When ev'n their shadows can transport me so!
O blest ecstatic! blest relief from cares!
Thus let me lose my soul in softer wars!
By love's transporting sighs my sweet alarms,
Nor worlds, but Rosamonda crown my arms!
In her alone, my full desires agree,
Her charms are empires, glories, all to me!

THE HOUR GLASS.

As in my silent study late I fate,
Intent on poet's poor precarious state,
Around my sight a sudden dimness play'd,
And ting'd the taper with a blew shade;
When to my eyes appear'd that watchful pow'r
Which measures out the sandy-streaming hour,
An human form the meagre phantom wore,
And on its brow a faded laurel bore,
On me were fix'd its looks, whilst thus it spoke,
And sounds like these the solemn silence broke.
"At length the time is come to tell a truth
"To thee, to thee alone, O fated youth!
"Then mark my story well—in happier days,
"Like thine my bosom panted after praise;
"Foe to the grave fatigues of life I strove
"To grow immortal in a myrtle grove:
"Lost there, I lavish'd out my little store,
"Destin'd to live poetically poor;
"What slender gains my labours brought I spent,
"And through the glass my luscious profit went;
"From thence, with fictitious inspiration warm'd,
"A vain eternity's reversion charm'd;
"My fate I blest'd—for future fame reserv'd!
"For that I glory'd!—and for that I—starv'd!
"Thence by some powerful transmigration turn'd,
"In these repentant streams my folly mourn'd:
"Here, as you see, my fleeting minutes pass,
"Still, as of old, devoted to the glass.
"As once too humble for proud rooms of state,
"In homely cottages I seek my fate,
"And find my vast poetic promis'd land
"All dwindled to this little barren sand;
"With which advise, ye youthful sons of rhyme,
"In abler studies to employ your time;

"Warn'd by my fate, to learn, for learn you must
"That all your fame, like mine, but turns to dust."

THE CAMBRIDGE BEAUTIES.

By an Admirer of the Fair Sex.

Ye gentle nymphs, to whom my lays belong;
Approve my numbers, and assist my song;
Soft smiling may your bright'ning eyes inspire—
At once the poet's, and the lover's fire:
So shall the muse each magic charm rehearse,
So shall each charm be lasting as her verse.

Bless'd in my choice! what blooming beauties
rise!

How court my numbers with inspiring eyes!
O could my lays like gentle Waller move,
Like gentle Waller, tune the soul to love;
Bright as my theme, each easy note should shine,
And Sacharissas smile in ev'ry line.
To Aurenelia, fam'd Carlisle should yield,
And Waller own his fav'rite fair excell'd:
Had charms like her's inspir'd his lofty lays,
How had he grown immortal in her praise!
How might the muse her wonted gift receive,
And poetry from beauty learn to live!

When Sylvia smiles, methinks she smiles to prove
Her charms superior to the power of love.
Gay sportive Cupids flutter round the fair,
Pant on her breast, and wanton in her hair;
With ev'ry lock, a new adorer gain,
And ev'ry ringlet is a lover's chain;
The orbit ringlets, soft dissolving down,
Flow on her breast, and half her bosom drown;
Through the bright shades, her panting bubbles
heave,
Like swans emerging from a silver wave.

On Delia's cheeks, eternal roses bloom,
Her ruby lips exhale a sweet perfume;
Her ruby lips indulge a mutual kiss,
And blush luxuriant in their envy'd bliss.

When bright Belinda leads the sprightly dance,
With ev'ry step our captive hearts advance;
Her magic charms the soft enchantress prove,
And on her breast descends the god of love
Smiling, she seems to imitate those airs,
That form their regularity by her's;
Moves, as the soul-dissolving numbers move;
And musically swims the maze of love:
On the soft sounds, her gentle motions flow,
And sail along magestically slow:
Her waving arms in snowy circles play,
And all the easy conqueror display;
Melodious music warbles love's alarms,
Sounds the soft charge, and sings her conqu'ring
charms.

When Flora sings, ye gods! 'tis heaven to hear,
We listen to the music of the sphere;
Our ravish'd sight confirms the sweet surprise,
And owns the angel, by her heav'nly eyes.

But, oh! my muse, your tuneful'st charms prepare,
Harmonious, as your Aurenelia's fair.

Where'er she looks, her eyes like lightnings wound,
When e'er she speaks, there's music in the sound;
From her dear lips such melting softness flows,
Soft as when Zephyrs kiss the silken rose:
But when the wondrous charmer talks of love,
Good gods! what raptures in our bosom move!
How each discourse our soul transported warms,
And, if 'tis possible, improves her charms.

O ever beauteous, ever lovely fair,
Pride of my verse, and object of my care.
O take me, clasp me, melting in thy arms,
Unfold thy sweets, and open all thy charms.
On those dear breasts for ever let me rove,
Those breasts to me the true poetic grove!
On those soft hills for ever let me sing,
And sip thy sacred Heliconian spring.

Were Paris here to judge fair beauty's prize,
How might these brighter goddesses surprise;
How could his choice the doubtful favour place,
When a new Venus shines in ev'ry face?
But since that task, that pleasing task I claim,
O Venus guide me to a brighter flame:
To Aurenelia's charms my wishes move,
Warm her cold heart, and tune her breast to love;
There, let my soul a nobler prize impart,
And for an apple, give my bleeding heart.

ABELARD TO ELOISA.

In my dark cell, low prostrate on the ground,
Mourning my crimes, thy letter entrance found;
Too soon my soul the well known name confess'd,
My beating heart sprung fiercely in my breast;
Through my whole frame a guilty transport
glow'd
And streaming torrents from my eyes fast flow'd.

O Eloisa! art thou still the same?
Dost thou still nourish this destructive flame?
Have not the gentle rules of peace, and heav'n
From thy soft soul this fatal passion driven?
Alas! I thought you disengag'd, and free,
And can you still, still sigh, and weep for me?
What powerful deity, what hallow'd shrine,
Can save me from a love, a faith like thine?
Where shall I fly, when not this awful cave,
Whose rugged feet the surging billows lave;
When not these gloomy cloister's solemn walls,
O'er whose rough sides the languid ivy crawls;
When my dread vows, in vain, their force oppose,
Opposing love, alas! how vain are vows!
In fruitless penance here I wear away
Each tedious night, each sad revolving day:
I fast, I pray; and with deceitful art
Veil thy dear image from my tortur'd heart.
My tortur'd heart conflicting passions move,
I hope, despair, repent, but still I love.
A thousand jarring thoughts my bosom tear,
For thou, not God, my Eloise art there.
To the false world's deluding pleasures dead,
No longer by its wand'ring fires misled;
In learn'd disputes, harsh precepts I infuse,
And give that counsel, I want power to use.
The rigid maxims of the grave, and wise,
Have quench'd each milder sparkle in my eyes;

Each lovely feature of this well-known face,
By grief revers'd, assumes a sterner grace:
O Eloisa! would the fates once more
(Indulgent to thy wish) this form restore,
How wouldst thou from these arms with horror start,
To miss those charms, familiar to thy heart!
Nor could thy quick, thy piercing judgment see,
To speak thy Abelard, but love of thee:
Lean abstinence, pale grief, and haggard care,
The dire attendants of forlorn despair;
Have Abelard the gay, the young remov'd,
And in the hermit, sunk the man you lov'd.

Wrapt in the gloom these holy mansions shed,
The thorny paths of penitence I tread;
Lost to the world, from all its interest free,
And torn from all my soul held dear in thee;
Ambition, with its train of frailties, gone,
All loves, all forms forgot, but thine alone.

Amidst the blaze of day, and dusk of night,
My Eloisa rises to my sight;
Veil'd, as in Paraclete's sea-bath'd tow'rs,
The wretched mourner counts the lagging hours;
I hear the sigh, see the swift-falling tears,
Weep all her griefs, and pine with all her cares.
O vows! O converts! your stern force impart,
And frown the melting phantom from my heart;
Let other sighs a worthier sorrow show,
Let other tears, for sin, repentant flow;
Low to the earth, my guilty eyes I roll,
And humble to the dust my contrite soul.
Forgiving pow'r! your gracious call I meet,
Who first empower'd this rebel heart to beat!
Who through this trembling, this offending frame,
For nobler ends diffus'd life's active flame:
O change the temper of this throbbing breast,
And form anew each beating pulse to rest!
Let springing grace, fair faith and hope remove,
The fatal traces of voluptuous love;
Voluptuous love from his soft mansion tear,
And leave no tracks of Eloisa there.

Are these the wishes of thy inmost soul?
Would I its softest tend'rest peace controul?
Would I, thus touch'd, this gloomy heart resign
To the cold substance of the marble shrine?
Transform'd like these pale saints that round me
move,

O bless'd insensibles! that knew not love!
Ah! rather let me keep this hapless flame,
Adieu, false honour, unavailing fame!
Not your harsh rules, but tender love, supplies
The streams that gush from my despairing eyes:
I feel the traitor melt around my heart, [dart!
And through my veins with treach'rous influence
Inspire me heav'n! assist me, grace divine!
Aid me ye saints! unknown to crimes like mine!
You, while on earth, all pangs severe could prove,
All but the tort'ring pangs of hopeless love.
An holier rage in your pure bosoms dwelt,
Nor can you pity what you never felt;
A sympathizing grief alone can cure,
The hand that heals, must feel, what I endure.
Thou Eloise! alone, canst give me ease,
And bid my struggling soul subside in peace;

Restore me to my long lost heav'n of rest,
And take thyself from my reluctant breast:
If crimes, like mine, could an allay receive,
That blest'd allay, thy wond'rous charms must give.

Thy form, which first my heart to love inclin'd,
Still wanders in my lost, my guilty mind:
I saw thee as the new-blown blossoms fair,
Sprightly as light, and soft as summer air;
Wit, youth, and beauty, in each feature shone,
Blest'd by my fate, I gaz'd, and was undone!
There dy'd the gen'rous fire, whose vig'rous flame,
Enlarg'd my soul, and led me on to fame;
Nor fame, nor wealth, my soften'd heart could move,

My heart, insensible to all but love!
Snatch'd from myself, my learning tasteless grew,
And vain philosophy oppos'd to you.

A train of woes we mourn; nor should we mourn,
The hours that cannot, ought not to return;
As once to love, I sway'd thy yielding mind,
Too fond, alas! too fatally inclin'd!
To virtue now let me thy breast inspire,
And fan, with zeal divine, the holy fire;
Teach you to injur'd heav'n, all chang'd, to turn,
And bid thy soul with sacred raptures burn.
O that my own example could impart
This noble warmth to thy soft trembling heart!
That mine, with pious undissembled care,
Might aid the latent virtue struggling there!
Alas, I rave! nor grace, nor zeal divine,
Burns in a breast o'erwhelm'd with crimes, like
mine:

Too sure I find (whilst I the fortune prove
Of feeble piety, conflicting love)
On black despair, my forc'd devotion built,
Absence, to me, has greater pangs than guilt.

Ah! yet my Eloisè, thy charms I view,
Yet my sighs break, and my tears flow for you;
Each weak resistance stronger knits my chain,
I sigh, weep, love, despair, repent in vain!
Haste Eloisa, haste, thy lover free,
Amidst thy warmer pray'rs, O think of me!
Wing with thy rising zeal my grov'ling mind:
And let me mine, from thy repentance find:
Ah! labour, strive, thy love, thyself controul,
The change will sure affect my kindred soul:
In blest concert our purer sighs shall grieve,
And, Heav'n assisting, shall our crimes forgive.
But if unhappy, wretched, lost in vain,
Faintly th' unequal combat you sustain:
If not to heaven you feel your bosom rise,
Nor tears, refin'd, fall contrite from your eyes:
If still thy heart thy wonted passions move,
And thy tongue prompts thy tender soul to love;
Deaf to the weak essays of living breath,
Attend the stronger eloquence of death.

When that kind pow'er this captive soul shall free,
(Which, only then, can cease to doat on thee)
When gently sunk to my eternal sleep,
The Paraclete my peaceful urn shall keep;
Then Eloisa, then, thy lover view,
See, these quench'd eyes, no longer fix'd on you,

From their dead orbs that tender utterance flows,
Which first on yours my heart's soft tales made
known.

This breath no more, at length, to ease consign'd,
Pant, like light aspines quiv'ring with the wind;
See, all my wild tumultuous passions o'er,
And thou, amazing scene! belov'd no more:
Behold the destin'd end of human love,
But let the sight thy zeal alone improve;
Let not thy conscious soul, with sorrow mov'd,
Recal how much, how tenderly you lov'd!
With pious care thy fruitless grief restrain,
Nor let a tear thy sacred veil profane;
Nor e'en a sigh on my cold urn bestow,
But let thy breath with sacred rapture glow;
Let love divine, frail mortal love, dethrone,
And to thy mind immortal joys make known;
Let Heav'n, relenting, strike thy ravish'd view,
And still the bright, the blest pursuit, renew:
So, with thy crimes, shall thy misfortunes cease,
And thy wreck'd soul be calmly hush'd to peace.

TO THE LAST (KING GEORGE'S) GUINEA.

Inscribed to the Right Honourable Sir Robert Walpole.

WHAT call, bright monarch! can engage thy
breast,

To leave thy loyal subject thus distressed? [gone,
Who knows, my guardian-aid, when thou art
What foreign tyrant will usurp thy throne?
When want, rebellious, arrogates thy reign,
What equal power shall faction's rage restrain?
Too well, alas! my future state I see,
I can but sigh, and only think of thee!

So, when thy bright original repairs
To foreign realms, with equal griefs and cares:
Britannia mourns; and anxious for her fate,
Implores some favourite to protect the state;
Wisely, as still, the monarch makes his choice,
And for his Walpole joins the general voice.

O couldst thou there advance an equal claim,
Repos'd in him, our safety were the same!
Auspicious thought! and with what ease may he,
Who has secur'd three nations, succour me.

TO A NEEDLE THAT PRICK'D HIS MIS- TRESS'S FINGER.

From Bonifonius.*

MIRACLE of cruelty!
Must my Laura bleed by thee?
Her finger too, endure the smart?
That tender, inoffensive part!
What could the sweet offender do,
Soft, and fair, as falling snow;
To suffer innocently too!
Was it not envy caus'd this hate,
Because thyself were found less strait?
Did not this thy fury move
To wound the brighter queen of love?

* All the love poems of this celebrated author, are translated by several hands. Printed for H. Curll, in the Strand.

But, ah! then dreadful foe, forbear
To execute thy fury here;
Yet, if you still to rage incline,
Revenge at once, your cause, and mine:
Let her obdurate bosom feel
The angry fury of thy steel.
Her bosom, soft as turtle's down,
Yet harder than the hardest stone!
Her bosom! colder than the snow,
Burning at once, and freezing too,
Will brave thy fiercest, deadliest blow:
Here infix thy piercing dart,
Deep as love has pierc'd my heart:
Then, if thou gain'st the victory,
How wond'rous will the conquest be?
To win a fortress that withstood
The utmost fury of a god;
At once thy small, yet glorious dart
Shall conquer love's, and Laura's heart.

ON LAURINDA.

WHEN nature fram'd Laurinda, heavenly fair,
With each attractive charm, and winning air,
Minerva's eloquence refin'd her tongue,
Charm'd in her speech, and warbled in her song;
Imperial majesty from Juno came,
Sooth'd with the softness of the Cyprian dame.
O! would some other powers employ their care,
To make her kind, as these have made her fair;
That single act should all the rest outshine,
And make the fair perfection all divine.

THE BEE AND CUPID.

FROM THEOCRITUS.

As Cupid in a flow'ry valley stray'd,
Where bees around their hives in clusters play'd,
The honey's fragrant scent allur'd his nose,
And to the hive the groping archer goes.
Boldly he thrusts his roguish fingers in—
Nor in that heaven of sweets could fear a sting—
But soon he merited, and met his fate,
Repenting of his roguery, too late;
And now, in vain, he frets, he stamps, he tears
The flowing honours of his waving hairs;
Deep is the wound, alas! what can he do!
Revenge he vows, but then he fears the foe?
Now swift as thought, to Ida's grove he flies,
And thus complaining, to his mother cries,
Alas! mamma, what pain my hand endures!
O take it, kiss it, cool it, rub 't with yours.
Searching for honey I this torment found,
Small was the author, but, O! deep the wound—
To whom the mother goddess thus reply'd,
Unkindly laughing, while poor Cupid cry'd.

Fie, fie, is this your courage, mighty Love!
And is a bee a stronger foe than Jove?
Hence child, compassionate each lover's heart,
Since you are conquer'd by so small a dart.

TO AN

OLD LADY THAT USED TO PAINT.

KNELLER with animated art, could trace,
The magic wonders of a lovely face;

His nice creating fancy could impart,
Fire to each charm, and flames to ev'ry heart;
Yet all this skill could but at best command
A fancy'd goddess at the second hand.

You brighter nymph, can greater wonders show
And all this superficial art out-do;
What if his hand a seeming life could give,
Your greater wonder more than seems to live!
His nymph, at best, could only raise our fire,
But you create, and satisfy desire.

TO ONE WHO BLAMED ME

For writing in praise of a very undeserving Lady.

I own, my friend, Olivia is not fair,
An awkward creature, with a flattern air;
She's nature's error, I confess indeed,
What then? the sick alone the doctor need:
Thus cunning tradesmen praise their paltry ware,
And cry, the very best in all the fair;
But let the diamonds sparkle into fame,
And each spectator with their worth inflame.

When fancy's in her infancy, the muse
Some trivial theme, in trifling lays, pursues,
Till, by degrees, she takes a loftier aim
And crowns her actions with immortal fame,
Thus the keen sword that's bath'd in heroes blood,
First to be temper'd, drinks the filthly flood.

PRESENTING WALLER'S POEMS

TO A LADY.

MADAM,

ACCEPT the softest sweetest strains,
That ever breath'd a dying lover's pains;
That ever yet could unsuccessful prove,
When arm'd with all the eloquence of love;
And if you find some tender moving part,
Softens your soul, and steal upon your heart;
(For sure the most obdurate maid must blame,
The rigid coyness of the cruel dame):
Then lovely Laura, think, you faintly feel
The symptoms of a flame I dare not tell;
Think, then, you hear your suppliant lover sigh,
But generously, more than see him die;
And if you kindly listen to his pain,
Successful Waller has not sung in vain.

TO A LADY

AT KING'S-COLLEGE CHAPEL, CAMBRIDGE.

UNSKILL'D in love, unpractis'd in those arts
Of gaining mistresses, and giving hearts,
Mix'd with the gazing crowd I hither come,
Nor dreamt destruction near this sacred dome;
Where holy hymns, and solemn songs of praise,
A venerable adoration raise;
But with surprise, at once I hear and see
A speaking, and a silent harmony:
Transporting sounds! my fainting senses rise,
Wing'd with the sweeter music of your eyes:
Your eyes that speak a form so bright, so fair,
You seem the object of each fervent prayer.
Our souls the sweet divinity adore—
Aspiring vanity can hope no more—

N n iii

But ah! forbear, thou holy fair, unknown,
 Our happiness to hazard by your own;
 Can Heaven, impartial, to your hopes comply,
 And give you that, which you to all deny.
 Mistaken maid! you think you blessings gain,
 When 'tis your very prayers create our pain
 And save us, but to kill us, with disdain.
 Alas! I feel the fatal poison run,
 I gaze, I sigh, I love, and am undone---
 Harmonious charms, in vain, my mind reprove,
 They sympathize, and melt, with me, to love:
 Whilst in soft sounds, my soul, transported, flew,
 Mistook her heav'n, but found a heav'n in you.

THE FOP.

SIR PLUME, the banker, of each trading lass,
 (That newest French edition of an ass!
 Charm'd by dear self, with love may safely sport,
 As things inanimate receive no hurt)
 On his own beauteous person, deeply read,
 No love e'er reach'd his heart, no thought his head;
 Pangleless, he woos some pangleless dame of fashion,
 And in bad French, serenely lisps his passion;
 Then, as the suit he makes is right or wrong,
 Triumphs in rigadon, or dies in song.

THE REFUSAL OF HER HAND.

THAT with an eagle's piercing eye,
 Ned look'd, what man with eyes can doubt,
 When from the feather'd family,
 He singled this fair chicken out.

A lion's heart, the gen'rous boy
 Proudly in ev'ry act maintains,
 Bravely attacks the nymph when coy,
 When yielding bravely he disdains.

To play the skilful surgeon's part,
 Two necessary points are gain'd;
 But to be master of his art,
 Poor Ned still wants the lady's hand.

THE MORNING CONTEMPLATION.

As I range these spacious fields,
 Feast on all that nature yields;
 Ev'ry thing conspires delight,
 Charms my smell, my taste, my sight;
 Ev'ry rural sound I hear
 Soothes my soul, and tunes my ear.

Yonder azure hills arising,
 Peeping through the wide horizon;
 Strive for the priority,
 Which shall first salute my eye:
 Gentle winds, each sweet adorning,
 Breathe the wholesome breath of morning;
 Birds on blossom'd hawthorns, sing
 Jocund carols to the spring;
 Hopping o'er the fragrant lawn,
 Merrily salute the dawn,
 And with their music seem to chide
 Man's ingratitude and pride.

O venerable Solitude!
 Best of blessings, chiefest good!

Chiefest good! for in you is
 Every part of happiness:
 No racking passions here dim controul,
 The peaceful surface of my soul;
 Nothing can my bliss destroy,
 Whilst I thus myself enjoy.
 Ere the heavens or earth were made,
 Or their vast foundations laid;
 Ere angels yet were taught to sing,
 To tune the lyre, or touch the string;
 In godlike pomp the great Three One
 Reign'd in their solitude alone.

Tell me, all ye mighty wise,
 Ye governors of colleges;
 What deeper wisdom can you know,
 Than easy nature's works here show?
 All the lonesome night ye pore,
 Philosophic sages o'er:
 To what prodigious vast account
 Can all your mighty works amount?
 The wise man was as wise as you,
 And yet his wisdom was---he nothing knew.

Come, ye covetous! ye proud!
 Come, ye wise fantastic crowd!
 And as your follies ye discern,
 Nature's plain instructions learn.

See, this river, as it goes,
 With what eloquence it flows?
 How clear the water, and how fine!
 How deep, how rapidly serene!
 But should it fearful of decay,
 Stagnate, and stop up its way;
 No longer would its streams appear,
 Wholesome, delicate, or clear:
 But bury'd in a quagmire sink,
 Or in a choking deluge stink.

Believe me, life's the very same,
 The very image of this stream:
 If of future fortune fearless,
 If of present changes, careless,
 It uninterrupted goes,
 How sweet! and how serene it flows!
 But if stopt with these restraints,
 Present ills, and future wants;
 If anxious doubts, and clogging care,
 Betray our reason to despair;
 Life's dull enjoyment only cloy,
 And painfully itself destroys.

View this revential shade!
 Sacred to retirement made!
 What surprising sweets surround me!
 What varieties confound me!
 Bless'd in this obscure abode,
 I think myself almost a god!
 I think myself so too the more,
 Because I'm out of envy's power!
 And if angels envious be,
 They alone dare envy me;
 And doing so, they let me know
 I am happier here below.

Where is self-enamour'd pride!
 Tinsel vanity beside:

In what gilded rooms of state
Shaking with the storms of fate
Do they now luxurious lie,
Bound in purple slavery!
Can their artificial flowers
Rival these delightful bowers?
Compar'd with nature's charms, how faint
Is their mimic-colour'd paint?
I, the living forest have,
They the empty shadows crave;
Yet, in spite of all their theft,
I too have better shadows left.
Behold this little scrubby thorn,
Of verdure destitute, forlorn,
As if it were e'en nature's scorn.
Yet this, is of much more possess'd,
Than any tyrant of the east;
Is richer; nay, is happier far
Than oriental monarchs are:
Can, with equal grandeur, show,
Its brilliant head with diamonds glow:
And contented, knows, next day
Doubly will the loss repay,
If fortune snatches it away.
Princely honours thus remain,
And thus they flee—but ne'er return again—

But this flow'ry meadow walking,
To this prattling echo talking;
As along the stream I pass,
Gazing on my floating face;
Lo! the rustling winds arise,
To snatch the prospect from my eyes:
The mimic form that fury braves,
And proudly triumphs o'er the waves;
Yet though with ev'ry wave 'tis tost,
The reflection is not lost.

Virtue wages such a strife,
In this turbulent stream of life;
Rack'd with passions, tost with fears,
Vex'd with jealousies, and cares:
But a good unspotted soul,
Though subject, yet knows no controul,
Whilst it turns on virtue's pole.

But, lo! the clouds obscure the sun,
Swift shadows o'er the waters run!
Trembling too, my shadow flies?
And by its very likeness dies.

Hence learn, reflecting Pattison,
How silent fate still hurries on,
How suddenly you must be gone!
And as you now can tell no more,
The likeness that your visage wore,
On the surface of the flood,
Where but now you gazing stood:
So, as soon as you shall die,
And resign mortality;
The delusive breath of fame,
Shall forget your very name.

VERSES ON THE FIFTH OF NOVEMBER.

MOURN, Rome! thy baffled arts, thy conquer'd
arms,
For know! 'tis heav'n thy impious zeal disarms;

Learn by thy fate, and oft experienc'd cost,
Our temples still the true Palladium boast:
With shame review that dire vindictive day,
When hostile nations plow'd the liquid way;
With rebel rage inspir'd, but ah! how vain
They brav'd the Cynthia of our British main!
Wing'd with false hopes, their floating cities flew,
Like Sodom, doom'd to flaming vengeance too:
Immortal Drake, the British thunder drove,
Swift, as the bolt, hot-hissing from above;
Wide o'er the main, the bright infection flew,
And flying, with tempestuous fury grew;
Reflecting billows shot a gleamy glare,
And boil'd, and flam'd, with elemental war;
From the deep cavern of his oozy bed,
Old Ocean's fire emerg'd his azure head;
Like scorching Xanthus, felt his floods retire,
And roar'd in anguish at the god of fire:
But when he saw Britannia's peace alarm'd,
And Heav'n, and Drake, with sacred vengeance
arm'd;
With billowing storms he urg'd the work of fate,
And heav'd huge mountains at the burning fleet;
The burning fleet deplore their impious aim,
And dread the thund'rer, now they feel his flame;
With shame, with anguish, and with guilt, expire,
Or sink in wat'ry floods, or floods of fire.

Calm o'er the waves great Drake triumphant rode,

Safe in the sacred function of a god;
His ark, like Noah's, saw the whelming tide,
Absorb an impious world, and gorge its pride,
Conquest sat smiling at the scene Heav'n wrought,
And, like the dove, the peaceful olive brought:
Like Israel, England, on her sea-beat shore,
Beheld the proud Egyptians, proud no more.

But, as when once, the rebel Titans strove,
And fell sad victims to a vengeful Jove;
Sprung from the poison of their Hydra gore,
A race arose, as impious as before;
A race, that durst usurp the bless'd abodes,
Defy the thund'rer, and dethrone the gods:
So, from this base defeat, with impious rage,
New Titans dar'd our British gods engage;
Salmonus like, with mimic power they strove,
And madly arm'd the thunder 'gainst its Jove.

In the deep bosom of the cavern'd earth,
Close plotting treason laid the nitrous birth;
Old midwife-night with dusky pinions fate,
To hatch the seeds, and brood them into fate:
When Britain's genius from his ruling star,
Beheld the latent ruin from afar;
(Such, once in heav'n, he saw black treasons rage
When rebel angels durst their God engage)
With sailing wings the sacred pow'r descends,
And hov'ring o'er his isle incumbent bends;
With tutelary care, the guardian fate,
And anxious, watch'd the birth of future fate.
And now the gloomy wings of sable night,
Embrown'd the silver empire of the night;
Nor yet the choral cock proclaim'd the day,
But all in silence, all in horror lay;
No breathing breeze the dreary forest shakes,
And Heaven alone with watchful treason wakes:

Repos'd, the meditated martyr lay,
Nor slumb'ring dream'd himself a future prey :
Well might he rest secure from mortal fear ;
Whose happiness was Heaven's peculiar care !

Lo ! through the gloom, a darting lustre streams,
And, like a comet, sheds its baleful beams ;
Like that, each baleful beam malignant springs,
Denouncing fate to empires, and to kings :
For lo ! black treason lifts her Hydra head,
Struck at her monster form she starts afraid,
Shrinks in the deepest gloom, and seeks the darkest shade !

But, ah ! she turns— " O Britain see thy doom—
" Awake ! arise ! 'tis hell conspires ! 'tis Rome !"
Thanks, Heaven ! thy beams dispel the hideous
sprite,

She flies, she sinks, she seeks th' abyss of night.
Sink fury ! to the deepest hell of pains,
There, curse thy rage, in adamant chains !
But, hark ! Britannia's rousing lion roars,
And thunders treason through her concave shores ;
But Heaven protects—ye echoes ! waft it round,
Ye repercussive rocks ! repeat the sound.

Hence learn, O treach'rous Rome ! repuls'd retire,
And only with Britannia's peace, conspire ;
Oft as thy plots, and stratagems engage,
As often shalt thou mourn thy baffled rage ;
For know, we dare thy poor intending hate,
Whilst Walpole stands the bulwark of our state :
Whilst his judicious hands our vessel guide,
Boldly we'll stem old time's tempestuous tide ;
Led by that star, the storms of fate defy,
And launch into immense eternity.

Though rocks, and seas begird Britannia's isle,
Her happy shades with sweets eternal smile,
Though the winds rage, and the rough billows
roar,
Soft Halcyon ease adorns her peaceful shore ;
Compos'd, she sees the factious floods engage,
And smiles superior to their empty rage ;
The breaking waves her rocks with fury beat,
And mourn, like thee, O Rome ! in tears their bale defeat.

1725.

ON CRASSUS.

DON CRASSUS plum'd with Bacularian pride,
A cap, a gown, and eke a robe beside,
Pedantically faunters up and down
To satisfy the misbelieving town,
Proud of himself—but prouder of his gown.
And well he may so ; for the dapper fellow
Is but poor Fustian, though his gown's Prunello !

CHLOE REPROVED.

As Chloe, conscious of her pretty face,
Kiss'd the reflected goddess in the glass ;
And shall these charms, she cries, these matchless
charms,
To night be buried in an husband's arms ?
No—since the gods indulgent give me power,
I'll reign, at least, the tyrant of an hour !

She said, and to the glitt'ring toilet flew,
Heighten'd each charm, and ev'n diviner grew ;
A thousand arts, a thousand airs she tries,
And thus computes the conquests of her eyes.

With scorn, Honorio's passion I resign,
Brillantis, dear Brillantis ! shall be mine ;
Conquer'd Sireno shall these charms adore,
Sylvander, and an endless thousand more.

Thus spoke the proud premeditated bride,
And the Cosmetic oracle reply'd.

Beware, fair maid, beware, nor strive to prove,
The dangerous varieties of love ;
But think how brittle are those charms you boast,
And think how soon that beauty may be lost.

For this (take notice what I say)

Depend on, to your sorrow,
That if you change your mind to-day,
I'll change your face to-morrow.

THE NIGHTINGALE AND SHEPHERD.

IMITATED FROM STRADA.

'Twas when the sun diffus'd a milder ray,
And length'ning shades confess'd the short'ning
day :

To Tiber's banks repair'd an am'rous swain,
The love, and envy, of the neighb'ring plain ;
To cool his heat, he sought the breezy grove,
To cool his heat, but more, the heat of love ;
To soothe his cares, on a soft lute he play'd,
But the soft lute reviv'd the lovely maid ;
Conspiring elms their umbrage shed around,
Wav'd with applause, and listen'd to the sound :
When Philomela, gentle bird of love,
Poor, pretty, harmless Syren of the grove !
Enchanted, heard the shepherd as he play'd,
And stole attentive to the tuneful shade,
Perch'd o'er his head, the charmer seem'd to grow,
And to the lyre, in shadows danc'd below ;
With scornful eye elate, inclin'd to hear,
And lent her soul to listen in her ear ;
As his swift fingers tremble o'er the lute,
Softly she sings responsive to the note ;
Each air, each flowing accent of the song,
She soothes, and sweetens, with her softer tongue ;
Gently refines each imitated strain
And with his music charms the ravish'd swain :
The ravish'd swain admir'd the just replies,
At first mistaken for the echoing breeze ;
But when he found his little rival near,
Imbibing music both at eye and ear ;
Sublimier notes improv'd each lab'ring air,
The daring prelude to the tuneful war :
O'erjoy'd, the charmer heard the bold defy,
And warbling, answer'd, with a brisk reply.

Now tend'rest thoughts the gentle swain inspire,

And with a dying softness tune the lyre,
Echo the music of the vernal woods,
Warble the murmurs of the falling floods.
Thus sweet he plays, but sweet he plays in vain,
For Philomela sings a sweeter strain ;

With easier art she modulates each note,
More nat'ral music melting in her throat.

Much he admir'd the magic of her tongue.
But more to see his lute, and art outdone ;
And now, to loftier airs, he tunes the strings,
And now, to loftier airs, his echo sings;
Though loud as thunder, though as swift as thought,

She reach'd the swelling, caught the flying note ;
In trembling treble now in deeper base,
She show'd how nature could his art surpass.

Amaz'd, at length, with rage the shepherd
burn'd,

His admiration into anger turn'd ;
Enflam'd with emulating pride, he flood,
And thus defy'd the charmer of the wood.

And wilt thou still my music imitate ?
Then see thy folly, and thy task is great---
For know more pow'ful lays remain unsung,
Lays ! far superior to that mimic tongue---
If not, this lute, this vanquish'd lute, I swear,
Shall never more delight the ravish'd ear ;
But, broke in scatter'd fragments strew the plain,
And mourn the glory which it could not gain---

He said, and as he said, his soul on fire,
With a disdainful air, he swept the lyre ;
Quick to the touch, the tides of music flow,
Swell into strength, or melt away in woe ;
Now, raise the shrilling trumpet's clanging jar,
Now, rouse the raging thunders of the war ;
Now, soft'ning sounds, and sadly-pleasing strains,
Breathe out the lover's joys, and lover's pains.

He sung, and ceas'd his rivals' notes to hear,
As his dy'd list'ning in the ambient air.

But now, too late ! her noble folly found,
Sad Philomela stood subdu'd by sound. [fill'd,
Though vanquish'd, yet, with generous ardour
Ignobly still she scorn'd to quit the field ;
Each emulated air, each labour'd note,
Trills on her tongue, and trembles through her
throat,

But slowly faint her pensive accents flow,
Weaken'd with grief, and overcharg'd with woe :
Again, she tunes her voice, again she sings,
Strains every nerve, and quivers on her wings ;
In vain ! her sinking spirits fade away,
And in a tuneful agony decay ;
Dying, she fell, and as the strains expire,
Breath'd out her soul in anguish on the lyre ;
Dissolv'd in transport, there, resign'd her breath,
And gain'd a living conquest by her death.

THE COURT OF VENUS.

FROM CLAUDIAN.

WHERE the fair Paphian goddess kept her court,
Where the loves wanton, and the graces sport ;
A tow'ring mountain lifts its lofty brow,
And bends with pleasure o'er the plains below ;
O'er distant, blue-retiring hills surveys
Its shadows floating in Ionian seas ;
The top impervious, all access denies,
Tires the faint foot, and dims the dizzy eyes :

No fierce, inclement winter shivers here,
No blasting seasons nip the blooming year ;
No smoking mists, nor foggy damps arise,
Hang o'er the hills, or sail along the skies ;
But an untainted Æther shines serene,
And sheds its influence on the smiling scene ;
Eternal sweets the wafting breezes bring,
And whisper out an everlasting spring.

This pleasurable mountain by degrees,
Sinks in a level, to salute your eyes ;
Where joy, succeeding joy, for ever new,
For ever rising to the ravish'd view,
The wand'ring sight with sweet amusement leads
Through golden groves, and ever-living meads.

These were the gifts, his gratitude to prove,
Vulcan bestow'd upon the queen of love ;
For these, the queen of love, resign'd her charms,
And over-fold the Heaven in her arms.

Here, a soft grove its coolly shade affords,
Fann'd by the music of the warbling birds ;
To this, the sylvan choristers resort,
Hop on the boughs, and to the breezes sport :
The queen of love, amid the tuneful throng,
With gracious smiles rewards the fav'rite song ;
Elects the worthy tenant of the grove,
And dedicates him to the god of love.

Embow'ring trees the mingled shade compose,
That imitates the fair, for whom it grows ;
With complicating poplars, poplars twine,
With spreading alders, spreading alders join :
Majestic elms with bending foliage flow,
Float in green waves, and fan the shades below ;
The shades below, the cooling gale receive,
And rising, with the cooling gale, revive :
Two different rivers murmur through the grove,
Two fatal contrarieties in love !
This, sweet as mutual joy in youthful veins,
That, bitter, as a dying lover's pains :
Conscious, the streams, each other seem to shun,
But, in meanders lost, too soon are one !
Dipt in these fabled waves, love's fatal dart,
Stings the distracted soul, to soothe the heart ;
To these, their double pow'r his arrows owe,
Soft-pleasing joys, and sad consuming woe.

Rang'd on the banks, the little loves resort,
Plight fancy'd oaths, and bend their bows in sport ;
These, tender nymphs produc'd, a blooming race !
And left their virgin image on their face.
Their ruddy cheeks their parents charms proclaim,
Alike their habit, and their look the same :
O'er all these troops, presides the god of love,
A god, whom all the gods revere above ;
Sprung from the mother, and the queen of charms,
He shines distinguish'd in superior arms ;
His cogent power e'en deities controuls,
And awes the thunderer that awes the poles ;
On earth he triumphs o'er a monarch's cares,
And blasts the laurel which the thunder spares :
In woods, and groves, th' inferior archers reign,
Contented with the conquests of the plain.

Close by the streams, in fatal pomp array'd,
Love's wild romantic equipage is laid :

Here lawless liberty for ever roves,
 For ever riots in excess of loves;
 Inflam'd with wine, distracted rage appears,
 But soon dissolves in self-accusing tears.
 Here warming whispers propagate replies,
 Sweet-melting murmurs, soft-consenting sighs;
 With all the eloquence that hearts confess,
 With all the harmony that eyes express:
 There young desire their tasted joys pursue,
 Pleas'd with the past, and panting for the new;
 When strange chimeras on a sudden rise,
 Shift the false scene, and intercept their eyes;
 Tormenting jealousies, uneasy cares,
 Dissembling hopes, imaginary fears;
 Accusing crimes of ill-requitted love
 And breaking vows re-echo through the grove.
 Full in the midst, with nice becoming grace,
 Stood youth, too conscious of his comely face;
 Proud of his nervous strength, and vig'rous veins,
 With pain his blood the luscious tide contains;
 With haughty smiles he mocks declining age,
 His starv'd enjoyments, and dissembled rage;
 The wither'd crone avoids him with remorse,
 And sickens at the thought of, Once he was---

Proud o'er the groves a glitt'ring dome ascends,
 Rich with the labour of Vulcanian hands;
 Through the green ranks, the darting lustre streams,
 And the shades kindle with reflected flames;
 This masterpiece of skill, the Lemnian god,
 On his fair spouse a worthy gift bestow'd.
 Immortal monuments of art support
 The vast foundations of each ample court,
 On diamond pillars, diamond pillars rise;
 At once invade, and emulate the skies;
 Pelucid crystal clarifies each stone,
 And by excluding, makes a double sun;
 In oval steps the wavy topaz roll'd,
 Gleams by reflexion on the valving gold;
 Each stone conspires it emulating rays,
 Glitters the beryls, and the rubies blaze;
 Carv'd sapphires melt in undulating flame,
 And drink the lucid amber's fainter stream.

Here spacious greens, reviving areas rise,
 And with a milder scene refresh the eyes;
 Through Cassia groves ambrosial breezes breathe,
 And steal the aromatic sweets beneath;
 There, soft, inferior shades of myrtle grow,
 And lilies, blushing as the roses glow;
 Dissolv'd with joy, the trickling balm runs o'er,
 And the sweet tears distil at every pore.

But now, his journey past, the god of love,
 With joyful steps approach'd his native grove;
 And now he re-assumes a solemn pace,
 He moves with majesty, and looks with grace.

It happen'd then, with future joys elate,
 His goddess-mother at her toilet fate;
 On either side, th' Idalian sisters stand,
 Proud of the smiling goddesses command;
 These scatters odours o'er the fragrant fair,
 Those thread the mazy tendrils of her hair;
 Part exercise the nice correcting comb,
 Smooth the soft curls, and call the stragglers home,
 The comely fav'rites, by a nice design,
 They leave to sport, and wanton with the wind,

The comely fav'rites, with adorning grace
 Wave on the breeze, and flow upon her face,
 With cooling airs create an easy pride,
 And, but increase the charms, they strive to hide:
 No glasses here, deluding lights supply,
 The brilliant diamond, guides the judging eye;
 For as the goddess moves new mirrors rise,
 And catch augmenting splendors from her eyes;
 As to the multiplying stones she turns,
 In all the dances, and in all the burns.

But, lo! a sudden scene of glory fires
 Her rising soul, and breathes more gay desires;
 Her son's reflected image she surveys,
 With trembling joys, she turns to prove the rays,
 But turning, conscious of her only son,
 Into the bloomy boy's embraces run,
 Receives him panting at unfolding charms,
 And hugs the little darling in her arms.

ORPHEUS AND EURYDICE.

FROM VIRGIL'S FOURTH GEORGIC.

INCENS'd, the raging prophet* thus replies,
 Gnashes his teeth, and rolls his azure eyes.
 No common vengeance does your crimes pursue,
 Your crimes, which well deserve their fatal due:
 But humbly supplicate immortal hate,
 And wisely shun the threat'ning rage of fate;
 O! think on Orpheus, and his injur'd spouse,
 And mark the wicked author of their woes;
 When lawless lust inflam'd thy boiling blood,
 To chase the flying fair along the flood:
 Think, how the snake, in verdant ambush laid,
 Unwarily surpris'd the panting maid;
 Shrieking, she fell, resign'd her fainter breath,
 And sought the kinder arms of icy death:
 The nymphs, the swains, the dying virgin mourn'd,
 The river deities, the grief return'd;
 The winds, with sympathising sorrow, sigh'd,
 And the sad streams their trickling tears supply'd.

The wretched husband, hopeless of relief,
 In tuneful anguish sought to soothe his grief;
 But rising sorrows all his thoughts controul,
 Flow in his eyes, and melt his soft'ning soul;
 In plaintive strains he mourns his consort gone,
 Sighs to the rising, and the setting sun;
 Till wildly lost in solitude and woe,
 Raving, he sought, the dreary shades below,
 Advent'rous by despair, and dar'd to tread
 The melancholy mansions of the dead;
 With songs to supplicate th' infernal power,
 And soothe the god, who ne'er was sooth'd before.

Lur'd by the magic of the sacred sound,
 Swift-gliding crowds of spectres hover round;
 Thick, as when fowls obscure the ev'ning air,
 And to their groves in feather'd clouds repair;
 Men, matrons, maids, a visionary throng,
 Surround the poet, and imbibe his song;
 With all those multitudes of empty ghosts,
 Where Stygian streams surround the squallid coasts;
 Heedless their own unhappy fates to mourn,
 Weeping, they make his misery their own.

* Proteus.

E'en hell itself, with all its fiends, was charm'd,
 Its terrors soften'd, and its rage disarm'd;
 The grinning guardian loll'd his triple tongue,
 And fawning, lick'd the poet, as he sung;
 'The very furies heav'd away their chains,
 And found their own too weak for music's strains,
 Ixion his eternal toil forewent,
 And list'ning, on his rolling labour, leant.

But now the tuneful bard, his bride restor'd,
 Back to the realms of day, the path explor'd;
 Slowly she follow'd, as he led the way,
 Obedient to Proserpina's decree:
 For if, before the gloomy shades were past,
 He turn'd to look, the look must be his last,
 A fault which hell might pass in silence by,
 Could hell behold it with a lover's eye:
 And now near travers'd o'er the realms of night,
 They rose emergent on the beams of light;
 When the poor youth unfortunately kind,
 Cast a too fond-conductive glance behind:
 But, as he turn'd, three peals of thunder spoke,
 The dire conditional promise broke;
 While thus the sadly sweet, reproving maid,
 Bespoke the youth by too much love betray'd.

Unhappy Orpheus! ah, unhappy boy!
 What mov'd thee thus to blast our bloomy joy?
 Alas! for ever lost, I leave thee now!
 This parting kiss, to soothe eternal woe—
 Farewell—dim shades of horror round me rise,
 And sudden night o'erwhelms my swimming eyes.

She said; and as she said, in shades withdrew,
 From his deluded arms, the vision flew;
 With strict embrace, in vain he stops her stay,
 Dissolv'd to air, unfelt, she glides away;
 In vain he seeks her with incessant eyes,
 In vain invokes her with imploring cries;
 What could he do? All efforts are too late,
 Again her soul is summon'd down by fate;
 Th' infernal ferry-man relents no more,
 And e'en his music now forgets its power!

Seven months, by fame's report, the lonesome
 swain,
 Devoted to his melancholy pain:
 Where Scythian hills are bleak with drifted snow,
 And shiver in the frigid floods below,
 Distracted, with indulgency of grief,
 In soul-restoring strains he sought relief;
 In strains that e'en the barren mountains charm'd,
 And their eternal frosts with pity warm'd:
 The list'ning savages his power confess'd,
 Their rage he sooth'd, but could not soothe his breast.

As the lamenting nightingale complains,
 Of cruel spoilers, and destructive swains,
 When sad! she sees her younglings borne away,
 Her downy darlings, an inhuman prey!
 Sunk in some gloom, she darkling pines alone,
 Sighs out her grief, and murmurs out her moan.
 Thus Orpheus sought to calm his peaceless breast,
 A stranger to the quietude of rest;
 Now wildly tortur'd by despair, he goes,
 O'er freezing mountains of eternal snows,

Delighted to the barren rocks to tell,
 The rigorous benevolence of hell;
 Averse to Venus, and the nuptial joys,
 In unavailing grief his life destroys;
 Till frantic Bacchanals that madly strove
 To warm his bosom to a second love,
 With rage, revenge, and brutal fury arm'd,
 More savage, than those savages he charm'd,
 Conspir'd against his life, the bard they slew,
 And on cold Hebe's streams his head they threw;
 Yet, e'en in death, his voice bewails his woe,
 And with the streams his strains in anguish flow;
 Eurydice! his dying tongue deplores,
 Eurydice! resounds along the length'ning shores.

UPON A NEEDLE.

Occasioned by seeing a Lady Embroidering.

THIS little instrument of art,
 Methinks, resembles Cupid's dart;
 As the silken wound it gives,
 With enliv'ning beauty lives;
 So the pointed shafts of love,
 On my heart, their power prove;
 And, as the vital threads they pierce,
 Animate a spring of verse,
 Whilst the flowers of poetry
 Arise, these brighter flowers to see.

Yet, though thus like, both darts appear,
 In the main point, they differ far;
 For, but consider, their employs—
 This creates, but that destroys!

TO MR. TAYLOR, A. B. OF ST. JOHN'S, &c.

Upon reading some of his excellent Poems.

As suppliants e'er they seek the sacred shrine,
 Prefer their off'rings to the power within;
 Thus let me fix this token of my zeal, [steal;
 Here, through these gates of fame, a pass-port
 Pursue the paths of glory where you run,
 And, like the lark, salute the rising sun.

But hark! what sweet enchanting notes I hear!
 Does * Horace, or does Taylor charm mine ear?
 Desistive thought! the Roman, now no more,
 To Latium lost, delights th' Elysium shore;
 There, hap'ly could he hear thy loftier strain,
 Thy lyre would charm him into life again.

† Securely may'st thou dare the darts of death,
 Defy the tyrant with thy latest breath;
 For this life lost, eternal life receive,
 And in thy own Pindaric ever live.

‡ What may not all thy lofty numbers raise,
 When light receives new lustre from thy lays?
 Amaz'd, I view'd thy beams, like ancient night,
 Silver my gloom, and cheer my soul with light:
 Like the fair orb you sing with equal force,
 By your own brightness you direct your course;
 To us below, thy genial rays dispense,
 The glorious beams of everlasting sense;

* Alluding to his odes.

† Alluding to a poem against the fear of death.

‡ Alluding to an ode on light.

Ripen each thought, recal each fancy forth,
And warm poetic harvests into birth.
In thee, as in Apollo, both unite,
Celestial lustre, and celestial wit.

* Had holy David heard thee weep his woe,
The Psalmist had resign'd his harp to you;
Music, like yours, would all his griefs controul,
And soothe him, as he sooth'd distemper'd Saul.

But whilst I thus thy pleasing paths pursue,
What fields of glory open to my view?
What rising raptures, all my breast inspire,
How my soul kindles with reflected fire!
Still, as I read, with rage divine I glow,
Dwell on each thought, and strive to think like
you:

With wonder view judicious ardour shine,
Bloom in each thought, and ripen ev'ry line:
Each manly verse, with female sweetness flows,
With fruits, and blossoms, like the orange glows.

But, oh! forgive a weak officious friend,
And let these lines my honest love commend;
Whilst to sublimer flights your wings aspire,
Thus let me gaze at distance, thus admire;
Receive a single portion of your power,
Nor, like Elisha, could I wish for more.

But, when time sees thy future laurels grow
For some great Iliad, to adorn thy brow,
In the soft shade, thus let me chant my love,
And live the linnet of thy laurel grove.

TO LAURA.

When Paris saw the bright celestial Three,
And view'd those beauties, now reviv'd in thee,
Hadst thou, my Laura, seen the grand dispute,
Hadst thou contended for the glitt'ring fruit;
Heaven's queen had found her princely presents
vain,

Nor proffer'd empires you alone could gain;
Pallas abash'd, had own'd with sweet surprise,
The silent eloquence of magic eyes;
Such eyes had smil'd thee fairest of the fair,
And Venus own'd a brighter Venus there.
Though Venus shone with each alluring grace,
Her charms had only gain'd a second place:
Thine! thine had won the shepherd's noble part,
Though hers the apple, thine had been his heart.

TO THE SAME.—WEEPING.

If Laura weep for those her eyes have slain,
Then smile, my fair, and we'll revive again.

TO THE SAME.

ON HER PATCHES.

LAURA, you say, these sable spots impart,
The seemly tokens of each love-burnt heart;
As conquer'd trophies grace some sacred shrine,
So they adorn a power, as much divine:
But if, among those conquests of your eyes,
My humble heart can prove a worthy prize;

* Alluding to a poem on David's lamentation over Absalom.

O let your lip the faithful token wear,
And let me live on endless kisses there!

TO HER RING.

Blest ornament! how happy is thy snare,
To bind the snowy finger of my fair!
O could I learn thy nice coercive art,
And as thou bind'st her finger, bind her heart!

Not eastern diadems, like thee, can shine,
Fed from her brighter eyes with beams divine;
Nor can their mightiest monarch's pow'r command

So large an empire, as thy charmer's hand.

O could thy form thy fond admirer wear,
Thy very likeness should in all appear;
My endless love, thy endless round should show,
And my heart flaming, for thy diamond glow.

ON A LADY'S NECKLACE.

Ye crystal orbs that on her bosom lie,
The glitt'ring planets of a brighter sky,
Like stars illumin'd by the lamp of day,
From my Selinda's eye you catch your ray;
Well may those eyes of light like yours inspire,
When their least beam can set my heart on fire.

O happy chain! thy artless foldings prove
Superior to the magic charms of love!
O! were you, by a just possession, mine,
And had I power to make you more divine;
Could art increase each globe, as large as this,
Like Anthony, I'd give it for a kiss:
My worlds, though swell'd to thousands, I'd bestow,
To circle my Selinda's neck, like you.

TO A LADY,

Who is most beautiful when Angry.

CÆLIA, methinks, that sweet contracted brow,
Resembles angry Cupid's bended bow;
Like, that, it aims a stroke at every heart,
Whilst either eye supplies a keener dart.

ON WOMEN.

BRIGHT, as those glittering worlds that roll above,
Are women, when in virtue's orb they move;
But then, like stars, once fall'n, their light they lose,
Unheeded fade, and turn to slime, like those.

TO MRS. WIGMORE,

Upon seeing her at the Mountebank's stage.

COULD Smith's medicinary power but heal,
With half that ease, your fatal glances kill:
How might we bless the love-relieving art!
How might it soothe this sad afflicted heart!
But yet, for O! so pleasing is the flame,
So like the charming fair, from whom it came!
First, let each pang distract my peaceful rest,
But never, never! leave my love-sick breast;
Still, still, let hope indulge the dear desire,
And with the lamp of life alone expire;

So shall my death, my faithful passion prove,
And my heart die a martyr to my love.

TO MR. EUSDEN,

Desiring his Corrections on a Poem.*

DEAR SIR,

If what a grateful heart can give,
May meet a kind reception, this receive ;
To these low, humble lines, a while unbend,
And let the critic soften to the friend ;
Let human candor aid thy judging art,
And thy head ever dictate from thy heart !

Fond to be thought a candidate for fame,
My muse, ambitious, takes a lofty aim ;
But, ah ! too bold her wish, too large her view,
Unless approv'd, unless inspir'd by you ;
Unless you tune her notes, in vain she sings,
Unless you aid, in vain she spreads her wings ;
Aw'd by your word, she'll, blushing own her fault,
Disclaiming each extravagance of thought ;
Nature, and art, at once, like you, dispense,
And ripen fancy into strength of sense.

Thus, tender trees, with flowers luxuriant smile,
Waste their vain sap, ungrateful to their soil ;
Till some wise hand, with kind corrective care,
Prune their gay pride, and bid their branches bear :
Then fruits, and flowers, promiscuously abound,
Teem from the stroke, and blossom from the wound.

Sidney-College, Jan. 27. 1725-6.

W. PATTISON.

AN APOLOGY TO MR. BELL.

Clarior in tenebris si latuisset, erat.

SIR,

If I my tributary lays refuse,
O blame not me, but blame the conscious muse !
For when commanding duty bids me sing,
She stops my voice, and breaks the jarring string ;
And when I would the pleasing task renew,
The awful Roman rises to my view,
Let those, says he, who aim in all they write,
At once to mingle profit, and delight ;
Their theme exactly to their measures fit,
Nor vainly hope to rise above their wit :
Who looks aloft, will surely tread awry,
And may mistake a marl-pit for the sky.

Yet, like the rest, I can my tribute bring,
Like some perhaps in spite of nature sing :
Ransack each common author, and from thence
Profane good ancient phrase with modern sense.
In rapine rich, laboriously dull,
Witty, but just enough to show a fool ;
How could I languish in a rural song,
And tag the tadpole-pastoral along ?
How sweetly should the tuneful murmurs creep,
And lull the ravish'd reader fast asleep ?
The blasted oaks should then more justly fear,
My rhyming fury, than the thunder's scar.

How could I, wing'd with splay-foot lyrics fly,
Like hag, on broomstick, through the troubled sky !

* Rosalind to Henry.

Rhyming, I'd mount, like Dennis, heretofore,
Bluster as loudly, and as proudly soar.

Well may such poets rise a tow'ring height,
Who have no thought to intercept their flight ;
Nor need they fear to tumble from the skies,
For those can never fall, who never rise.

But shall I with collected theft profane
The great, the bless'd, the venerable name !
Shall I with murd'ers to the altar fly,
Not through religious zeal, but infamy,
As Blackmore fought in Job a sanctuary !
Forbid it, Heav'n—I choose an humbler fate,
Nor would be wicked, to be vainly great.
Let me in lowlier scenes a while delight,
With cooling judgment meditate the flight ;
Then, worthy Sir, if time confirm my thought,
The tribute, if 'tis worthy, shall be brought ;
With double ardour I'll the task pursue,
To sing of Heaven, and sing to you.

TO MR. HEDGES,

On Reading his Latin Ode to Dr. Broxholme.

UNSKILL'D in Greek and Roman tongue,
Which words are short, and which are long,
To thee these home-spun lines I send,
Not as a scholar, but a friend.

Here I might show from wise example,
In work elaborate and ample,
That Homer, though he writ in Greek,
Writ what his mother taught him speak ;
Horace and Virgil's learned Latin,
Was what, when boys, they us'd to prate in.
That all fam'd bards, except the Dutch,
(If there were ever any such)
Have writ the poems, they excel in,
In the same tongue they learn'd to spell in.

To thee alone, with greatest ease,
'Tis granted, in all ways, to please ;
And, by a gift from heaven miraculous,
All lingua's are to thee vernacula's :
That Horace self had scarcely known,
Thy thoughts, or language from his own.

Many a lad returns from school,
A Latin, Greek, and Hebrew fool ;
In arts and knowledge still a block,
Though deeply skill'd in hie, hae, hoc.
Heavy they tread the up-hill way,
O'er craggy rocks, and found'ring clay,
Till weary with their road, they stop
Just at the mountain's lofty top ;
Still poring on the barren ground,
View not the beauteous prospect round ;
Which, hid beneath the summit, lies
Conceal'd from low and vulgar eyes,
And which alone can amply pay
The toil and drudgery of the way :
From hence they might with transport view
All that the ancient sages knew ;
What they perform'd, and what they thought,
How Tully spoke, and Cæsar fought ;
While manners of a world unknown
Should guide their youth, and form their own ;

While bright examples lead to fame,
And vicious teach to fly their shame.

Yet we might spare the mighty pains
In searching ancient dark remains;
Since greater worthies rise at home,
And Britain scorns to yield to Rome.
Augustus' reign, renown'd for peace,
For learning, wit, and wealth's increase;
No more we envy, while our land
Is doubly blest'd from George's hand.
Ammon's success, and Cæsar's mind,
To form victorious Marlbro' join'd;
Demosthenes', and Tully's fame,
Must yield to Walpole's greater name;
Faction, and strife, to hear his voice,
Are dumb, and cease their jarring noise:
Whole senates bow their yielding minds,
Like woods before the southern winds;
Free from deceit, and servile art,
He speaks the dictates of his heart;
His tongue enchants, his counsel leads;
Peace enters first, then wealth succeeds:
His virtues through the land confess'd,
While thus he soothes us to be blest.

If to new scenes we turn our view,
And learning, arts, and wit pursue,
Our land can furnish men of fame,
To eclipse the Greek, and Roman name.
Locke shall instruct, and form our youth,
And teach their understandings truth.
Vice shall look pale, and virtue thrive,
Humanity, and friendship live;
While Addison our morals rules,
And proves all villains to be fools.
Newton shall lead our ravish'd souls,
Through boundless worlds beyond the poles;
From star to star direct our way,
As certain, and as fix'd as they.
Examples were but vain to prove,
Our nation's boast, our country's love.
A land of patriots brave, and free,
While all mankind are slaves but we!

To what a height true wit can reach,
Let Waller, and let Congreve teach;
And if we needs must write by rules,
Without th' assistance of the schools,
In flowing verse, and lines well-wrought,
What Horace, what Quintilian thought,
Join'd with a little mother wit,
Roscommon, and our Pope have writ.

The fair, who best the muse inspire,
Who warm the heart, and tune the lyre,
Superior to all former dames,
Inhabit now the banks of Thames:
Th' Egyptian queen, the ancient's boast,
For whom the well-fought world was lost,
Tell me, dear Hedges, thou canst tell,
Thou know'st the dead, and living well,
Could she her haughty charms compare
With her, who represents her here?
Old Homer's theme, the Grecian dame,
Who set whole nations in a flame,
No more had been the beauteous prize,
Had they beheld Lavinia's eyes:

The Greeks for her alone had strove,
And Paris had been false to love.

Thus taught, and thus inspir'd, I write
What friendship, and what love indite;
Free from each modern witling's vice,
Envy and slander, flattery, lies,
To please our pride, or gain our end,
Each jest should sacrifice a friend;
While one's ill-nature joins to praise
What th' other's malice dully says;
In peace my harmless minutes pass,
'Tis business, beauty, and a glass;
Nor want I aught, my soul to cheer,
But thee, to join in pleasure here;
Thus may I live, till life shall end,
And love my mistress, country, friend!

TO A FRIEND,

Disuading him from loving a certain Lady.

If aught a kindly caution can impart,
Be this, not love, imprinted on thy heart;
Let every line a well-known truth commend,
And, where you doubt the poet, trust the friend;
Let vanquish'd reason re-assume the field,
And to the true, the fictitious goddess yield.

What Homer feigns, when fierce Tydides strove
Inspir'd by Pallas, with the queen of love;
But shows the weakness of vain beauty's art,
Whilst wisdom's sacred influence arms the heart:
Yet, green in age, unvers'd in female wiles,
Each specious show our easy sight beguiles;
Gay courting scenes the early path adorn,
And blooming beauty paints our youthful morn;
Our heedless pleasures with false objects rise,
Blind to the black'ning cloud, and gathering skies.
But, ah! methinks, I hear thee, sighing, say,
Such charms invite! so flowery smiles the way!
Resolv'd, fair beauty's lovely maze I'll run—
Who might not thus? who would not be undone!—
O stay, rash youth! beware, be timely wise,
Lurk'd in that labyrinth, another monster lies!

How weak were female snares, how vain each
wile,

Did not our eyes our hood-wink'd minds beguile?
Like gross idolaters, we form the power,
Then, the dull image, as a god, adore;
Breath'd in soft sighs, our pleading souls impart,
And, for the victim, sacrifice our heart:
Hence, Celia rules, the tyrant of thy breast,
In all the seeming Deity confest;
Hence, when she speaks, there's music in the sound,
Hence, when she looks, her eyes like lightnings wound:

But, to thy reason's eye, the scene display,
And the proud phantom-goddess fades away;
No more her immortality remains,
Unless preserv'd in thy immortal strains.

Grant we, thy Celia's charms superior shine,
Or, in the lover's language, look divine;
Yet, is each charm to her alone confin'd?
Or canst thou judge, by partial passion blind?
Still, will each faithful, love-alluring grace,
Beam in her eye, and brighten up her face?

So, the blue summit of some mountain's height,
Wrapt in gay clouds, deludes the distant sight;
But, as with gazing eyes we draw more near,
Fades the false scene, and the rough rocks appear.

Nor outward form thy easy thought controul,
But be the look an index to the soul;
For, when old nature fram'd the faithless fair,
From every work the goddess cull'd a share;
In heav'nly beauty bade her face excel,
But made her heart the treasury of hell:
Hence, pride, and lust, and jealous fury grow,
The springs of sorrow, and the seeds of woe:
Thus brothels with a painted angel shine,
Whilst latent devils enambush'd, lurk within.

Nor think, my Damon, that I rashly blame
Thy too good nature, thy too generous flame;
Like thine, my victim'd heart, the pangs has bore,
But, (ah, delightful change!) endures no more;
Yet, O! for oft the thought disturbs my rest,
'Tis hard to heal a love-envenom'd breast;
So soft each arrow steals upon our heart,
It glides a feather, but it grows a dart.
Yet, wouldst thou from increasing ill be free,
Pursue my precepts, and resolve like me,
When the false fyren singles out her man,
Tips the lewd leer, or flaps the flirting fan;
O shun th' infection swift, victorious, fly,
She smiles a ruin, and she looks a lie:
But, must some lovely, some divinely fair,
Sweeten this draught of life, and soothe thy care;
Let the gay muse relieve thy sickening pain,
And form a brighter Venus of the brain: [grieve,
Then shalt thou scorn those charms that made thee
And by the fair illusion learn to live.

So Israel's sons, by poisonous serpents stung,
Aloft in air, a mimic serpent hung;
Fix'd on the sight, the sad afflicted train
Gaz'd into health, and look'd away their pain.

ON A PAINTED LADY.

CÆLIA's fair, the charming toast,
May of each perfection boast;
What penurious nature owes,
Art more liberal bestows:
Bids a fresher blush arise,
Keener lightning arm her eyes;
Adds, or animates a grace,
And wakes the wonders of her face:
The blushing tinctures smiling flow,
To see how cunningly they grow;
To see how all the beaux adore
Cælia, mortal now no more,
New created by their power.

Thus the fairest sweetest place,
Once uncultivated was;
Where parterres their flowers disclose,
Bushes, brakes, and briars rose;
Thorns with pointed horror stood,
And arm'd the borders of the wood;
But since the workman's pow'ful hand
Subdu'd, and civiliz'd the land;
Tun'd the torrents to cascades,
And soften'd forests into shades,

Surprising scenes attract our sight,
And turn displeasure to delight;
The savages forsake their place,
And yield to nobler human race.

An Natura intendat Monstrum? Neg.

Translated from the Carm. Quad.

PRESS'd with a load of poverty and years,
How strange a prodigy the wretch appears;
Whose trembling limbs, and furrow'd brows reveal,
The noxious witch, foe to the public weal;
Who gathers herbs by moon-light, and alarms
The neighb'ring villages with magic charms:
To her imagin'd spells dire woes succeed,
The gen'rous courser lothes the flow'ry mead;
Spurning the glebe around the field he flies,
Forsakes his dappled mares, repines, and dies.

From infants tender throats (what nurses say)
There numbers shall to wond'ring ears convey }
Sharp pins and needles tear their bloody way.
From heifers stubborn teats the trickling store
Of milky nectar now descends no more;
Dame Baucis trudges to the fields in vain,
Few drops, alas! her flinted pails contain.

Oft the malicious hag is seen to fly,
Through the large convex of the nether sky;
Upborn by magic staff she rides secure,
(Superior to the giddy whirlwinds power.)
Advent'rous, o'er the pathless welkin strays,
Mocks the rude winds, and in the tempest plays.
Now dwindled to an hare, she scours in view,
While the full cry her circling maze pursue;
Now tir'd, the beagle's eager speed eludes,
In puzzling thickets lost, or trackless woods:
The baffled hunters for the witch inquire,
Now safely seated by the kitchen fire;
Hid in grimalkin's form, with fullen pride,
Demure she sits, and licks her tabby side.

Whence knows she thus to vary her disguise,
And in a borrow'd shape deceive our eyes?
She, whom the restless course of time made old,
(Time that distorts the fairest human mould)
Though a poor simple soul as ever liv'd,
Is by the vulgar as a witch receiv'd.
Thus monsters in our mind alone exist,
We give 'em birth, and shape them as we list.

TO MR. ROCHE,

Upon his translating the foregoing Piece.

To praise unknown, unknowing to commend,
Distinguishes the critic from the friend:
Such was my just applause when public fame
Proclaim'd your merit, but conceal'd your name.
Like Egypt we ador'd the teeming flood,
And bless'd the latent author of our good.

No more shall silly tales the world deceive,
No more the sillier world those tales believe:
Each wither'd crone shall live and die unblam'd,
And be no more a witch or wizard nam'd:
No public grievances infect her ease,
But innocently she may stink in peace.
The only prodigy which now appears,
Is such a genius so beyond its years.

TO A WRETCHED POETASTER;

That went into mourning to counterfeit his sister's death.

IN vain, poor fustian seer, you dress and write,
Begot in nature's scorn, and wit's despite;
For sure she made thee only for a rule,
To form a coxcomb, and a canting fool;
In vain you tag dull miserable rhyme,
And make it with your shambling legs to chime;
The muse you may pursue in nature's spite,
But never overtake her tow'ring flight;
In this you're only right, so smart in black,
For then, you show your soul, upon your back.

As the sly peasant hangs a breathless crow,
To scare the vermin from the corn below;
So fortune sets thee in a * world of wit,
To keep fools like thyself from tasting it.

Of old, we read Amphion's sacred song,
Could draw dull blocks and senseless stones along;
The same effect among thy books we see,
For they draw blocks, as dull, in drawing thee.

Thy wit, and money, both are of a length,
Both stol'n, dependant on each other's strength;
But soon thy sister shall resume her breath,
And to thy muse, and thee give surer death;
Then, those black ensigns of her wish'd-for fate,
May mourn thy transient wit, and lost estate.

Wrote at Appleby School, 1723.

SONG.

'Twas in the solemn noon of night,
As I lay by a murmuring stream,
Betray'd by fancy's sweet delight,
Amus'd by an amorous dream.

When straight I heard, or seem'd to hear,
From an ivy's dark reverend shade,
A solemn sound assault mine ear,
And heavily pierce the thick glade.

But soon a faint pale form appear'd,
Like a shade on a moon-shiny wall;
To it's gor'd breast it's hand it rear'd,
And utter'd this sorrowful call.

O pity me kind hearted swain!
For you knew, ah too well! the false maid;
She lov'd me first, first sooth'd my pain,
She sooth'd it, but then she betray'd!

Depress'd with anguish, rage, and grief,
I fatally fought out this grove,
Here rashly cut the thread of life,
And ended all hopes of my love!

But yet, though beauty cannot please,
And, though I'm now tasteless of charms,
'Twill rob me of eternal rest,
To think her enjoy'd in thy arms.

Yet once, I think, thou wert my friend,
Till the friend in the rival was lost,
O kindly let the rival end.
Nor farther torment a poor ghost!

* Meaning his books.

For this a restless shade I rove
Be warn'd by my pitiful fate!
Betimes, betimes renounce your love,
Nor ponder this lesson too late!
So may good angels guard thy sleep.--
But I to the false-hearted maid
Will glide, and through the curtains peep;
There show her the man she betray'd.
She cannot, sure, she cannot see
So wretched an object unmov'd!
At least, I think, she'll pity me,
More truly than ever she lov'd.
Farewell---but, go to yonder cave,
Where my bones to the ravens lie bare;
Inhume them kindly in a grave,
And my fame from aspersers, O clear!
I trembled as the spectre spoke,
And starting, awak'd with the fright,
While the hoarse night bird's hollow croak,
Presented the shivering sp'rit.
A sudden chillness freez'd my breast,
My soul in a terror was fled;
Fainting, I sunk, benumb'd oppress'd,
And dreamt that Beliza was dead.
When soon, for now the dawning light
Be-jewell'd the dew-dropping vale,
A youth came posting through the night;
To tell me the fore-boded tale.
The maid was dead---my fears were just,
I arose, and soon found out the cave,
Prepar'd an urn, then mix'd their dust,
And weeping laid both in a grave.

FROM LONDON TO CAMBRIDGE.

AN EPISTLE TO MR. ROCHE.

SIR,
YOURS, I receiv'd, with mighty pleasure,
Attended with my learned * treasure;
And had I Burckett's knack, and time,
I'd shoe my muse's feet with rhyme,
I'd send you such a pack of news,
Nay, make an hackney of my muse:
Prove logically Pope a fool †,
Sagely denounce great Shakspeare dull,
To both prefer good Master Fenton,
Or, in a moment's time invent one;
But for necessity you know,
One's self might stand---in statu quo.

But hang it, I've no turn for satire,
Besides, 'tis quite against my nature;
For criticisms! pshaw the bottle---
The devil take your Aristotle:
Give me a sparkling foaming glass,
As bright and clever as my las;
Thus let us dance an endless round,
Till one or t'other throws me down.

But now to talk a little serious,
Nor vainly light, nor yet mysterious;

* Books received.

† In answer to Burckett's asserting these tenets.

Pray how do Cambridge matters stand?
 How fare the brethren of the band?
 For now I think on't in your last,
 Those things were negligently pass'd;
 But in your next, pray let me know,
 If you can come to town or no;
 For solitary here I stay,
 Impatient at your long delay;
 Most indolently spend my time,
 Or sleep, or drink, or idly rhyme;
 Now lay new models for a poem,
 Then in a moment's time undo 'em;
 For faith the tuneful tribe neglect me,
 While you are absent to direct me.
 But, if you'll come, then in a trice,
 Assisted by your good advice;
 I'll polish my poetic store,
 And fish for trouts in metaphor;
 To Thames' serene retreats repair,
 And finish my six cantos there *;
 My pleasurable labours done,
 Subscribe, your servant Pattison.

TO THE SAME.

WHILE you, my dear, sit moap'd in college,
 And lose your wit in search of knowledge,
 Restrain'd by tutors, aw'd by doctors,
 And watch'd by supercilious proctors;
 I make the present day my own,
 And dedicate it to the town:
 As how? why thus; here's just a piece
 And this is all, my pleasure's price;
 With this I'll get politely drunk,
 With this I'll get some courtly punk,
 Not one of your damn'd common whores,
 That ply it at your merchant's doors;
 But one, ay, such a one! so fine!
 You bards would call her some divine---
 Some---but a rapture here encroaches,
 Time spends---you captain of the coaches!
 Here master---where? why to the Rose;
 (A place that every body knows.)

But now we've got a moment's talk,
 As folks tell stories as they walk;
 For once I'll be as dull and sober,
 As if I'd guzzled fat October.

I know you, and twenty more,
 If once poetically---poor;
 Would sit and frown, be hipp'd, and snivel,
 And curse your fortune to the devil;
 Whilst I, all gay, and debonair,
 Till I must feel, would nothing fear.
 Riches are joys indeed---I want 'em,
 And I'll thank fortune if she'll grant 'em;
 If not---why I'm the richer still---
 No, no, you mean the poorer Will---
 The richer, Sir, I say again,
 And thus the matter I'll explain.

Those mortals, happy, you'll allow,
 Who nothing borrow, nothing owe!

* He had a design of writing a poem upon angling,
 in six cantos.

But search the world: and if you can
 In town or country find that man,
 To your opinion I'll descend,
 If not, I hope, you'll hear your friend.

Well, for that's nearest, go to court,
 Begin your search, I wish you sport:
 His Honour, Lordship, and his Grace,
 All mighty men! in mighty place!
 But how are all those honours gain'd?
 Those mighty places, how obtain'd?
 How? why by interest and favour,
 Then let me note, Sir, by your leave here;
 Those dignities 'tis plainly shown,
 Are but another's, not their own;
 Soon got, they may as soon be lost,
 While whim and fancy rule the roast;
 And very plainly, by the bye,
 Belong as much to you or I.

But if they're bob'd by church or state,
 You say they've got a great estate:
 A great estate! by whom? or how?
 Lord, Sir! you're too inquisitive now---
 Job's father's dead, he's eldest son,
 Just come to age, so all's his own;
 What would you more? but lend your ear,
 And in a moment you shall hear;
 Your 'squire has wealth, and therefore parts!
 Is great at court, deep vers'd in arts:
 Yet whilst his stock of wealth and sense,
 Is due to men or providence;
 He lives!--but on another's pence!
 And while he grows the richer, yet
 He only runs the more in debt;
 Hence logically I could show,
 The more we have, the more we owe;
 But time's too precious thus to spend,
 And see we're at our journey's end---
 Here, O delicious! take the glass---
 O fill it higher! name the lass---
 Now make a fool, as tale shall bless us,
 Of Aristotle, and of Cræsus.

TO MR. MITCHELL,

Upon his poetical petition to the Honourable Sir Robert Walpole.

BACK, scribbler, to thy Caledonian plains,
 Cold as thy genius, barren as thy brains;
 To those inhospitable mountains show,
 A cursed rhyming itch they never knew;
 Nor think to read thy lectures here; for know,
 We never take dictators from the plough:
 Then peaceably betimes resign thy quill,
 Scotland to British power is subject still;

While Congreve with a just politeness warms,
 While easy Pope with flowing music charms;
 While witty Swift shall every muse adorn,
 And Dennis scourge the fools he does not scorn;
 While Philips' verse delights the list'ning swains,
 And Steele declines the praise his merit gains;
 While Fenton's sadly-pleasing numbers move,
 And Granville kindles up a nobler love.
 While happy we these tuneful bards can hear,
 No foreign jargon shall debauch our ear.

Yet warm'd by British heat, and British lays,
Thou striv'st to turn thy libel into praise;
Thus Egypt's streams in muddy currents run,
And ripen into monsters by the sun.
In vain thou'rt sanctify'd with Milton's name,
Not even Homer should protect thy shame;
In Pope, that mighty Greek thy baseness knows,
And Zoilus and Homer still were foes.
Murderers like thee to an asylum fly,
Not to show zeal, but hide their infamy:
And with convicted villains may'st thou go,
Guilty of robbery, and murder too;
For trace thy steps, and presently we find
The hand that robb'd Pack's garden of the mind;
Murdering each sweet, disguising it for thine,
And making mortal what he made divine.

ON HIS MISTRESS'S FAVOURS.

LIKE Alexander, Cælia spreads her power,
Like him, she makes the vassal world adore;
But, ah! like him, to soothe a proud desire,
First conquers towns, then sets those towns on fire.

TO MR. POPE.

DEAR SIR,
AND sure that fond, familiar name,
May hint, that friendship is my gen'rous aim;
O then this frankness of my heart excuse,
And with a smile confirm the blushing muse;
Ambitious hope! yet say, to bless our eyes,
Thy mighty Homer should again arise,
Wouldst thou not pant, the wondrous man to see?
Speak from thy inmost soul!—then censure me!
And as aloft in laurell'd state you sit,
And view below the subject sons of wit;
O, teach those arduous ways through which you
came,
And lead her through the flowery paths of fame.
A child, as yet, no certain steps she takes,
But now and then a wild excursion makes;
Mocks the grave dictates of her guardian art,
Steals from her sight, and plays a wanton's part.
Though cross'd myself in every glorious aim,
'Tis hope, at least, to be ally'd to fame.
And whilst the witty and the fair commend,
It hints some merit to be call'd thy friend.
Fir'd at that word, against my fate I'll strive,
And dare to emulate that praise I'd give.
What though I fail the bold attempt to gain,
Mean were the thought to think it made in vain.
The richest ore shines useless unreveal'd,
And finallest talents should not be conceal'd.
For, sure the muse that gen'rous verse inspires,
Which friendship dictates, and affection fires;
Warm'd by a faint reflexion of thy flame,
My bosom kindles at immortal fame;
But well I know the rashness of my youth,
Perhaps these lines confirm the fatal truth!
No sordid views could ever yet seduce,
The virgin-chasteness of my youthful muse;
Let venal bards in state-promotion play,
There sport like atoms in the stream of day.
I never made a wealthy idiot laugh,
Or Israel-like ador'd a golden calf;

But when I see true worth conspicuous shine,
I burn to make the bright alliance mine.
Superior to the formal world's controul,
Pride in its charms, and claim a kindred soul;
O! then this token of my zeal receive,
For next to merit praises, is to give.

UPON SEEING A LADY

At the Music-Booth at Sturbridge-Fair. By J. Taylor.

COULD these faint numbers glow with equal
fire,
To that which in his breast the writer feels:
Could Phœbus like the fair unknown inspire,
And verse, but emulate the flame it tells,
The lover some success had found, and she
Been known to fame, though lost to love and me.
Wound not that love with too severe a name,
Which was not chance, but passion in excess,
Conceal'd the shaft from whence the arrow
came,
My hopes may be, but not my anguish less:
Strikes not the lightning with a fate as true,
Though baffled reason wonder'd whence it flew.
If not in pity to your lover's woes,
For your own sake, at least, yourself reveal,
Lest when I die, and thou the latent cause,
You lose a triumph you deserve so well;
Nay, ev'n repaid with all my suff'rings be,
And envy'd by my fall—if known, I fall by thee.
Yet more—a thousand loves may lurk behind,
And half the course of glory yet to run;
A flowing wit, discreet, and beauteous mind,
May crown the conquest which your eyes
began;
Nor bid me dread the thousand deaths in store,
I look'd, I sigh'd, and lov'd—and was undone before!
In vain I, midnight-anchorite, must boast
Of rugged maxims, and pedantic rules,
For what is life, if best enjoyment lost
In the dull mazes of insipid schools?
Love, must refine what science scarce began,
And mould the letter'd savage into man.
Let lazy hermits dream in college-cells
Severely great, and indolently good,
Whose frozen breasts such glimm'ring rapture
fells,
As lifeless, dull platonic understood.
Go, tell that doating sage, who looks on thee
With Plato's eyes, may question if he see.
Judge now my passion by severest truth,
And read what rig'rous justice cannot blame
If I have err'd, inform a willing youth,
At least, mistaken only was my flame.
Was love a crime? then teach me to adore,
And zeal shall be what passion was before.

TO A LADY,

THAT SENT ME A FLOWERED CAP.

WHAT flowers of rhet'ric can I use
These brighter flowers to commend?

What gift, or present, can I choose,
Equivalent to send?

I've search'd the muses fertile field,
But searching no where can find such,
Nor even nature's self can yield,
What I admire so much.

This token, o'er my temples spread,
A double power does impart;
For as it gently warms my head,
It fires my bleeding heart.

But let the blust'ring storms engage,
The rustling winds blow high;
Thus arm'd I'll mock their empty rage,
And every blast defy.

Like the bold Grecian chief I stand,
In arms superior shine;
Like his, they boast an heavenly hand,
But skill, much more divine!

He did not fear a wound, 'tis true,
From none, except the deities:
And I'm invulnerable too,
To all—except my Laura's eyes.

TO MRS. MARY FREWEN,

UPON HER HAVING THE SMALL-POX.

LET others pensive o'er their mirrors trace,
The beauteous ruins of a former face;
Nor for thy beauties, lovely maid repine,
Thy beauties mingled in a mould divine,
Can but endure a momentary pain,
And like all heavenly substance heal again.

And see thy dangers, and our fears are o'er,
Hearts pant, sighs heave, and sorrow streams no
more!

As gold by purging flame still clearer glows,
As virtue from affliction brighter grows,
Sweet e'en in griefs, and e'en in pangs serene,
Dawn the dear glories of Euphrosia's mien;
Dear to the muse, who trembling spreads her
wings,

To shroud the lover, as her poet sings;
But as he loves, alas! he sings in vain,
When beauty's in affliction, every strain.
When every charm a thousand charms resumes,
And fair as Eden, from confusion blooms,
Raptur'd he stands, and boldly dares divine,
How to an angel thou must once refine.

TO THE COUNTESS OF HERTFORD, MADAM,

In the following lines, the result of my misfortunes this morning, can engage your ladyship's encouragement to the poems I propose afterwards, it will be no small recommendation to their public appearance; and, a very great favour to their author.

Your Ladyship's most devoted,
and most humble servant,
WILLIAM PATTISON.

FAIR patroness of gentle arts excuse,
This rude address of an unhappy muse;

A muse, bereft of every worldly view!--
Unknown she comes—but then she comes to you!
And, if a stranger's soul distressed, sigh,
Tun'd by kind sympathy, our souls reply;
Explore the cause through a long train of ills,
And, pitying share those woes the sufferer feels:
The loss of fortune, friends, or fame divine,---
O grievous loss! and must I call it mine!
And must I still reflect those happier hours,
When, peaceably retir'd, in Granta's bowers
I lay, the pleasing paths to learning plann'd,
And, Moses-like, just saw the promis'd land.
Just saw—but, O my soul! I live to mourn
The joyous scene, that can no more return!
Distress!--and have my boundless griefs reveal'd
The thought—ambition labouring had conceal'd!
In vain, for when we dictate from the heart,
Nature will speak at every pause of art;
And like a bashful virgin, half express'd,
In spite of all the woman, blush the rest—
Though pangful-martyrs smile upon their grief
To man, yet sigh to him, who sends relief.
Whence then, my muse, thy blush, and why thy tears,

'Tis not the world—alleviate thy fears;
Remember well, that virtue still the same,
Sounds the soft earnest of immortal fame!
Though want itself might feed her famish'd eye,
And sorrow sweeten into harmony?
O how I long to change this mournful strain,
But when fate frowns, the muses smile in vain!
Doom'd by the sad severity of fate,
And must I bound my glory with my hate!
It must be so—like Noah's dove distressed,
In vain I wander up and down for rest,
From spray to spray I traverse every tree,
And offer up my greenest branch to thee?

To the Right Honourable THE LORD CARTERET.

WITH an indulgent smile, my Lord, excuse
This sadly true prediction of the muse;
And may this single specimen of woe
Speak for the rest, and all its author show;
Nor blushing let me mourn my youthful hours,
As vainly spent in the Parnassian bowers.
By nature prompted and a slave to fate,
I strove to please the witty and the great;
Presumptuous hence, nor without hopes I come
To you, and from your taste await my doom;
From thence implore the sanction of your name,
To be my passport through the gates of fame.
So, miners, first the bullion ore refine,
Then beg their monarch's stamp, to make it current coin.

A HARVEST SCENE.

BEHOLD—
The green fields yellowing into corny gold!
White o'er their ranks, an old man half appears,
How hale he looks, though hoar'd with seventy years;

* The hour-glass, subjoined to his proposals.

His prospect mounts, flow-pac'd, he strives to climb,
 And seems some ancient monument of time;
 Propt o'er his staff the reverend father stands,
 And views heaven's blessings with uplifted hands;
 Glee in heart computes the year's increase,
 And portions out, in thought, his homely race,
 His homely race before, his hopes improve,
 And labour in obedience for his love;
 Sweepy they cut, then bind the sheafy-grain,
 And bend beneath the burthen of the plain;
 His cheerful eyes, with silent praises crown
 Their toils, and smile at vigour once his own;
 Till the mid-sun to second nature's call,
 Noon-marks the distant steeple's ivy'd wall,
 Thence warn'd, he waves his arms, with giddy haste,
 The circling summons to a cool repaste.

EFFIGIES AUTHORIS.

OPPRESS'D with griefs, with poverty, and scorn,
 Of all forsaken, and of all forlorn,
 What shall I do? or whither shall I flee?
 Or what kind ear will hear the muse's cry?
 With restless heart from place to place I roam,
 A wretched vagrant destitute of home;
 Driv'n from fair Granta's shade by fortune's frown,
 I came to court the flatt'rer in the town.
 Three tedious days detain'd me on the road,
 Whilst the winds whistled, and the torrents flow'd,
 On my devoted head the gusty breeze,
 Shook the collected tempest, from the trees;
 For shelter to the shades, I ran in vain,
 The shades deceitful delug'd me with rain;
 Thus when fate frowns upon our happier days,
 Our friend, perhaps, our bosom friend betrays:
 But as vicissitudes controul our fate,
 And griefs and joys maintain a doubtful state,
 So now the sun's emerging orb appears,
 And with the spongy clouds dispels my fears,
 In tears the transient tempests flits away,
 And all the blue expansion flames with day.
 My gazing eyes o'er pleasing prospects roll,
 And look away the sorrows of my soul,
 Pleas'd at each view, some rueful thought to draw,
 And moralize on every scene I saw;
 Here, with inviting pride blue mountains rise,
 Like joys more pleasant to our distant eyes;
 In golden waves, there tides of harvest flow,
 Whilst idle poppies intermingling grow,
 How like their brother fops an empty show!
 In every bush the warbling birds advance,
 Sing to the sun, and on the branches dance;
 No grief, no cares perplex their souls with strife,
 Like bards they live a poor but merry life;
 In every place alike their fortunes lie,
 Both live in want, and unregarded die.
 With like concern they meet approaching death,
 In prison, or in fields, resign their breath;
 Musing, I saw the fate I could not shun,
 Shook my grave head, and pensive travell'd on:
 But as Augusta's wish'd-for domes arise,
 Peep o'er the clouds, and dance before my eyes.
 What thoughts, what tumults fill'd my lab'ring
 To be conceiv'd alone, but not express'd; [breast,

What intermingled multitudes arose,
 Lords, parsons, lawyers, baronets, and beaux,
 Fops, coxcombs, cits, and knaves of ev'ry class,
 While some the better half, some wholly as,
 On either side bewailing suppliants stand, [hand.
 Speak with their looks, and stretch their wither'd
 In feeble accents supplicate relief,
 And by their sorrows multiply my grief,
 Mov'd by their wants, my fortune I deplore,
 And deal a tribute from my slender store.
 With joy, the favour they receive, and pray,
 That God, the bounteous blessing, may repay;
 Thus providently wise, the lab'ring swain
 O'er the plough'd furrows strews the fertile grain:
 The grateful plain o'er-pays his bounteous care,
 With tenfold blessings, and a golden year.

Now lost in thought, I wander up and down
 Of all unknowing, and to all unknown;
 Try in each place, and ransack ev'ry news,
 To find some friend, some patron of the muse:
 But where? or whom? alas! I search in vain,
 The fruitless labour only gives me pain;
 But soon each pleasing prospect fades away,
 And with my money all my hopes decay.

But now the sun diffus'd a fainter ray,
 And falling dews bewail'd the falling day,
 When to St. James's park my way I took,
 Solemn in pace, and sadden'd in my look:
 On the first bench my wearied bones I laid,
 For gnawing hunger on my vitals prey'd;
 There faint in melancholy mood I sat,
 And meditated on my future fate.
 Nights fable vapours now the trees invade,
 And gloomy darkness deepen'd ev'ry shade;
 And now, ah! whither shall the helpless fly,
 From the nocturnal horrors of the sky;
 With empty rage my cruel fate I curse,
 While falling tears bedew my meagre purse;
 What shall I do? or whither shall I run?
 How 'scape the threat'ning fate I cannot shun;
 There, trembling cold, and motionless I lay,
 Till sleep beguil'd the tumults of the day.
 " Yet though this mortal body was resign'd,
 " Tormenting objects terrified my mind,
 " Despairing forms too dreadful for the light,
 " Danc'd on my eyes, and play'd before my sight;
 " Here worn with sorrow, poverty appear'd,
 " In ev'ry ghastly form by mortals fear'd:
 " And now to make my wants the more deplor'd,
 " Prepar'd a plenteous table richly stor'd.
 " My hand I stretch'd impatient of delay,
 " When lo! the fictitious treat dissolv'd away,
 " Despair arose, and shook a deadly dart,
 " Then aim'd the thirsty arrow at my heart;
 " Inly I quiver'd, trembled for my life,
 " Lost in tumultuous agony and grief.

" But now a kind, though visionary shade
 " Gleam'd through the gloom, and brighten'd all
 " the glade,
 " On its fair head a branching laurel grew,
 " And though before unseen, the form I knew;
 " While thus it spoke—poor youth, thy fate I
 " mourn,
 " And weeping make thy miseries my own:

" But patiently resign—I bring relief,
 " For as I caus'd, 'tis just, I cure thy grief.
 " Then hear—when morning's beamy rays arise,
 " And shoot refulgent glories through the skies;
 " To Chiswick's pleasurable bowers repair,
 " To guide your wand'ring path be Thames's care;
 " In those fair hospitable shades you'll find,
 " Great Burlington, the muse's surest friend:
 " Fam'd Burlington, as humble as he's great,
 " Pride of the court, and bulwark of the state;
 " To him this visionary tale disclose,
 " His soul will melt in pity at your woes.
 " To him return your long neglected lyre,
 " And let his virtues every line inspire;"

Farewell it said—when as the morn appear'd,
 To the warm ray my dewy head I rear'd,
 Amaz'd, half drowsy, waken'd in a fright,
 I ponder'd on the vision of the night;
 When thoughtless in my pocket I reveal'd,
 A latent fixpence happily conceal'd,
 Surpris'd with transport flood my bristled hair,
 On wings I seem'd to fly, and tread in air:
 To the first house I took my speedy flight,
 There wrote this recent vision of the night;
 The wond'rous tale in snowy foldings bound,
 Then seal'd the passport with a waxen wound.
 When prompted by my genius, swift as thought,
 To Chiswick's bowers my rueful story brought;
 Where now with doubtful hopes, and fears, I wait
 Your bounteous lordship's pleasure at your gate.

W. PATTISON.

ON A GENTLEMAN'S PICTURE.

POETS and painters rival glories claim,
 Alike their labours, and alike their fame;
 Appelles by a Homer's thoughts design'd,
 And Homer was the picture of his mind:
 From both the same immortal wonders rise,
 At once in speaking to our ears, and eyes;
 The pencil's art, a seeming likeness gives,
 But by the pen alone, that likeness lives;
 For time, that makes those colours fainter show,
 Gives life to these, and makes them brighter grow.

But your's, bold artist *, claim a longer date,
 The great original preserves their fate;
 To future fame transmit the finish'd piece,
 And boast a perfect parallel with Greece;
 Nor boast too much—for though the face we find,
 We lose the noble image of the mind:
 'Tis ours to draw the manners, yours the men,
 And painting's but the shadow of the pen:
 Yet happy in your art, O, bless your fate!
 'Tis honour here enough to imitate;
 Whilst we, confounded by your skilful hand,
 Think the draught lives, and fix'd like pictures stand.

VERSES

By way of contrast to the foregoing Copy, and wrote up on the same occasion.

CRASSUS, the dullest, most pedantic fool,
 That ever humm'd o'er jargon in a school,

* To the painter.

Ambitious of attaining endless fame,
 At first, by study thought to raise his name;
 For this, by day, the plodding pedant por'd;
 For this, by night, o'er sacred pages snor'd;
 But when he found his dull attempts were vain,
 And nature gave him too much tongue for brain:
 Thinks he the painter shall these honours give,
 And make this face, at least, in colours live,
 Quick as his word the seeds of fame arise,
 And lo! the mimic monster strikes our eyes!
 So like so just the living copy too,
 For both were made for nothing but for show!
 O may their fates to the same end be turn'd,
 May both be hang'd, and when decay'd, both
 burn'd!

ON CRASSUS.

DULL magisterial fool, forbear
 To spit thy pointless venom here;
 To more exalted glories born,
 Thy mean indignities I scorn;
 Secure of fame, I boast my lays,
 While Pope, while Pack, or Congreve praise;
 Let these but favour what I write,
 And damn'd like thee, be all thy spite:
 No more shall duty force my lays,
 To gild thy vanities with praise;
 If e'er again my colours strive,
 To make thy painter's daubings live;
 May fate, and ev'ry muse combine,
 To blast me, and the vile design;
 In short, may heav'n, and all agree,
 To make me such an ass as thee.

WOMEN AND WINE:

AN EPIGRAM.

'TWAS a doubt in debate among sages of yore,
 Whether women or wine had more absolute power;
 Now had I been the judge when the matter was done,
 Not one had been wiser than when it begun;
 For how can man tell which the strongest to call,
 When with the same ease both can give him a fall?

AD CÆLUM.

GOOD Heaven! this mystery of life explain,
 Nor let me think I bear the load in vain;
 Lest with the tedious passage cheerless grown,
 Urg'd by despair I throw the burden down.

THE
OF
JAMES HAMMOND, ESQ.

Containing his LOVE ELEGIES, PROLOGUE TO ELMERIC,
 &c. &c. &c.

To which is prefixed
THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

Perhaps ev'n Genius pours a slighted lay;
Perhaps ev'n Friendship sheds a fruitless tear;
Ev'n Lyttleton but vainly trims the bay,
And fondly graces HAMMOND's mournful bier,
Though weeping virgins haunt his favour'd urn,
Renew their chaplets, and repeat their sighs;
Though near his tomb Sabea odours burn,
The loitering fragrance, will it reach the skies?
No, should his DELIA votive wreaths prepare,
DELIA might place the votive wreaths in vain:
Yet the dear hope of DELIA's future care,
Once crown'd his pleasures, and dispell'd his pain.

THE LIFE OF HAMMOND.

OF JAMES HAMMOND, though he be generally known as an elegiac poet, and well remembered as a man esteemed and caressed by the elegant and the great, few memorials are to be found.

The accounts of his biographers are discordant and unsatisfactory. According to Shiels, he was the son of a Turkey merchant in the city of London, and had some office at the Prince of Wales's Court, till the love of a lady, whose name was Dashwood, for a time disordered his understanding. The lady either could not return his passion with a reciprocal fondness, or entertained too ambitious views to settle her affections upon him. "He was inextinguishably amorous, and his mistress inexorably cruel."

"Of this narrative," Dr. Johnson says, "part is true, and part false. He was the second son of Anthony Hammond, a man of note among the wits, poets, and parliamentary orators, in the beginning of this century, who was allied to Sir Robert Walpole, by marrying his sister."

This account is still erroneous. He was of a different family; the second son of Anthony Hammond, Esq. of Somersham-place, in the county of Huntingdon, member of Parliament for Shoreham in Sussex. He vacated his seat, December 7. 1708, upon being made a Commissioner of the Navy, and died about 1728.

Anthony Hammond, Esq. who had the name of "the silver-tongued Hammond," given him by Bolingbroke, was of Wotton in the county of Norfolk. He married Susannah, a sister of Sir Robert Walpole. A volume of miscellany poems was inscribed to him, in 1694, by his friend Hopkins; and in 1720, he was himself the editor of "A New Miscellany of Original Poems," in which he had no small share. He was the intimate friend of Mr. Moyle; and wrote the "Account of his Life and Writings," prefixed to his works in 1727.

He was born about 1710, and educated at Westminster-school; but it does not appear that he was of any university.

He seems to have come very early into public notice, and to have been distinguished by those whose friendship prejudiced mankind at that time in favour of the man on whom they were bestowed; for he was the companion of Cobham, Lyttleton, and Chesterfield, by whose interest he obtained the place of Equerry to the Prince of Wales.

He was also much esteemed by Nicholas Hammond, Esq.; who, at his death, which happened Oct. 13. 1733, left him an estate worth 400 l. a-year, besides leaving 500 l. for erecting a school-house, and 500 l. for endowing it.

In 1740, he wrote the Prologue to "Elmeric," a posthumous tragedy, written by Lillo; in which it is said, that when he wrote that play, he was distressed by want, and affected by disease. But in the former particular there appears to be a mistake, as he died possessed of an estate of 60 l. a-year, besides other effects to a considerable value. The Epilogue has also been ascribed to Hammond.

In 1741, he was chosen into Parliament for Truro in Cornwall; probably one of those who were elected by the Prince's influence.

He died at Stowe, the famous seat of Lord Cobham, June 7. 1742, in the thirty-second year of his age. Miss Dashwood long survived him, and died unmarried, bed-chamber-woman to the Queen, in 1779.

The character which her lover bequeathed her, was not likely to attract courtship; yet it was her own fault that she remained single, having had another very honourable offer.

The character of Hammond seems to have been highly amiable and respectable. He is said to have divided his life between pleasure and books; in his retirement forgetting the town, and in his gaiety losing the student. Of his literary hours, all the efforts are here exhibited, except a Ballad sung at Vauxhall forty years ago, beginning, O how could I venture to love one like thee! and the Epilogue to "Elmeric," which have been given to him.

His Love Elegies, written "before he was twenty-two years old," were published soon after his death, with a recommendatory preface by the editor, who was then believed, and is now affirmed by Dr. Maty, to be the Earl of Chesterfield.

"Of the prefacer," says Dr. Johnson, "whoever he was, it may be reasonably suspected, that he never read the poems; for he professes to value them for a very high species of excellence, and recommends them as the genuine effusions of the mind, which expresses a real passion in the language of nature. But the truth is, these elegies have neither passion, nature, nor manners. Where there is fiction, there is no passion; he that describes himself as a shepherd, and his Neera or Delia as a shepherdess, and talks of goats and lambs, feels no passion. He that courts his mistress with Roman imagery, deserves to lose her; for she may with good grace suspect his sincerity. Hammond has few sentiments drawn from nature, and few images from modern life. He produces nothing but frigid pedantry. It would be hard to find in all his productions three stanzas that deserve to be remembered. His verses are not rugged: but they have no sweetness; they never glide in a stream of melody. Why Hammond and other writers have thought the quatrain of ten syllables elegiac, it is difficult to tell. The character of the elegy is gentleness and tenuity; but this stanza has been pronounced by Dryden, whose knowledge of English metre was not inconsiderable, to be the most magnificent of all the measures which our language affords."

The critical decisions of Dr. Johnson, it is not, in general, very safe to contradict; except when they may be attributed, as in the present instance, to the force of prejudice, or to vitiated and defective feelings, respecting poetical beauty.

Considering Dr. Johnson's peculiar turn of mind, there is no wonder that he should deny nature to Hammond, and find no melody in his verse. The general opinion is much more favourable. That he has been much read, and greatly admired, serves to contradict the assertion of that too-rigid critic, and establishes his claim to some portion of tenderness and harmony; for by the judgment of the common, unprejudiced, unpedantic reader, the merit of every poetical composition must be ultimately determined.

The popular decisions upon the character of Hammond, have been exceedingly favourable: By some, perhaps, he has been extolled too high. He certainly possessed an elegant and cultivated mind. He is not deficient either in feeling, or melody of verse. He has generally expressed himself with sensibility, and in measures sufficiently harmonious.

The specific character of his elegies, and his pretensions to originality, have by no means been distinguished or ascertained with sufficient accuracy.

Dr. Johnson indeed speaks, but only to disapprove of his "Roman imagery;" and Lord Chesterfield, in his preface to the elegies, informs us, that Hammond seems to have judiciously taken Tibullus for his model, rather than Ovid.

After reading Tibullus and Hammond, with the most candid attention, the present writer is obliged to observe, that Hammond appears not merely to have taken the Roman poet for his model, but to have taken from him some of the most beautiful passages in his elegies.

The parallel passages appear almost in every page of both poets; yet Dr. Johnson is silent on the subject; and Lord Chesterfield passes it over, as if he had no suspicion of Hammond's obligations to Tibullus.

The following instances, which immediately occur, will specify what can by no means be called imitations, being almost literal translations.

Compare Tibullus, Lib. i. Eleg. i., with the thirteenth elegy of Hammond. The thought of gain assisting slumber, is finely translated.

Quam juvat immites ventos audire cubantem,
Et dominam tenero continuisse sinu;

Aut, gelidas hibernus aquas cum fuderit auster,
Securum somnos imbre juvante sequi!

What joy to hear the tempest howl in vain,
And clasp a fearful mistress to my breast,
Or, lull'd to slumber by the beating rain,
Secure and happy, sink at last to rest!

Compare Tibullus, Lib. i. Eleg. 5., with the thirteenth elegy of Hammond.

Huc veniet Messala meus, cui dulcia poma
Delia selectis detrahet arboribus;
Et tantum venerata virum hunc sedula curet,
Huic paret, atque epulas ipsa ministra gerat.

Hammond has applied this delicate compliment to Lord Chesterfield, with admirable felicity of expression. Strokes of this exquisite nature are only to be expected from those who have access to the great, but whom the great have not infected with selfishness.

Stanhope shall come, and grace his rural friend;
Delia shall wonder at her noble guest;
With blushing awe the riper fruit commend,
And for her husband's patron cull the best.

Again,

Te spectem, suprema mihi cum veneris hora,
Te teneam moriens deficiente manu.

On her I'll gaze, when other loves are o'er,
And, dying, press her with my clay-cold hand.

Again,

Parce solutis
Crinibus, et teneris, Delia, parce genis.

Wound not thy cheeks, nor hurt that flowing hair.

Compare Tibullus, Lib. i. Eleg. 5., with the fourteenth elegy of Hammond,

At mihi felicem vitam, si salva fuisses
Fingebam demens———

What scenes of bliss my raptur'd fancy fram'd!

Hammond has improved upon Tibullus, Lib. 2., Eleg. vi. in his second elegy,

Adieu, ye walls! &c.

Compare Tibullus, Lib. iii. Eleg. 2., with the ninth elegy of Hammond,

Qui primus caram juveni, carumque puellæ
Eripuit juvenem, ferreus ille fuit.
Durus et ille fuit, qui tantum ferre dolorem
Vivere et crepta conjuge qui potuit.

These sentiments are finely expressed by Hammond.

He who could first two gentle hearts unbind,
And rob a lover of his weeping fair:
Hard was the man; but harder, in my mind,
The lover still who died not of despair.

Again,

Ergo quum tenuem fuero mutatus in umbram,
Candidaque ossa super nigra favilla tegit,
Ante meum veniat longos incompta capillos,
Et fleat ante meum mæsta Nexera rogem,

This rite, which is altogether foreign to English manners, Hammond has rather injudiciously transferred into his ninth elegy.

Wilt thou in tears thy lover's corse attend,
With eyes averted light the solemn fire,
Till all around the doleful flames ascend;
Then, slowly sinking, by degrees expire?

It is unnecessary to transcribe more parallel passages, to show that Hammond, not satisfied with taking Tibullus for his model, has transfused into his elegies the sentiments and the imagery of the Roman poet. Yet it ought to be observed, that he has very often taken the liberty to transpose, and sometimes paraphrastically to enlarge the thoughts, and to give the imagery a more modern polish. In the passages he has translated, he has generally improved on Tibullus, and given his version of the most exact, elegant, and harmonious of the Roman elegiac poets, the easy air of a modern original. As he felt the distress which gave rise to most of the elegies of Tibullus, he is not inferior to him in amorous tenderness and poetical fancy. His elegies have those sallies and transitions of passion, that frantic and desponding air, so observable in the Roman poet; for these are the natural emanations of a heated fancy, and a distracted heart.

His greatest fault is, an injudicious adoption of the mythology, and too servile an adherence to the manners of the Roman poet; which detract from his merit as an imitator, more than as a translator of Tibullus. Amorous elegy is less local than many other of the minor kinds of poetry; the passion of love operating nearly the same upon the human mind in all ages: yet as the modes of expressing that passion differ much in different countries, so these modes must not be confounded; a Roman ought not to make love like a Grecian, nor an Englishman like a Roman.

Although the elegies of Hammond warrant, in some degree, this censure, yet it ought to be considered, that he has both nature and originality in many parts; and the Elegies to Mr. Grenville and Miss Dashwood, ought to have been exempted from the censure of Dr. Johnson, who has spoken of him with too great asperity. They are written in the heroic measure, the sentiments are exquisitely delicate, and the numbers flow with an easy correctness. An "Answer to the Elegy to Miss Dashwood," was written by Lord Hervey, and is a suitable companion to it.

The measure which he has adopted in his other elegies, is the quatrain, or alternate rhyme, which, like the Latin hexameter and pentameter, is thought to be peculiarly suited to plaintive subjects; and it must be confessed, that he has happily succeeded. The quatrain has, indeed, a disagreeable sameness in its structure, every succeeding stanza being a faithful echo to the last; yet is there something plaintive in it—some pathetic softness in the descending melody, that seems fitted to express the tender passions. It is the peculiar language of love and melancholy, when they soothe their sorrows with the pensive muse. It is now appropriated to the complaining tone of the English elegy, by Gray, Shenstone, Mason, Whitehead, Græme, and other elegiac poets.

On the character of Hammond it is unnecessary to enlarge, as it is given in the preface to his elegies, by Lord Chesterfield, with a minuteness, elegance, and tenderness, which, making due allowance for the partiality of friendship, and the extravagance of erroneous criticism, leave nothing to be supplied by a casual hand.

[BY LORD CHESTERFIELD.]

THE following elegies were wrote by a young gentleman lately dead, and justly lamented.

As he had never declared his intentions concerning their publication, a friend of his, into whose hands they fell, determined to publish them, in the persuasion that they would neither be unwelcome to the public, nor injurious to the memory of their author. The reader must decide, whether this determination was the result of just judgment, or partial friendship; for the editor feels, and avows so much of the latter, that he gives up all pretensions to the former.

The author composed them ten years ago, before he was two and twenty years old; an age when fancy and imagination commonly riot, at the expence of judgment and correctness, neither of which seem wanting here. But sincere in his love as in his friendship, he wrote to his mistresses, as he spoke to his friends, nothing but the true genuine sentiments of his heart; he sat down to write what he thought, not to think what he should write; it was nature and sentiment only that dictated to a real mistress, not youthful and poetic fancy, to an imaginary one. Elegy, therefore, speaks here her own, proper, native language, the unaffected plaintive language of the tender passions; the true elegiac dignity and simplicity are preserved, and united; the one without pride, the other without meannesses. Tibullus seems to have been the model our author judiciously preferred to Ovid; the former writing directly from the heart, to the heart; the latter too often yielding and addressing himself to the imagination.

The undissipated youth of the author, allowed him time to apply himself to the best masters, the ancients, and his parts enabled him to make the best use of them; for upon those great models of solid sense and virtue, he formed not only his genius, but his heart, both well prepared by nature to adopt, and adorn the resemblance. He admired that justness, that noble simplicity of thought and expression, which have distinguished, and preserved their writings to this day; but he revered that love of their country, that contempt of riches, that sacredness of friendship, and all those heroic and social virtues, which marked them out as the objects of the veneration, though not the imitation, of succeeding ages; and he looked back with a kind of religious awe and delight, upon those glorious, and happy times of Greece and Rome, when wisdom, virtue, and liberty formed the only triumvirates, ere luxury invited corruption to taint, or corruption introduced slavery to destroy, all public and private virtues. In these sentiments he lived, and would have lived, even in these times; in these sentiments he died—but in these times too—Ut non erepta a diis immortalibus vita, sed donata mors esse videatur.

LOVE ELEGIES.

"Virginibus puerisque canto."

FIRST PRINTED IN 1743.

ELEGY I.

On his falling in Love with Næra.

FAREWELL that liberty our fathers give,
In vain they gave, their sons receiv'd in vain :
I saw Næra, and her instant slave,
Though born a Briton, hugg'd the servile chain.

Her usage well repays my coward heart,
Meanly she triumphs in her lover's shame,
No healing joy relieves his constant smart,
No smile of love rewards the loss of fame.

Oh, that to feel these killing pangs no more,
On Scythian hills I lay a senseless stone,
Was fix'd a rock amidst the watery roar,
And in the vast Atlantic stood alone.

Adieu, ye muses, or my passion aid,
Why should I loiter by your idle spring ?
My humble voice would move one only maid,
And she contemns the trifles which I sing.

I do not ask the lofty Epic strain,
Nor strive to paint the wonders of the sphere ;
I only sing one cruel maid to gain,
Adieu, ye muses, if she will not hear.

No more in useless innocence I'll pine,
Since guilty presents win the greedy fair,
I'll tear its honours from the broken shrine,
But chiefly thine, O Venus ! will I tear.

Deceiv'd by thee, I lov'd a beauteous maid,
Who bends on sordid gold her low desires :
Nor worth nor passion can her heart persuade,
But love must act what avarice requires.

Unwise who first, the charm of nature lost,
With Tyrian purple soil'd the snowy sheep ;
Unwiser still who seas and mountains cross,
To dig the rock, and search the pearly deep :

These costly toys our silly fair surprise,
The shining follies cheat their feeble sight,
Their hearts secure in trifles, love despise,
'Tis vain to court them, but more vain to write.

Why did the gods conceal the little mind,
And earthly thoughts beneath a heavenly face ;
Forget the worth that dignifies mankind,
Yet smooth and polish so each outward grace ?

Hence all the blame that Love and Venus bear,
Hence pleasure short, and anguish ever long,
Hence tears and sighs, and hence the peevish fair,
The froward lover—hence this angry song.

ELEGY II.

Unable to satisfy the covetous temper of Næra, he intends to make a Campaign, and try, if possible, to forget her.

ADIEU, ye walls, that guard my cruel fair,
No more I'll sit in rosy fetters bound,
My limbs have learnt the weight of arms to bear,
My rousing spirits feel the trumpet's sound.

Few are the maids that now on merit smile,
On spoil and war is bent this iron age :
Yet pain and death attend on war and spoil,
Unfated vengeance and remorseless rage.

To purchase spoil, even love itself is sold,
Her lover's heart is least Næra's care,
And I through war must seek detested gold,
Not for myself, but for my venal fair :

That while she bends beneath the weight of drefs,

The stiffen'd robe may spoil her easy mien ;
And art mistaken make her beauty less,
While still it hides some graces better seen.

But if such toys can win her lovely smile,
Hers be the wealth of Tagus' golden sand,
Hers the bright gems that glow in India's soil,
Hers the black sons of Afric's sultry land.

To please her eye let every loom contend,
For her be rifled ocean's pearly bed.
But where, alas ! would idle fancy tend,
And soothe with dreams a youthful poet's head ?

Let others buy the cold unloving maid,
In forc'd embraces act the tyrant's part,
While I their selfish luxury upbraid,
And scorn the person where I doubt the heart.

Thus warm'd by pride, I think I love no more,
And hide in threats the weakness of my mind :
In vain,—though reason fly the hated door,
Yet Love, the coward Love, still lags behind.

ELEGY III.

He upbraids and threatens the avarice of Næra, and resolves to quit her.

SHOULD Jove descend in floods of liquid ore,
And golden torrents stream from every part,
That craving bosom still would heave for more,
Not all the gods could satisfy thy heart :
But may thy folly, which can thus disdain
My honest love, the mighty wrong repay,
May midnight fire involve thy sordid gain,
And on the shining heaps of rapine prey :
May all the youths, like me, by love deceiv'd,
Not quench the ruin, but applaud the doom ;
And, when thou dy'st, may not one heart be griev'd,
May not one tear bedew the lonely tomb.
But the deserving, tender, generous maid,
Whose only care is her poor lover's mind,
Though ruthless age may bid her beauty fade,
In every friend to love, a friend shall find :
And, when the lamp of life will burn no more,
When dead she seems as in a gentle sleep,
The pitying neighbour shall her loss deplore,
And round the bier assembled lovers weep :
With flowery garlands, each revolving year,
Shall strow the grave where truth and softness rest,
Then home returning, drop the pious tear,
And bid the turf lie easy on her breast.

ELEGY IV.

To his friend, written under the confinement of a long indisposition.

While calm you sit beneath your secret shade,
And lose in pleasing thought the summer-day,
Or tempt the wish of some unpractis'd maid,
Whose heart at once inclines and fears to stray :
The sprightly vigour of my youth is fled,
Lonely and sick, on death is all my thought,
Oh, spare, Persephone, this guiltless head,
Love, too much love, is all thy suppliant's fault.
No virgin's easy faith I e'er betray'd,
My tongue ne'er boasted of a feign'd embrace ;
No poisons in the cup have I convey'd,
Nor veil'd destruction with a friendly face :
No secret horrors gnaw this quiet breast,
This pious hand ne'er robb'd the sacred fane,
I ne'er disturb'd the gods eternal rest
With curses loud,—but oft have pray'd in vain.
No stealth of time has thinn'd my flowing hair,
Nor age yet bent me with his iron hand :
Ah ! why so soon the tender blossom tear !
Ere autumn yet the ripen'd fruit demand ?
Ye gods, whoe'er in gloomy shades below,
Now slowly tread your melancholy round ;
Now wandering view the paleful rivers flow,
And musing hearken to their solemn sound :
Oh, let me still enjoy the cheerful day,
Till, many years unheeded o'er me roll'd,

Pleas'd in my age, I trifle life away,
And tell how much he lov'd, ere I grew old.

But you, who now, with festive garlands crown'd,
In chase of pleasure the gay moments spend,
By quick enjoyment heal love's pleasing wound,
And grieve for nothing but your absent friend.

ELEGY V.

The Lover is at first introduced speaking to his Servant, he afterwards addresses himself to his Mistress, and at last there is a supposed Interview between them.

WITH wine, more wine, deceive thy master's care,
Till creeping slumber soothe his troubled breast,
Let not a whisper stir the silent air.
If hapless love a while consent to rest.

Untoward guards beset my Cynthia's doors,
And cruel locks th' imprison'd fair conceal,
May lightnings blast whom love in vain implores,
And Jove's own thunder rive those bolts of steel.

Ah, gentle door, attend my humble call,
Nor let thy sounding hinge or thefts betray,
So all my curses far from thee shall fall,
We angry lovers mean not half we say.

Remember now the flowery wreathes I gave
When first I told thee of my bold desires,
Nor thou, O Cynthia, fear the watchful slave,
Venus will favour what herself inspires.

She guides the youth who see not where they tread,
She shows the virgin how to turn the door,
Softly to steal from off her silent bed,
And not a step betray her on the floor.

The fearless lover wants no beam of light,
The robber knows him, nor obstructs his way,
Sacred he wanders through the pathless night,
Belongs to Venus, and can never stray.

I scorn the chilling wind, and beating rain,
Nor heed cold watchings on the dewy ground,
If all the hardships I for love sustain,
With love's victorious joys at last be crown'd :

With sudden step let none our bliss surprise,
Or check the freedom of secure delight —
Rash man beware, and shut thy curious eyes,
Lest angry Venus snatch their guilty sight.

But shouldst thou see, th' important secret hide,
Though question'd by the powers of earth and
heaven,

The prating tongue shall love's revenge abide,
Still sue for grace, and never be forgiven.

A wizard dame, the lover's ancient friend,
With magic charm has deafen'd thy husband's ear,
At her command I saw the stars descend,
And winged lightnings stop in mid career.

I saw her stamp, and cleave the solid ground,
While ghastly spectres round us wildly roam ;
I saw them hearken to her potent sound,
Till, fear'd at day, they sought their dreary home.

At her command the vigorous summer pines,
And wintry clouds obscure the hopeful year ;
At her strong bidding, gloomy winter shines,
And vernal roses on the snows appear.

She gave these charms, which I on thee bestow,
They dim the eye, and dull the jealous mind,
For me they make a husband nothing know,
For me, and only me, they make him blind :

But what did most this faithful heart surprise,
She boasted that her skill could set it free :
This faithful heart the boasted freedom flies ;
How could it venture to abandon thee ?

ELEGY VI.

He adjures Delia to pity him, by their Friendship with Cælia, who was lately dead.

THOUSANDS would seek the lasting peace of death,
And in that harbour shun the storm of care,
Officious hope still holds the fleeting breath,
She tells them still,—To-morrow will be fair.

She tells me, Delia, I shall thee obtain,
But can I listen to her siren song, [chain,
Who seven flow months have dragg'd my painful
So long thy lover, and despis'd so long ?

By all the joys thy dearest Cælia gave,
Let not her once-lov'd friend unpitied burn ;
So may her ashes find a peaceful grave,
And sleep uninjur'd in their sacred urn.

To her I first avow'd my timorous flame,
She nurs'd my hopes, and taught me how to sue,
She still would pity what the wise might blame,
And feel for weakness which she never knew :

Ah, do not grieve the dear lamented shade,
That hovering round us all my sufferings hears,
She is my saint ; to her my prayers are made,
With oft repeated gifts of flowers and tears :

To her sad tomb at midnight I retire,
And lonely sitting by the silent stone,
I tell it all the griefs my wrongs inspire,
The marble image seems to hear my moan :
The friend's pale ghost shall vex thy sleepless bed,
And stand before thee all in virgin white ;
That ruthless bosom will disturb the dead,
And call forth pity from eternal night :

Cease, cruel man, the mournful theme forbear,
Though much thou suffer, to thyself complain :
Ah, to recal the sad remembrance spare,
One tear from her, is more than all thy pain.

ELEGY VII.

On Delia's being in the Country, where he supposes she stays to see the Harvest.

Now Delia breathes in woods the fragrant air,
Dull are the hearts that still in town remain,
Venus herself attends on Delia there,
And Cupid sports amid the sylvan train.

Oh, with what joy, my Delia to behold !
I'd press the spade, or wield the weighty prong,
Guide the slow plough-share through the stubborn mold,

And patient goad the loitering ox along :
The scorching heats I'd carelessly despise,
Nor heed the blisters on my tender hand ;
The great Apollo wore the same disguise,
Like me subdued to love's supreme command.

No healing herbs could soothe their master's pain,
The art of physic lost, and useless lay,
To Peneus' stream, and Tempe's shady plain,
He drove his herds beneath the noon-tide ray :

Oft with a bleating lamb in either arm,
His blushing sister saw him pace along ;
Oft would his voice the silent valley charm,
Till lowing oxen broke the tender song.

Where are his triumphs ? where his warlike toil ?
Where by his darts the crested Pithon slain ?
Where are his Delphi ? his delightful isle ?
The god himself is grown a cottage swain.

O Ceres ! in your golden fields no more,
With harvest's cheerful pomp, my fair detain,—
Think what for lost Proserpina you bore,
And in a mother's anguish feel my pain.

Our wiser fathers left their fields unsown,
Their food was acorns, love their sole employ ;
They met, they lik'd, they staid but till alone,
And in each valley snatch'd the honest joy.

No wakeful guard, no doors to stop desire,
Thrice happy times !—But oh, I fondly rave !
Lead me to Delia, all her eyes inspire
I'll do.—I'll plough, or dig, as Delia's slave.

ELEGY VIII.

He despairs that he shall ever possess Delia.

Ah, what avails thy lover's pious care ?
His lavish incense clouds the sky in vain,
Nor wealth nor greatness was his idle prayer,
For thee alone he pray'd, thee hop'd to gain :

With thee I hop'd to waste the pleasing day,
Till in thy arms an age of joy was past,
Then, old with love, insensibly decay,
And on thy bosom gently breathe my last,

I scorn the Lydian river's golden wave,
And all the vulgar charms of human life,
I only ask to live my Delia's slave,
And, when I long have serv'd her, call her wife :

I only ask, of her I love possess,
To sink, o'ercome with bliss, in safe repose,
To strain her yielding beauties to my breast,
And kiss her wearied eye-lids till they close.

Attend, O Juno ! with thy sober ear,
Attend, gay Venus, parent of desire ;
This one fond wish, if you refuse to hear,
Oh, let me with this sigh of love expire !

ELEGY IX.

He has lost Delia.

He who could first two gentle hearts unbind,
And rob a lover of his weeping fair,
Hard was the man, but harder, in my mind,
The lover still, who dy'd not of despair :

With mean disguise let others nature hide,
And mimic virtue with the paint of art,
I scorn the cheat of reason's foolish pride,
And boast the graceful weakness of my heart.

The more I think, the more I feel my pain,
And learn the more each heavenly charm to prize ;

While fools, too light for passion, safe remain,
And dull sensation keeps the stupid wife.

Sad is my day, and sad my lingering night,
When, wrapt in silent grief, I weep alone,
Delia is lost, and all my past delight
Is now the source of unavailing moan.

Where is the wit that heighten'd beauty's charms?
Where is the face that fed my longing eyes?
Where is the shape that might have blest my arms?
Where are those hopes relentless fate denies?

When spent with endless grief I die at last,
Delia may come, and see my poor remains,—
Oh, Delia! after such an absence past,
Canst thou still love, and not forget my pains?

Wilt thou in tears thy lover's corse attend,
With eyes averted light the solemn pyre,
Till all around the doleful flames ascend,
Then, slowly sinking, by degrees expire?

To soothe the hovering soul, be thine the care,
With plaintive cries to lead the mournful band,
In fable weeds the golden vase to bear,
And cull my ashes with thy trembling hand!

Panchaia's odours be their costly feast,
And all the pride of Asia's fragrant year;
Give them the treasures of the farthest east,
And, what is still more precious, give thy tear.

Dying for thee, there is in death a pride,
Let all the world thy hapless lover know,
No silent urn the noble passion hide,
But deeply graven thus my sufferings show:

Here lies a youth, borne down with love and care,
He could not long his Delia's loss abide,
Joy left his bosom with the parting fair,
And when he durst no longer hope, he dy'd.

ELEGY X.

On Delia's Birth-day.

THIS day, which saw my Delia's beauty rise,
Shall more than all our sacred days be blest,
The world enamour'd of her lovely eyes,
Shall grow as good and gentle as her breast.

By all our guarded sighs, and hid desires,
Oh, may our guiltless love be still the same!
I burn, and glory in the pleasing fires,
If Delia's bosom share the mutual flame.

Thou happy genius of her natal hour,
Accept her incense, if her thoughts be kind;
But let her court in vain thy angry power,
If all our vows are blotted from her mind.

And thou, O Venus! hear my righteous prayer,
Or bind the shepherdes, or loose the swain,
Yet rather guard them both with equal care,
And let them die together in thy chain:

What I demand, perhaps her heart desires,
But virgin fears her nicer tongue restrain;
The secret thought, which blushing love inspires,
The conscious eye can full as well explain.

VOL. VIII.

ELEGY XI.

Against Lovers going to War, in which he philosophically prefers Love and Delia to the more serious Vanities of the World.

THE man who sharpen'd first the warlike steel,
How fell and deadly was his iron heart,
He gave the wound encountering nations feel,
And death grew stronger by his fatal art:

Yet not from steel debate and battle rose,
'Tis gold o'erturns the even scale of life,
Nature is free to all, and none were foes,
Till partial luxury began the strife.

Let spoil and victory adorn the bold,
While I inglorious neither hope nor fear,
Perish the thirst of honour, thirst of gold,
Ere for my absence Delia lose a tear:

Why should the lover quit his pleasing home,
In search of danger on some foreign ground;
Far from his weeping fair ungrateful roam,
And risk in every stroke a double wound?

Ah, better far, beneath the spreading shade,
With cheerful friends to drain the sprightly bowl,
To sing the beauties of my darling maid,
And on the sweet idea feast my soul:

Then full of love to all her charms retire,
And fold her blushing to my eager breast,
Till, quite o'ercome with softness, with desire,
Like me she pants, she faints, and sinks to rest.

ELEGY XII.

To Delia.

No second love shall e'er my heart surprise,
This solemn league did first our passion bind:
Thou, only thou, canst please thy lover's eyes,
Thy voice alone can soothe his troubled mind.

Oh, that thy charms were only fair to me,
Displease all others, and secure my rest,
No need of envy,—let me happy be,
I little care that others know me blest.

With thee in gloomy deserts let me dwell,
Where never human footstep mark'd the ground;
Thou, light of life, all darkness canst expel,
And seem a world with solitude around.

I say too much—my heedless words restore,
My tongue undoes me in this loving hour;
Thou know'st thy strength, and thence insulting
more,

Will make me feel the weight of all thy power:
Whate'er I feel, thy slave I will remain,
Nor fly the burden I am form'd to bear,
In chains I'll sit me down at Venus' fane,
She knows my wrongs, and will regard my prayer.

ELEGY XIII.

He imagines himself married to Delia, and that content with each other, they are retired into the Country.

LET others boast their heaps of shining gold,
And view their fields, with waving plenty crown'd,

P P

Whom neighbouring foes in constant terror hold,
And trumpets break their slumbers, never sound :

While calmly poor I trifle life away,
Enjoy sweet leisure by my cheerful fire,
No wanton hope my quiet shall betray,
But, cheaply blest, I'll scorn each vain desire.

With timely care I'll sow my little field,
And plant my orchard with its master's hand,
Nor blush to spread the hay, the hook to wield,
Or range my sheaves along the sunny land.

If late at dusk, while carelessly I roam,
I meet a strolling kid, or bleating lamb,
Under my arm I'll bring the wanderer home,
And not a little chide its thoughtless dam.

What joy to hear the tempest howl in vain,
And clasp a fearful mistress to my breast ?
Or, lull'd to slumber by the beating rain,
Secure and happy, sink at last to rest ?

Or, if the sun in flaming Leo ride,
By shady rivers indolently stray,
And with my Delia, walking side by side,
Hear how they murmur, as they glide away ?

What joy to wind along the cool retreat,
To stop, and gaze on Delia as I go ?
To mingle sweet discourse with kisses sweet,
And teach my lovely scholar all I know ?

Thus pleas'd at heart, and not with fancy's dream,
In silent happiness I rest unknown ;
Content with what I am, not what I seem,
I live for Delia and myself alone.

Ah, foolish man, who thus of her possessest,
Could float and wander with ambition's wind,
And if his outward trappings spoke him blest,
Not heed the sickness of his conscious mind !

With her I scorn the idle breath of praise,
Nor trust to happiness that's not our own ;
The smile of fortune might suspicion raise,
But here I know that I am lov'd alone.

Stanhope, in wisdom as in wit divine,
May rise, and plead Britannia's glorious cause,
With steady rein his eager wit confine,
While manly sense the deep attention draws.

Let Stanhope speak his listening country's wrongs,
My humble voice shall please one partial maid ;
For her alone I pen my tender song,
Securely sitting in his friendly shade.

Stanhope shall come, and grace his rural friend,
Delia shall wonder at her noble guest,
With blushing awe the riper fruit commend,
And for her husband's patron cull the best.

Hers be the care of all my little train,
While I with tender indolence am blest,
The favourite subject of her gentle reign,
By love alone distinguish'd from the rest.

For her I'll yoke my oxen to the plough,
In gloomy forests tend my lonely flock ;
For her a goat-herd climb the mountain's brow,
And sleep extended on the naked rock :

Ah, what avails to press the stately bed,
And far from her 'midst tasteless grandeur weep,

By marble fountains lay the pensive head,
And, while they murmur, strive in vain to sleep ?

Delia alone can please, and never tire,
Exceed the paint of thought in true delight ;
With her, enjoyment wakens new desire,
And equal rapture glows through every night :

Beauty and worth in her alike contend,
To charm the fancy, and to fix the mind ;
In her, my wife, my mistress, and my friend,
I taste the joys of sense and reason join'd.

On her I'll gaze, when others loves are o'er,
And dying press her with my clay-cold hand—
Thou weep'st already, as I were no more,
Nor can that gentle breast the thought withstand.

Oh, when I die, my latest moments spare,
Nor let thy grief with sharper torments kill,
Wound not thy cheeks, nor hurt that flowing hair,
Though I am dead, my soul shall love thee still :

Oh, quit the room, oh, quit the deathful bed,
Or thou wilt die, so tender is thy heart ;
Oh, leave me, Delia, ere thou see me dead,
These weeping friends will do thy mournful part :

Let them, extended on the decent bier,
Convey the corse in melancholy state,
Through all the village spread the tender tear,
While pitying maids our wondrous loves relate.

ELEGY XIV.

To Delia.

WHAT scenes of bliss my raptur'd fancy fram'd,
In some lone spot with peace and thee retir'd !
Though reason then my sanguine fondness blam'd,
I still believ'd what flattering love inspir'd :

But now my wrongs have taught my humbled
mind,

To dangerous bliss no longer to pretend,
In books a calm, but fix'd content to find,
Safe joys, that on ourselves alone depend :

With them the gentle moments I beguile,
In learned ease, and elegant delight ;
Compare the beauties of each different style,
Each various ray of wit's diffusive light :

Now mark the strength of Milton's sacred lines,
Sense rais'd by genius, fancy rul'd by art,
Where all the glory of the Godhead shines,
And earliest innocence enchants the heart.

Now, fir'd by Pope and virtue, leave the age
In low pursuit of self-undoing wrong,
And trace the author through his moral page,
Whose blameless life still answers to his song.

If time and books my lingering pain can heal,
And reason fix its empire o'er my heart,
My patriot breast a noble warmth shall feel, [part.
And glow with love, where weakness has no

Thy heart, O Lyttleton, shall be my guide,
Its fire shall warm me, and its worth improve ;
Thy heart, above all envy, and all pride,
Firm as man's sense, and soft as woman's love.

And you, O West, with her your partner dear,
Whom social mirth and useful sense commend,

With learning's feast my drooping mind shall cheer,

Glad to escape from love to such a friend.

But why, so long my weaker heart deceive?

Ah, still I love, in pride and reason's spite,

No books, alas! my painful thoughts relieve,

And while I threat, this elegy I write.

ELEGY XV.

To Mr. George Grenville.

Oh, form'd alike to serve us, and to please;

Polite with honesty, and learn'd with ease;

With heart to act, with genius to retire;

Open, yet wise; though gentle, full of fire:

With thee I scorn the low constraint of art,

Nor fear to trust the follies of my heart;

Hear then from what my long despair arose,

The faithful story of a lover's woes.

When, in a sober melancholy hour,

Reduc'd by sickness under reason's power,

I view'd my state, too little weigh'd before,

And love himself could flatter me no more,

My Delia's hopes I would no more deceive, [leave;

But whom my passion hurt, through friendship

I chose the coldest words my heart to hide,

And cure her sex's weakness through its pride:

The prudence which I taught, I ill pursu'd,

The charm my reason broke, my heart renew'd:

Again submissive to her feet I came,

And prov'd too well my passion by my shame;

While she, secure in coldness, or disdain,

Forgot my love, or triumph'd in its pain,

Began with higher views her thoughts to raise,

And scorn'd the humble poet of her praise:

She let each little lie o'er truth prevail,

And strengthen'd by her faith each groundless tale,

Believ'd the grossest arts that malice try'd,

Nor once in thought was on her lover's side:

Oh, where were then the scenes of fancied life?

Oh, where the friend, the mistress, and the wife?

Her years of promis'd love were quickly past,

Not two revolving moons could see them last.—

To Stow's delightful scenes I now repair,

In Cobham's smile to lose the gloom of care!

Nor fear that he my weakness should despise,

In nature learned, and humanely wise:

There Pitt, in manners soft, in friendship warm,

With mild advice my listening grief shall charm,

With sense to counsel, and with wit to please,

A Roman's virtue with a courtier's ease.

Nor you, my friend, whose heart is still at rest,

Contemn the human weakness of my breast;

Reason may chide the faults she cannot cure,

And pains, which long we scorn'd, we oft endure;

Though wiser cares employ your studious mind,

Form'd with a soul so elegantly kind,

Your breast may lose the calm it long has known,

And learn my woes to pity, by its own.

ELEGY XVI.

To Miss Dashwood.

O SAY, thou dear possessor of my breast,

Where's now my boasted liberty and rest!

Where the gay moments which I once have known!

O, where that heart I fondly thought my own!

From place to place I solitary roam,

Abroad uneasy, not content at home.

I scorn the beauties common eyes adore;

The more I view them, feel thy worth the more;

Unmov'd I hear them speak, or see them fair,

And only think on thee, who art not there.

In vain would books their formal succour lend,

Nor wit nor wisdom can relieve their friend;

Wit can't deceive the pain I now endure,

And wisdom shows the ill without the cure.

When from thy sight I waste the tedious day,

A thousand schemes I form, and things to say;

But when thy presence gives the time I seek,

My heart's so full, I wish, but cannot speak.

And could I speak with eloquence and ease,

Till now not studious of the art to please,

Could I, at woman who so oft exclaim,

Expose (nor blush) thy triumph and my shame,

Abjure those maxims I so lately priz'd,

And court that sex I foolishly despis'd,

Own thou hast soften'd my obdurate mind,

And thus reveng'd the wrongs of womankind;

Lost were my words, and fruitless all my pain,

In vain to tell thee, all I write in vain;

My humble sighs shall only reach thy ears,

And all my eloquence shall be my tears.

And now (for more I never must pretend)

Hear me not as thy lover, but thy friend;

Thousands will fain thy little heart ensnare,

For without danger none like thee are fair;

But wisely choose who best deserves thy flame,

So shall the choice itself become thy fame;

Nor yet despise, though void of winning art,

The plain and honest courtship of the heart:

The skilful tongue in love's persuasive lore,

Though less it feels, will please and flatter more,

And, meanly learned in that guilty trade,

Can long abuse a fond, unthinking maid.

And since their lips, so knowing to deceive,

Thy unexperienc'd youth might soon believe;

And since their tears, in false submission dress'd,

Might thaw the icy coldness of thy breast;

O! shut thine eyes to such deceitful woe:

Caught by the beauty of thy outward show,

Like me they do not love, whate'er they seem,

Like me—with passion founded on esteem.

ANSWER TO THE FOREGOING LINES.

BY THE LATE LORD HERVEY.

Too well these lines that fatal truth declare,

Which long I've known, yet now I blush to hear,

But say, what hopes thy fond ill-fated love,

What can it hope, though mutual it should prove?

This little form is fair in vain for you,

In vain for me thy honest heart is true;

For wouldst thou fix dishonour on my name,

And give me up to penitence and shame;

Or gild my ruin with the name of wife,

And make me a poor virtuous wretch for life:

Couldst thou submit to wear the marriage chain,

(Too sure a cure for all thy present pain)

No saffron robe for us the godhead wears,

His torch inverted, and his face in tears,

Though ev'ry softer wish were amply crown'd,
Love soon would cease to smile where fortune
frown'd;

Then would thy soul my fond consent deplore,
And blame what it solicited before;
Thy own exhausted would reproach my truth,
And say I had undone thy blinded youth;
That I had damp'd ambition's nobler flame,
Eclips'd thy talents, and obscur'd thy fame;
To madrigals and odes that wit consign'd,
That would in senates or in courts have shin'd,
Gloriously active in thy country's cause,
Asserting freedom, and enacting laws.

Or say, at best, that negatively kind
You only mourn'd, and silently repin'd;
The jealous demons in my own fond breast
Would all these thoughts incessantly suggest,
And all that sense must feel, though pity had supprest.

Yet added grief my apprehension fills
(If there can be addition to those ills)
When they shall cry, whose harsh reproof I
dread,

" 'Twas thy own deed, thy folly on thy head!
Age knows not to allow for thoughtless youth,
Nor pities tenderness, nor honours truth;
Holds it romantic to confess a heart,
And say those virgins act a wiser part
Who hospitals and bedlams would explore
To find the rich, and only dread the poor;
Who, legal prostitutes for int'rest sake,
Clodios and Timons to their bosoms take,
And, if avenging heav'n permit increase,
People the world with folly and disease.
Those titles, deeds, and rent-rolls only wed,
Whilst the best bidder mounts the venal bed,
And the grave aunt and formal fire approve
This nuptial sale, this auction of their love.
But if regard to worth or sense be shown,
That poor degen'rate child her friends disown,

Who dares to deviate by a virtuous choice
From her great name's hereditary voice.

These scenes my prudence ushers to my mind,
Of all the storms and quicksands I must find,
If I embark upon this summer sea,
Where flatt'ry smooths, and pleasure gilds the way.
Had our ill fate ne'er blown thy dang'rous flame
Beyond the limits of a friend's cold name,
I might upon that score thy heart receive,
And with that guiltless name my own deceive;
That commerce now in vain you recommend,
I dread the latent lover in the friend;
Of ignorance I want the poor excuse,
And know, I both must take, or both refuse.

Hear then the safe, the firm resolve I make,
Ne'er to encourage one I must forsake.
Whilst other maids a shameless path pursue,
Neither to int'rest nor to honour true,
And proud to swell the triumph of their eyes,
Exult in love from lovers they despise;
Their maxims all revers'd I mean to prove,
And though I like the lover, quit the love.

PROLOGUE

TO LILLO'S ELMERIC.

No labour'd scenes to night adorn our stage,
Lillo's plain sense would here the heart engage.
He knew no art, no rule; but warmly thought
From passion's force, and, as he felt, he wrote.
His Barnwell once no critic's test could bear,
Yet from each eye still draws the natural tear,
With generous candour hear his latest strains,
And let kind pity shelter his remains.
Deprest by want, afflicted by disease,
Dying he wrote, and dying wish'd to please.
Oh, may that wish be now humanely paid,
And no harsh critic vex his gentle shade.
'Tis yours his unsupported fame to save,
And bid one laurel grace his humble grave,

THE LIFE OF SAVAGE.

FOR the life of SAVAGE, the "lovers of truth and wit" are obliged to Dr. Johnson, who "was favoured with his confidence, and received from himself an account of most of the transactions which he relates."

The facts stated in the present account are chiefly taken from Dr. Johnson's larger narrative, which is written in so clear and animated a manner, enriched with such variety of anecdotes, and illuminated throughout with so much philosophy and knowledge of human life, that it is one of the most interesting biographical disquisitions in the English language.

Richard Savage was born in Fox-court, Holborn, on the 10th of January 1697-8. He was the son of Anne, Countess of Macclesfield, adulterously begotten by Richard Savage, Earl of Rivers, who, it is alleged by Dr. Johnson, gave him his own name, and had it duly recorded in the register of St. Andrew's, Holborn; but that register has been carefully inspected, and no such entry is to be found. According to Mr. Reed, he was christened by the name of Richard Smith; but of this there is no evidence.

Dr. Johnson states, that "Lady Macclesfield having lived for some time upon very uneasy terms with her husband, thought a public confession of adultery the most obvious and expeditious method of obtaining her liberty," and assuming this to be true, stigmatizes her with indignation, as "the wretch who had, without scruple, proclaimed herself an adulteress."

That Lady Macclesfield was convicted of the crime of adultery, and separated from her husband by an act of parliament, cannot be denied; but there is not sufficient evidence of her voluntarily submitting to the ignominious charge of adultery.

"I have perused," says Mr. Boswell, the lively and agreeable biographer of Dr. Johnson, "the Journals of both Houses of Parliament, at the period of her divorce, and there find it authentically ascertained; that she made a most strenuous defence by her counsel; the bill having been first moved 15th January 1697, and proceeded on at intervals till the 3d of March, when it passed. It was brought to the Commons the 5th of March, proceeded on the 7th, 10th, 11th, 14th, and 15th; on which day, after a full examination of witnesses on both sides, and hearing of counsel, it was reported without amendment, passed, and carried to the Lords." Yet, on the other hand, it ought to be observed, that it belonged to Lady Macclesfield to oppose the divorce, to prevent a suspicion of collusion; and therefore her opposition, under such circumstances, is not sufficient to overbalance the general repute as to her voluntary confession.

As to the truth of the fact, there was no doubt made of it; for Lord Rivers acquiesced in her declaration, and appeared by the measures he took to provide for him, to consider the child as his own. Lord Rivers unfortunately left him to the care of his mother, who, after having forfeited the title of Lady Macclesfield by divorce, retained her fortune, and was married to Colonel Henry Brett, whom she survived many years. She died October 11. 1753, aged above fourscore.

Strange as it may appear, his mother, from the moment of his birth, looked upon him with a kind of resentment and abhorrence; and, instead of supporting, assisting, and defending him, resolved to disown him; and in a very short time removed him from her sight, by committing him to the care of a shoemaker's wife, whom she directed to educate him as her own, enjoining her never to inform him of his true parents.

The hapless infant was not, however, wholly abandoned. Her mother, Lady Mason, whether in approbation of her design, or to prevent more criminal practices, took some charge of his education, and placed him at a small grammar-school near St. Alban's, where he was called by the name of his nurse.

Here he was initiated in literature, and passed through several of the classes, with what rapidity or applause cannot now be known.

While he was cultivating his genius, his father Lord Rivers was seized with a distemper which threatened his life; and as he lay on his death-bed, he thought it his duty to provide for him among his other natural children. Accordingly, he sent to his mother to inquire after him, and she had the cruelty to cut him off for ever from that happiness which competence affords, by declaring that he was dead. The Earl did not imagine that there could exist a mother that would ruin her son without enriching herself; and therefore bestowed upon some other person six thousand pounds, which he had, in his will, bequeathed to Savage. He died August 18. 1712.

Mr. Boswell, for the honour of human nature, is inclined to think the shocking tale not true; and supposes that the person who then assumed the name of Richard Savage, was an impostor, being in reality the son of the shoemaker, and that, after the death of the real Richard Savage, he attempted to personate him; and that the fraud being known to Lady Macclesfield, he was therefore repulsed by her, with just resentment.

Mr. Boswell supports his supposition by a circumstance that has been mentioned as an aggravation of Lady Macclesfield's unnatural conduct; and that is, her having prevented him from obtaining the benefit of a legacy left to him by Mrs. Lloyd, his god-mother: "For if there was such a legacy left," says he, "his not being able to obtain payment of it, must be imputed to his consciousness that he was not the real person. The just inference should be, that by the death of Lady Macclesfield's child before its god-mother, the legacy became lapsed; and therefore, that Johnson's Richard Savage was an impostor."

A very little reflection might have satisfied Mr. Boswell, that executors acting under the influence of Lady Macclesfield, might have laid Savage, with a very good title, under considerable difficulties in recovering the legacy.

Besides, we must allow the weight of general repute as to his parentage, though illicit, and it must ever appear very suspicious, that three different accounts of the Life of Savage, one published by Hill, in the "The Plain Dealer," in 1724, another by Mr. Beckingham, in 1727, and another by the powerful pen of Dr. Johnson in 1749, and all of them while Lady Macclesfield was alive, should, notwithstanding the severe attacks upon her, have been suffered to pass without any public and effectual contradiction.

The same cruelty which incited his mother to intercept this provision which had been intended him, prompted her, on his leaving school, to rid herself from the danger of being at any time made known to him, by sending him secretly to the American plantations; but this contrivance was by some accident defeated.

Being hindered, by whatever means, from banishing him into another country, she formed, soon after, a scheme of burying him in poverty and obscurity for the remainder of his days, and had him placed with a shoemaker in Holborn.

In this station, however, he did not long continue; for his nurse dying, he went to take care of the effects of his supposed mother, and found in her boxes some of Lady Mason's letters to her, which informed him of his birth, and the cause of its concealment.

He was now no longer satisfied with the employment which had been allotted him, and thought he had a right to share in the affluence of his mother; and therefore, without scruple, applied to her as her son, and made use of every art to awaken her tenderness, and attract her regard. But she still resolved to neglect, though she could no longer disown him, and took measures to prevent his ever entering her house on any pretence whatever.

Savage was, at the same time, so touched with the discovery of his real mother, that it was his frequent practice to walk in the dark evenings before her door, in hopes of seeing her, as she might come by accident to the window, or cross her apartment with a candle in her hand.

One evening, walking in the street that she inhabited, he saw the door of her house by accident open. He entered it, and went up stairs to salute her. She discovered him before he could enter her chamber, alarmed the family, and ordered them to drive out of the house that villain who had endeavoured to murder her. Savage, who had attempted by the most submissive tenderness to soften her rage, hearing her utter so detestable an accusation, thought it prudent to retire; and never attempted afterwards to speak to her.

While he was assiduously endeavouring to awaken the tenderness of a mother, in whom all natural affection was extinct, he was destitute of the means of support, and having no profession, and a strong inclination to literary pursuits, especially poetry, he became by necessity an author.

The subject he made choice of for his first attempt was the Bangorian controversy, in which he inconsiderately engaged in opposition to Hoadly, the able defender of civil and religious liberty, and published a poem against the Bishop, the success of which is not known, but of which he was afterwards much ashamed.

He then attempted a more gainful kind of writing; and, in 1717, offered a comedy to the stage, intituled, Woman's a Riddle, which was refused by the players. It was not, however, his own performance, but a translation of a Spanish comedy called La Dama Duende, executed by Mrs. Price, lady of Baron Price, who gave him the copy, and, through inadvertency, another copy to Mr. Bullock the player, who made some alterations in the MS., and brought it on the stage at Lincoln's-inn-fields, the same year.

In 1719, he produced Love in a Veil, a comedy, translated likewise from a Spanish play, called Peor esla qua esclava, and was acted at Lincoln's-inn-fields, but so late in the year, that he received scarce any other advantage from it, than the acquaintance of Steele, and Mr. Wilks the comedian, by whom he was pitied, caressed, and relieved.

Steele espoused his interest with all the ardour of benevolence which constituted his character, and asserted, that "the inhumanity of his mother had given him a right to find every good man his father."

The kindness of Steele did not end in common favours. He proposed to have established him in some settled scheme of life, and to have married him to a natural daughter of his, on whom he intended to bestow a thousand pounds; but as he was never able to raise the sum which he had offered, the marriage was delayed.

In the mean time, he was informed that Savage had ridiculed him; by which he was so much exasperated, that he withdrew the allowance which he had paid him, and never afterwards admitted him to his house.

Mr. Wilks, however, continued an equal and steady kindness to the time of his death; and by his interposition, according to Mr. Beckingham, he once obtained from his mother fifty pounds, and a promise of one hundred and fifty more, which was never performed.

Being thus obliged to depend on Mr. Wilks, he became an assiduous frequenter of the theatre; and this constant attendance, naturally procured him the acquaintance of Mrs. Oldfield, who, according to Dr. Johnson, was so much pleased with his conversation, and touched with his misfortunes, that she allowed him an annuity, during her life, of fifty pounds. But Shiels asserts, that "she so much disliked Savage, and disapproved of his conduct, that she never admitted him to her conversation, nor suffered him to enter her house;" and that "she indeed often relieved him with such donations as spoke her generous disposition: but this was at the solicitation of friends; and from a principle of humanity, she became not a little instrumental in saving his life."

It is certain, that at her death, he went into mourning as for a mother; and though Dr. Johnson, says he did not celebrate her in elegies, Chetwood has printed a poem on her death, which he ascribes to Savage.

He had sometimes, by the kindness of Mr. Wilks, the advantage of a benefit; on which occasions he often received uncommon marks of regard and compassion, though the interest of his mother was employed to frustrate his applications.

The kindness of his friends not affording him any constant supply, he found it necessary to endeavour once more at dramatic poetry; and having been unsuccessful in comedy, he resolved to try whether he should not be more fortunate in exhibiting a tragedy.

The story which he chose for the subject, was that of Sir Thomas Overbury. During a considerable part of the time in which he was employed upon it, he was without lodging, and often without meat; nor had he any other convenience for study than the fields or the streets allowed him. There he used to walk, and form his speeches, and afterwards step into a shop, beg for a moment the use of pen and ink, and write down what he had composed, upon paper which he had picked up by accident.

It was brought on the stage at Drury-lane, June 12. 1723, and acted only three nights. It was once more performed for his benefit, when the house opened for the winter season, October 2. It was corrected and fitted for the stage by Hill, an author of established reputation, from whose friendship he received great assistance on many occasions, and whom he never mentioned but with the utmost tenderness and regard. Hill wrote the prologue and epilogue, in which he touches on the circumstances of Savage with great tenderness. He himself performed the part of Sir Thomas Overbury, but with so little reputation, that he always blotted out his name from the list, when a copy of his tragedy was to be shown to his friends.

For the dedication, to Herbert Tryst, Esq. of Herefordshire, he received ten pounds. The accumulated profits of acting, printing, and dedication, were a hundred pounds, which he thought a very large sum, having never been master of so much before.

When his necessities returned, Hill encouraged a subscription to a Miscellany of Poems, by publishing his story in the "Plain Dealer," with some affecting verses, which had a very powerful effect upon all, but his mother, whom, by making her cruelty more public, they only hardened in her aversion.

To this Miscellany, the greater part of which was furnished by Hill, he wrote a Preface, in which he gives an account of his mother's cruelty, in a very uncommon strain of humour, with a dedication to Lady Mary Wortley-Montague, whom he flatters without reserve, and with very little art.

Soon afterwards, the death of George I. furnished a general subject for poetical condolence, in which Savage engaged, without obtaining any other advantage, than the increase of his reputation.

He was now advancing in credit, and appeared to be gaining upon mankind, when a misfortune befel him, by which not only his reputation, but his life was endangered.

On the 20th of November, 1727, Savage came from Richmond, whither he had for some time retired, in order to pursue his studies without interruption; and accidentally meeting two acquaintances, whose names were Marchant and Gregory, he went in with them to a coffee-house, where they sat drinking till it was late. He would willingly have gone to bed in the same house, but there was not room for the whole company, and therefore they agreed to ramble about the streets till the morning. Happening to discover a light in a coffee-house near Charing-cross, they went in, and demanded a room. They were told the next parlour would be empty presently, as a company were about to leave it, being then paying their reckoning. Marchant, not satisfied with this answer, rushed into the room, and behaved very rudely. This produced a quarrel; swords were drawn; and, in the confusion, one Mr. James Sinclair was killed. A woman servant was likewise accidentally wounded by Savage, as she was endeavouring to hold him.

Savage and his companions being taken into custody, were tried for this offence; and both he and Gregory were capitally convicted, by the evidence of a common strumpet, a woman by whom such wretches were entertained, and a man by whom they were supported. Savage pleaded his own cause, and behaved with great resolution; but it was proved that he gave Sinclair his death's wound, while Gregory commanded the sword of the deceased.

Had his audience been his judges, he had undoubtedly been acquitted; but Mr. Page, then on the bench, treated him with his usual insolence and severity, exasperated the jury against him, and misrepresented his defence.

The convicts, reconducted to prison, had no hopes of life but from the mercy of the Crown, which was earnestly solicited by his friends, and only obstructed by his mother, who had prejudiced the Queen against him, by relating the atrocious calumny of his forcing himself in upon her, with an intent to murder her.

At length a friend arose, whose character and rank were too eminent to fail of success, the amiable Countess of Hertford, by whose interposition he was admitted to bail, and, on the 9th March 1728, pleaded the royal pardon; to which also the petition delivered to his Majesty by Lord Tyrconnel, his mother's nephew, and the solicitations made to Sir Robert Walpole by Mrs. Oldfield, were not a little conducive.

He had now recovered his liberty, but he had no means of subsistence. He resolved, therefore, to compel his mother to do something for him, and threatened that he would severely expose her cruelty. The expedient proved successful. Lord Tyrconnel, whatever were his motives, upon his promise to lay aside his design, received him into his family, treated him as his equal, and allowed him two hundred pounds a year.

Mr. Boswell represents his being received as a companion by Lord Tyrconnel, as if prior to his conviction and pardon; but Dr. Johnson's account, which is followed here, is confirmed by the appearance of The Wanderer, in 1729, addressed to that nobleman, not only in the first lines, but in a formal dedication filled with the highest strains of panegyric, and the warmest professions of gratitude. No allusion indeed to the murder is observable in The Wanderer, which is a circumstance rather favourable to Mr. Boswell's account.

For some time he had no reason to complain of fortune : his appearance was splendid, his expences large, and his acquaintance extensive. He was courted by all who endeavoured to be thought men of genius, and caressed by all who valued themselves upon a refined taste. This interval of prosperity furnished him with opportunities of enlarging his knowledge of human nature, by contemplating life from its highest gradation to its lowest. Of his exact observations on human life, he has left a proof in The Author to be Let, published about this time, and afterwards inserted in a collection of pieces relating to the Dunciad, which were addressed to the Earl of Middlesex, in a dedication written by Pope, but signed by Savage.

After the publication of this piece, he was considered by those who were attacked by Pope, as a kind of confederate, and was suspected of supplying him with private intelligence and secret incidents ; so that the ignominy of an informer was added to the terror of a satirist.

About this time he wrote a panegyrical Epistle to Sir Robert Walpole, and The Triumph of Health and Mirth, on the recovery of Lady Tyrconnel, from a languishing illness.

While the world seemed to smile upon him, his conduct was such as made Lord Tyrconnel grow weary of him, and even forced him to withdraw his voluntary bounty, and to banish him from his table.

The cause assigned by his Lordship for dismissing him, was, his introducing company into his house, with whom he practised the most licentious frolics, and committed all the outrages of drunkenness ; and selling or pawning the books of which he had made him a present, stamped with his own arms. Both these accusations were easily credited.

On the other hand, Savage declared, that Lord Tyrconnel quarrelled with him because he would not subtract from his own luxury and extravagance what he had promised to allow him : but this is by no means probable.

These mutual accusations were retorted on both sides, for many years, with the utmost degree of virulence and rage. Savage felt every day the consequences of the quarrel ; and seems to have persuaded Dr. Johnson, " that his spirit never suffered him to solicit a reconciliation : " but Mr. Boswell has shown, that he once solicited a reconciliation, " in the humblest manner," by the interposition of Mr. Gilbert, his Lordship's chaplain.

He now thought himself again at liberty to take his revenge on his mother ; and published about this time, The Bastard, inscribed with " due reverence," to Mrs. Brett, which had an extraordinary sale.

His mother, who happened then to be at Bath, was not able to bear the representation of her own conduct, but fled from reproach, and took shelter in London.

On the death of Eusden, in 1730, he ineffectually exerted all the interest which his wit, or his birth, or his misfortunes could procure, to obtain the place of poet-laureat, which was given to Cibber.

Being disappointed of the laureat's place, he took a resolution of applying to the Queen, and published a poem on her birth-day, which he intitled, The Volunteer Laureat. The Queen, a few days after publication, sent him fifty pounds, and her " permission to write annually on the same subject ; " and a promise of " the like present, till something better could be done for him."

When the Princess Anne was married to the Prince of Orange, he wrote a poem upon her departure, only, as he declared, " because it was expected from him."

About this time, he was accused in " The Daily Courant," of influencing elections against the court, by appearing at the head of a Tory mob ; but he sufficiently cleared his innocence, and found no ill effects from the accusation.

In the dispute between the Bishop of London and the Chancellor, relating to Dr. Rundle, he engaged with great zeal against the Bishop ; and wrote a poem, called, The Progress of a Divine, in which he painted the character of a profligate priest, in such odious colours, as drew upon him the resentment of the clergy. The Court of King's Bench was moved against him for obscenity ; but Lord Chief Justice York dismissed the information, with encomiums upon the purity and excellence of his writings.

He once intended to make a reparation for the folly or injustice with which he might be charged, by writing another poem, called, The Progress of a Freethinker ; but this plan was, like others, formed, and laid aside.

He was still in his usual exigencies, having no certain support but the pension from the Queen ; which, when he received, he regularly disappeared, and spent, and returned to his acquaintance as penniless as before.

His friends solicited Sir Robert Walpole in his favour, with so much earnestness, that they obtained a promise of the next place that should become vacant, not exceeding 200 l. a-year; but, nothing more than promises were obtained from that celebrated statesman.

Despair was not, however, the character of Savage; when one patronage failed, he had recourse to another. The Prince of Wales had very liberally rewarded the merit of Thomson and Mallet; and, therefore, he resolved to address to him, his Poem on Public Spirit, with regard to Public Works; but he received no reward from his patron, however generous on other occasions; a disappointment which he never mentioned without indignation.

His poverty still pressing, he lodged as much by accident as he dined; for he generally lived by chance, eating only when he was invited to the tables of his acquaintance, from which the meanness of his dress often excluded him. He often passed his nights in those mean houses which are set open for casual wanderers; sometimes in cellars, amidst the riot and filth of the most profligate of the rabble; and not seldom would he walk the streets till he was weary, and then lie down, in summer, on a bulk, and in winter, among the ashes of a glass-house.

His necessities as a writer for bread, brought him acquainted with Mr. Cave, the editor of "The Gentleman's Magazine;" and his visits at St. John's Gate, naturally brought Dr. Johnson and him together.

It is melancholy to reflect, that Dr. Johnson and Savage have sometimes wandered together whole nights in the streets for want of a lodging. Yet, in those scenes of distress, it is probable that Savage mentioned many of those anecdotes, with which Dr. Johnson afterwards enriched the life of his unfortunate companion, and those of other poets.

His distresses, however afflictive, never dejected him: In his lowest state he wanted not spirit to assert the natural dignity of wit, and to repress, with contempt, the insolence which the superiority of fortune incited; of which Dr. Johnson records an instance, in his refusing to wait upon one of his friends, when he was without meat, lodging, or clothes, only because the message signified that he desired to see him about nine in the morning.

It was one of his favourite amusements to form schemes for publishing his works by subscription; for which, at length, he printed proposals; and as they grew obsolete, new ones were printed with fresher dates; but the money which his subscriptions afforded him, was not less volatile than that which he received from his other schemes.

The death of the Queen, in 1738, deprived him of all hopes at Court: his pension was discontinued; and he was now abandoned again to fortune.

On the return of the Queen's birth-day next year, he addressed to his Majesty, A Poem, sacred to the memory of the late Queen, which may be justly ranked among the best pieces which the death of princes has produced. He expected by this address to recover his pension, and demanded of Sir Robert Walpole to have it restored, with a degree of roughness, which, perhaps, determined him to withdraw what had been only delayed.

His distress was now publicly known; and a scheme was at length concerted for procuring him a permanent relief. It was proposed that he should retire to Wales, and receive an allowance of fifty pounds a-year, to be raised by subscription, on which he was to live privately in a cheap place, without aspiring any more to affluence, or having any farther care of reputation. Pope subscribed twenty pounds.

This offer he seemed gladly to accept; but his intentions were only to deceive his friends, by retiring for a while to write another tragedy on the story of Sir Thomas Overbury, and then to return with it to London, to bring it upon the stage.

He left London in the Bristol stage-coach, in July 1739, having taken leave of his friends with great tenderness, and parted from Dr. Johnson with tears in his eyes.

After some stay at Bristol, where he was treated with a regard that highly gratified his vanity, he proceeded to Swansea, the place originally proposed for his residence, where he lived about a year, very much dissatisfied with the diminution of his salary; for he had in his letters treated his contributors so insolently, that most of them withdrew their subscription.

At this place he became acquainted with Mr. Powell, and Mrs. Jones, whom he has celebrated in his poems; and completed his tragedy, with which he resolved to return to London. Pope opposed his return, and advised him to put his play into the hands of Thomson and Mallet, that they might fit it for the stage, and receive the profits on his account. This proposal he rejected with the utmost contempt; and soon after returned to Bristol, on his way to London: but, meeting with a repetition of the same kind treatment he had before found there, he was tempted to stay, till he tired out the generosity of his friends; and his irregular behaviour grew troublesome. Distress stole upon him by imperceptible degrees. To complete his misery, on the 10th of January 1742-3, he was arrested for a debt of about eight pounds, which he owed at a coffeehouse; and conducted to the house of a sheriff's officer, where he remained for some time "at an immense expence," in hopes of procuring bail; and, at length, was removed to Newgate.

The expence of living at the officer's house he was enabled to support, by the generosity of Mr. Nash at Bath, who, upon hearing of his misfortune, sent him five guineas.

He was treated by Mr. Dagge, the keeper of the prison, with great humanity; was supported by him at his own table, had a room to himself, was allowed to stand at the door of the prison, and sometimes taken out into the fields.

He employed himself in this hospitable prison, in writing a satirical poem, called London and Bristol Delineated; which he left unfinished.

When he had been about six months in prison, he received a letter from Pope, who yet continued to remit him his subscription, containing a charge of very atrocious ingratitude, founded on a complaint which he was supposed to have made to Henley. He returned a very solemn protestation of his innocence; but, however, appeared much disturbed at the accusation.

In a few days after, he was seized with a disorder, which at first was not suspected to be dangerous; but growing daily more languid and dejected, at last a fever seized his spirits, and he expired on the 1st of August 1743, in the 46th year of his age. He was buried in the church-yard of St. Peter, at the expence of the keeper.

Thus lived, and thus died this unfortunate poet; leaving behind him an example of the most remarkable combination of virtues and vices, weaknesses and abilities, that is to be found in the records of biography.

The infelicity of his fate has been a frequent subject of lamentation with succeeding poets; and very lately by William Preston, Esq., an eminent poet of a neighbouring kingdom, in an elegant and pathetic "Epistle to a Young Gentleman, on his having addicted himself to the study of Poetry."

He, too, that gloried in a Basford's name,
The patient pupil of reproach and shame—
Nor father's smile, nor mother's tender tears,
Cheer'd the sad cradle of his tender years!
Lo! time for him prepares the scorns and whips,
And steep in poverty beyond the lips—
Oh Savage! doubly born of noble kind,
And tenfold noble in th' exalted mind:
Want, fear, and calumny, for thee combin'd,
And blood oppressive clings around thy mind:
Oft to themselves their pangs the wretched owe,
But Savage! thine from crimes of others flow.
What demons steel a shameless woman's breast?
Maternal fury, wilt thou never rest?
With vilest falsehoods, every fiend-like art,
The human harpy rends his bleeding heart.
Unwearied hate the curse of being gave,
Pursued through life, and sunk him to the grave.
Oh, Savage! curs'd with elegant desires,
Th' ennobled nature, the poetic fires;
Thy roving wishes spread th' unwearied wing,
Their sad returns of misery to bring.
No peaceful olive proves their wand'rings past;
But noxious herbs and fruits of bitter taste.
In dreary prospect, dire existence lies
Where crowding sorrows, woes on woes arise;
The murder'd hopes, departed faith of friends;
And mildest death, the long perspective ends.
Alas! what joy thy parting moment smooth'd,
By Pope embitter'd, by a jailor sooth'd.
Strange comforter! he cheer'd thy prison's gloom,
He gave thy relics to the decent tomb."

Savage was of a middle stature, of a thin habit of body, a long visage, coarse features, and melancholy aspect, of a grave and manly deportment, a solemn dignity of mien, but which, upon a nearer acquaintance, softened into an engaging easiness of manners. His walk was slow, and his voice tremulous and mournful. He was easily excited to smiles, but very seldom provoked to laughter.

Of his character, the most striking peculiarities have been displayed in the relation of his life. He was undoubtedly a man of excellent parts; and had he received the advantages of a liberal education, and had his natural talents been cultivated to the best advantage, he might have made a respectable figure in life. He was happy in an agreeable temper, and a lively flow of wit, which made his company much coveted: nor was his judgment both of writings and of men inferior to his wit; but he was too much a slave to his passions, and his passions were too easily excited.

He was warm in his friendships, but implacable in his enmity; and his greatest fault, which is indeed the greatest of all faults, was ingratitude. Vanity, the most innocent species of pride, was most frequently predominant; and his veracity was often questioned, and not without reason.

His poetical works, dispersed in magazines and fugitive publications, were collected and published by T. Evans, bookseller, in 2 vols., 8vo, 1771. His second tragedy, on the subject of the first, was found among Mr. Cave's papers, many years after his death, and fitted for the stage by Mr. William Woodfall, with the assistance of Mr. Garrick and Mr. Colman, and exhibited at Covent-garden, in 1777, with applause.

As a poet, the compositions of Savage amply establish his fame. The Wanderer, the greatest effort of his poetical genius, is a work of uncommon merit. It abounds with strong representations of nature, and just observations upon life. Most of the pictures have an evident tendency to illustrate his first great position, "That good is the consequence of evil," which verges towards the latitudinarianism of Mandeville. The terrific portrait of Suicide deserves particular commendation. It has been objected to The Wanderer, with some degree of justice, that the disposition of the parts is irregular; that the design is obscure, and the plan perplexed; that the images, however beautiful, succeed each other without order; and that the whole performance is not so much a regular fabric, as a heap of shining materials thrown together by accident, which strike rather with the solemn magnificence of a stupendous ruin, than the elegant grandeur of a finished pile.

The Bastard is a vigorous and spirited performance: The vivacious sallies of thought in the beginning, when he makes a pompous enumeration of the imaginary advantages of base birth, and the pathetic sentiments at the end, where he recounts the real calamities which he suffered by the crime of his parents, are chiefly remarkable.

The poem of Public Spirit is not so diligently laboured, nor so successfully finished as The Wanderer. The plan is very extensive, and comprises a multitude of topics; but he passes negligently over many public works, which deserved to be more elaborately treated.

The settlement of colonies in uninhabited countries, is recommended with all the ornaments of verse, and all the tenderness of humanity and benevolence. He asserts the natural equality of mankind, and endeavours to suppress that pride which inclines men to suppose, that right is the consequence of power.

The Triumph of Mirth and Health, is remarkable not only for the gaiety of the ideas, and the melody of the numbers, but for the agreeable fiction upon which it is formed. Among his smaller pieces, The Employment of Beauty, The Friend, The Genius of Liberty, Valentine's Day, and the Poem sacred to the memory of her late Majesty, deserve particular commendation.

"As an author," says Dr. Johnson, "if one piece, which he had resolved to suppress, be excepted, Savage has very little to fear from the strictest moral or religious censure. And though he may not be altogether secure against the objections of the critic, it must however be acknowledged, that his works are the production of a genius truly poetical, and what many writers, who have been more lavishly applauded, cannot boast, that they have an original air, which has no resemblance of any foregoing writer; that the versification and sentiments have a cast peculiar to themselves, which no man can imitate with success; because, what was nature in Savage, would be in another affectation. It must be confessed that his descriptions are striking, his images animated, his fictions truly imagined, and his allegories artfully pursued; that his diction is elevated, though sometimes forced; and his numbers sonorous and majestic, though frequently sluggish and encumbered. Of his style, the general fault is harshness, and its general excellence is dignity: of his sentiments, the prevailing beauty is simplicity, and uniformity the prevailing defect."

POEMS OF SAVAGE.

THE WANDERER: A VISION.

IN FIVE CANTOS.

"Nulla mali nova mi facies inopinave surgit."

VIRG.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE
JOHN LORD VISCOUNT TYRCONNEL,
BARON CHARLEVILLE, AND LORD BROWNLOWE,
KNIGHT OF THE BATH.

MY LORD,

PART of this poem had the honour of your Lordship's perusal when in manuscript; and it was no small pride to me, when it met with approbation from so distinguishing a judge: should the rest find the like indulgence, I shall have no occasion (whatever its success may be in the world) to repent the labour it has cost me—But my intention is not to pursue a discourse on my own performance; no, my Lord, it is to embrace this opportunity of throwing out sentiments that relate to your Lordship's goodness, the generosity of which, give me leave to say, I have greatly experienced.

I offer it not as a new remark, that dependance on the great, in former times, generally terminated in disappointment; nay, even their bounty (if it could be called such) was, in its very nature, ungenerous. It was, perhaps, withheld, through an indolent or wilful neglect, till those who lingered in the want of it, grew almost past the sense of comfort. At length it came, too often, in a manner that half cancelled the obligation, and, perchance, must have been acquired too by some previous act of guilt in the receiver, the consequence of which was remorse and infamy.

But that I live, my Lord, is a proof that dependance on your Lordship, and the present ministry, is an assurance of success. I am persuaded, distress, in many other instances, affects your soul with a compassion, that always shows itself in a manner most humane and active; that to forgive injuries, and confer benefits, is your delight; and that to deserve your friendship is to deserve the countenance of the best of men. To be admitted into the honour of your Lordship's conversation (permit me to speak but justice) is to be elegantly introduced into the most instructive, as well as entertaining, parts of literature; it is to be furnished with the finest observations upon human nature, and to receive, from the most unassuming, sweet, and winning candour, the worthiest and most polite maxims—such as are always enforced by the actions of your own life. I could also take notice of your many public-spirited services to your country in Parliament, and your constant attachment to liberty, and the royal, illustrious house of our most gracious sovereign; but, my Lord, believe me, your own deeds are the noblest and fittest orators to speak your praise, and will elevate it far beyond the power of a much abler writer than I am.

I will therefore turn my view from your Lordship's virtues to the kind influence of them, which has been so lately shed upon me; and then, if my future morals and writings shall gain any approbation from men of parts and probity, I must acknowledge all to be the product of your Lordship's goodness to me. I must, in fine, say with Horace,

"Quod spiro, et placeo, (et placeo) tuum est."

I am, with the highest gratitude and adoration,

MY LORD,

Your Lordship's most dutiful
and devoted servant,

RICHARD SAVAGE.

CANTO I.

FAIN would my verse, Tyrconnel, boast thy name,
Brownlowe, at once my subject and my fame!
Oh! could that spirit, which thy bosom warms,
Whose strength surprises, and whose goodness charms!

That various worth! could that inspire my lays,
Envy should smile, and censure learn to praise:
Yet though unequal to a soul like thine,
A generous soul, approaching to divine,
When blest'd beneath such patronage I write,
Great my attempt, though hazardous my flight.

O'er ample nature I extend my views;
Nature to rural scenes invites the muse:
She flies all public care, all venal strife,
To try the still, compar'd with active life;
To prove, by these the sons of men may owe
The fruits of bliss to bursting clouds of woe;
That ev'n calamity, by thought refin'd,
Inspirits and adorns the thinking mind.

Come, contemplation, whose unbounded gaze,
Swift in a glance, the course of things surveys;
Who in thyself the various view canst find
Of sea, land, air, and heaven, and human-kind;
What tides of passion in the bosom roll;
What thoughts debase, and what exalt the soul,
Whose pencil paints, obsequious to thy will,
All thou survey'st, with a creative skill!
Oh, leave awhile thy lov'd, sequester'd shade!
Awhile in wintry wilds vouchsafe thy aid!
Then waft me to some olive, bowery green,
Where, cloth'd in white, thou show'st a mind
serene;

Where kind content from noise and court retires,
And smiling sits, while muses tune their lyres:
Where zephyrs gently breathe, while sleep profound
To their soft fanning nods, with poppies crown'd;
Sleep, on a treasure of bright dreams reclines,
By thee bestow'd; whence fancy colour'd shines,
And flutters round his brow a hovering flight,
Varying her plumes in visionary light.

Though solar fires now faint and watery burn,
Just where with ice Aquarius frets his urn!
If thaw'd forth issue, from its mouth severe,
Raw clouds, that sadden all th' inverted year.

When frost and fire with martial powers en-
gag'd,
Frost, northward fled the war, unequal wag'd!
Beneath the pole his legions urg'd their flight,
And gain'd a cave profound and wide as night.
O'er cheerless scenes by desolation own'd,
High on an Alp of ice he sits enthron'd!
One clay-cold hand, his crystal beard sustains,
And scepter'd one, o'er wind and tempest reigns;
O'er stony magazines of hail, that storm
The blossom'd fruit, and flowery spring deform.
His languid eyes like frozen lakes appear,
Dim gleaming all the light that wanders here.
His robe snow-wrought, and hoar'd with age;
his breath

A nitrous damp, that strikes petrific death.

Far hence lies, ever-freez'd, the northern main,
That checks, and renders navigation vain,

That, shut against the sun's dissolving ray,
Scatters the trembling tides of vanquish'd day,
And stretching eastward half the world secures,
Defies discovery, and like time endures!

Now frost sent boreal blasts to scourge the air,
To bind the streams, and leave the landscape bare;
Yet when, far west, his violence declines, [fines;
Though here the brook, or lake, his power con-
To rocky pools, to cataracts are unknown
His chains!---to rivers, rapid like the Rhone!

The falling moon cast, cold, a quivering light,
Just silver'd o'er the snow, and sunk!---pale night
Retir'd. The dawn in light-gray mists arose!
Shrill chants the cock!---the hungry heifer lows!
Slow blush yon breaking clouds;---the sun's up-
roll'd!

Th' expansive gray turns azure, chas'd with gold;
White-glittering ice, chang'd like the topaz, gleams,
Reflecting saffron lustre from his beams.

O contemplation, teach me to explore,
From Britain far remote, some distant shore!
From sleep a dream distinct and lively claim;
Clear let the vision strike the moral's aim!
It comes! I feel it o'er my soul serene!

Still morn begins, and frost retains the scene!
Hark!---the loud horn's enlivening note's begun!
From rock to vale sweet-wandering echoes run!
Still floats the sound shrill-winding from afar!
Wild beasts astonish'd dread the sylvan war!
Spears to the sun in files embattled play,
March on, charge briskly, and enjoy the fray!

Swans, ducks, and geese, and the wing'd winter-
brood,
Chatter discordant on yon echoing flood!
At Babel thus, when heaven the tongue confounds,
Sudden a thousand different jargon-sounds,
Like jangling bells, harsh mingling grate the ear!
All stare! all talk! all mean; but none cohere!
Mark! wiley fowlers meditate their doom,
And smoky fate speeds thundering through the gloom!

Stop'd short, they cease in airy rings to fly,
Whirl o'er and o'er, and, fluttering, fall and die.

Still fancy wafts me on! deceiv'd I stand,
Estrang'd, adventurous on a foreign land!
Wide and more wide extends the scene unknown!
Where shall I turn, a WANDERER, and alone?

From hilly wilds, and deeps where snows remain,
My winding steps up a steep mountain strain!
Emmers'd a-top, I mark, the hills subside,
And towers aspire, but with inferior pride!
On this bleak height tall firs, with ice-work
crown'd,

Bend, while their slacky winter shades the ground!
Hoarse, and direct, a blustering north-wind blows!
On boughs, thick rustling, crack the crisped snows!
Tangles of frost half-fright the wilder'd eye,
By heat oft-blacken'd like a lowering sky!
Hence down the side two turbid rivulets pour,
And devious two, in one huge cataract roar!
While pleas'd the watery progress I pursue,
Yon rocks in rough assemblage rush in view!
In form an amphitheatre they rise;
And a dark gulf in their broad centre lies.

There the dim'd sight with dizzy weakness fails,
And horror o'er the firmest brain prevails!
Thither these mountain-streams their passage take,
Headlong foam down, and form a dreadful lake!
The lake, high-swell, so redundant grows,
From the heap'd store deriv'd, a river flows;
Which, deepening, travels through a distant wood,
And thence emerging, meets a sister-flood;
Mingled they flash on a wide-opening plain,
And pass yon city to the far-seen main.

So blend two souls by heaven for union made,
And strengthening forward, lend a mutual aid,
And prove in every transient turn their aim,
Through finite life to infinite the same.

Nor ends the landscape---ocean, to my sight,
Points a blue arm, where sailing ships delight,
In prospect lessen'd!—Now new rocks, rear'd
high,

Stretch a cross-ridge, and bar the curious eye;
There lies obscur'd the ripening diamond's ray,
And thence red-branching coral's rent away.
In conic form there gelid crystal grows;
Through such the palace-lamp, gay lustre throws!
Lustre, which, through dim night, as various plays,
As play from yonder snows the changeful rays!
For nobler use the crystal's worth may rise,
If tubes perspective hem the spotless prize;
Through these the beams of the far-lengthen'd eye
Measure known stars, and new remoter spy.
Hence commerce many a shorten'd voyage steers,
Shorten'd to months, the hazard once of years;
Hence Halley's soul ethereal flight essays;
Instructive there from orb to orb she strays;
Sees, round new countless suns, new systems roll!
Sees God in all! and magnifies the whole!
Yon rocky side enrich'd the summer scene,
And peasants search for herbs of healthful green;
Now naked, pale, and comfortless it lies,
Like youth extended cold in death's disguise.
There, while without the sounding tempest swells,
Incar'd secure th' exulting eagle dwells;
And there, when nature owns prolific spring,
Spreads o'er her young a fondling mother's wing.
Swains on the coast the far-fam'd fish descry,
That gives the fleecy robe the Tyrian dye;
While shells, a scatter'd ornament bestow,
The tinctur'd rivals of the showery bow.
Yon limeless sands, loose-driving with the wind,
In future cauldrons useful texture find,
Till, on the furnace thrown, the glowing mass
Brightens, and brightening hardens into glass.
When winter halcyons, flickering on the wave,
Tune their complaints, yon sea forgets to rave;
Though lash'd by storms, which naval pride o'er-
turn,

The foaming deep in sparkles seems to burn,
Loud winds turn zephyrs to enlarge their notes,
And each safe nest on a calm surface floats.
Now veers the wind full east; and keen, and
fore,
Its cutting influence aches in every pore!
How weak thy fabric, man!—A puff, thus blown,
Staggers thy strength, and echoes to thy groan.
A tooth's minutest nerve let anguish seize,
Swift kindred fibres catch! (so frail our case!)

Pinch'd, pierc'd, and torn, inflam'd, and unafswag'd, [rag'd!
They smart, and swell, and throb, and shoot en-
From nerve to nerve fierce flies th' exulting pain!
—And are we of this mighty fabric vain? [glides!
Now my blood chills! scarce through my veins it
Sure on each blast a shivering ague rides!
Warn'd let me this bleak eminence forsake,
And to the vale a different winding take!

Half I descend: my spirits fast decay;
A terrace now relieves my weary way.
Close with this stage a precipice combines;
Whence still the spacious country far declines!
The herds seem insects in the distant glades,
And men diminish'd, as, at noon, their shades!
Thick on this top, o'ergrown for walks, are seen
Gray leafless wood, and winter-greens between!
The reddening berry, deep-ting'd holly shows,
And matted mistletoe, the white, bestows!
Though lost the banquet of autumnal fruits,
Though on broad oaks no vernal umbrage shoots!
These boughs, the silenc'd shivering songsters seek!
These foodful berries fill the hungry beak.

Beneath appears a place, all outward bare,
Inward the dreary mansion of despair!
The water of the mountain-road, half stray'd,
Breaks o'er it wild, and falls a brown cascade.
Has nature this rough, naked piece design'd,
To hold inhabitants of mortal kind?
She has. Approach'd, appears a deep descent,
Which opens in a rock a large extent!
And hark!—its hollow entrance reach'd, I hear
A trampling sound of footsteps hastening near!
A death-like chillness thwarts my panting breast:
Soft! the wish'd object stands at length confess'd!
Of youth his form!—But why with anguish bent?
Why pin'd with fallow marks of discontent?
Yet patience, labouring to beguile his care,
Seems to raise hope, and smiles away despair.
Compassion, in his eye, surveys my grief,
And in his voice invites me to relief.
Preventive of thy call, behold my haste,
(He says) nor let warm thanks thy spirits waste!
All fear forget—Each portal I possess,
Duty wide-opens to receive distress.
Oblig'd, I follow, by his guidance led;
The vaulted roof re-echoing to our tread!
And now, in squar'd divisions, I survey
Chambers sequester'd from the glare of day;
Yet needful lights are taught to intervene,
Through rifts; each forming a perspective scene.

In front a parlour meets my entering view;
Oppos'd, a room to sweet refection due.
Here my chill'd veins are warm'd by chippy fires,
Through the bor'd rock above, the smoke expires;
Neat, o'er a homely board, a napkin's spread,
Crown'd with a heapy canister of bread.
A maple cup is next dispatch'd to bring
The comfort of the salutary spring:
Nor mourn we absent blessings of the vine,
Here laughs a frugal bowl of rosy wine;
And savoury cates, upon clear embers cast,
Lie hissing, till snatch'd off; a rich repast!
Soon leap my spirits with enliven'd power,
And in gay converse glides the feastful hour.

The hermit, thus: Thou wonder'st at thy fare:
 On me, yon city, kind, bestows her care:
 Meat for keen famine, and the generous juice,
 That warms chill'd life, her charities produce:
 Accept without reward; unask'd 'twas mine;
 Here what thy health requires, as free be thine.
 Hence learn that God, (who, in the time of need,
 In frozen deserts can the raven feed)
 Well-sought, will delegate some pitying breast,
 His second means, to succour man distress'd.
 He paus'd Deep thought upon his aspect gloom'd;
 Then he, with smile humane, his voice resum'd.
 I'm just inform'd, (and laugh me not to scorn)
 By one unseen by thee, thou'rt English-born.
 Of England I—to me the British state
 Rises, in dear memorial, ever great!
 Here stand we conscious:—Diffidence suspend!
 Free flew our words!—Did ne'er thy muse extend
 To grotts, where contemplation smiles serene,
 Where angels visit, and where joys convene?
 To groves, where more than mortal voices rise,
 Catch the rapt soul, and waft it to the skies?
 This cave!—Yon walks!—But, ere I more unfold,
 What artful scenes thy eyes shall here behold,
 Think subjects of my toil: nor wondering gaze!
 What cannot industry completely raise?
 Be the whole earth in one great landscape found,
 By industry is all with beauty crown'd.
 He, he alone, explores the mine for gain,
 Hews the hard rock, or harrows up the plain;
 He forms the sword to smite; he sheaths the steel,
 Draws health from herbs, and shows the balm to heal;
 Or with loom'd wool the native robe supplies;
 Or bids young plants in future forests rise;
 Or fells the monarch oak, which, borne away,
 Shall, with new grace, the distant ocean sway;
 Hence golden commerce views her wealth increase,
 The blissful child of liberty and peace.
 He scoops the stubborn Alps, and, still employ'd,
 Fills, with soft fertile mould, the sterile void;
 Slop'd up white rocks, small, yellow harvests
 grow,
 And, green on terrac'd stages, vineyards blow!
 By him fall mountains to a level space,
 An isthmus sinks, and sunder'd seas embrace!
 He founds a city on the naked shore,
 And desolation starves the tract no more.
 From the wild waves he won the Belgic land;
 Where wide they foam'd, her towns and traffics
 stand;
 He clear'd, manur'd, enlarg'd the furtive ground,
 And firms the conquest with his fenceful mound.
 Ev'n mid the watery world his Venice rose,
 Each fabric there, as pleasure's seat he shows!
 There marts, sports, councils, are for action sought,
 Landscapes for health, and solitude for thought.
 What wonder then I, by his potent aid,
 A mansion in a barren mountain made?
 Part thou hast view'd!—If further we explore,
 Let industry deserve applause the more.

No frowning care yon blest apartment sees,
 There sleep retires, and finds a couch of ease.

Kind dreams, that fly remorse, and pamper'd wealth,

There shed the smiles of innocence and health.

Mark!—Here descends a grot, delightful seat!
 Which warms ev'n winter, tempers summer heat;
 See!—Gurgling from a top, a spring distills!
 In mournful measures wind the dripping rills;
 Soft coos of distant doves, receiv'd around,
 In soothing mixture, swell the watery sound;
 And hence the streamlets seek the terrace' shade,
 Within, without, alike to all convey'd.
 Pass on—New scenes, by my creative power,
 Invite reflection's sweet and solemn hour.

We enter'd, where, in well-rang'd order, stood
 Th' instructive volumes of the wise and good.
 These friends (said he) though I desert mankind,
 Good angels never would permit behind.
 Each genius, youth conceals, or time displays,
 I know; each work some seraph here conveys,
 Retirement thus presents my searchful thought,
 What heaven inspir'd, and what the muse has taught;

What young satiric and sublime has writ,
 Whose life is virtue, and whose muse is wit.
 Rap'd I foresee thy Mallet's* early aim
 Shine in full worth, and shoot at length to fame.
 Sweet fancy's bloom in Fenton's lay appears,
 And the ripe judgment of instructive years.
 In Hill is all that generous souls revere,
 To virtue and the muse for ever dear:
 And Thomson, in this praise, thy merit see,
 The tongue that praises merit, praises thee.

These scorn (said I) the verse-wright of their age,

Vain of a labour'd, languid, useless page;
 To whose dim faculty the meaning song
 Is glaring, or obscure, when clear, and strong;
 Who, in cant phrases, gives a work disgrace;
 His wit, and oddness of his tone and face;
 Let the weak malice, nurs'd to an essay,
 In some low libel a mean heart display;
 Those, who once prais'd, now undeciv'd, despise,
 It lives condemn'd a day, then harmless dies.
 Or should some nobler bard, their worth, unpraise,
 Deserting morals, that adorn his lays,
 Alas! too oft each science shows the same,
 The great grow jealous of a greater name:
 Ye bards, the frailty mourn, yet brave the shock;
 Has not a Stillingfleet oppos'd a Locke?
 Oh, still proceed, with sacred rapture fir'd!
 Unenvy'd had he liv'd, if unadmir'd.

Let envy, he replied, all ireful rise,
 Envy pursues alone the brave and wise;
 Maro and Socrates inspire her pain,
 And Pope, the monarch of the tuneful train!
 To whom be nature's, and Britannia's praise!
 All their bright honours rush into his lays!
 And all that glorious warmth his lays reveal,
 Which only poets, kings, and patriots feel!
 Though gay as mirth, as curious thought sedate,
 As elegance polite, as power elate;
 Profound as reason, and as justice clear;
 Soft, as compassion, yet as truth severe;

* He had then just written the Excursion.

As bounty copious, as persuasion sweet,
Like nature various, and like art complete;
So fine her morals, so sublime her views,
His life is almost equall'd by his muse.

O Pope!—Since envy is decreed by fate,
Since she pursues alone the wise and great;
In one small, emblematic landscape see,
How vast a distance 'twixt thy foe and thee!
Truth from an eminence surveys our scene
(A hill, where all is clear, and all serene).
Rude earth-bred storms o'er meaner valleys blow,
And wandering mists roll, blackening far below;
Dark, and debas'd, like them, is envy's aim,
And clear, and eminent, like truth, thy fame.

Thus I. From what dire cause can envy spring?
Or why embosom we a viper's sting?
'Tis envy stings our darling passion, pride.
Alas! (the man of mighty soul replied)
Why choose we miseries? Most derive their birth
From one bad source—we dread superior worth;
Prefer'd, it seems a satire on our own;
Then heedless to excel we meanly moan:
Then we abstract our views, and envy show,
Whence springs the misery, pride is doom'd to know.

Thus folly pain creates: By wisdom's power,
We shun the weight of many a restless hour—
Lo! I meet wrong; perhaps the wrong I feel
Tends, by the scheme of things, to public weal.
I, of the whole, am part—the joy men see,
Must circulate, and so revolve to me.
Why should I then of private loss complain?
Of loss, that proves, per chance, a brother's gain?
'The wind, that binds one bark within the bay,
May waft a richer freight its wish'd-for way.
If rains redundant flood the abject ground,
Mountains are but supplied, when vales are
drown'd;
If, with soft moisture swell'd, the vale looks gay,
The verdure of the mountain fades away.
Shall clouds, but at my welfare's call descend?
Shall gravity for me her laws suspend?
For me shall suns their noon-tide course forbear?
Or motion not subsist to influence air?
Let the means vary, be they frost, or flame,
'Thy end, O nature! still remains the same!
Be this the motive of a wise man's care,—
To shun deserving ills, and learn to bear.

CANTO II.

WHILE thus a mind humane, and wise, he shows,
All eloquent of truth his language flows. [pears;
Youth, though depress'd, through all his form ap-
Through all his sentiments the depth of years.
Thus he—Yet farther industry behold,
Which conscious waits new wonders to unfold,
Enter my chapel next—Lo! here begin
The hallow'd rites, that check the growth of sin.
When first we met, how soon you seem'd to know
My bosom, labouring with the throbs of woe!
Such racking throbs!—Soft! when I rouse those cares,
On my chill'd mind pale recollection glares!
VOL. VIII.

When moping frenzy strove my thoughts to sway,
Here prudent labours chas'd her power away.
Full, and rough-rising from yon sculptur'd wall,
Bold prophets nations to repentance call!
Meek martyrs smile in flames! gor'd champions
groan!

And muse-like cherubs tune their harps in stone!
Next shadow'd light a rounding force bestows,
Swells into life, and speaking action grows!
Here pleasing, melancholy subjects find,
To calm, amuse, exalt the pensive mind!
This figure tender grief, like mine, implies,
And semblant thoughts, that earthly pomp despise.
Such penitential Magdalene reveals;
Loose-veil'd, in negligence of charms she kneels.
Though dress, near-stor'd, its vanity supplies,
The vanity of dress unheeded lies.
The sinful world in sorrowing eye she keeps,
As o'er Jerusalem Messiah weeps.
One hand her bosom smites; in one appears
The lifted lawn, that drinks her falling tears.

Since evil outweighs good, and sways mankind,
True fortitude assumes the patient mind:
Such prov'd Messiah's, though to suffering born,
To penury, repulse, reproach, and scorn.
Here, by the pencil, mark his flight design'd;
The weary'd virgin by a stream reclin'd,
Who feeds the child. Her looks a charm express,
A modest charm, that dignifies distress.
Boughs o'er their heads with blushing fruits depend,
Which angels to her busied consort bend.
Hence by the smiling infant seems discern'd,
Trifles, concerning Him, all heaven concern'd.

Here the transfigur'd Son from earth retires:
See! the white form in a bright cloud aspires!
Full on his followers bursts a flood of rays,
Prostrate they fall beneath th' o'erwhelming blaze!
Like noon-tide summer-suns the rays appear,
Unfufferable, magnificent, and near!

What scene of agony the garden brings;
The cup of gall; the suppliant King of kings!
The crown of thorns; the cross, that felt him die;
These, languid in the sketch, unfinish'd lie.

There, from the dead, centurions see him rise,
See! but struck down with horrible surprise!
As the first glory seem'd a sun at noon,
This casts the silver splendour of the moon.

Here peopled day, th' ascending God surveys!
The glory varies, as the myriads gaze!
Now soften'd, like a sun at distance seen,
When through a cloud bright-glancing, yet serene!
Now fast encreasing to the crowd amaz'd,
Like some vast meteor high in æther rais'd!

My labour, yon high vaulted altar stains
With dyes, that emulate ætherial plains.
The convex glass, which in that opening glows,
Mid circling rays a pictur'd Saviour shows!
Bright it collects the beams, which, trembling all,
Back from the God, a showery radiance fall.
Lightening the scene beneath! a scene divine!
Where saints, clouds, seraphs, intermingled shine!

Here water-falls, that play melodious round,
Like a sweet organ, swell a lofty sound!
The solemn notes bid earthly passions fly,
Lull all my cares, and lift my soul on high!

This monumental marble—this I rear
To one—Oh! ever mourn'd!—Oh! ever dear!
He stopt—pathetic sighs the pause supply,
And the prompt tear starts, quivering, on his eye!

I look'd—two columns near the wall were seen,
An imag'd beauty stretch'd at length between.
Near the wept fair, her harp Cecilia strung;
Leaning, from high, a listening angel hung!
Friendship, whose figure at the feet remains,
A phoenix, with irradiate crest, sustains:
This grac'd one palm, while one extends t' impart
Two foreign hands, that clasp a burning heart.
A pendent veil two hovering seraphs raise,
Which opening heaven upon the roof displays!
And two, benevolent, less distant, hold
A vase, collective of perfumes uproll'd!
These from the heart, by friendship held, arise,
Odorous as incense gathering in the skies.
In the fond pelican is love express'd,
Who opens to her young her tender breast.
Two mated turtles hovering hang in air,
One by a falcon struck!—in wild despair,
The hermit cries—So death, alas! destroys
The tender consort of my cares and joys!
Again soft tears upon his eye-lid hung,
Again check'd sounds dy'd, fluttering, on his tongue.

Too well his pining inmost thought I know!
Too well ev'n silence tells the story'd woe!
To his my sighs, to his my tears reply!
I stray o'er all the tomb a watery eye!

Next, on the wall, her scenes of life I gaz'd,
The form back-leaning, by a globe half-rais'd!
Cherubs a proffer'd crown of glory show,
Ey'd wistful by th' admiring fair below.
In action eloquent dispos'd her hands,
One shows her breast, in rapture one expands!
This the fond hermit seiz'd!—o'er all his soul,
The soft, wild, wailing, amorous passion stole!
In stedfast gaze his eyes her aspect keep,
Then turn away, a while dejected weep;
Then he reverts them; but reverts in vain,
Dimm'd with the swelling grief that streams again.
Where now is my philosophy? (he cries)
My joy, hope, reason, my Olympia dies!
Why did I e'er that prime of blessings know?
Was it, ye cruel fates, t' embitter woe?
Why would your bolts not level first my head?
Why must I live to weep Olympia dead?
—Sir, I had once a wife! Fair bloom'd her youth,
Her form was beauty, and her soul was truth!
Oh, she was dear! How dear, what words can say?
She dies!—my heaven at once is snatch'd away!
Ah! what avails, that, by a father's care,
I rose a wealthy and illustrious heir?
That early in my youth I learn'd to prove
Th' instructive, pleasing, academic grove?
That in the senate eloquence was mine?
That valour gave me in the field to shine? [all
That love shower'd blessings too—far more than
High rapt ambition e'er could happy call?
Ah!—What are these, which ev'n the wise adore?
Lost is my pride!—Olympia is no more!
Had I, ye persecuting powers! been born
The world's cold pity, or, at best, its scorn;

Of wealth, of rank, of kindred warmth bereft;
To want, to shame, to ruthless censure left!
Patience, or pride, to this, relief supplies!
But a lost wife!—there! there distraction lies!

Now three sad years I yield me all to grief,
And fly the hated comfort of relief!
Though rich, great, young, I leave a pompous seat,
(My brother's now) to seek some dark retreat:
Mid cloister'd solitary tombs I stray,
Despair and horror lead the cheerless way!
My sorrow grows to such a wild excess,
Life, injur'd life, must with the passion less!
Olympia!—my Olympia's lost! (I cry)
Olympia's lost, the hollow vaults reply!
Louder I make my lamentable moan;
The swelling echoes learn like me to groan;
The ghosts to scream, as through lone aisles they sweep;

The shrines to shudder, and the faints to weep!
Now grief and rage, by gathering sighs suppress'd,
Swell my full heart, and heave my labouring breast!
With struggling starts, each vital string they strain,
And strike the tottering fabric of my brain!
O'er my sunk spirits frowns a vapoury scene,
Woe's dark retreat! the madding maze of spleen!
A deep damp gloom o'erspreads the murky cell;
Here pining thoughts and secret terrors dwell!
Here learn the great unreal wants to feign!
Unpleasing truths here mortify the vain!
Here learning, blinded first, and then beguil'd,
Looks dark as ignorance, as frenzy wild!
Here first credulity on reason won!
And here false zeal mysterious rants begun!
Here love impearls each moment with a tear,
And superstition owes to spleen her fear!

Fantastic lightnings, through the dreary way,
In swift short signals flash the bursting day!
Above, beneath, across, around, they fly!
A dire deception strikes the mental eye!
By the blue fires, pale phantoms grin severe!
Shrill, fancy'd echoes wound th' affrighted ear!
Air-banish'd spirits flag in fogs profound,
And, all obscene, shed baneful damps around!
Now whispers, trembling in some feeble wind,
Sigh out prophetic fears, and freeze the mind!

Loud laughs the hag!—She mocks complaint
away,
Unroofs the den, and lets in more than day.
Swarms of wild fancies, wing'd in various flight,
Seek emblematic shades, and mystic light!
Some drive with rapid steeds the shining car!
These nod from thrones! Those thunder in the war!

Till, tir'd, they turn from the delusive show,
Start from wild joy, and fix in stupid woe.

Here the lone hour a blank of life displays,
Till now bad thoughts a fiend more active raise;
A fiend in evil moments ever nigh!
Death in her hand, and frenzy in her eye!
Her eye all red, and sunk!—A robe she wore,
With life's calamities embroider'd o'er.
A mirror in one hand collective shows,
Vary'd and multiply'd, that group of woes.
This endless foe to generous toil and pain
Lolls on a couch for ease; but lolls in vain;

She mufes o'er her woe embroider'd veft,
And felf-aborrence heightens in her breaft.
To fhun her care, the force of fleep ſhe tries,
Still wakes her mind, though flumbers doze her
eyes:

She dreams, ſtarts, riſes, ſtalks from place to place,
With reſtleſs, thoughtful, interrupted pace;
Now eyes the ſun, and curſes every ray,
Now the green ground, where colour fades away.
Dim ſpectres dance. Again her eye ſhe rears;
Then from the blood-ſhot ball wipes purpled tears;
Then preſſes hard her brow, with miſchief fraught,
Her brow half burſts with agony of thought!
From me (ſhe cries) pale wretch, thy comfort
claim,

Born of deſpair, and ſuicide my name!
Why ſhould thy life a moment's pain endure!
Here every object proffers grief a cure.
She points where leaves of hemlock blackening ſhoot!

Fear not! pluck! eat (ſaid ſhe) the ſovereign root!
Then death, revers'd, ſhall bear his ebon lance!
Soft o'er thy ſight ſhall ſwim the ſhadowy trance!
Or leap yon rock, poſſeſs a watery grave,
And leave wild ſorrow to the wind and wave!
Or mark—this poniard thus from miſery frees!
She wounds her breaſt!—the guilty ſteel I ſeize!
Straight, where ſhe ſtruck, a ſmoking ſpring of gore [floor,

Wells from the wound, and floats the crimſon'd
She faints! ſhe fades!—Calm thoughts the deed revolve,

And now, unſtartling, fix the dire reſolve;
Death drops his terrors, and, with charming wiles,
Winning, and kind, like my Olympia ſmiles!
He points the paſſage to the ſeats divine,
Where poets, heroes, fainter lovers ſhine!
I come, Olympia!—my rear'd arm extends;
Half to my breaſt the threatening point deſcends;
Straight thunder rocks the land! new lightnings
play!

When, lo! a voice reſounds—Arife! away!
Away! nor murmur at th' afflictive rod!
Nor tempt the vengeance of an angry God!
Fly'ſt thou from providence for vain relief?
Such ill-fought eaſe ſhall draw avenging grief.
Honour, the more obſtructed, ſtronger ſhines,
And zeal by perſecution's rage refines.
By woe, the ſoul to daring action ſwells;
By woe, in painleſs patience it excels;
From patient, prudent dear experience ſprings,
And traces knowledge through the courſe of things!
Thence hope is form'd, thence fortitude, ſucceſs,
Renown:—whate'er men covet and careſs.

The vaniſh'd fiend thus ſent a hollow voice,
Would'ſt thou be happy? ſtraight be death thy choice.

How mean are thoſe, who paſſively complain;
While active ſouls, more free, their ſetters ſtrain!
Though knowledge thine, hope, fortitude, ſucceſs,
Renown:—whate'er men covet and careſs;
On earth ſucceſs muſt in its turn give way,
And ev'n perfection introduce decay.
Never the world of ſpirits thus— their reſt
Untouch'd! entire!—once happy, ever bleſt!

Earneſt the heavenly voice responsive cries,
Oh, liſten not to ſubtilty unwiſe!
Thy guardian faint, who mourns thy hapleſs fate,
Heaven grants to prop thy virtue, ere too late.
Know, if thou wilt thy dear lov'd wife deplore,
Olympia waits thee on a foreign ſhore;
There in a cell thy laſt remains be ſpent;
Away! deceive deſpair, and find content!

I heard, obey'd; nor more of fate complain'd;
Long ſeas I meaſur'd, and this mountain gain'd
Soon to a yawning rift, chance turn'd my way;
A den it prov'd, where a huge ſerpent lay!
Flame-ey'd he lay!—he rages now for food,
Meets my firſt glance, and meditates my blood!
His bulk, in many a gather'd orb uproll'd,
Rears ſpire on ſpire! His ſcales, be-dropt with gold,

Shine burniſh'd in the ſun! ſuch height they gain,
They dart green luſtre on the diſtant main!
Now writh'd in dreadful ſlope, he ſtoops his creſt,
Furious to fix on my unſhielded breaſt!
Juſt as he ſprings, my ſabre ſmites the foe!
Headleſs he falls beneath th' unerring blow!
Wrath yet remains, though ſtrength his fabric
leaves,

And the meant hiſs the gasping mouth deceives;
The lengthening trunk ſlow-looſens every fold,
Lingers in life: then ſtretches ſtill, and cold.
Juſt as th' inveterate ſon of miſchief ends,
Comes a white dove, and near the ſpot deſcends:
I hail this omen! all bad paſſions ceaſe,
Like the ſlain ſnake, and all within is peace.

Next, to religion this plain roof I raiſe!
In duteous rites my hallow'd tapers blaze;
I bid due incenſe on my altars ſmoke!
Then, at this tomb, my promis'd love invoke!
She hears! ſhe comes!—My heart what raptures warm?

All my Olympia ſparkles in the form!
No pale, wan, livid mark of death ſhe bears!
Each roſeate look a quickening tranſport wears!
A robe of light, high-wrought, her ſhape inveſts;
Unzon'd the ſwelling beauty of her breaſts!
Her auburn hair each flowing ring reſumes,
In her fair hand, love's branch of myrtle blooms!
Silent, awhile, each well-known charm I trace;
Then, thus, (while nearer ſhe avoids th' embrace)
Thou dear deceit!—muſt I a ſhade purſue?
Dazzled I gaze!—thou ſwim'ſt before my view!
Dip'd in etherial dews, her bough divine
Sprinkles my eyes, which, ſtrengthen'd, bear the ſhine:

Still thus I urge (for ſtill the ſhadowy bliſs
Shuns the warm graſp, nor yields the tender kiſs)
Oh, fly not!—fade not! liſten to love's call!
She lives! no more I'm man! I'm ſpirit all!
Then let me ſnatch thee!—preſs thee!—take me
whole!

Oh, cloſe!—yet cloſer!—cloſer to my ſoul!
Twice, round her waſt, my eager arms entwin'd,
And, twice deceiv'd, my frenzy clasp'd the wind!
Then thus I rav'd—Behold thy huſband kneel,
And judge! O judge what agonies I feel!
Oh! be no longer, if unkind, thus fair;
Take horror's ſhape, and fright me to deſpair!

Rather than thus, unpitying, see my moan,
 Far rather frown, and fix me here in stone!
 But mock not thus!—Alas (the charmer said,
 Smiling, and in her smile soft radiance play'd)
 Alas! no more eluded strength employ,
 To clasp a shade!—What more is mortal joy?
 Man's bliss is, like his knowledge, but surmis'd;
 One ignorance, the other pain disguis'd!
 Thou wert (had all thy wish been still possess'd)
 Supremely curs'd from being greatly blest;
 For oh! so fair, so dear was I to thee,
 Thou hadst forgot thy God to worship me;
 This he foresaw, and snatch'd me to the tomb;
 Above I flourish in unfading bloom.
 Think me not lost: for thee I heaven implore!
 Thy guardian angel, though a wife no more!
 I, when abstracted from this world you seem,
 Hint the pure thought, and frame the heavenly dream!

Close at thy side, when morning streaks the air,
 In music's voice I wake thy mind to prayer!
 By me, thy hymns, like purest incense, rise,
 Fragrant with grace, and pleasing to the skies!
 And when that form shall from its clay refine,
 (That only bar betwixt my soul and thine!)
 When thy lov'd spirit mounts to realms of light,
 Then shall Olympia aid thy earliest flight:
 Mingled we'll flame in raptures that aspire
 Beyond all youth, all sense, and all desire.
 She ended. Still such sweetness dwells behind,
 Th' enchanting voice still warbles in my mind:
 But lo! th' unbodied vision fleets away!—
 —Stay, my Olympia!—I conjure thee, stay!
 Yet stay—for thee my memory leans to smart!
 Sure every vein contains a bleeding heart!
 Sooner shall splendor leave the blaze of day,
 Than love, so pure, so vast as mine, decay!
 From the same heavenly source its lustre came,
 And glows, immortal, with congenial flame!
 Ah!—let me not with fires neglected burn;
 Sweet mistress of my soul, return, return!

Alas!—she's fled!—I traverse now the place,
 Where my enamour'd thoughts her footsteps trace.
 Now, o'er the tomb, I bend my drooping head,
 There tears, the eloquence of sorrow, shed.
 Sighs choke my words, unable to express
 The pangs, the throbs of speechless tenderness!
 Not with more ardent, more transparent flame,
 Call dying saints on their Creator's name,
 Than I on her's;—but through yon yielding
 door,
 Glides a new phantom o'er the illumin'd floor!
 The roof swift kindles from the beaming ground,
 And floods of living lustre flame around!
 In all the majesty of light array'd,
 Awful it shines!—'tis Cato's honour'd shade!
 As I the heavenly visitant pursue,
 Sublimed glory opens to my view!
 He speaks!—But, oh! what words shall dare repeat
 His thoughts!—They leave me fir'd with patriot heat!

More than poetic raptures now I feel,
 And own that godlike passion, public zeal!
 But from my frailty, it receives a stain,
 I grow, unlike my great inspirer, vain;

And burn, once more, the busy world to know,
 And would, in scenes of action foremost glow!
 Where proud ambition points her dazzling rays!
 Where coronets and crowns, attractive, blaze!
 When my Olympia leaves the realms above,
 And lures me back to solitary love.
 She tells me truth, prefers an humble state,
 That genuine greatness shuns the being great!
 That mean are those, who false-term'd honour
 prize;

Whose fabrics from their country's ruin rise;
 Who look the traitor, like the patriot, fair;
 Who, to enjoy the vineyard, wrong the heir.

I hear!—through all my veins new transports roll!

I gaze!—warm love comes rushing on my soul:
 Ravish'd I gaze!—again her charms decay!
 Again my manhood to my grief gives way!
 Cato returns!—Zeal takes her course to reign!
 But zeal is in ambition lost again!
 I'm now the slave of fondness!—now of pride!
 —By turns they conquer, and by turns subside!
 These balanc'd each by each, the golden mean,
 Betwixt them found, gives happiness serene;
 This I'll enjoy!—He ended!—I reply'd,
 O hermit! thou art worth severely try'd!
 But had not innate grief produc'd thy woes,
 Men, barbarous men, had prey'd on thy repose.
 When seeking joy, we seldom sorrow miss,
 And often misery points the path to bliss.
 The soil, most worthy of the thrifty swain,
 Is wounded thus, ere trusted with the grain;
 The struggling grain must work obscure its way,
 Ere the first green springs upward to the day;
 Up-sprung, such weed-like coarseness it betrays,
 Flocks on th' abandon'd blade permissive graze;
 Then shoots the wealth, from imperfection clear,
 And thus a grateful harvest crowns the year.

CANTO III.

Thus free our social time from morning flows
 Till rising shades attempt the day to close.
 Thus my new friend: behold the light's decay:
 Back to yon city let me point thy way.
 South-west, behind yon hill, the sloping sun,
 To ocean's verge his fluent course has run:
 His parting eyes a watery radiance shed,
 Glance through the vale, and tip the mountain's
 head:

To which oppos'd the shadowy gulfs, below,
 Beauteous, reflect the party-colour'd snow.

Now dance the stars, where Vesper leads the
 way;

Yet all faint-glimmering with remains of day.
 Orient, the queen of night emits her dawn,
 And throws, unseen, her mantle o'er the lawn.
 Up the blue steep, her crimson orb now shines;
 Now on the mountain-top her arm reclines,
 In a red crescent seen: Her zone now gleams,
 Like Venus, quivering in reflecting streams.
 Yet reddening, yet round-burning up the air,
 From the white cliff, her feet flow-rising glare!

See! flames, condens'd now vary her attire;
 Her face, a broad circumference of fire.
 Dark firs seem kindled in nocturnal blaze;
 Through ranks of pines, her broken lustre plays,
 Here glares, there brown-projecting shade be-
 flows,
 And, glittering, sports upon the spangled snows.

Now silver turn her beams!--yon den they gain;
 The big, rous'd lion shakes his brindled main.
 Fierce, fleet, gaunt monsters, all prepar'd for gore,
 Rend woods, vales, rocks, with wide resounding
 roar.

O dire preface!--But fear not thou, my friend,
 Our steps the guardians of the just attend.
 Homeward I'll wait thee on---and now survey,
 How men and spirits chase the night away!
 Yon nymphs and swains in amorous mirth advance;

To breathing music moves the circling dance.
 Here the bold youth in deeds adventurous glow,
 Skimming in rapid sleds the crackling snow.
 Not when Tydides won the funeral race,
 Shot his light car along in swifter pace.
 Here the glaz'd way with iron feet they dare,
 And glide, well-pois'd, like Mercuries in air.
 There crowds, with stable tread, and level'd eye,
 Lift, and dismiss the quoits, that whirling fly.
 With force superior, not with skill so true,
 The ponderous disk from Roman sinews flew.
 Where neighbouring hills some cloudy sheet sustain,

Freez'd o'er the nether vale a penile plain,
 Cross the roof'd hollow rolls the massy round,
 The crack'd ice rattles, and the rocks resound!
 Censures, disputes, and laughs, alternate, rise;
 And deafening clangor thunders up the skies.

Thus, amid crowded images, serene,
 From hour to hour we pass'd, from scene to scene:
 Fast wore the night. Full long we pac'd our way:
 Vain steps! the city yet far distant lay.
 While thus the hermit, ere my wonder spoke,
 Methought, with new amusement, silence broke:
 Yon amber-hued cascade, which fleecy flies
 Through rocks, and strays along the trackless
 skies,

To frolic fairies marks the mazy ring;
 Forth to the dance from little cells they spring,
 Measur'd to pipe or harp!--and next they stand,
 Marshal'd beneath the moon, a radiant band!
 In frost-work now delight the sportive kind:
 Now court wild fancy in the whistling wind.

Hark! the funeral bell's deep-sounding toll,
 To bliss, from misery, calls some righteous soul!
 Just freed from life, life swift-ascending fire,
 Glorious it mounts, and gleams from yonder spire!
 Light clasps its wings!--it views, with pitying
 sight,

The friendly mourner pay the pious rite;
 The plume high wrought, that blackening nods
 in air;

The slow-pac'd weeping pomp; the solemn prayer;
 The decent tomb; the verse, that sorrow gives,
 Where, to remembrance sweet, fair virtue lives.

Now to mid-heaven the whiten'd moon inclines,
 And shades contract, mark'd out in clearer lines;

With noiseless gloom the plains are delug'd o'er:
 See!--from the north, what streaming meteors pour!

Beneath Bootes springs the radiant train,
 And quiver through the axle of his wain.
 O'er altars thus, impainted, we behold
 Half-circling glories shoot in rays of gold.
 Cross æther swift elance the vivid fires!
 As swift again each pointed flame retires!
 In Fancy's eye encountering armies glare,
 And sanguine ensigns wave unfurl'd in air!
 Hence the weak vulgar deem impending fate,
 A monarch ruin'd, or unpeopled state.
 Thus comets, dreadful visitants! arise
 To them wild omens! science to the wise!
 These mark the comet to the sun incline,
 While deep-red flames around its centre shine!
 While its fierce rear a winding trail displays,
 And lights all æther with the sweepy blaze!
 Or when, compell'd, it flies the torrid zone,
 And shoots by worlds unnumber'd and unknown;
 By worlds, whose people, all aghast with fear,
 May view that minister of vengeance near!
 Till now, the transient glow, remote and lost,
 Decays, and darkens 'mid involving frost!
 Or when it, sunward, drinks rich beams again,
 And burns imperious on th' ætherial plain!
 The learn'd-one, curious, eyes it from afar,
 Sparkling through night, a new illustrious star!

The moon, descending, saw us now pursue
 The various talk:---the city near in view!
 Here from still-life (he cries) avert thy sight,
 And mark what deeds adorn, or shame the night!
 But, heedful, each immodest prospect fly;
 Where decency forbids inquiry's eye.
 Man, were not man, without love's wanton fire,
 But reason's glory is to quell desire.
 What are thy fruits, O lust? Short blessings bought
 With long remorse, the seed of bitter thought;
 Perhaps some babe to dire diseases born, [mourn;
 Doom'd for another's crimes, through life, to
 Or murder'd, to preserve a mother's fame;
 Or cast obscure; the child of want and shame!
 False pride! What vices on our conduct steal,
 From the world's eye one frailty to conceal!
 Ye cruel mothers!--Soft! those words command;
 So near shall cruelty, and mother stand?
 Can the dove's bosom snakey venom draw?
 Can its foot sharpen, like the vulture's claw?
 Can the fond goat, or tender, fleecy dam
 Howl like the wolf, to tear the kid or lamb?
 Yes, there are mothers---There I fear'd his aim,
 And, conscious, trembled at the coming name;
 Then, with a sigh, his issuing words oppos'd!
 Straight with a falling tear the speech he clos'd!
 That tenderness, which ties of blood deny,
 Nature repaid me from a stranger's eye.

Pale grew my cheeks!--But now to general views
 Our converse turns, which thus my friend renews.

Yon mansion, made by beaming tapers gay,
 Drowns the dim night, and counterfeits the day,
 From lumin'd windows glancing on the eye,
 Around, athwart, the frisking shadows fly.
 There midnight riot spreads illusive joys,
 And fortune, health, and dearer time destroys.

Soon death's dark agent to luxuriant ease,
Shall wake sharp warnings in some fierce disease.
O man! thy fabric's like a well-form'd state;
Thy thoughts, first rank'd, were sure design'd the
great;

Passions plebians are, which faction raise;
Wine, like pour'd oil, excites the raging blaze:
Then giddy anarchy's rude triumphs rise:
Then sovereign reason from her empire flies:
That ruler once depos'd, wisdom and wit,
To noise and folly, place and power submit;
Like a frail bark thy weaken'd mind is tost,
Unsteer'd, unbalanc'd, till its wealth is lost.

The miser-spirit eyes the spendthrift heir,
And mourns, too late, effects of sordid care.
His treasures fly to cloy each fawning slave;
Yet grudge a stone to dignify his grave.
For this, low-thoughted craft his life employ'd;
For this, though wealthy, he no wealth enjoy'd;
For this, he grip'd the poor, and alms deny'd,
Unfriended liv'd and unlamented died.
Yet smile, griev'd shade! when that unprosperous store

Fast-lessens, when gay hours return no more;
Smile at thy heir, beholding, in his fall,
Men once oblig'd, like him, ungrateful all!
Then thought-inspiring woe his heart shall mend,
And prove his only wise, unflattering friend.

Folly exhibits thus unmanly sport,
While plotting mischief keeps reserv'd her court.
Lo! from that mount, in blasting sulphur broke,
Stream flames voluminous, enwapp'd with smoke!
In chariot-shape they whirl up yonder tower,
Lean on its brow, and like destruction lower!
From the black depth, a fiery legion springs;
Each bold, bad spectre claps her sounding wings:
And straight beneath a summon'd, traiterous band,
On horror bent, in dark convention stand:
From each fiend's mouth a ruddy vapour flows,
Glides through the roof, and o'er the council glows:
The villains, close beneath th' infection pent,
Feel, all possess'd, their rising galls ferment;
And burn with faction, hate, and vengeful ire,
For rapine, blood, and devastation dire!
But justice marks their ways: she waves in air,
The sword, high-threatening, like a comet's glare.

While here dark villany herself deceives,
There studious honesty our view relieves.
A feeble taper, from yon lonesome room,
Scattering thin rays, just glimmers through the gloom.

There sits the sapient bard in useful mood,
And glows impassion'd for his country's good!
All the bright spirits of the just combin'd,
Inform, refine, and prompt his towering mind!
He takes the gifted quill from hands divine,
Around his temples rays refulgent shine!
Now rapt! now more than man!—I see him climb,
To view this speck of earth from worlds sublime!
I see him now o'er nature's works preside!
How clear the vision! and the scene how wide!
Let some a name by adulation raise,
Or scandal, meaner than a venal praise!
My muse (he cries) a nobler prospect view!
Through fancy's wilds some moral's point pursue!

From dark deception clear drawn truth display,
As from black chaos rose resplendent day!
Awake compassion, and bid terror rise!
Bid humble sorrows strike superior eyes!
So pamper'd power, unconscious of distress,
May see, be mov'd, and, being mov'd, redress.
Ye traitors, tyrants, fear his stinging lay!
Ye powers unlov'd, unpity'd in decay!
But know, to you sweet-blossom'd fame he brings,
Ye heroes, patriots, and paternal kings!
O Thou, who form'd, who rais'd the poet's art.

(Voice of thy will!) unerring force impart!
If wailing worth can generous warmth excite!
If verse can gild instruction with delight,
Inspire his honest muse with orient flame,
To rise, to dare, to reach the noblest aim!

But, O my friend! mysterious is our fate!
How mean his fortune, though his mind elate!
Æneas-like he passes through the crowd.
Unfought, unseen beneath misfortune's cloud;
Or seen with slight regard: Unprais'd his name;
His after-honour, and our after-shame.
The doom'd desert, to avarice stands confess'd;
Her eyes averted are, and steel'd her breast.
Envy asquint the future wonder eyes:
Bold insult, pointing, hoots him as he flies;
While coward censure, skill'd in darker ways,
Hints sure detraction in dissembled praise!
Hunger, thirst, nakedness, there grievous fall!
Unjust derision too!—that tongue of gall!
Slow comes relief, with no mild charms endued,
Usher'd by pride, and by reproach pursued.
Forc'd pity meets him with a cold respect,
Unkind as scorn, ungenerous as neglect.

Yet, suffering worth! thy fortitude will shine:
Thy foes are virtue's, and her friends are thine!
Patience is thine, and peace thy days shall crown;
Thy treasure prudence, and thy claim renown:
Myriads, unborn, shall mourn thy hapless fate,
And myriads grow, by thy example, great!

Hark! from the watch-tower rolls the trumpet's sound,
Sweet through still night, proclaiming safety round!
Yon shade illustrious quits the realms of rest,
To aid some orphan of its race distressed,
Safe winds him through the subterraneous way,
That mines yon mansion, grown with ruin gray,
And marks the wealthy, unsuspected ground,
Where, green with rust, long-buried coins, abound.

This plaintive ghost, from earth when newly fled,
Saw those, the living trusted, wrong the dead;
He saw, by fraud abus'd, the lifeless hand
Sign the false deed that alienates his land;
Heard, on his fame, injurious censure thrown,
And mourn'd the beggar'd orphan's bitter groan.
Commission'd now the falsehood he reveals,
To justice soon th' enabled heir appeals;
Soon, by his wealth, are costly pleas maintain'd,
And, by discover'd truth, lost right regain'd.

But why (some may inquire) why kind success,
Since mystic heaven gives misery oft to bless?
Though misery leads to happiness and truth,
Unequal to the load, this languid youth,

Unstrengthen'd virtue scarce his bosom fir'd,
And fearful from his growing wants retir'd.
Oh, let not censure, if (untry'd by grief,
If, amidst woe, untempted by relief,)
He stoop'd reluctant to low arts of shame,
Which then, ev'n then he scorn'd, and blush'd to
name.

Heaven sees, and makes th' imperfect worth its care,
And cheers the trembling heart, unform'd to bear,
Now rising fortune elevates his mind,
He shines unclouded, and adorns mankind.

So in some engine, that denies a vent,
If unrespiring is some creature pent,
It sickens, droops, and pants, and gasps for breath,
Sad o'er the sight swim shadowy mists of death;
If then kind air pours powerful in again,
New heats, new pulses quicken every vein;
From the clear'd, lifted, life-rekindled eye,
Dispers'd, the dark and dampy vapours fly. [rise,

From trembling tombs the ghosts of greatness
And o'er their bodies hang with wistful eyes;
Or discontented stalk, and mix their howls
With howling wolves, their screams with screaming owls.

The interval 'twixt night and morn is nigh,
Winter more nitrous chills the shadow'd sky.
Springs with soft heats no more give borders green,
Nor smoking breathe along the whiten'd scene;
While steamy currents, sweet in prospect, charm
Like veins blue-winding in a fair one's arm.

Now sleep to fancy parts with half his power
And broken slumbers drag the restless hour.
The murder'd seems alive, and ghastly glares,
And in dire dreams the conscious murderer scares,
Shows the yet-spouting wound, th' ensanguin'd
floor,

The walls yet-smoking with the spatter'd gore;
Or shrieks to dozing justice, and reveals
The deed, which fraudulent art from day conceals;
The delve obscene, where no suspicion pries,
Where the disfigur'd corse unshrouded lies;
The sure, the striking proof, so strong maintain'd,
Pale guilt starts self-convicted, when arraign'd.

These spirits treason of its power divest,
And turn the peril from the patriot's breast.
Those solemn thought inspire, or bright descend
To snatch in vision sweet the dying friend.

But we deceive the gloom, the matin bell
Summons to prayer!—Now breaks th' enchanter's spell!

And now—But yon fair spirit's form survey!
'Tis she!—Olympia beckons me away!
I haste!—I fly!—adieu!—and when you see
The youth who bleeds with fondness, think on me:
Tell him my tale, and be his pain carest;
By love I tortur'd was, by love I'm blest.
When worshipp'd woman we entranc'd behold,
We praise the Maker in his fairest mould;
The pride of nature, harmony combin'd,
And light immortal to the soul refin'd!
Depriv'd of charming women, soon we miss
The prize of friendship, and the life of bliss!

Still through the shades Olympia dawning breaks!
What bloom, what brightness lusters o'er her cheeks!

Again she calls!—I dare no longer stay!
A kind farewell—Olympia, I obey.

He turn'd, no longer in my sight remain'd;
The mountain he, I save the city gain'd.

CANTO IV.

STILL o'er my mind wild fancy holds her sway,
Still on strange visionary land I stray.
Now scenes crowd thick! now indistinct appear!
Swift glide the months, and turn the varying year!

Near the bull's horn light's rising monarch draws;
Now on its back the Pleiades he thaws!
From vernal heat pale winter forc'd to fly,
Northward retires, yet turns a watery eye;
Then with an anguish breath nips infant blooms,
Deprives unfolding spring of rich perfumes,
Shakes the slow-circling blood of human race,
And in sharp, livid looks contracts the face.
Now o'er Norwegian hills he strides away:
Such slippery paths ambition's steps betray.
Turning, with sighs, far spiral firs he sees,
Which bow obedient to the southern breeze:
Now from yon Zemblan rock his crest he shrouds,
Like fame's, obscur'd amid the whitening clouds;
Thence his lost empire is with tears deplor'd:
Such tyrants shed o'er liberty restor'd.
Beneath his eye (that throws malignant light
Ten times the measur'd round of mortal fight)
A waste, pale glimmering, like a moon, that waned

A wild expanse of frozen sea contains.
It cracks!—vast floating mountains beat the shore!
Far off he hears those icy ruins roar,
And from the hideous crash distracted flies,
Like one, who feels his dying infant's cries.
Near, and more near the rushing torrents sound,
And one great rift runs through the vast profound,
Swift as a shooting meteor; groaning loud,
Like deep-roll'd thunder through a rending cloud.
The late dark pole now feels unsetting day;
In hurricanes of wrath he whirls his way;
O'er many a polar Alp to frost he goes,
O'er crackling vales imbrown'd with melting snows:
Here bears stalk tenants of the barren space,
Few men, unsocial those!—a barbarous race!
At length the cave appears! the race is run:
How he recounts the conquests lost and won,
And taleful in th' embrace of frost remains,
Barr'd from our climes, and bound in icy chains.

Meanwhile the sun his beams on Cancer throws,
Which now beneath his warmest influence glows.
From glowing Cancer fallen, the king of day,
Red through the kindling Lion shoots his ray.
The tawny harvest pays the earlier plough,
And mellowing fruitage loads the bending bough,
'Tis day-spring. Now green labyrinths I frequent.
Where wisdom oft retires to meet content.

The mounting lark her warbling anthem lends,
From note to note the ravish'd soul ascends;
As thus it would the patriarch's ladder climb,
By some good angel led to worlds sublime;

Of (legends say) the snake with waken'd ire,
Like envy rears in many a scaly spire;
Then songsters droop, then yield their vital gore,
And innocence and music are no more.

Mild rides the morn in orient beauty drest,
An azure mantle, and a purple vest.
Which, blown by gales, her gemmy feet display,
Her amber tresses negligently gay.
Collected now her rosy hand they fill,
And, gently wrung, the pearly dew distil.
The songful zephyrs, and the laughing hours,
Breathe sweet; and strow her opening way with flowers.

The chattering swallows leave their nested care,
Each promising return with plenteous fare.

So the fond swain, who to the market hies,
Stills, with big hopes, his infant's tender cries,
Yonder two turtles, o'er their callow brood,
Hang hovering, ere they seek their guiltless food.
Fondly they bill. Now to their morning care,
Like our first parents, part the amorous pair:
But ah!—a pair no more!—With spreading wings,
From the high-sounding cliff a vulture springs;
Steady he sails along th' aerial gray,

Swoops down, and bears yon timorous dove away.
Start we, who worse than vultures, Nimrods find,
Men meditating prey on human kind?

Wild beasts to gloomy dens repace their way,
Where their couch'd young demand the slaughter'd prey.

Rooks, from their nodding nests, black-swarming
And, in hoarse uproar, tell the fowler nigh.

Now, in his tabernacle rous'd, the sun
Is warn'd the blue ætherial sleep to run.
While on his couch of floating jasper laid,
From his bright eye sleep calls the dewy shade.
The crystal dome transparent pillars raise,
Whence, beam'd from sapphires, living azure
plays:

The liquid floor, in-wrought with pearls divine,
Where all his labours in mosaic shine.

His coronet, a cloud of silver-white;
His robe with unconsuming crimson bright,
Varied with gems, all heaven's collected store!
While his loose locks descend, a golden shower.

If to his steps compar'd, we tardy find
The Grecian racers, who outstrip the wind,
Fleet to the glowing race behold him start!

His quickening eyes a quivering radiance dart,
And, while this last nocturnal flag is furled,
Swift into life and motion look the world.

The sun-flower now averts her blooming cheek
From west, to view his eastern lustre break.

What gay, creative, power his presence brings!
Hills, lawns, lakes, villages!—the face of things,
All night beneath successive shadows miss'd,
Instant begins in colours to exist:

But absent these from sons of riot keep,
Lost in impure, unmeditating sleep.
T' unlock his fence, the new-risen swain prepares,
And ere forth-driven recounts his fleecy cares;

When, lo! an ambush'd wolf, with hunger bold,
Springs at the prey, and fierce invades the fold!
But by the pastor not in vain defied,
Like our arch foe by some celestial guide.

Spread on yon rock the sea-calf I survey:
Bask'd in the sun, his skin reflects the day.
He sees yon tower-like ship the waves divide,
And slips again beneath the glassy tide.

The watery herbs, and shrubs, and vines, and flowers, [showers.

Rear their bent heads, o'ercharg'd with nightly
Hail, glorious sun! to whose attractive fires,
The weaken'd, vegetative life aspires!

The juices, wrought by thy directive force,
Through plants, and trees, perform their genial
course,

Extend in root, with bark unyielding bind
The hearted trunk; or weave the branching rind;
Expand in leaves, in flowery blossoms shoot,
Bleed in rich gums, and swell in ripen'd fruit.
From Thee, bright, universal Power! began
Instinct in brute, and generous love in man.

Talk'd I of love?—Yon swain, with amorous
air,

Soft swells his pipe, to charm the rural fair.
She milks the flocks; then, listening as he plays,
Steals, in the running brook, a conscious gaze.

The trout, that deep, in winter, ooz'd remains,
Up-springs, and sunward turns its crimson stains.

The tenants of the warren, vainly chas'd;
Now lur'd to ambient fields for green repast,
Seek their small vaulted labyrinths in vain;
Entangling nets betray the skipping train;
Red massacres through their republic fly,
And heaps on heaps by ruthless spaniels die.

The fisher, who the lonely beech has stray'd,
And all the live-long night his net-work spread,
Drags in, and bears the loaded snare away;
Where flounce, deceiv'd, th' expiring lunny prey.

Near Neptune's temple (Neptune's now no
more),

Whose statue plants a trident on the shore,
In sportive rings the generous dolphins wind,
And eye, and think the image human-kind:
Dear, pleasing friendship!—See! the pile commands

The vale, and grim at superstition stands!
Time's hand there leaves its print of mossy green,
With hollows, carv'd for snakes, and birds obscene.

O Gibbs, whose art the solemn fane can raise,
Where God delights to dwell, and man to praise;
When moulder'd thus the column falls away,
Like some great prince majestic in decay;
When ignorance and scorn the ground shall tread,
Where wisdom tutor'd, and devotion pray'd;
Where all thy pompous work our wonder claim;
What, but the muse alone, preserve thy name?

The sun shines, broken, through yon arch that rears

This once round fabric, half depriv'd by years,
Which rose a stately colonnade, and crown'd
Encircling pillars now unfaithful sound;
In fragments, these the fall of those forebode,
Which, nodding, just up-heave their crumbling load.

High, on yon column, which has batter'd stood,
Like some stripp'd oak, the grandeur of the wood,
The stork inhabits her aerial nest;
By her are liberty and peace carest;

She flies the realms that own despotic kings,
And only spreads o'er free-born states her wings.
The roof is now the daw's, or raven's haunt,
And loathsome toads in the dark entrance pant;
Or snakes, that lurk to snap the heedless fly,
And fated bird, that oft comes fluttering by.

An aqueduct across yon vale is laid,
Its channel through a ruin'd arch betray'd;
Whirl'd down a steep, it flies with torrent force,
Flashes, and roars, and plows a devious course.

Attracted mists a golden cloud commence,
While through high-colour'd air strike rays intense.
Betwixt two points, which yon steep mountains
show,

Lies a mild bay, to which kind breezes flow.
Beneath a grotto, arch'd for calm retreat,
Leads lengthening in the rock—Be this my seat.
Heat never enters here; but coolness reigns
O'er zephyrs, and distilling, watery veins.
Secluded now I trace th' instructive page,
And live o'er scenes of many a backward age;
Through days, months, years, through time's
whole course I run,

And present stand where time itself begun.

Ye mighty dead, of just, distinguish'd fame,
Your thoughts, (ye bright instructors!) here I
claim.

Here ancient knowledge opens nature's springs;
Here truths historic give the hearts of kings.
Hence contemplation learns white hours to find,
And labours virtue on th' attentive mind:
O lov'd retreat! thy joys content bestow,
Nor guilt, nor shame, nor sharp repentance know.
What the fifth Charles long aim'd in power to see,
That happiness he found reserv'd in thee. [weeps,

Now let me change the page—Here Tully
While in death's icy arms his Tullia sleeps,
His daughter dear!—Retir'd I see him mourn,
By all the frenzy now of anguish torn.

Wild his complaint! Nor sweeter sorrow's strains,
When Singer for Alexis lost complains.

Each friend condole, expostulates, reproves;
More than a father raving Tully loves;
Or Sallust censures thus!—Unheeding blame,
He schemes a temple to his Tullia's name.

Thus o'er my hermit once did grief prevail,
Thus rose Olympia's tomb, his moving tale,
The sighs, tears, frantic starts, that banish rest,
And all the bursting sorrows of his breast.

But hark! a sudden power attunes the air!
Th' enchanting sound enamour'd breezes bear;
Now low, now high, they sink, or lift the song,
Which the cave echoes sweet, and sweet the creeks prolong.

I listen'd, gaz'd, when, wondrous to behold!
From ocean steam'd, a vapour gathering roll'd:
A blue, round spot on the mid-roof it came,
Spread broad, and redden'd into dazzling flame.
Full orb'd it shone, and dimm'd the swimming
light,

While doubling objects danc'd with darkling light.
Amaz'd I stood!—amaz'd I still remain!

What earthly power this wonder can explain?
Gradual, at length, the lustre dies away:

My eyes restor'd, a mortal form survey.

My hermit friend! 'Tis he.—All hail! (he cries)
I see, and would alleviate, thy surprise.

The vanish'd meteor was heaven's message meant,
To warn thee hence: I knew the high intent.
Hear then! in this sequester'd cave retir'd,
Departed saints converse with men inspir'd.

'Tis sacred ground; nor can thy mind endure,
Yet unprepar'd, an intercourse so pure.

Quick let us hence.—And now extend thy views
O'er yonder lawn; there find the heaven-born
muse!

Or seek her, where she trusts her tuneful tale
To the mid, silent wood, or vocal vale; [shades,
Where trees half check the light with trembling
Close in deep glooms, or open clear in glades;
Or where surrounding vistas far descend,
The landscape varied at each lessening end;
She, only she can mortal thought refine,
And raise thy voice to visitants divine.

CANTO V.

We left the cave. Be fear (said I) defy'd!
Virtue (for thou art virtue) is my guide.

By time-worn steps a steep ascent we gain,
Whose summit yields a prospect o'er the plain.
There, bench'd with turf, an oak our seat extends,
Whose top a verdant, branch'd pavilion bends.
Vistas, with leaves, diversify the scene,
Some pale, some brown, and some of lively green.

Now, from the full-grown day a beamy shower
Gleams on the lake, and gilds each glossy flower.
Gay insects sparkle in the genial blaze,
Various as light, and countless as its rays:
They dance on every stream, and pictur'd play,
Till, by the watery racer, snatch'd away.

Now, from yon range of rocks, strong rays re-
bound,

Doubling the day on flowery plains around:
King-cups beneath far-striking colours glance,
Bright as th' ethereal glows the green expanse.
Gems of the field!—the topaz charms the sight,
Like these, effulging yellow streams of light.

From the same rocks, fall rills with soften'd force,
Meet in yon mead, and well a river's source.
Through her clear channel shine her finny shoals,
O'er sands, like gold, the liquid crystal rolls.

Dimm'd in yon coarser moor, her charms decay,
And shape, through rustling reeds, a ruffled way.
Near willows short and bushy shadows throw:
Now lost, she seems through nether tracts to flow;
Yet, at yon point, winds out in silver state,
Like virtue from a labyrinth of fate. [run

In lengthening rows, prone from the mountains,
The flocks:—their fleeces glistening in the sun;
Her streams they seek, and, 'twixt her neighbouring trees,

Recline in various attitudes of ease.
Where the herds sip, the little scaly fry,
Swift from the shore, in scattering myriads fly.

Each livery'd cloud, that round th' horizon
glows,

Shifts in odd scenes, like earth, from whence it rose.

The bee hums wanton in yon jasmine bower,
And circling settles, and despoils the flower.
Melodious there the plummy songsters meet,
And all charm'd echo from her arch'd retreat.
Neat polish'd mansions rise in prospect gay;
Time-batter'd towers frown awful in decay;
The sun plays glittering on the rocks and spires,
And the lawn lightens with reflected fires.

Here mirth, and fancy's wanton train advance
And to light measures turn the swimming dance,
Sweet, slow-pac'd melancholy next appears,
Pompous in grief, and eloquent of tears.
Here meditation shines, in azure drest,
All starr'd with gems; a sun adorns her crest.
Religion, to whose lifted, raptur'd eyes
Seraphic hosts descend from opening skies;
Beauty, who sways the heart, and charms the sight;
Whose tongue is music, and whose smile delight;
Whose brow is majesty; whose bosom peace;
Who bade creation be, and chaos cease; [vine
Whose breath perfumes the spring; whose eye di-
Kindled the sun, and gave its light to shine.
Here, in thy likeness, fair Ophelia*, seen,
She throws kind lustre o'er th' enliven'd green.
Next her description, rob'd in various hues,
Invites attention from the pensive muse!
The muse!—she comes! refin'd the passions wait,
And precept, ever winning, wise, and great.
The muse! a thousand spirits wing the air (Once men, who made like her mankind their care):

Enamour'd round her prefs th' inspiring throng,
And swell to ecstasy her solemn song.

Thus in the dame each nobler grace we find,
Fair Wortley's angel-accent, eyes, and mind.
Whether her sight the dew-bright dawn surveys,
The noon's dry heat, or evening's temper'd rays,
The hours of storm, or calm, the gleby ground,
The coral'd sea, gem'd rock, or sky profound,
A Raphael's fancy animates each line,
Each image strikes with energy divine;
Bacon and Newton in her thoughts conspire;
Nor sweeter than her voice is Handel's lyre.

My hermit thus. She beckons us away:
Oh, let us swift the high behest obey! [croft,

Now through a lane, which mingling tracts have
The way unequal, and the landscape lost,
We rove. The warblers lively tunes essay,
The lark on wing, the linnet on the spray,
While music trembles in their songful throats,
The bullfinch whistles soft his flute-like notes.
The bolder blackbird swells sonorous lays;
The varying thrush commands a tuneful maze;
Each a wild length of melody pursues; [coos.
While the soft murmuring, amorous wood-dove
And, when in spring these melting mixtures flow,
The cuckoo sends her unison of woe.

But as smooth seas are furrow'd by a storm;
As troubles all our tranquil joys deform;
So, loud through air, unwelcome noises sound,
And harmony's at once, in discord, drown'd.
From yon dark cypress, croaks the raven's cry;
As dissonant the daw, jay, chattering pie:

* Mrs. Oldfield.

The clamorous crows abandon'd carnage seek,
And the harsh owl shrills out a sharpening shriek.
At the lane's end a high-lath'd gate's prefer'd,
To bar the trespass of a vagrant herd.

Fast by, a meagre mendicant we find,
Whose russet rags hang fluttering in the wind:
Years bow his back, a staff supports his tread,
And soft white hairs shade thin his palsy'd head.
Poor wretch!—Is this for charity his haunt?
He meets the frequent flight, and ruthless taunt.
On slaves of guilt oft smiles the squandering peer;
But passing knows not common bounty here.
Vain thing! in what dost thou superior shine?
His our first fire: what race more ancient thine?
Less backward trac'd, he may his lineage draw
From men, whose influence kept the world in awe:
Whose worthless sons, like thee, perchance con-
sum'd

Their ample store, their line to want was doom'd.
So thine may perish, by the course of things,
While his, from beggars, re-ascend to kings.
Now, lazarus, as thy hardships I peruse,
On my own state instructed would I muse.
When I view greatness, I my lot lament;
Compar'd to thee, I snatch supreme content.
I might have felt, did heaven not gracious deal,
A fate, which I must mourn to see thee feel.
But soft! the cripple our approach describes,
And to the gate, though weak, officious hies.
I spring preventive, and unbar the way,
Then, turning, with a smile of pity, say,
Here, friend!—this little copper alms receive,
Instance of will, without the power to give.
Hermit, if here with pity we reflect, [gleet?
How must we grieve, when learning meets ne-
When god-like souls endure a mean restraint;
When generous will is curb'd by tyrant want?
He truly feels what to distress belongs,
Who to his private, adds a people's wrongs;
Merit's a mark, at which disgrace is thrown,
And every injur'd virtue is his own.
Such their own pangs with patience here endure,
Yet there weep wounds, they are denied to cure;
Thus rich in poverty, thus humbly great,
And, though depress'd, superior to their fate.
Minions in power, and misers, 'mid their store,
Are mean in greatness, and in plenty poor.
What's power, or wealth? Were they not form'd for aid,

A spring for virtue, and from wrongs a shade?
In power we savage tyranny behold,
And wily avarice owns polluted gold.
From golden sands her pride could Libya raise,
Could she, who spreads no pasture, claim our praise? [breed;
Loath'd were her wealth, where rabid monsters
Where serpents, pamper'd on her venom, feed,
No sheltering trees invite the wanderer's eye,
No fruits, no grain, no gums, her tracts supply;
On her vast wilds no lovely prospects run;
But all lies barren, though beneath the sun.

My hermit thus. I know thy soul believes,
'Tis hard vice triumphs, and that virtue grieves;
Yet oft affliction purifies the mind,
Kind benefits oft flow from means unkind.

Were the whole known, that we uncouth suppose,
 Doubtless, would beauteous symmetry disclose.
 The naked cliff, that singly rough remains,
 In prospect dignifies the fertile plains;
 Lead-colour'd clouds, in scattering fragments seen,
 Show, though in broken views, the blue serene.
 Severe distresses industry inspire;
 Thus captive oft excelling arts acquire,
 And boldly struggle through a state of shame,
 To life, ease, plenty, liberty, and fame.
 Sword-law has often Europe's balance gain'd,
 And one red victory years of peace maintain'd.
 We pass through want to wealth, through dismal strife,

To calm content, through death to endless life.
 Libya thou nam'st---let Afric's wastes appear
 Curst by those heats, that fructify the year;
 Yet the same suns her orange-groves befriend,
 Where clustering globes in shining rows depend.
 Here when fierce beams o'er withering plants are
 roll'd.

There the green fruit seems ripen'd into gold.
 Ev'n scenes that strike with terrible surprise,
 Still prove a God, just, merciful, and wise.
 Sad wintry blasts, that strip the autumn, bring
 The milder beauties of a flowery spring.
 Ye sulphurous fires in jaggy lightnings break!
 Ye thunders rattle, and ye nations shake!
 Ye storms of riving flame the forest tear!
 Deep crack the rocks! rent trees be whirl'd in air!
 Rest at a stroke, some stately fane we'll mourn;
 Her tombs wide-shatter'd, and her dead up-torn;
 Were noxious spirits not from caverns drawn,
 Rack'd earth would soon in gulfs enormous yawn:
 Then all were lost!--Or would we floating view
 The baleful cloud, there would destruction brew;
 Plague, fever, frenzy, close-engendering lie,
 Till these red ruptures clear the sullied sky.

Now a field opens to enlarge my thought,
 In parcel'd tracts to various uses wrought.
 Here hardening ripeness the first blooms behold,
 There the last blossoms spring-like pride unfold.
 Here swelling pease on leafy stalks are seen,
 Mix'd flowers of red and azure shine between;
 Whose weaving beauties, heighten'd by the sun,
 In colour'd lanes along the furrows run.
 There the next produce of a genial shower,
 The beans fresh-blossoms in a speckled flower;
 Whose morning dews, when to the sun resign'd,
 With undulating sweets embalm the wind.
 Now daisy plats of clover square the plain,
 And part the bearded from the beardless grain.
 There fibrous flax with verdure binds the field,
 Which on the loom shall art-spun labours yield.
 The mulberry, in fair summer-green array'd,
 Full in the midst starts up, a silky shade.
 For human taste the rich-stain'd fruitage bleeds;
 The leaf the silk-emitting reptile feeds.
 As swans their down, as flocks their fleeces leave,
 Here worms for man their glossy entrails weave.
 Hence to adorn the fair, in texture gay,
 Sprigs, fruits, and flowers on figur'd vestments
 play:

But industry prepares them oft to please
 The guilty pride of vain, luxuriant ease.

Now frequent, dusty gales offensive blow,
 And o'er my sight a transient blindness throw.
 Windward we shift. Near down th' etherial steep,
 The lamp of day hangs hovering o'er the deep.
 Dun shades, in rocky shapes up æther roll'd,
 Project long, shaggy points, deep-ting'd with gold.
 Others take faint th' unripen'd cherry's dye,
 And paint amusing landscapes on the eye.
 Their blue-veil'd yellow, through a sky serene,
 In swelling mixture forms a floating green.
 Streak'd through white clouds a mild vermilion
 shines,

And the breeze freshens, as the heat declines.

Yon crooked, sunny roads change rising views
 From brown, to sandy red, and chalky hues.
 One mingled scene another quick succeeds,
 Men, chariots, teams, yok'd steers, and prancing
 steeds,
 Which climb, descend, and, as loud whips resound,
 Stretch, sweat, and smoke along unequal ground.
 On winding Thames, reflecting radiant beams,
 When boats, ships, barges mark the roughen'd
 streams.

This way, and that, they different points pursue;
 So mix the motions, and so shifts the view,
 While thus we throw around our gladden'd eyes,
 The gifts of heaven in gay profusion rise;
 Trees rich with gums, and fruits; with jewels rocks:

Plains with flowers, herbs, and plants, and bees,
 and flocks;
 Mountains with mines; with oak, and cedar,
 woods;

Quarries with marble, and with fish the floods.
 In darkening spots, mid fields of various dyes,
 Tilt new manur'd, or naked fallow lies.
 Near uplands fertile pride enclos'd display,
 The green grass yellowing into scentful hay.
 And thick-set hedges fence the full-ear'd corn,
 And berries blacken on the virid thorn.
 Mark in yon heath oppos'd the cultur'd scene,
 Wild thyme, pale box, and firs of darker green,
 The native strawberry red-ripening grows,
 By nettles guarded, as by thorns the rose.
 There nightingales in unprun'd copses build,
 In shaggy furzes lies the hare conceal'd.
 'Twixt ferns and thistles, unsown flowers amuse,
 And form a lucid chace of various hues;
 Many half-grey with dust: confus'd they lie;
 Scent the rich year, and lead the wandering eye.

Contemplative, we tread the flowery plain,
 The muse preceding with her heavenly train,
 When, lo! the mendicant, so late behind,
 Strange view! now journeying in our front we find! [mands;

And yet a view, more strange, our heed de-
 Touch'd by the muse's wand transform'd he stands,
 O'er skin late wrinkled, instant beauty spreads;
 The late-dimm'd eye, a vivid lustre sheds;
 Hairs, once so thin, now graceful locks decline;
 And rags now chang'd in regal vestments shine.

The hermit thus. In him the BARD behold,
 Once seen by midnight's lamp in winter's cold;
 The BARD, whose want so multiplied his woes,
 He sunk a mortal, and a seraph rose.

See!—where those stately yew-trees darkling grow,
And, waving o'er yon graves, brown borrows
throw,

Scornful he points—there, o'er his sacred dust,
Arise the sculptur'd tomb, and labour'd bust.
Vain pomp! bestow'd by ostentatious pride,
Who to a life of want relief deny'd.

But thus the BARD. Are these the gifts of state?
Gifts unreceiv'd!—These! Ye ungenerous great!
How was I treated when in life forlorn?
My claim your pity; but my lot your scorn.
Why were my studious hours oppos'd by need?
In me did poverty from guilt proceed?
Did I contemporary authors wrong,
And deem their worth, but as they priz'd my song?
Did I soothe vice, or venal strokes betray,
In the low-purpos'd, loud polemic fray?
Did e'er my verse immodest warmth contain,
Or, once-licentious, heavenly truths profane?
Never.—And yet when envy sunk my name,
Who call'd my shadow'd merit into fame?
When, undeserv'd, a prison's grate I saw,
What hand redeem'd me from the wrested law?
Who cloth'd me naked, or when hungry fed?
Why crush'd the living? Why extol'd the dead?—
But foreign languages adopt my lays,
And distant nations shame you into praise.
Why should unrelish'd wit these honours cause?
Custom, not knowledge, dictates your applause:
Or think you thus a self-renown to raise,
And mingle your vain-glories with my bays?
Be your's the mouldering tomb! Be mine the lay
Immortal!—Thus he scoffs the pomp away.
Though words like these unletter'd pride impeach,
To the meek heart he turns with milder speech.
Though now a seraph, oft he deigns to wear
The face of human friendship, oft of care;
To walk disguis'd an object of relief.
A learn'd, good man, long exercis'd in grief;
Forlorn, a friendless orphan oft to roam,
Craving some kind, some hospitable home:
Or, like Ulysses, a low lazar stand;
Beseeching pity's eye, and bounty's hand;
Or, like Ulysses, royal aid request,
Wandering from court to court, a king distressed.
Thus varying shapes, the seeming son of woe
Eyes the cold heart, and hearts that generous glow:
Then to the muse relates each lordly name,
Who deals impartial infamy and fame.

Oft, as when men in mortal state depress'd,
His lays taught virtue, which his life confess'd,
He now forms visionary scenes below,
Inspiring patience in the heart of woe;
Patience, that softens every sad extreme, [gleam,
That casts through dungeon-glooms a cheerful
Disarms disease of pain, mocks slander's sting,
And strips of terrors the terrific king,
'Gainst want, a sorer foe, its succour lends,
And smiling sees th' ingratitude of friends.

Nor are these tasks to him alone consign'd.
Millions invisible befriend mankind.
When watery structures, seen cross heaven t' ascend,
Arch above arch in radiant order bend,
Fancy beholds, adown each glittering side,
Myriads of missionary seraphs glide;

She sees good angels genial showers bestow
From the red convex of the dewy bow.
They smile upon the swain: He views the prize;
Then grateful bends, to bless the bounteous skies.
Some winds collect, and send propitious gales
Oft where Britannia's navy spreads her sails;
There ever wafting, on the breath of fame,
Unequal'd glory in her sovereign's name.
Some teach young zephyrs vernal sweets to bear,
And float the balmy health on ambient air;
Zephyrs, that oft, where lovers listening lie,
Along the grove in melting music die,
And in lone caves to minds poetic roll
Seraphic whispers, that abstract the soul.
Some range the colours, as they parted fly,
Clear-pointed to the philosophic eye;
The flaming red, that pains the dwelling gaze;
The stainless, lightsome yellow's gilding rays;
The clouded orange, that betwixt them glows,
And to kind mixture tawny lustre owes;
All-cheering green, that gives the spring its dye;
The bright, transparent blue, that robes the sky;
And indico, which shaded light displays;
And violet, which in the view decays.
Parental hues, whence others all proceed;
An ever-mingling, changeful, countless breed;
Unravel'd, variegated, lines of light,
When blended, dazzling in promiscuous white.
Oft through these bows departed spirits range,
New to the skies, admiring at their change;
Each mind a void, as when first born to earth,
Behold a second blank in second birth;
Then, as yon seraph bard fram'd hearts below,
Each sees him here transcendent knowledge show,
New founts he tutors into truth refin'd,
And tunes to rapturous love the new-form'd mind.
He swells the lyre, whose loud, melodious lays
Call high Hosannas from the voice of praise;
Though one bad age such poesy could wrong,
Now worlds around retentive roll the song:
Now God's high throne the full-voic'd raptures
gain,

Celestial hosts returning strain for strain.

Thus he, who once knew want without relief,
Sees joys resulting from well-suffering grief.
Hark! while we talk, a distant pattering rain
Resounds!—See! up the broad ethereal plain
Shoots the bright bow!—The seraph flits away;
The muse, the graces from our view decay.

Behind yon western hill the globe of light
Drops sudden; fast-pursued by shades of night.

Yon graves from winter-scenes to mind recall
Rebellion's council, and rebellion's fall.
What fiends in sulphurous, car-like clouds up-
flew!

What midnight treason glar'd beneath their view!
And now the traitors rear their Babel-schemes,
Big, and more big, stupendous mischief seems;
But justice, rous'd, superior strength employs,
Their scheme wide shatters, and their hope de-troys.

Discord she wills; the missile ruin flies;
Sudden, unnatural debates arise,
Doubt, mutual jealousy, and dumb disgust,
Dark-hinted mutterings, and avow'd distrust;

To secret ferment is each heart resign'd;
Suspicion hovers in each clouded mind;
They jar, accus'd accuse, revil'd revile,
And wrath to wrath oppose, and guile to guile;
Wrangling they part, themselves themselves betray;

Each dire device starts naked into day;
They feel confusion in the van with fear;
They feel the king of terrors in the rear.

Of these were three by different motives fir'd,
Ambition one, and one revenge inspir'd.
The third, O Mammon, was thy meaner slave;
Thou idol seldom of the great and brave!

Florio, whose life was one continued feast,
His wealth diminish'd, and his debts increas'd,
Vain pomp, and equipage, his low desires,
Who ne'er to intellectual bliss aspires;
He, to repair by vice what vice has broke,
Durst with bold treasons judgment's rod provoke.
His strength of mind, by luxury half dissolv'd,
Ill brooks the woe, where deep he stands involv'd.
He weeps, stamps wild, and to and fro now flies;
Now wrings his hands, and sends unmanly cries,
Arraigns his judge, affirms unjust he bleeds,
And now recants, and now for mercy pleads;
Now blames associates, raves with inward strife,
Upbraids himself; then thinks alone on life.
He rolls red swelling, tearful eyes around,
Sore smites his breast, and sinks upon the ground.
He wails, he quite desponds, convulsive lies,
Shrinks from the fancied axe, and thinks he dies:
Revives, with hope inquires, stops short with
fear,

Entreats ev'n flattery, nor the worst will hear;
The worst, alas, his doom!—What friend replies?
Each speaks with shaking head, and down-cast eyes.
One silence breaks, then pauses, drops a tear;
Nor hope affords, nor quite confirms his fear;
But what kind friendship part reserves unknown
Comes thundering in his keeper's surly tone.
Enough struck through and through, in ghastly stare,

He stands transfix'd, the statue of despair;
Nor aught of life, nor aught of death he knows,
Till thought returns, and brings return of woes:
Now pours a storm of grief in gushing streams:
That past—collected in himself he seems,
And with forc'd smile retires—his latent thought
Dark, horrid, as the prison's dismal vault.

If with himself at variance ever-wild,
With angry heaven how stands he reconcil'd?
No penitential orisons arise;
Nay, he obtests the justice of the skies.
Not for his guilt, for sentenc'd life he moans;
His chains rough-clanking to discordant groans,
To bars harsh-grating, heavy-creaking doors,
Hoarse-echoing walls, and hollow-ringing floors,
To thoughts more dissonant, far, far less kind,
One anarchy, one chaos of the mind.
At length, fatigu'd with grief, on earth he lies:
But soon as sleep weighs down th' unwilling eyes,
Glad liberty appears, no damps annoy,
Treason succeeds, and all transforms to joy.
Proud palaces their glittering stores display:
Gain he pursues, and rapine leads the way.

What gold! what gems!—he strains to seize the prize;

Quick from his touch dissolv'd, a cloud it flies.
Conscious he cries—and must I wake to weep?
Ah, yet return, return, delusive sleep!
Sleep comes; but liberty no more:—Unkind,
The dudgeon-glooms hang heavy on his mind.
Shrill winds are heard, and howling demons call;
Wide-flying portals seem unhing'd to fall:
Then close with sudden claps; a dreadful din!
He starts, wakes, storms, and all is hell within.

His genius flies—reflects he now on prayer?
Alas! bad spirits turn those thoughts to air.
What shall he next? What, straight relinquish breath,

To bar a public, just, though shameful death?
Rash, horrid thought! yet now afraid to live,
Murderous he strikes—may heaven the deed forgive!

Why had he thus false spirit to rebel?
And why not fortitude to suffer well?
Were his success, how terrible the blow!
And it recoils on him eternal woe,
Heaven this affliction then for mercy meant,
That a good end might close a life mispent.

Where no kind lips the hallow'd dirge resound,
Far from the compass of yon sacred ground;
Full in the centre of three meeting ways,
Stak'd through he lies.—Warn'd let the wicked
gaze.

Near yonder fane, where misery sleeps in peace,
Whose spire fast-lessens, as these shades increase,
Left to the north, whence oft brew'd tempests roll,
Tempests, dire emblems, Cosmo, of thy soul!
There mark that Cosmo, much for guile renown'd!
His grave by unbid plants of poison crown'd.
When out of power, through him the public good,
So strong his factious tribe, suspended stood.
In power, vindictive actions were his aim,
And patriots perish'd by th' ungenerous flame.
If the best cause he in the senate chose,
Ev'n right in him from some wrong motive rose.
The bad he loath'd, and would the weak despise;
Yet courted for dark ends, and shunn'd the wise.
When ill his purpose, eloquent his strain;
His malice had a look, and voice humane.
His smile, the signal of some vile intent,
A private poniard, or empoison'd scent;
Proud, yet to popular applause a slave;
No friend he honour'd, and no foe forgave.
His boons unfrequent, or unjust to need;
The hire of guilt, of infamy the meed;
But, if they chanc'd on learned worth to fall,
Bounty in him was ostentation all,
No true benevolence his thought sublimed,
His noblest actions are illustrious crimes,
Fine parts, which virtue might have rank'd with
fame,

Enhance his guilt, and magnify his shame.
When parts in probity in man combine,
In wisdom's eye, how charming must he shine!
Let him, less happy, truth at least impart
And what he wants in genius bear in heart.

Cosmo, as death draws nigh, no more conceals
That storm of passion, which his nature feels:

He feels much fear, more anger, and most pride;
But pride and anger make all fear subside.
Dauntless he meets at length untimely fate;
A desperate spirit! rather fierce, than great.
Darkling he glides along the dreary coast,
A sullen, wandering, self-tormenting ghost.

Where veiny marble dignifies the ground,
With emblem fair in sculpture rising round,
Just where a crossing, lengthening aisle we find,
Full east; whence God returns to judge mankind,

Once-lov'd Horatio sleeps, a mind elate!
Lamented shade, ambition was thy fate.
Ev'n angels, wondering, oft his worth survey'd;
Behold a man, like one of us! they said.
Straight heard the furies, and with envy glar'd,
And to precipitate his fall prepar'd.

First avarice came. In vain self-love she press'd;
The poor he pity'd still, and still redress'd:

Learning was his, and knowledge to commend,
Of arts a patron, and of want a friend.

Next came revenge: but her essay how vain!
Not hate, nor envy, in his heart remain.

No previous malice could his mind engage,
Malice the mother of vindictive rage.

No—from his life his foes might learn to live;
He held it still a triumph to forgive.

At length ambition urg'd his country's weal,
Assuming the fair look of public zeal;

Still in his breast so generous glow'd the flame,
The vice, when there, a virtue half became.

His pitying eye saw millions in distress,
He deem'd it godlike to have power to bless:

Thus, when unguarded, treason stain'd him o'er;
And virtue and content were then no more.

But when to death by rigorous justice doom'd,
His genuine spirit faint-like state resum'd,

Oft from soft penitence distill'd a tear;
Oft hope in heavenly mercy lighten'd fear;

Oft would a drop from struggling nature fall,
And then a smile of patience brighten all.

He seeks in heaven a friend, nor seeks in vain.

His guardian angel swift descends again;

And resolution thus bespeaks a mind,
Not scorning life, yet all to death resign'd;

—Ye chains, fit only to restrain the will

Of common, desperate veterans in ill,
Though rankling on my limbs ye lie, declare,

Did e'er my rising soul your pressure wear?

No!—free as liberty, and quick as light,

To worlds remote she takes unbounded flight.

Ye dungeon glooms, that dim corporeal eyes,

Could ye once blot her prospect of the skies?

No!—from her clearer sight ye fled away,

Like error, pierc'd by truth's resistless ray.

Ye walls, that witness my repentant moan!

Ye echoes, that to midnight sorrows groan!

Do I, in wrath, to you of fate complain?

Or once betray fear's most inglorious pain?

No!—Hail, twice hail then, ignominious death!

Behold how willing glides my parting breath!

Far greater, better far—ay, far indeed!

Like me, have suffer'd, and like me will bleed.

Apostles, patriarchs, prophets, martyrs all,

Like me once fell, nor murmur'd at their fall.

Shall I, whose days, at best, no ill design'd,
Whose virtue shone not, though I lov'd mankind,
Shall I, now guilty wretch, shall I repine?

Ah, no! to justice let me life resign!

Quick, as a friend, would I embrace my foe!

He taught me patience, who first taught me woe;

But friends are foes, they render woe severe,

For me they wail, from me extort the tear.

Not those, yet absent, missive griefs controul;

These periods weep, those rave, and these condole,

At entrance shrieks a friend, with pale surprise;

Another panting, prostrate, speechless lies;

One gripes my hand, one sobs upon my breast!

Ah, who can bear?—it shocks, it murders rest!

And is it yours, alas! my friends to feel?

And is it mine to comfort, mine to heal?

Is mine the patience, yours the bosom strife?

Ah! would rash love lure back my thoughts to life?

Adieu, dear, dangerous mourners! swift depart!

Ah, fly me! fly!—I tear ye from my heart.

Ye saints, whom fears of death could ne'er con-

troul,

In my last hour compose, support my soul!

See my blood wash repented sin away!

Receive, receive me to eternal day!

With words like these the destin'd hero dies,

While angels waft his soul to happier skies.

Distinction now gives way; yet on we talk,

Full darkness deepening o'er the formless walk.

Night treads not with light step the dewy gale,

Nor bright-distends her star-embroider'd vale;

Her leaden'd feet, inclement damps distil,

Clouds shut her face, black winds her vesture fill;

An earth-born meteor lights the fable skies,

Eastward it shoots, and, sunk, forgotten dies.

So pride, that rose from dust to guilty power,

Glares out in vain; so dust shall pride devour.

Fishers, who yonder brink by torches gain,

With toothful tridents strike the scaly train.

Like snakes in eagles' claws, in vain they strive,

When heav'd aloft, and quivering yet alive.

While here, methought, our time in converse pass'd,

[fast.

The moon clouds muffled, and the night wore

At prowling wolves was heard the mastiff's bay,

And the warn'd master's arms forbad the prey!

Thus treason steels, the patriot thus describes,

Forth springs the monarch, and the mischief flies.

Pale glow-worms glimmer'd through the depth

of night,

Scattering, like hope through fear, a doubtful

light.

Lone Philomela tun'd the silent grove,

With pensive pleasure listen'd wakeful love.

Half-dreaming fancy form'd an angel's tongue,

And pain forgot to groan, so sweet she sung.

The night-crone, with the melody alarm'd,

Now paus'd, now listen'd, and awhile was charm'd;

But like the man, whose frequent stubborn will

Resists what kind, seraphic sounds instil,

Her heart the love-inspiring voice repell'd,

Her breast with agitating mischief swell'd;

Which clos'd her ear, and tempted to destroy

The tuneful life, that charms with virtuous joy.

Now fast we measure back the trackless way;
 No friendly stars directive beams display.
 But lo!—a thousand lights shoot instant rays;
 Yon kindling rock reflects the startling blaze.
 I stand astonish'd—thus the hermit cries:
 Fear not, but listen with enlarg'd surprise!
 Still must these hours our mutual converse claim,
 And cease to echo still Olympia's name;
 Grotts, rivulets, groves, Olympia's name forget,
 Olympia now no sighing winds repeat.
 Can I be mortal, and those hours no more,
 Those amorous hours, that plaintive echoes bore?
 Am I the same? Ah no!—Behold a mind,
 Unruffled, firm, exalted, and refin'd!
 Late months, that made the vernal season gay,
 Saw my health languish off in pale decay.
 No racking pain yet gave disease a date;
 No sad, prefaceful thought preluded fate:
 Yet number'd were my days—My destin'd end
 Near, and more near—Nay, every fear suspend!
 I pass'd a weary, lingering, sleepless night:
 Then rose, to walk in morning's earliest light:
 But few my steps—a faint, and cheerless few!
 Refreshment from my flagging spirits flew.
 When, low, retir'd beneath a cypress shade,
 My limbs upon a flowery bank I laid,
 Soon by soft-creeping, murmuring winds compos'd,
 A slumber press'd my languid eyes—They clos'd:
 But clos'd not long—Methought Olympia spoke;
 Thrice loud she call'd, and thrice the slumber
 broke.

I wak'd. Forth-gliding from a neighbouring wood,
 Full in my view the shadowy charmer stood.
 Rapturous I started up to clasp the shade;
 But stagger'd, fell, and found my vitals fade:
 A mantling chillness o'er my bosom spread,
 As if that instant number'd with the dead.
 Her voice now sent afar, imperfect sound,
 When in a swimming trance my pangs were
 drown'd.

Still farther off she call'd—With soft surprise,
 I turn'd—but void of strength, and aid to rise;
 Short, shorter, shorter yet, my breath I drew:
 Then up my struggling soul unburden'd flew.
 Thus from a state, where sin and grief abide,
 Heaven summon'd me to mercy—thus I died.

He said. Th' astonishment with which I start,
 Like bolted ice runs shivering through my heart.
 Art thou not mortal then? I cried. But lo!
 His raiment lightens, and his features glow!
 In shady ringlets falls a length of hair;
 Embloom'd his aspect shines, enlarg'd his air.
 Mild from his eyes enlivening glories beam;
 Mild on his brow sits majesty supreme.
 Bright plumes of every dye, that round him flow,
 Vest, robe, and wings, in varied lustre show.
 He looks, and forward steps with mien divine;
 A grace celestial gives him all to shine.
 He speaks—Nature is ravish'd at the sound,
 The forests move, and streams stand listening
 round!

Thus he. As incorruption I assum'd,
 As instant in immortal youth I bloom'd!
 Renew'd, and chang'd, I felt my vital springs,
 With different lights discern'd the form of things;

To earth my passions fell like mists away,
 And reason open'd in eternal day.
 Swifter than thought from world to world I flew,
 Celestial knowledge shone in every view.
 My food was truth—what transport could I miss?
 My prospect, all infinitude of bliss.
 Olympia met me first, and, smiling gay,
 Onward to mercy led the shining way;
 As far transcendant to her wonted air,
 As her dear wonted self to many a fair!
 In voice, and form, beauty more beauteous shows,
 And harmony still more harmonious grows.
 She points out souls, who taught me friendship's
 charms,

They gaze, they glow, they spring into my arms!
 Well pleas'd, high ancestors my view command;
 Patrons and patriots all; a glorious band!
 Horatio too, by well-born fate refin'd,
 Shone out white-rob'd with saints, a spotless mind!
 What once, below, ambition made him miss,
 Humility here gain'd, a life of bliss!
 Though late, let sinners then from sin depart!
 Heaven never yet despis'd the contrite heart.
 Last shone, with sweet, exalted lustre grac'd,
 The seraph-bard, in highest order plac'd!
 Seers, lovers, legislators, prelates, kings,
 All raptur'd listen, as he raptur'd sings.
 Sweetness and strength his look and lays employ,
 Greet smiles with smiles, and every joy with joy:

Charmful he rose; his ever charming tongue
 Joy to our second hymeneals sung;
 Still as we pass'd, the bright, celestial throng
 Hail'd us in social love, and heavenly song.
 Of that no more! my deathless friendship see!
 I come an angel to the muse and thee.
 These lights, that vibrate, and promiscuous shine,
 Are emanations all of forms divine.
 And here the muse, though melted from thy
 gaze,

Stands among spirits, mingling rays with rays.
 If thou would'st peace attain, my words attend,
 The last, fond words of thy departed friend!
 True joy's a seraph, that to heaven aspires,
 Unhurt it triumphs mid' celestial choirs.
 But should no cares a mortal state molest,
 Life were a state of ignorance at best.

Know then, if ills oblige thee to retire,
 Those ills solemnity of thought inspire.
 Did not the soul abroad for objects roam,
 Whence could she learn to call ideas home?
 Justly to know thyself, peruse mankind;
 To know thy God, paint nature on thy mind:
 Without such science of the worldly scene,
 What is retirement?—Empty pride or spleen:
 But with it wisdom. There shall cares refine,
 Render'd by contemplation half-divine.
 Trust not the frantic, or mysterious guide,
 Nor stoop a captive to the schoolman's pride.
 On nature's wonders fix alone thy zeal!
 They dim not reason, when the truth reveal;
 So shall religion in thy heart endure,
 From all traditionary falsehood pure;
 So life make death familiar to thy eye,
 So shalt thou live, as thou may'st learn to die;

And, though thou view'st thy worst oppressor thrive,
From transient woe, immortal bliss derive.
Farewell---Nay, stop the parting tear!--I go!
But leave the muse thy comforter below.

He said. Instant his pinions upward soar,
He lessening as they rise, till seen no more.
While contemplation weigh'd the mystic view,
The lights all vanish'd, and the vision flew.

THE BASTARD:

INSCRIBED WITH ALL DUE REVERENCE TO

MRS. BRETT, ONCE COUNTESS OF MACCLESFIELD.

"Decet hæc dare dona Novercam." Ov. Met.

PREFACE.

THE reader will easily perceive these verses were begun, when my heart was gayer than it has been of late; and finished in hours of the deepest melancholy.

I hope the world will do me the justice to believe, that no part of this flows from any real anger against the Lady, to whom it is inscribed. Whatever undeserved severities I may have received at her hands, would she deal so candidly as acknowledge truth, she very well knows, by an experience of many years, that I have ever behaved myself towards her, like one who thought it his duty to support with patience all afflictions from that quarter. Indeed, if I had not been capable of forgiving a mother, I must have blushed to receive pardon myself at the hands of my Sovereign.

Neither, to say the truth, were the manner of my birth all, should I have any reason for complaint—When I am a little disposed to a gay turn of thinking, I consider, as I was a derelict from my cradle, I have the honour of a lawful claim to the best protection in Europe. For being a spot of earth, to which nobody pretends a title, I devolve naturally upon the king, as one of the rights of his royalty.

While I presume to name his Majesty, I look back, with confusion, upon the mercy I have lately experienced; because it is impossible to remember it, but with something I would fain forget, for the sake of my future peace, and alleviation of my past misfortune.

I owe my life to the royal pity, if a wretch can, with propriety, be said to live, whose days are fewer than his sorrows; and to whom death had been but a redemption from misery.

But I will suffer my pardon as my punishment, till that life, which has so graciously been given me, shall become considerable enough not to be useless in his service to whom it was forfeited. Under influence of these sentiments, with which his Majesty's great goodness has inspired me, I consider my loss of fortune and dignity as my happiness; to which, as I am born without ambition, I am thrown from them without repining—Possessing those advantages, my care had been, perhaps, how to enjoy life; by the want of them I am taught this nobler lesson, to study how to deserve it.

RICHARD SAVAGE.

IN gayer hours, when high my fancy ran,
The muse, exulting, thus her lay began.

Blest be the bastard's birth! through wondrous ways,

He shines eccentric like a comet's blaze!
No sickly fruit of faint compliance he!
He! stamp'd in nature's mint of ecstasy!
He lives to build, not boast, a generous race:
No tenth transmitter of a foolish face.
His daring hope, no fire's example bounds;
His first-born lights, no prejudice confounds.
He, kindling from within, requires no flame;
He glories in a bastard's glowing name.

Born to himself, by no possession led,
In freedom foster'd, and by fortune fed;
Nor guides, nor rules, his sovereign choice controul,
His body independent as his soul;
Loos'd to the world's wide range—enjoy'd no aim,
Prescrib'd no duty, and assign'd no name:
Nature's unbounded son, he stands alone,
His heart unbias'd, and his mind his own.

O mother, yet no mother! 'tis to you,
My thanks for such distinguish'd claims are due.
You, unenslav'd to nature's narrow laws,
Warm championess for freedom's sacred cause,
From all the dry devoirs of blood and line,
From ties maternal, moral and divine,
Discharg'd my grasping soul; push'd me from
shore,

And launch'd me into life without an oar.

What had I lost, if, conjugally kind,
By nature hating, yet by vows confin'd,
Untaught the matrimonial bounds to flight,
And coldly conscious of a husband's right,
You had faint-drawn me with a form alone,
A lawful lump of life by force your own!
Then, while your backward will retrench'd de-
fire,

And unconcurring spirits lent no fire,
I had been born your dull, domestic heir,
Load of your life, and motive of your care;
Perhaps been poorly rich, and meanly great,
The slave of pomp, a cypher in the state;
Lordly neglectful of a worth unknown,
And slumbering in a seat, by chance my own.

Far nobler blessings wait the bastard's lot;
Conceiv'd in rapture, and with fire begot!
Strong as necessity, he starts away,
Climbs against wrongs, and brightens into day.

Thus unprophetic, lately misinspir'd,
I sung: gay fluttering hope, my fancy fir'd;
Inly secure, through conscious scorn of ill,
Nor taught by wisdom, how to balance will,
Rashly deceiv'd, I saw no pits to shun,
But thought to purpose and to act were one;
Heedless what pointed cares pervert his way,
Whom caution arms not, and whom woes be-
tray;

But now, expos'd, and shrinking from distress,
I fly to shelter, while the tempests press;
My muse to grief resigns the varying tone,
The raptures languish, and the numbers groan.

O memory! thou soul of joy and pain!
Thou actor of our passions o'er again!
Why dost thou aggravate the wretch's woe?
Why add continuous smart to every blow?
Few are my joys; alas! how soon forgot!
On that kind quarter thou invad'st me not:
While sharp and numberless my sorrows fall;
Yet thou repeat'st, and multiply'st them all!

Is chance a guilt? that my disastrous heart,
For mischief never meant, must ever smart?
Can self-defence be sin!—Ah, plead no more!
What though no purpos'd malice stain'd thee o'er?
Had heaven befriended thy unhappy side,
Thou hadst not been provok'd—Or thou hadst died.

Far be the guilt of homeshed blood from all
On whom, unsought, embroiling dangers fall!
Still the pale dead revives, and lives to me,
To me! through pity's eye condemn'd to see.
Remembrance veils his rage, but swells his fate;
Griev'd I forgive, and am grown cool too late.
Young, and unthoughtful then; who knows, one
day,

What ripening virtues might have made their way!
He might have liv'd till folly died in shame,
Till kindling wisdom felt a thirst for fame.
He might perhaps his country's friend have prov'd;
Both happy, generous, candid, and belov'd,
He might have sav'd some worth, now doom'd
to fall;

And I, perchance, in him, have murder'd all.

O fate of late repentance! always vain:
Thy remedies but lull undying pain.
Where shall my hope find rest?—No mother's care
Shielded my infant innocence with prayer:
No father's guardian hand my youth maintain'd,
Call'd forth my virtues, or from vice restrain'd,
Is it not thine to snatch some powerful arm,
First to advance, then screen from future harm?
Am I return'd from death, to live in pain?
Or would imperial pity save in vain?

Distrust it not—What blame can mercy find,
Which gives at once a life, and rears a mind?
Mother, miscall'd, farewell—of soul severe,
This sad reflection yet may force one tear:
All I was wretched by to you I ow'd,
Alone from strangers every comfort flow'd!

Lost to the life you gave, your son no more,
And now adopted, who was doom'd before,
New-born, I may a nobler mother claim,
But dare not whisper her immortal name;
Supremely lovely, and serenely great!
Majestic mother of a kneeling state!
Queen of a people's heart, who ne'er before!
Agreed—yet now with one consent adore!
One contest yet remains in this desire,
Who most shall give applause, where all admire.

MISCELLANEOUS POEMS.

VERSES

Occasioned by the Right Honourable the Lady Viscountess Tyrconnel's recovery at Bath.

WHERE Thames with pride beholds Augusta's
charms,
And either India pours into her arms;
VOL. VIII.

Where liberty bids honest arts abound,
And pleasures dante in one eternal round;
High-thron'd appears the laughter-loving dame,
Goddess of mirth! Euphrosyne her name.
Her smile more cheerful than a vernal morn;
All life! all bloom! of youth and fancy born,
Touch'd into joy, what hearts to her submit!
She looks her fire, and speaks her mother's wit,

R r

O'er the gay world the sweet inspirer reigns;
Spleen flies, and elegance her pomp sustains.
Thee, goddess! thee! the fair and young obey;
Wealth, wit, love, music, all confess thy sway.
In the bleak wild ev'n want by thee is bless'd,
And pamp'ring pride without thee pines for rest.
The rich grow richer, while in thee they find
The matchless treasure of a smiling mind.
Science by thee flows soft in social ease,
And virtue, losing rigour, learns to please.

The goddess summons each illustrious name,
Bids the gay talk, and forms th' amusive game.
She, whose fair throne is fix'd in human souls,
From joy to joy her eye delighted rolls.
But where (she cried) is she, my favourite! she
Of all my race, the dearest far to me!
Whose life's the life of each refin'd delight?
She said—But no Tyrconnel glads her sight.
Swift sunk her laughing eyes in languid fear;
Swift rose the swelling sigh, and trembling tear.
In kind low murmurs all the loss deplore!
Tyrconnel droops, and pleasure is no more.

The goddess, silent, paus'd in musel air;
But mirth, like virtue, cannot long despair.
Celestial-hinted thoughts gay hope inspir'd,
Smiling she rose, and all with hope were fir'd.
Where Bath's ascending turrets meet her eyes;
Straight wafted on the tepid breeze she flies,
She flies, her elder sister health to find;
She finds her on the mountain-brow reclin'd.
Around her birds in earliest concert sing;
Her cheek the semblance of the kindling spring;
Fresh-tinctur'd like a summer-evening sky,
And a mild sun sits smiling in her eye.
Loose to the wind her verdant vestments flow;
Her limbs yet recent from the springs below;
There oft she bathes, then peaceful sits secure,
Where every gale is fragrant, fresh, and pure;
Where flowers and herbs their cordial odours
blend,

And all their balmy virtues fast ascend.

Hail, sister, hail! (the kindred goddess cries)
No common suppliant stands before your eyes.
You, with whose living breath the morn is fraught,
Flush the fair cheek, and point the cheerful
thought!

Strength, vigour, wit, depriv'd of thee, decline!
Each finer sense, that forms delight, is thine!
Bright suns by thee diffuse a brighter blaze,
And the fresh green a fresher green displays!
Without thee pleasures die, or dully cloy,
And life with thee, how'er depress'd, is joy.
Such thy vast power!—The deity replies,
Mirth never asks a boon, which health denies,
Our mingled gifts transcend imperial wealth;
Health strengthens mirth, and mirth inspirits
health. [are mine;

These gales, yon springs, herbs, flowers, and sun,
Thine is their smile! be all their influence thine.

Euphrosyne rejoins—Thy friendship prove!
See the dear, sickening object of my love!
Shall that warm heart, so cheerful ev'n in pain,
So form'd to please, unpleas'd itself remain?
Sister! in her my smile anew display,
And all the social world shall bless thy sway.

Swift, as she speaks, health spreads the purple wing,
Soars in the colour'd clouds, and sheds the spring:
Now bland and sweet she floats along in air;
Air feels, and softening own th' æthereal fair!
In still descent she melts on opening flowers,
And deep impregnates plants with genial showers,
The genial showers, new-ising to the ray,
Exhale in roseate clouds, and glad the day.
Now in a zephyr's borrow'd voice she sings,
Sweeps the fresh dew, and shakes them from her
wings,

Shakes them embalm'd; or, in a gentle kiss,
Breathes the sure earnest of awakening bliss.
Sapphira feels it, with a soft surprise,
Glide through her veins, and quicken in her eyes!

Instant in her own form the goddess glows,
Where, bubbling warm, the mineral water flows;
Then, plunging, to the flood new virtue gives;
Steeps every charm; and, as she bathes, it lives!
As from her locks she sheds the vital shower,
'Tis done! (she cries) these springs possess my power!

Let these immediate to thy darling roll
Health, vigour, life, and gay returning soul.
Thou smil'st Euphrosyne; and conscious see,
Prompt to thy smile, how nature joys with thee.
All is green life! all beauty rosy bright;
Full harmony, young love, and dear delight!
See vernal hours lead circling joys along!
All sun, all bloom, all fragrance, and all song!

Receive thy care! Now mirth and health combine.

Each heart shall gladden, and each virtue shine.
Quick to Augusta bear thy prize away;
There let her smile, and bid a world be gay.

AN EPISTLE

To the Right Honourable Sir Robert Walpole.

STILL let low wits, who sense nor honour prize,
Sneer at all gratitude, all truth disguise;
At living worth, because alive, exclaim,
Insult the exil'd, and the dead defame!
Such paint, what pity veils in private woes,
And what we see with grief, with mirth expose;
Studious to urge—(whom will mean authors spare?)

The child's, the parent's, and the consort's tear;
Unconscious of what pangs the heart may rend,
To lose what they have ne'er deserv'd—a friend.
Such, ignorant of facts, invent, relate,
Expos'd persist, and answer'd still debate:
Such, but by foils, the clearest lustre see,
And deem aspersing others, praising thee.
Far from these tracks my honest lays aspire,
And greet a generous heart with generous fire.
Truth be my guide! Truth, which thy virtue claims!

This, nor the poet, nor the patron shames!
When party minds shall lose contracted views,
And history question the recording muse;
'Tis this alone to after-times must shine,
And stamp the poet and his theme divine.

Long has my muse, from many a mournful cause,
Sung with small power, nor sought sublime applause;

[scope;
From that great point she now shall urge her
On that fair promise rest her future hope;
Where policy, from state illusion clear,
Can through an open aspect shine sincere;
Where science, law, and liberty depend,
And own the patron, patriot, and the friend;
(That breast to feel, that eye on worth to gaze,
That smile to cherish, and that hand to raise!)
Whose best of hearts her best of thoughts inflame,
Whose joy is bounty, and whose gift is fame.

Where, for relief, flies innocence distress'd?
To you, who chase oppression from th' oppress'd:
Who, when complaint to you alone belongs,
Forgive your own, though not a people's wrongs:
Who still make public property your care,
And thence bid private grief no more despair.

Ask they what state your sheltering care shall own?

'Tis youth, 'tis age, the cottage, and the throne:
Nor can the prison 'scape your searching eye,
Your ear still opening to the captive's cry.
Nor less was promis'd from thy early skill,
Ere power enforc'd benevolence of will!
To friends refin'd; thy private life adher'd,
By thee improving, ere by thee prefer'd.
Well hadst thou weigh'd what truth such friends afford;

With thee resigning, and with thee restor'd.
Thou taught'st them all extensive love to bear,
And now mankind with thee their friendship share.

As the rich cloud by due degrees expands,
And showers down plenty thick on sundry lands,
Thy spreading worth in various bounty fell,
Made genius flourish, and made art excel.

How many, yet deceiv'd, all power oppose?
Their fears increasing, as decrease their woes;
Jealous of bondage, while they freedom gain,
And most oblig'd, most eager to complain.

But well we count our bliss, if well we view,
When power oppression, not protection grew;
View present ills that punish distant crimes;
Or bleed in memory here from ancient times.

Mark first the robe abus'd religion wore,
Story'd with griefs, and stain'd with human gore!
What various tortures, engines, fires, reveal,
Study'd, empower'd, and sanctify'd by zeal?

Stop here, my muse!—Peculiar woes descry!
Bid them in sad succession strike thy eye!
Lo, to her eye the sad succession springs!
She looks, she weeps, and, as she weeps, she sings.
See the doom'd Hebrew of his stores bereft!
See holy murder justify the theft!

His ravag'd gold some useless shrine shall raise,
His gems on superstitious idols blaze!
His wife, his babe, deny'd their little home,
Stripp'd, starv'd, unfriended, and unpity'd roam.

Lo, the priest's hand the wafer-god supplies!—
A king by consecrated poison dies!

See learning range yon broad ethereal plain,
From world to world, and godlike science gain!
Ah! what avails the curious search sustain'd,
The finish'd toil, the godlike science gain'd?

Sentenc'd to flames th' expansive wisdom fell,
And truth from heaven was sorcery from hell.

See reason bid each mystic wile retire, [mire!
Strike out new light! and mark!—the wise ad-
Zeal shall such heresy, like learning, hate;
The same their glory, and the same their fate.

Lo, from sought mercy, one his life receives!
Life, worse than death, that cruel mercy gives:
The man, perchance, who wealth and honours bore,
Slaves in the mine, or ceaseless strains the oar.
So doom'd are these, and such, perhaps, our doom,
Own'd we a prince, avert it heaven! from Rome.

Nor private worth alone false zeal assails;
Whole nations bleed when bigotry prevails.
What are sworn friendships? What are kindred ties?

What's faith with heresy? (the zealot cries.)
See, when war sinks, the thundering cannons roar;
When wounds, and death, and discord are no
more;

When music bids undreading joys advance,
Swell the soft hour, and turn the swimming dance:
When, to crown these, the social sparkling bowl
Lifts the cheer'd sense, and pours out all the soul;
Sudden he sends red massacre abroad;
Faithless to man, to prove his faith to God.
What pure persuasive eloquence denies,
All drunk with blood, the arguing sword supplies;
The sword, which to th' assassin's hand is given!
Th' assassin's hand!—pronounc'd the hand of heaven!

Sex bleeds with sex, and infancy with age;
No rank, no place, no virtue, stops his rage;
Shall sword, and flame, and devastation cease,
To please with zeal, wild zeal! the God of Peace?

Nor less abuse has scourg'd the civil state,
When a king's will became a nation's fate,
Enormous power! Nor noble, nor serene;
Now fierce and cruel; now but wild and mean.
See titles sold, to raise th' unjust supply!
Compell'd the purchase! or be fin'd, or buy!
No public spirit, guarded well by laws,
Uncensur'd censures in his country's cause.
See from the merchant forc'd th' unwilling loan!
Who dares deny, or deem his wealth his own?
Denying, see! where dungeon damp arise,
Diseas'd he pines, and unassisted dies.
Far more than massacre that fate accurst!
As of all deaths the lingering is the worst.

New courts of censure griev'd with new offence,
Tax'd without power, and fin'd without pretence,
Explains, at will, each statute's wrested aim,
Till marks of merit were the marks of shame;
So monstrous!—Life was the severest grief,
And the worst death seem'd welcome for relief.

In vain the subject sought redress from law,
No senate liv'd the partial judge to awe:
Senates were void, and senators confin'd
For the great cause of nature and mankind;
Who kings superior to the people own;
Yet prove the law superior to the throne.

Who can review without a generous tear,
A church, a state, so impious, so severe;
A land uncultur'd through polemic jars,
Rich!—but with carnage from intestine wars;

The hand of industry employ'd no more,
 And commerce flying to some safer shore;
 All property reduc'd, to power a prey,
 And sense and learning chas'd by zeal away?
 Who honours not each dear departed ghost,
 That strove for liberty so won, so lost:
 So well regain'd when godlike William rose,
 And first entail'd the blessing George bestows?
 May Walpole still the growing triumph raise,
 And bid these emulate Eliza's days;
 Still serve a prince, who, o'er his people great,
 As far transcends in virtue, as in state!

The muse pursues thee to thy rural seat;
 Ev'n there shall liberty inspire retreat.
 When solemn cares in flowing wit are drown'd,
 And sportive chat and social laughs go round:
 Ev'n then, when pausing mirth begins to fail,
 The converse varies to the serious tale.
 The tale pathetic speaks some wretch that owes
 To some deficient law reliefless woes.
 What instant pity warms thy generous breast!
 How all the legislator stands confess'd!
 Now springs the hint! 'tis now improv'd to thought!

Now ripe! and now to public welfare brought!
 New bills, which regulating means bestow,
 Justice preserve, yet softening mercy know:
 Justice shall low vexatious wiles decline,
 And still thrive most, when lawyers most repine,
 Justice from jargon shall refin'd appear,
 To knowledge through our native language clear.
 Hence we may learn, no more deceiv'd by law,
 Whence wealth and life their best assurance draw.

The freed insolvent, with industrious hand,
 Strives yet to satisfy the just demand:
 Thus ruthless men, who would his powers restrain,

Oft what severity would lose obtain.
 These, and a thousand gifts, thy thought acquires,

Which liberty benevolent inspires.
 From liberty the fruits of law increase,
 Plenty, and joy, and all the arts of peace.
 Abroad the merchant, while the tempests rave,
 Adventurous sails, nor fears the wind and wave;
 At home untir'd we find th' auspicious hand
 With flocks, and herds, and harvests, bless the land:
 While there, the peasant glads the grateful soil,
 Here mark the shipwright, there the mason toil,
 Hew, square, and rear, magnificent, the stone,
 And give our oaks a glory not their own!
 What life demands by this obeys her call,
 And added elegance consummates all.
 Thus stately cities, statelier navies rise,
 And spread our grandeur under distant skies.
 From liberty each nobler science sprung,
 A Bacon brighten'd, and a Spenser sung:
 A Clarke and Locke new tracks of truth explore,
 And Newton reaches heights unreach'd before.

What trade fees property that wealth maintain,
 What industry no longer dreads to gain;
 What tender conscience kneels with fears resign'd,
 Enjoys her worship, and avows her mind;
 What genius now from want to fortune climbs,
 And to safe science every thought sublimed;

What royal power, from his superior state,
 Sees public happiness his own create;
 But kens those patriot souls, to which he owes
 Of old each source, whence now each blessing
 flows?

And if such spirits from their heaven descend,
 And blended flame, to point one glorious end;
 Flame from one breast, and thence to Britain shine,
 What love, what praise, O Walpole, then is thine?

THE VOLUNTEER LAUREAT.

No. I.

On her Majesty's Birth-day, 1731-2.

TWICE twenty tedious moons have roll'd away,
 Since hope, kind flatterer! tun'd my pensive lay,
 Whispering, that you, who rais'd me from despair,
 Meant, by your smiles, to make life worth my
 care;

With pitying hand an orphan's tears to screen,
 And o'er the motherless extend the queen.
 'Twill be—the prophet guides the poet's strain!
 Grief never touch'd a heart like your's in vain:
 Heaven gave you power, because you love to bless;
 And pity, when you feel it, is redress.

Two fathers join'd to rob my claim of one!
 My mother too thought fit to have no son!
 The senate next, whose aid the helpless own,
 Forgot my infant wrongs, and mine alone!
 Yet parents pityless, nor peers unkind,
 Nor titles lost, nor woes mysterious join'd,
 Strip me of hope—by heav'n thus lowly laid,
 To find a Pharaoh's daughter in the shade.

You cannot hear unmov'd, when wrongs im-
 plore,
 Your heart is woman, though your mind be more;
 Kind, like the power who gave you to our prayers,
 You would not lengthen life to sharpen cares;
 They, who a barren leave to live bestow,
 Snatch but from death to sacrifice to woe.
 Hated by her from whom my life I drew,
 Whence should I hope, if not from heaven and you?
 Nor dare I groan beneath affliction's rod,
 My queen my mother, and my father—God.

The pitying muses saw me wit pursue;
 A bastard-son, alas! on that side too,
 Did not your eyes exalt the poet's fire,
 And what the muse denies, the queen inspire?
 While rising thus your heavenly soul to view,
 I learn, how angels think, by copying you.

Great princess! 'tis decreed—once every year
 I march uncall'd your Laureat Volunteer;
 Thus shall your poet his low genius raise, [praise.
 And charm the world with truths too vast for
 Nor need I dwell on glories all your own,
 Since surer means to tempt your smiles are known;
 Your poet shall allot your lord his part,
 And paint him in his noblest throne—your heart.

Is there a greatness that adorns him best,
 A rising wish, that ripens in his breast?

Has he foremeant some distant age to bless,
 Disarm oppression, or expel distress?
 Plans he some scheme to reconcile mankind,
 People the seas, and busy every wind?
 Would he by pity the deceiv'd reclaim,
 And smile contending factions into shame?
 Would his example lend his laws a weight,
 And breathe his own soft morals o'er his state?
 The muse shall find it all, shall make it seen,
 And teach the world his praise, to charm his queen.

Such be the annual truths my verse imparts,
 Nor frown, fair favourite of a people's hearts!
 Happy if, plac'd, perchance, beneath your eye,
 My muse, unpension'd, might her pinions try;
 Fearless to fail, whilst you indulge her flame,
 And bid me proudly boast your Laureat's name;
 Renobled thus by wreaths my queen bestows,
 I lose all memory of wrongs and woes.

No. II.

On her Majesty's Birth-day, 1732-3.

"GREAT princess, 'tis decreed! once every year,
 "I march uncall'd, your Laureat Volunteer."
 So sung the muse; nor sung the muse in vain:
 My queen accepts, the year renews the strain.
 Ere first your influence shone with heavenly aid,
 Each thought was terror; for each view was shade.
 Fortune to life each flowery path deny'd;
 No science learn'd to bloom, no lay to glide.
 Instead of hallow'd hill, or vocal vale,
 Or stream, sweet-echoing to the tuneful tale;
 Damp dens confin'd, or barren deserts spread,
 With spectres haunted, and the muses fled;
 Ruins in pensive emblem seem to rise,
 And all was dark, or wild, to fancy's eyes.

But hark! a gladdening voice all nature cheers!
 Disperse, ye glooms! a day of joy appears!
 Hail, happy day!--'Twas on thy glorious morn,
 The first, the fairest of her sex was born!
 How swift the change! Cold, wintery sorrows fly!
 Where'er she looks, delight surrounds the eye!
 Mild shines the sun, the woodlands warble round,
 The vales sweet echo, sweet the rocks resound!
 In cordial air, soft fragrance floats along;
 Each scene is verdure, and each voice is song!

Shoot from your orb divine, ye quickening rays!
 Boundless, like her benevolence, ye blaze!
 Soft emblems of her bounty, fall ye showers!
 And sweet ascend, and fair unfold ye flowers!
 Ye roses, lilies, you we earliest claim,
 In whiteness, and in fragrance, match her fame!
 'Tis yours to fade, to fame like hers is due
 Undying sweets, and bloom for ever new.
 Ye blossoms, that one varied landscape rise,
 And send your scentful tribute to the skies;
 Diffusive like yon royal branches smile,
 Grace the young year, and glad the grateful isle!
 Attend, ye muses! mark the feather'd quires!
 Those the spring wakes, as you the queen inspires

O, let her praise for ever swell your song!
 Sweet let your sacred streams the notes prolong,

Clear, and more clear, through all my lays refine;
 And there let heaven and her reflected shine!

As, when chill blights from vernal suns retire,
 Cheerful the vegetative world aspire,
 Put forth unfolding blooms, and waving try
 Th' enlivening influence of a milder sky;
 So gives her birth (like yon approaching spring)
 The land to flourish, and the muse to sing.

'Twas thus, Zenobia, on Palmyra's throne,
 In learning, beauty, and in virtue shone;
 Beneath her rose, Longinus, in thy name,
 The poet's, critic's, and the patriot's fame!
 Is there (so high be you, great princess, prais'd)
 A woe unpitied, or a worth unrais'd?
 Art learns to soar by your sweet influence taught;
 In life well cherish'd; nor in death forgot:
 In death, as life, the learn'd your goodness tell!
 Witness the sacred busts of Richmond's cell!
 Sages, who in unfading light will shine;
 Who grasp'd at science, like your own, divine!

The muse, who hails with song this glorious morn,
 Now looks through days, through months, through years unborn;

All white they rise, and in their course express'd
 A king by kings rever'd, by subjects blest!
 A queen, where'er true greatness spreads in fame;
 Where learning towers beyond her sex's aim;
 Where pure religion no extreme can touch,
 Of faith too little, or of zeal too much;
 Where these behold, as on this blest'd of morns,
 What love protects them, and what worth adorns;
 Where'er diffusive goodness smiles, a queen
 Still prais'd with rapture, as with wonder seen!

See nations round, of every wish possess'd!
 Life in each eye, and joy in every breast!
 Shall I, on what I lightly touch'd, explain?
 Shall I (vain thought!) attempt the finish'd strain?
 No!—let the poet stop unequal lays,
 And to the just historian yield your praise.

No. III.

On her Majesty's Birth-day, 1734-5.

In youth no parent nurs'd my infant songs,
 'Twas mine to be inspir'd alone by wrongs;
 Wrongs, that with life their fierce attack began,
 Drank infant tears, and still pursue the man.
 Life scarce is life—Dejection all is mine;
 The power, that loves in lonely shades to pine;
 Of fading cheek, of unelated views;
 Whose weaken'd eyes the rays of hope refuse.
 'Tis mine the mean, inhuman pride to find;
 Who shuns th' oppress'd, to fortune only kind;
 Whose pity's insult, and whose cold respect
 Is keen as scorn, ungenerous as neglect.
 Void of benevolent, obliging grace,
 Ev'n dubious friendship half averts his face.
 Thus sunk in sickness, thus with woes oppress'd,
 How shall the fire awake within my breast?
 How shall the muse her flagging pinions raise?
 How tune her voice to Carolina's praise?
 From jarring thought no tuneful raptures flow;
 These with fair days and gentle seasons glow;

Such give alone sweet Philomel to sing,
And Philomel's the poet of the spring.

But soft, my soul! see yon celestial light!
Before whose lambent lustre breaks the night.
It glads me like the morning clad in dews,
And beams reviving from the vernal muse:
Inspiring joyous peace, 'tis she! 'tis she!
A stranger long to misery and me.

Her verdant mantle gracefully declines,
And, flower-embroider'd, as it varies, shines.
To form her garland, zephyr, from his wing,
Throws the first flowers and foliage of the spring.
Her looks how lovely! health and joy have lent
Bloom to her cheek, and to her brow content.
Behold, sweet-beaming her ethereal eyes!
Soft as the Pleiades o'er the dewy skies.
She blunts the point of care, alleviates woes,
And pours the balm of comfort and repose;
Bids the heart yield to virtue's silent call,
And shows ambition's sons mere children all;
Who hunt for toys which please with tinsel shine;
For which they squabble, and for which they pine.
Oh, hear her voice, more mellow than the gale,
That breath'd through shepherd's pipe enchants
the vale!

Hark! she invites from city smoke and noise,
Vapours impure, and from impurer joys;
From various evils, that, with rage combin'd,
Untune the body, and pollute the mind:
From crowds, to whom no social faith belongs,
Who tread one circle of deceit and wrongs;
With whom politeness is but civil guile,
And laws oppress, exerted by the vile.
To this oppos'd, the muse presents the scene;
Where sylvan pleasures ever smiles serene;
Pleasures that emulate the blest above,
Health, innocence, and peace, the muse, and love;
Pleasures that ravish, while alternate wrought
By friendly converse, and abstracted thought.
These soothe my throbbing breast. No loss I mourn;
Though both from riches and from grandeur torn.
Weep I cruel mother? No—I've seen,
From heaven, a pitying, a maternal queen.
One gave me life; but would no comfort grant;
She more than life resum'd by giving want.
Would she the being which she gave destroy?
My queen gives life, and bids me hope for joy.
Honours and wealth I cheerfully resign;
If competence, if learned ease be mine!
If I by mental, heart-felt joys be fir'd,
And in the vale by all the muse inspir'd!

Here cease my plaint—See yon enlivening scenes!
Child of the spring! Behold the best of queens!
Softness and beauty rose this heavenly morn,
Dawn'd wisdom, and benevolence was born.
Joy, o'er a people, in her influence rose;
Like that which spring o'er rural nature throws.
War to the peaceful pipe resigns his roar,
And breaks his billows on some distant shore.
Domestic discord sinks beneath her smile,
And arts, and trade, and plenty, glad the isle.
Lo, industry surveys, with feasted eyes,
His due reward, a plenteous harvest rise!
Nor (taught by commerce) joys in that alone;
But sees the harvest of a world his own.

Hence thy just praise, thou mild, majestic Thames!
Rich river! richer than Pactolus' streams!
Than those renown'd of yore, by poets roll'd
O'er intermingled pearls, and sands of gold.
How glorious thou, when from old ocean's urn,
Loaded with India's wealth, thy waves return!
Alive thy banks! along each bordering line,
High cultur'd blooms, inviting villas shine:
And while around ten thousand beauties glow,
These still o'er those redoubling lustre throw.

"Come then (so whisper'd the indulgent muse)
"Come then, in Richmond groves thy sorrows
"lose!
"Come then, and hymn this day! The pleasing scene
"Shows, in each view, the genius of thy queen.
"Hear nature whispering in the breeze her song!
"Hear her sweet warbling through the feather'd
"throng!
"Come, with the warbling world thy notes unite,
"And with the vegetable smile delight!
"Sure such a scene and song will soon restore
"Lost quiet, and give bliss unknown before;
"Receive it grateful, and adore, when given,
"The goodness of thy parent, queen, and heaven!
"With me each private virtue lifts the voice;
"While public spirit bids a land rejoice:
"O'er all thy queen's benevolence descends,
"And wide o'er all her vital light extends.
"As winter softens into spring, to you
"Blooms fortune's season, through her smile, anew.
"Still for past bounty, let new lays impart
"The sweet effusions of a grateful heart!
"Cast through the telescope of hope your eye!
"There goodness infinite, supreme, descry!
"From him that ray of virtue stream'd on earth,
"Which kindled Caroline's bright soul to birth.
"Behold, he spreads one universal spring!
"Mortals, transform'd to angels, then shall sing;
"Oppression then shall fly with want and shame,
"And blessing and existence be the same!"

No. IV.

On her Majesty's Birth-Day, 1735-6.

Lo! the mild sun salutes the opening spring,
And gladdening nature calls the muse to sing;
Gay chirp the birds, the bloomy sweets exhale,
And health, and song, and fragrance fill the gale,
Yet, mildest suns, to me are pain severe,
And music's self is discord to my ear!
I, jocund spring, unsympathising, see,
And health, that comes to all, comes not to me.
Dear health once fled, what spirits can I find!
What solace meet, when fled my peace of mind?
From absent books what studious hint devise?
From absent friends, what aid to thought can rise?
A genius whisper'd in my ear—Go seek
Some man of state!—The muse your wrongs may speak.
But will such listen to the plaintive strain?
The happy seldom heed th' unhappy's pain.
To wealth, to honours, wherefore was I born?
Why left to poverty, repulse, and scorn?

Why was I form'd of elegant desires?
Thought, which beyond a vulgar flight aspires!
Why, by the proud, and wicked, crush'd to earth?
Better the day of death, than day of birth!

Thus I exclaim'd: a little cherub smil'd; [child!
"Hope, I am call'd (said he), a heaven-born
Wrongs sure you have; complain you justly may:
But let wild sorrow whirl not thought away!
No—trust to honour! that you ne'er will stain
From peerage-blood, which fires your filial vein.
Trust more to Providence! from me ne'er swerve!
Once to distrust, is never to deserve.

Did not this day a Caroline disclose?
I promis'd at her birth, and blessing rose!
(Blessing, o'er all the letter'd world to shine,
In knowledge clear, beneficence divine!)
'Tis hers, as mine, to chase away despair;
Woe undeserv'd is her peculiar care.

Her bright benevolence sends me to grief:
On want sheds bounty, and on wrong relief."

Then calm-ey'd Patience, born of angel-kind,
Open'd a dawn of comfort on my mind.
With her came Fortitude, of godlike air!
These arm to conquer ills; at least to bear: [dain,
Arm'd thus, my queen, while wayward fates or-
My life to lengthen, but to lengthen pain;
Your bard, his sorrows with a smile endures;
Since to be wretched, is—to be made yours.

No. V.

On her Majesty's Birth-day, 1736-7.

Ye spirits bright, that æther rove,
That breathe the vernal soul of love;
Bid health descend in balmy dews,
And life in every gale diffuse;
That give the flowers to shine, the birds to sing;
Oh, glad this natal day, the prime of spring!
The virgin snow-drop first appears;
Her golden head the crocus rears.
The flowery tribe, profuse and gay,
Spread to the soft, inviting ray.
So arts shall bloom by Carolina's smile,
So shall her fame waft fragrance o'er the isle.
The warblers various, sweet and clear,
From bloomy sprays salute the year.
O muse, awake! ascend, and sing!
Hail the fair rival of the spring!
To woodland honours woodland hymns belong;
To her, the pride of arts! the muse's song.
Kind, as of late her clement sway,
The season sheds a trepid ray.
The storms of Boreas rave no more;
The storms of faction cease to roar,
At vernal suns as wintery tempests cease,
She, lovely power! smiles faction into peace.

No. VI.

FOR THE FIRST OF MARCH, 1737-8.

Sacred to the Memory of her late Majesty, humbly addressed to his Majesty.

ORT has the muse, on this distinguish'd day,
Tun'd to glad harmony the vernal lay;

But, O lamented change! the lay must flow
From grateful rapture now to grateful woe.
She, to this day, who joyous lustre gave,
Descends for ever to the silent grave.
She, born at once to charm us and to mend,
Of human race the pattern and the friend.
To be or fondly or severely kind,
To check the rash or prompt the better mind,
Parents shall learn from her, and thus shall draw
From filial love alone a filial awe.
Who seek in avarice wisdom's art to save;
Who often squander, yet who never gave;
From her these knew the righteous mean to find,
And the mild virtue stole on half mankind.
The lavish now caught frugal wisdom's lore,
Yet still, the more they sav'd, bestow'd the more.
Now misers learn'd at others woes to melt,
And saw and wonder'd at the change they felt.
The generous, when on her they turn'd their
view,

The generous ev'n themselves more generous grew,
Learn'd the shunn'd haunts of shame-fac'd want to trace

To goodness, delicacy, adding grace,
The conscious cheek no rising blush confess'd,
Nor dwelt one thought to pain the modest breast;
Kind and more kind did thus her bounty shower,
And knew no limit but a bounded power.
This truth the widow's sighs, alas! proclaim;
For this the orphan's tears embalm her fame.
The wise beheld her learning's summit gain,
Yet never giddy grow, nor ever vain:
But on one science point a steadfast eye,
That science—how to live and how to die.

Say, Memory, while to thy grateful sight
Arise her virtues in unfading light,
What joys were ours, what sorrows now remain:
Ah! how sublime the bliss! how deep the pain!
And thou, bright princess, seated now on high,
Next one, the fairest daughter of the sky,
Whose warm-felt love is to all beings known,
Thy sister Charity next her thy throne;
See at thy tomb the Virtues weeping lie!
There in dumb sorrow seem the Arts to die.
So were the sun o'er other orbs to blaze,
And from our world, like thee, withdraw his rays,
No more to visit where he warm'd before,
All life must cease, and nature be no more.
Yet shall the muse a heavenly height essay
Beyond the weakness mix'd with mortal clay;
Beyond the loss, which, though she bleeds to see,
Though ne'er to be redeem'd, the loss of thee!
Beyond ev'n this, she hails with joyous lay,
Thy better birth, thy first true natal day;
A day, that sees thee borne beyond the tomb,
To endless health, to youth's eternal bloom;
Borne to the mighty dead, the souls sublime
Of every famous age, and every clime;
To goodness fix'd by truth's unvarying laws,
To bliss that knows no period, knows no pause—
Save when thine eye, from yonder pure serene,
Sheds a soft eye on this our gloomy scene.

With me now liberty and learning mourn,
From all relief, like thy lov'd consort, torn;

For where can prince or people hope relief,
When each contend to be supreme in grief?
So vy'd thy virtues, that could point the way,
So well to govern; yet so well obey.

Deign one look more! ah! see thy comfort dear
Wishing all hearts, except his own, to cheer.
Lo! still he bids thy wonted bounty flow
To weeping families of worth and woe.
He stops all tears, however fast they rise,
Save those that still must fall from grateful eyes,
And, spite of griefs that so usurp his mind,
Still watches o'er the welfare of mankind.

Father of those, whose rights thy care defends,
Still most their own, when most their sovereign's friends;

Then chiefly brave, from bondage chiefly free,
When most they trust, when most they copy thee;
Ah! let the lowest of thy subjects pay
His honest heart-felt tributary lay;
In anguish happy, if permitted here,
One sigh to vent, to drop one virtuous tear;
Happier, if pardon'd, should he wildly moan,
And with a monarch's sorrow mix his own.

OF PUBLIC SPIRIT

IN REGARD TO PUBLIC WORKS:

An Epistle to his Royal Highness Frederic Prince of Wales.

CONTENTS.

Of reservoirs, and their use; of draining fens, and building bridges, cutting canals, repairing harbours, and stopping inundations, making rivers navigable, building light-houses; of agriculture, gardening, and planting for the noblest uses; of commerce; of public roads; of public buildings, viz. squares, streets, mansions, palaces, courts of justice, senate-houses, theatres, hospitals, churches, colleges; the variety of worthies produced by the latter; of colonies. The slave-trade censured, &c.

GREAT hope of Britain!—Here the muse essays
A theme, which, to attempt alone, is praise.
Be her's a zeal of public spirit known!
A princely zeal!—a spirit all your own!

Where never science beam'd a friendly ray,
Where one vast blank neglected nature lay;
From public spirit there, by arts employ'd,
Creation, varying, glads the cheerless void,
Hail, arts! where safety, treasure, and delight,
On land, on wave, in wondrous works unite!
Those wondrous works, O muse! successive raise,
And point their worth, their dignity, and praise!

What though no streams, magnificently play'd,
Rise a proud column, fall a grand cascade;
Through nether pipes, which nobler use renowns,
Lo! ductile rivulets visit distant towns!

Now vanish fens, whence vapours rise no more,
Whose agueish influence tainted heaven before.
The solid isthmus sinks a watery space,
And wonders, in new state, at naval grace.
Where the flood deepening rolls, or wide extends,
From road to road yon arch, connective bends:
Where ports were chok'd; where mounds in vain,
arose;

There harbours open, and there breaches close;
To keels, obedient, spreads each liquid plain,
And bulwark moles repel the boisterous main.
When the sunk sun no homeward sail befriends,
On the rock's brow the light-house kind ascends,
And from the shoaly, o'er the gulfy way,
Points to the pilot's eye the warning ray.

Count still, my muse (to count, what muse can cease?)

The works of public spirit, freedom, peace!
By them shall plants, in forests, reach the skies;
Then lose their leafy pride, and navies rise.
(Navies, which to invasive foes explain,
Heaven throws not round us rocks and seas in vain):
The sail of commerce in each sky aspires,
And property assures what toil acquires.

Who digs the mine or quarry, digs with glee;
No slave!—His option and his gain are free:
Him the same laws the same protection yield,
Who ploughs the furrow, or who owns the field.

Unlike, where tyranny the rod maintains
O'er turfless, leafless, and uncultur'd plains,
Here herbs of food and physic plenty showers.
Gives fruits to blush, and colours various flowers.
Where sands or stony wilds once starv'd the year,
Laughs the green lawn, and nods the golden ear:
White shine the fleecy race, which fate shall doom
The feast of life, the treasure of the loom.

On plains now bare shall gardens wave their
groves;

While settling songsters woo their feather'd loves.
Where pathless woods no grateful openings knew,
Walks tempt the step, and vistas court the view.
See the parterre confess expansive day;
The grot, elusive of the noon-tide ray.
Up yon green slope a length of terrace lies,
Whence gradual landscapes fade in distant skies.
Now the blue lake reflected heaven displays;
Now darkens, regularly-wild, the maze.
Urns, obelisks, fanes, statues intervene;
Now centre, now commence, or end the scene.
Lo, proud alcoves! lo, soft sequester'd bowers!
Retreats of social, or of studious hours!
Rank above rank here shapely greens ascend;
There others natively-grotesque depend.
The rude, the delicate, immingled tell
How art would nature, nature art excel;
And how, while these their rival charms impart,
Art brightens nature, nature brightens art;
Thus, in the various, yet harmonious space,
Blend order, symmetry, and force, and grace.

When these from public spirit smile, we see
Free-opening gates, and bowery pleasures free;
For sure great souls one truth can never miss,
Bliss not communicated is not bliss.

Thus public spirit, liberty, and peace,
Carve, build, and plant, and give the land increase;

From peasant hands imperial works arise,
 And British hence with Roman grandeur vies;
 Not grandeur that in pompous whim appears,
 That levels hills, that vales to mountains rears;
 That alters nature's regulated grace,
 Meaning to deck, but destin'd to deface.
 Though no proud gates, with China's taught to vie,
 Magnificently useless strike the eye;
 (Useless, where rocks a surer barrier lend,
 Where seas encircle, and where fleets defend;)
 What though no arch of triumph is assign'd
 To laurel'd pride, whose sword has thinn'd mankind;

Though no vast wall extends from coast to coast,
 No pyramid aspires, sublimely lost;
 Yet the safe road through rocks shall winding tend,
 And the firm causeway o'er the clays ascend.
 Lo! stately streets, lo! ample squares invite
 The salutary gale, that breathes delight.
 Lo! structures mark the charitable soil
 For casual ill, maim'd valour, feeble toil
 Worn out with care, infirmity, and age;
 The life here entering, quitting there the stage:
 The babe of lawless birth, doom'd else to moan,
 To starve or bleed for errors not his own!
 Let the frail mother 'scape the fame defil'd,
 If from the murdering mother 'scape the child!
 Oh! guard his youth from sin's alluring voice;
 From deeds of dire necessity, not choice!
 His grateful hand, thus never harmful known,
 Shall on the public welfare build his own.

Thus worthy crafts, which low-born life divide,
 Give towns their opulence, and courts their pride.
 Sacred to pleasure structures rise elate,
 To that still worthy of the wise and great.
 Sacred to pleasure then shall piles ascend?
 They shall—when pleasure and instruction bend.
 Let theatres from public spirit shine!
 Such theatres, as, Athens, once were thine!
 See! the gay muse of pointed wit possess,
 Who makes the virtuous laugh, the decent jest:
 What though she mock, she mocks with honest aim,
 And laughs each favourite folly into shame,
 With liberal light the tragic charms the age:
 In solemn-training robes she fills the stage;
 There human nature, mark'd in different lines,
 Alive in character distinctly shines.
 Quick passions change alternate on her face;
 Her diction music, as her action grace.
 Instant we catch her terror-giving cares,
 Pathetic sighs, and pity-moving tears;
 Instant we catch her generous glow of soul,
 Till one great striking moral crowns the whole.

Hence in warm youth, by scenes of virtue taught,
 Honour exalts, and love expands the thought!
 Hence pity, to peculiar grief assign'd,
 Grows wide benevolence to all mankind.

Where various edifice the land renowns,
 There public spirit plans, exalts, and crowns.
 She cheers the mansion with the spacious hall,
 Bids painting live along the storied wall;
 Seated, she smiling eyes th' unclosing door,
 And much she welcomes all, but most the poor;
 She turns the pillar, or the arch she bends,
 The choir she lengthens, or the choir extends;

She rears the tower, whose height the heavens admire;

She rears, she rounds, she points the lessening spire;
 At her command the college-roofs ascend
 (For public spirit still is learning's friend).
 Stupendous piles, which useful pomp completes,
 Thus rise religion's, and thus learning's seats:
 There moral truth and holy science spring,
 And give the sage to teach, the bard to sing,
 There some draw health from herbs and mineral veins,

Some search the systems of the heavenly plains;
 Some call from history past times to view,
 And others trace old laws, and sketch out new;
 Thence saving rights by legislators plann'd,
 And guardian patriots thence inspire the land.

Now grant, ye powers, one great, one fond desire,

And, granting, bid a new Whitehall aspire!
 Far let it lead, by well-pleas'd Thames survey'd,
 The swelling arch, and stately colonnade;
 Bid courts of justice, senate-chambers join,
 Till various all in one proud work combine!

But now be all the generous goddesses seen,
 When most diffus'd she shines, and most benign!
 Ye sons of misery, attract her view!
 Ye fallow, hallow-eyed, and meagre crew!
 Such high perfection have our arts attain'd,
 That now few sons of toil our arts demand?
 Then to the public, to itself, we fear,
 Ev'n willing industry grows useless here,
 Are we too populous at length confess'd,
 From confluent strangers refug'd and redress'd!
 Has war so long withdrawn his barbarous train,
 That peace o'erstocks us with the sons of men?
 So long has plague left pure the ambient air,
 That want must prey on those disease would spare?
 Hence beauteous wretches (beauty's foul disgrace!)
 Though born the pride, the shame of human race;
 Fair wretches hence, who nightly streets annoy,
 Live but themselves and others to destroy.
 Hence robbers rise, to theft, to murder prone,
 First driven by want, from habit desperate grown;
 Hence for ow'd trifles oft our jails contain (Torn from mankind) a miserable train;
 Torn from, in spite of nature's tenderest cries,
 Parental, filial, and connubial ties:
 The trader, when on every side distress,
 Hence flies to what expedient frauds suggest;
 To prop his question'd credit's tottering state,
 Others he first involves to share his fate;
 Then for mean refuge must self-exil'd roam
 Never to hope a friend, nor find a home.

This public spirit sees, she feels and feels!
 Her breast the throb, her eye the tear reveals;
 (The patriot throb that beats, the tear that flows
 For others welfare, and for others woes)—
 And what can I (she said) to cure their grief?
 Shall I or point out death, or point relief?
 Forth shall I lead them to some happier soil,
 To conquest lead them, and enrich with spoil?
 Bid them convulse a world, make nature groan,
 And spill, in shedding others blood, their own?
 No, no—such wars do thou, ambition, wage!
 Go sterilize the fertile with thy rage!

Whole nations to depopulate is thine;
To people, culture, and protect, be mine!
Then range the world, discovery!—Straits he goes

O'er seas, o'er Libya's sands, and Zembla's snows;
He settles where kind rays till now have smil'd
(Vain smile!) on some luxuriant houseless wild.
How many sons of want might here enjoy
What nature gives for age but to destroy?
Blush, blush, O sun (she cries) here vainly found,
To rise, to set, to roll the seasons round!
Shall heaven distil in dew, descend in rain,
From earth gush fountains, rivers flow—in vain?
There shall the watery lives in myriads stray,
And be, to be alone each other's prey?
Unsought shall here the teeming quarries own
The various species of mechanic stone?
From structure this, from sculpture that confine?
Shall rocks forbid the latent gem to shine?
Shall mines, obedient, aid no artist's care,
Nor give the martial sword, and peaceful share?
Ah! shall they never precious ore unfold,
To smile in silver, or to flame in gold?
Shall here the vegetable world alone,
For joys, for various virtues, rest unknown?
While food and physic, plants and herbs supply,
Here must they shoot alone to bloom and die?
Shall fruits, which none but brutal eyes survey,
Untouch'd grow ripe, untasted drop away?
Shall here th' irrational, the savage kind,
Lord it o'er stores by heaven for man design'd,
And trample what mild suns benignly raise,
While man must lose the use, and heaven the praise?
Shall it then be?—(Indignant here she rose,
Indignant, yet humane, her bosom glows)—
No. By each honour'd Grecian, Roman name,
By men for virtue deify'd by fame,
Who peopled lands, who model'd infant state,
And then bade empire be maturely great;
By these I swear (be witness earth and skies!)
Fair order here shall from confusion rise.
Rapt, I a future colony survey?
Come then, ye sons of misery! come away!
Let those, whose sorrows from neglect are known,
(Here taught, compell'd, empower'd) neglect atone!
Let those enjoy, who never merit woes,
In youth th' industrious wish, in age repose!
Allotted acres (no reluctant soil)
Shall prompt their industry, and pay their toil.
Let families, long strangers to delight,
Whom wayward fate dispers'd, by me unite;
Here live enjoying life; see plenty, peace;
Their lands increasing as their sons increase.
As nature yet is found, in leafy glades,
To intermix the walks with lights and shades;
Or as with good and ill, in chequer'd strife,
Various the goddesses colours human life:
So, in this fertile clime, if yet are seen
Moors, marshes, cliffs, by turns to intervene;
Where cliffs, moors, marshes, desolate the view,
Where haunts the bittern, and where screams the mew; [lies,
Where prowls the wolf, where roll'd the serpent
Shall solemn fanes and halls of justice rise,

And towns shall open (all of structure fair!)
To brightening prospects, and to purest air;
Frequented ports, and vineyards green succeed,
And flocks increasing whiten all the mead.
On science science, arts on arts refine;
On these from high all heaven shall smiling
shine,

And public spirit here a people show,
Free, numerous, pleas'd, and busy all below.

Learn, future natives of this promis'd land,
What your forefathers ow'd my saving hand!
Learn, when despair such sudden bliss shall see,
Such bliss must shine from Oglethorpe or me!
Do you the neighbouring blameless Indian aid,
Culture what he neglects, not his invade,
Dare not, oh dare not, with ambitious view,
Force or demand subjection never due.
Let, by my specious name, no tyrants rise,
And cry, while they enslave, they civilize!
Know, liberty and I are still the same,
Congenial!—ever mingling flame with flame!
Why must I Afric's sable children see
Vended for slaves, though form'd by nature free,
The nameless tortures cruel minds invent,
Those to subject, whom nature equal meant?
If these you dare (albeit unjust success
Empowers you now unpunish'd to oppress)
Revolving empire you and your's may doom
(Rome all subdued, yet Vandals vanquish'd Rome),

Yes, empire may revolve, give them the day,
And yoke may yoke, and blood may blood repay.

Thus (ah! how far unequal'd by my lays,
Unskill'd the heart to melt, or mind to raise),
Sublime, benevolent, deep, sweetly clear,
Worthy a Thomson's muse, a Frederick's ear,
Thus spoke the goddess. Thus I faintly tell
In what lov'd works heaven gives her to excel.
But who her sons, that, to her interest true,
Conversant lead her to a prince like you?
These, sir, salute you from life's middle state,
Rich without gold, and without titles great:
Knowledge of books and men exalts their thought,
In wit accomplish'd, though in wiles untaught,
Careless of whispers meant to wound their name,
Nor spear'd nor brib'd from virtue into shame;
In letters elegant, in honour bright,
They come, they catch, and they reflect delight.

Mixing with these, a few of rank are found,
For councils, embassies, and camps renown'd.
Vers'd in gay life, in honest maxims read,
And ever warm of heart, yet cool of head,
From these the circling glass gives wit to shine,
The bright grow brighter, and ev'n courts refine;
From these so gifted, candid, and upright,
Flows knowledge, softening into ease polite.

Happy the men, who such a prince can
please!

Happy the prince ever'd by men like these!
His condescensions dignity display,
Grave with the wise, and with the witty gay;
For him fine marble in the quarry lies,
Which, in due statues, to his fame shall rise;
Ever shall public spirit beam his praise,
And the muse swell it in immortal lays.

TO MR. JOHN DYER,

A PAINTER,

Advising him to draw a certain noble and illustrious Person; occasioned by seeing his Picture of the celebrated Clio.*

FORGIVE an artless, an officious friend,
Weak, when I judge, but willing to commend;
Fall'n as I am, by no kind fortune rais'd,
Depress'd, obscur'd, unpity'd, and unprais'd;
Yet, when these well-known features I peruse,
Some warmth awakes—some embers of a muse.

Ye muses, graces, and ye loves, appear!
Your queen, your Venus, and your Clio's here!
In such pure fires her rising thoughts refine!
Her eyes with such commanding sweetness shine:
Such vivid tinctures sure through æther glow,
Stain summer clouds, or gild the watery bow:
If life Pygmalion's ivory favourite fir'd,
Sure some enamour'd god this draught inspir'd!
Or, if you rashly caught Promethean flame,
Shade the sweet theft, and mar the beauteous frame!

Yet if those cheering lights the prospect fly,
Ah!—let no pleasing view the loss supply.
Some dreary den, some desert waste prepare,
Wild as my thoughts, or dark as my despair.

But still, my friend, still the sweet object stays,
Still stream your colours rich with Clio's rays!
Sure at each kindling touch your canvass glows!
Sure the full form, instinct with spirit, grows!
Let the dull artist puzzling rules explore,
Dwell on the face, and gaze the features o'er;
You eye the soul—there genuine nature find,
You, through the meaning muscles, strike the mind.

Nor can one view such boundless power confine,
All nature opens to an art like thine!
Now rural scenes in simple grandeur rise!
Vales, hills, lawns, lakes, and vineyards feast our eyes,

Now halcyon peace a smiling aspect wears!
Now the red scene with war and ruin glares!
Here Britain's fleet o'er Europe's seas preside!
There long lost cities rear their ancient pride;
You from the grave can half redeem the slain,
And bid great Julius charm the world again:
Mark out Pharsalia's, mark out Munda's fray,
And image all the honours of the day.

But if new glories most our warmth excite;
If toils untry'd to noblest aims invite;
Would you in envy'd pomp unrival'd reign,
Oh, let Horatius grace the canvass plain!
His form might ev'n idolatry create,
In lineage, titles, wealth, and worth elate!
Empires to him might virgin honours owe,
From him arts, arms, and laws, new influence know.

For him kind suns on fruits and grains shall shine,
And future gold lie ripening in the mine:
For him fine marble in the quarry lies,
Which, in due statues, to his fame shall rise.

* See Dyer's Poems.

Through those bright features Cæsar's spirit trace,
Each conquering sweetness, each imperial grace,
All that is soft, or eminently great,
In love, in war, in knowledge, or in state.

Thus shall your colours, like his worth amaze!
Thus shall you charm, enrich'd with Clio's praise!
Clear, and more clear, your golden genius shines,
While my dim lamp of life obscure declines:
Dull'd in damp shades, it wastes, unseen, away,
While yours, triumphant, grows one blaze of day.

VERSES

SENT TO AARON HILL, ESQ.

With the Tragedy of Sir Thomas Overbury, expecting him to correct it.

As the soul, stript of mortal clay,
Grows all divinely fair,
And boundless roves the milky way,
And views sweet prospects there.

This hero, clogg'd with drossy lines,
By thee new vigour tries;
As thy correcting hand refines,
Bright scenes around him rise.

Thy touch brings the wish'd stone to pass,
So fought, so long foretold;
It turns polluted lead or brass,
At once to purest gold.

PROLOGUE

Spoken at the revival of Shakspeare's King Henry the Sixth, at the Theatre-Royal in Drury-Lane. Printed before the Play from a spurious Copy.

TO-NIGHT a patient ear, ye Britons lend,
And to your great forefathers' deeds attend.
Here, cheaply warn'd, ye blest descendants view,
What ills on England, civil discord drew.
To wound the heart, the martial muse prepares;
While the red scene with raging slaughter glares.
Here, while a monarch's sufferings we relate,
Let generous grief his ruin'd grandeur wait.
While Second Richard's blood for vengeance calls,
Doom'd for his grandfire's guilt, poor Henry falls.
In civil jars avenging judgment blows,
And royal wrongs entail a people's woes.
Henry, unvers'd in wiles, more good than great,
Drew on by meekness his disastrous fate.

Thus when you see this land by faction tost,
Her nobles slain, her laws, her freedom lost;
Let this reflection from the action flow,
We ne'er from foreign foes could ruin know.
Oh, let us then intestine discord shun,
We ne'er can be, but by ourselves, undone!

THE ANIMALCULE;

A TALE.

Occasioned by his Grace the Duke of Rutland's receiving the Small-pox by Inoculation.

In animalcules, muse, display
Spirits, of name unknown in song!

Reader, a kind attention pay,
Nor think an useful comment long.

Far less than mites, on mites they prey;
Minuteſt things my ſwarms contain :
When o'er your ivory teeth they ſway,
Then throb your little nerves with pain.

Fluids, in drops, minutely ſwell;
Theſe ſubtile beings each contains;
In the ſmall ſanguine globes they dwell,
Roll from the heart and trace the veins.

Through every tender tube they rove,
In finer ſpirits ſtrike the brain;
Wind quick through every fibrous grove,
And ſeek, through pores, the heart again.

If they with purer drops dilate,
And lodge where entity began,
They actuate with a genial heat,
And kindle into future man.

But, when our lives are nature's due,
Air, ſeas, nor fire, their frames diſſolve
They matter, through all forms, purſue,
And oft to genial heats revolve.

Thus once an animalcule prov'd,
When man, a patron to the bays;
This patron was in Greece belov'd;
Yet ſame was faithleſs to his praiſe.

In Rome this animalcule grew
Mæcenas, whom the classics rate !
Among the Gauls, it prov'd Richlieu,
In learning, power, and bounty great.

In Britain, Halifax it roſe ;
(By Halifax, bloom'd Congreve's ſtrains) ;
And now it redimiſh'd glows,
To glide through godlike Rutland's veins.

A plague there is, too many know;
Too ſeldom perfect cures befall it :
The muſe may term it beauty's foe ;
In phyſic, the ſmall-pox we call it.

From Turks we learn this plague t' aſſuage,
They, by admitting, turn its courſe :
Their kiſs will tame the tumor's rage ;
By yielding, they o'ercome the force.

Thus Rutland did its touch invite,
While, watchful in the ambient air,
Thus little, guardian, ſubtil ſpright
Did with the poiſon in repair.

Th' infection from the heart it clears ;
Th' infection, now dilated thin,
In pearly pimples but appears,
Expell'd upon the ſurface ſkin.

And now it, mouldering, waſtes away :
'Tis gone !—doom'd to return no more !
Our animalcule keeps its ſtay,
And muſt new labyrinths explore.

And now the noble's thoughts are ſeen,
Unmark'd, it views his heart's deſires !
It now reflects what it has been,
And, rapturous, at his change admires !

Its priſtine virtues kept, combine,
To be again in Rutland known

But they, immers'd, no longer ſhine,
Nor equal, nor increaſe his own.

TO MRS. ELIZABETH HAYWOOD,
On her Novel, called, "The Raſh Reſolve."

Doom'd to a fate which damps the poet's flame,
A muſe, unfriended, greets thy riſing name !
Unvers'd in envy's, or in flattery's phraſe,
Greatneſs ſhe flies, yet merit claims her praiſe ;
Nor will ſhe, at her withering wreath repine,
But ſmile, if fame and fortune cheriſh thine.

The ſciences in thy ſweet genius charm,
And, with their ſtrength, thy ſex's ſoftneſs arm.
In thy full figures, painting's force we find,
As muſic fires, thy language liſts the mind.
Thy power gives form, and touches into life
The paſſions imag'd in their bleeding ſtriſe :
Contracted ſtrokes, true art and fancy ſhow,
And lights and ſhades in lively mixture flow.
Hope attacks fear, and reaſon, love's controul,
Jealouſy wounds, and frienſhip heals the ſoul :
Black falſehood wears bright gallantry's diſguiſe,
And the guilt cloud enchants the fair-one's eyes.
Thy dames, in grief and frailties lovely ſhine,
And when moſt mortal half appear divine.
If, when ſome godlike, favourite paſſion ſways,
The willing heart too fatally obeys,
Great minds lament what cruel cenſure blames,
And ruin'd virtue generous pity claims.

Eliza, ſtill impatient love's powerful queen !
Let love, ſoft love, exalt each ſwelling ſcene.
Arm'd with keen wit, in fame's wide liſt's advance !

Spain yields in fiction, in politeneſs France.
Such orient light, as the firſt poets knew,
Flames from thy thought, and brightens every
view !

A ſtrong, a glorious, a luxuriant fire,
Which warms cold wiſdom into wild deſire !
Thy fable glows ſo rich through every page,
What mortal's force can the fierce heat aſſuage ?

And yet—but ſay if ever doom'd to prove
The ſad, the dear perplexities of love !
Where ſeeming tranſport ſoftens every pain,
Where fancy'd freedom waits the winning chain ;
Varying from pangs to viſionary joys,
Sweet is the fate, and charms as it deſtroys !
Say then—if love to ſudden rage gives way,
Will the ſoft paſſion not reſume its ſway ?
Charming, and charm'd, can love from love retire !
Can a cold convent quench th' unwilling fire ?
Precept, if human, may our thoughts refine,
More we admire ! but cannot prove divine.

AN APOLOGY TO BRILLANTE,
FOR HAVING LONG OMITTED WRITING IN VERSE.

In Imitation of a certain Mimic of Anacreon.

CAN I matchleſs charms recite ?
Source of ever-ſpringing light !
Could I count the vernal flowers,
Count in endleſs time the hours ;

Count the countless stars above,
 Count the captive hearts of love;
 Paint the torture of his fire,
 Paint the pangs those eyes inspire!
 (Pleasing torture, thus to shine,
 Purify'd by fires like thine!)
 Then I'd strike the sounding string!
 Then I'd thy perfection sing.
 Mystic world!—Thou something more!
 Wonder of th' Almighty's store!
 Nature's depths we oft descry,
 Oft they're pierc'd by learning's eye;
 Thou, if thought on thee would gain,
 Prov'st (like heaven) enquiry vain.
 Charms unequal'd we pursue!
 Charms in shining throngs we view!
 Number'd then could nature's be,
 Nature's self were poor to thee.

AN EPISTLE

TO MRS. OLDFIELD, OF THE THEATRE-ROYAL.

WHILE to your charms unequal verse I raise,
 Aw'd, I admire, and tremble as I praise:
 Here art and genius new refinement need,
 Listening, they gaze, and, as they gaze, recede!
 Can art or genius, or their powers combin'd,
 But from corporeal organs, sketch the mind?
 When sound embody'd can with shape surprise,
 The muse may emulate your voice and eyes.
 Mark rival arts perfection's point pursue!
 Each rivals each, but to excel in you!
 The bust and medal bear the meaning face,
 And the proud statue adds the posture's grace!
 Imag'd at length, the bury'd heroine, known,
 Still seems to wound, to smile, or frown in stone!
 As art would art, or metal stone surpass,
 Her soul strikes, gleaming through Corinthian
 brass!
 Serene, the saint in smiling silver shines,
 And cherubs weep in gold o'er saluted shrines!
 If long-lost forms from Raphael's pencil glow,
 Wondrous in warmth the mimic colours flow!
 Each look, each attitude, new grace displays;
 Your voice and motion life and music raise.
 Thus Cleopatra in your charms refines;
 She lives, she speaks, with force improv'd she shines!
 Fair, and more fair, you ev'ry grace transmit;
 Love, learning, beauty, elegance, and wit.
 Cæsar, the world's unrival'd master, fir'd,
 In her imperial soul, his own admir'd!
 Philippi's victor wore her winning chain,
 And felt not empire's loss in beauty's gain.
 Could the pale heroes your bright influence know,
 Or catch the silver accents as they flow,
 Drawn from dark rest by your enchanting strain,
 Each shade were lur'd to life and love again.
 Say, sweet inspirer! were each annal known,
 What living greatness shines there not your own!
 If the griev'd muse by some lov'd empress rose,
 New strength, new grace, it to your influence owes!
 If power by war distinguish'd height reveals,
 Your nobler pride the wounds of fortune heals!

Then could an empire's cause demand your care,
 The soul, that justly thinks, would greatly dare.
 Long has feign'd Venus mock'd the muse's praise,
 You dart, divine Ophelia! genuine rays!
 Warm through those eyes enlivening raptures roll!
 Sweet through each striking feature streams your soul!
 The soul's bright meanings heighten beauty's fires:
 Your looks, your thoughts, your deeds, each grace inspires!
 Know then, if rank'd with monarchs, here
 you stand,
 What fate declines, you from the muse demand!
 Each grace that shone of old in each fam'd fair,
 Or may in modern dames refinement wear;
 Whate'er just, emulative thoughts pursue,
 Is all confirm'd, is all ador'd in you!
 If godlike bosoms pant for power to bless,
 If 'tis a monarch's glory to redress;
 In conscious majesty you shine serene,
 In thought a heroine, and in act a queen.

VERSES.

OCCASIONED BY READING MR. AARON HILL'S
POEM, CALLED "GIDEON."The lines marked thus ' ' are taken from Gideon.

LET other poets poorly sing
 Their flatteries to the vulgar great!
 Her airy flight let wandering fancy wing,
 And rival nature's most luxuriant store,
 To swell some monster's pride, who shames a state,
 Or form a wreath to crown tyrannic power!
 Thou, who inform'dst this clay with active fire!
 Do thou, supreme of powers! my thoughts refine,
 And with thy purest heat my soul inspire,
 That with Hillarius' worth my verse may shine!
 As thy lov'd Gideon once set Israel free,
 So he with sweet, seraphic lays
 'Redeems the use of captive poetry,' [praise.
 Which first was form'd to speak thy glorious
 Moses, with an enchanting tongue,
 Pharaoh's just overthrow sublimely sung!
 When Saul and Jonathan in death were laid,
 Surviving David felt the softening fire!
 And, by the Great Almighty's tuneful aid,
 Wak'd into endless life his mournful lyre.
 Their different thoughts, met in Hillarius' song,
 Roll in one channel more divinely strong!
 With Pindar's fire his verse's spirit flies,
 'Wasted in charming music through the air!'
 Unstop'd by clouds, it reaches to the skies,
 And joins with angel's hallelujahs there,
 Flows mix'd, and sweetly strikes th' Almighty's ear
 Rebels should blush when they his Gideon see!
 That Gideon born to set his country free.
 O that such heroes in each age might rise,
 Brightening through vapours like the morning-star,
 Generous to triumph, and in council wise!
 Gentle in peace, but terrible in war!
 When Gideon, Oreb, Hiram, Shimron shine
 Fierce in the blaze of war as they engage!

Great bard! what energy, but thine,
 Could reach the vast description of their rage?
 Or when, to cruel foes betray'd,
 Sareph and Hamar call for aid,
 Lost, and bewilder'd in despair,
 How piercing are the hapless lover's cries!
 What tender strokes in melting accents rise!
 Oh, what a masterpiece of pity's there?
 Nor goodly Joah shows thy sweetness less,
 When, like kind heaven, he frees them from distress!

Hail thou, whose verse, a living image, shines,
 In Gideon's character your own you drew!
 As there the graceful patriot shines,
 We in that image bright Hillarius view!
 Let the low crowd, who love unwholesome fare,
 When in thy words the breath of angels flows,
 Like gross-fed spirits, sick in purer air,
 Their earthly souls by their dull taste disclose!
 Thy dazzling genius shines too bright! [light.
 And they, like spectres, shun the streams of
 But while in shades of ignorance they stray,
 Round thee rays of knowledge play,
 'And show thee glittering in abstracted day.'

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

BESSY, COUNTESS OF ROCHFORD,

Daughter of the late Earl Rivers—when with Child.

As when the sun walks forth in flaming gold,
 Mean plants may smile, and humble flowers unfold,
 The low-laid lark the distant æther wings,
 And, as she soars, her daring anthem sings;
 So, when thy charms celestial views create,
 My smiling song surmounts my gloomy fate.
 Thy angel-embryo prompts my towering lays,
 Claims my fond wish, and fires my future praise:
 May it, if male, its grandfire's image wear;
 Or in its mother's charms confess the fair;
 At the kind birth may each mild planet wait;
 Soft be the pain, but prove the blessing great. [rest!

Hail, Rivers! hallow'd shade! descend from
 Descend and smile, to see thy Rochford blest: [run,
 Weep not the scenes through which my life must
 Though fate, fleet-footed, scents thy languid son.
 The bar that, darkening, cross'd my crested claim,
 Yields at her charms, and brightens in their flame:
 That blood which, honour'd, in thy Rochford
 reigns,

In cold, unwilling wanderings trac'd my veins.
 Want's wintry realm froze hard around my view;
 And scorn's keen blasts a cutting anguish blew.

To such sad weight my gathering griefs were wrought, [thought!

Life seem'd not life, but when convuls'd with Decreed beneath a mother's frown to pine,
 Madness were ease, to misery form'd like mine!

Yet my muse waits thee through the realms of
 day,

Where lambent lightnings round thy temples play.
 Sure my fierce woes will, like those fires, refine,
 Thus lose their torture, and thus glorious shine!
 And now the muse heaven's milky path surveys,
 With thee, 'twixt pendent worlds, it wondering strays,

Worlds which, unnumber'd as thy virtues, roll
 Round suns—fix'd, radiant emblems of thy soul!
 Hence lights refracted run through distant skies,
 Changeful on azure plains in quivering dyes!
 So thy mind darted through its earthy frame,
 A wide, a various, and a glittering flame.

Now a new scene enormous lustre brings,
 Now seraphs shade thee round with silver wings;
 In angel-forms thou see'st thy Rochford shine;
 In each sweet form is trac'd her beauteous line!
 Such was her soul, ere this selected mould
 Sprung at thy wish, the sparkling life t' infold!
 So amidst cherubs shone her son refin'd,
 Are infant-flesh the new-form'd soul enshrin'd!
 So shall a sequent race from Rochford rise,
 The world's fair pride—descendants of the skies.

TO THE EXCELLENT MIRANDA,

CONSORT OF AARON HILL, ESQ. ON READING HER POEMS.

EACH softening charm of Clio's smiling song,
 Montague's soul, which shines divinely strong,
 These blend, with graceful ease, to form thy rhyme,
 Tender yet chaste; sweet-sounding, yet sublime;
 Wisdom and wit have made thy works their care,
 Each passion glows, refin'd by precept, there:
 To fair Miranda's form each grace is kind;
 The muses and the virtues tune thy mind.

VERSES TO A YOUNG LADY.

POLLY, from me, though now a love-sick youth,
 Nay, though a poet, hear the voice of truth!
 Polly, you're not a beauty, yet you're pretty;
 So grave, yet gay; so silly, yet so witty;
 A heart of softness, yet a tongue of satire;
 You've cruelty, yet, ev'n with that, good nature:
 Now you are free, and now reserv'd awhile;
 Now a forc'd frown betrays a willing smile.
 Reproach'd for absence, yet your sight deny'd;
 My tongue you silence, yet my silence chide.
 How would you chide me, should your sex defame!
 Yet, should they praise, grow jealous, and exclaim.
 If I despair, with some kind look you bless;
 But if I hope, at once all hope suppress.
 You scorn; yet should my passion change, or fail,
 Too late you'd whimper out a softer tale.
 You love; yet from your lover's wish retire;
 Doubt, yet discern; deny, and yet desire.
 Such, Polly, are your sex—part truth, part fiction,
 Some thought, much whim, and all a contradiction.

THE GENTLEMAN.

ADDRESSED TO JOHN JOLIFFE, ESQ.

A DECENT mein, an elegance of dress,
 Words, which, at ease, each winning grace express;
 A life, where love, by wisdom polish'd, shines,
 Where wisdom's self again, by love, refines;
 Where we to chance for friendship never trust,
 Nor ever dread from sudden whim disgust;
 To social manners, and the heart humane;
 A nature ever great, and never vain;
 A wit, that no licentious pertness knows;
 The sense, that unassuming candour shows;

Reason, by narrow principles uncheck'd,
Slave to no party, bigot to no sect;
Knowledge of various life, of learning too;
Thence taste; thence truth, which will from taste
ensue:

Unwilling censure, though a judgment clear;
A smile indulgent, and that smile sincere;
An humble, though an elevated mind;
A pride, its pleasure but to serve mankind:
If these esteem and admiration raise;
Give true delight, and gain unflattering praise,
In one wish'd view, th' accomplish'd man we see;
These graces all are thine, and thou art he.

CHARACTER

OF THE REV. JAMES FOSTER.

* * * * *

FROM Codex hear, ye ecclesiastic men,
This pastoral charge to Webster, Stebbing, Ven;
Attend, ye emblems of your P——'s mind!
Mark faith, mark hope, mark charity, defin'd;
On terms, whence no ideas ye can draw,
Pin well your faith, and then pronounce it law;
First wealth, a crossier next, your hope enflame;
And next church-power—a power o'er conscience,
claim;

In modes of worship right of choice deny;
Say, to convert, all means are fair:—add, why?
'Tis charitable—let your power decree,
That persecution then is charity;
Call reason error; forms, not things, display;
Let moral doctrine to abstruse give way;
Sink demonstration; mystery preach alone;
Be thus religion's friend, and thus your own.

But Foster well this honest truth extends—
Where mystery begins, religion ends.
In him, great modern miracle! we see
A priest, from avarice and ambition free;
One, whom no persecuting spirit fires;
Whose heart and tongue benevolence inspires:
Learn'd, not assuming; eloquent, yet plain;
Meek, though not timorous; conscious, though not vain;

Without craft, reverend; holy, without cant;
Zealous for truth, without enthusiast rant.
His faith, where no credulity is seen,
'T'wixt infidel and bigot, marks the mean;
His hope, no mitre militant on earth,
'Tis that bright crown, which heaven reserves for worth.

A priest, in charity with all mankind,
His love to virtue, not to sect confin'd:
Truth his delight; from him it flames abroad,
From him, who fears no being, but his God.
In him from Christian, moral light can shine;
Not mad with mystery, but a sound divine;
He wins the wise and good, with reason's lore;
Then strikes their passions with pathetic power;
Where vice erects her head, rebukes the page;
Mix'd with rebuke, persuasive charms engage;

Charms, which th' unthinking must to thought excite;

Lo! vice less vicious! virtue more upright:
Him copy, Codex, that the good and wise,
Who so abhor thy heart, and head despise,
May see thee now, though late, redeem thy name,
And glorify what else is damn'd to fame.

But should some churchman, apeing wit severe,
The poet's sure turn'd Baptist—say, and sneer;
Shame on that narrow mind so often known,
Which in one mode of faith, owns worth alone.
Sneer on, rail, wrangle! nought this truth repels—
Virtue is virtue, wherefoe'er she dwells;
And sure, where learning gives her light to shine,
Her's is all praise—if her's, 'tis Foster, thine.
Thee boast dissenters; we with pride may own
Our Tillotson; and Rome, her Fenelon*.

THE POET'S DEPENDANCE

ON A STATESMAN.

SOME seem to hint, and others proof will bring,
That, from neglect, my numerous hardships spring.
Seek the great man! they cry—'tis then decreed,
In him, if I court fortune, I succeed.

What friends to second? who for me should sue,
Have interests, partial to themselves, in view.
They own my matchless fate compassion draws;
They all wish well, lament, but drop my cause.

There are who ask no pension, want no place,
No title wish, and would accept no grace.
Can I entreat, they should for me obtain
The least, who greatest for themselves disdain?
A statesman, knowing this, unkind, will cry,
Those love him: let those serve him:—why should I?

Say, shall I turn where lucre points my views;
At first desert my friends, at length abuse?
But, on less terms, in promise he complies:
Years bury years, and hopes on hopes arise;
I trust, am trusted on my fairy gain;
And woes on woes attend, an endless train.

Be posts dispos'd at will!—I have, for these,
No gold to plead, no impudence to tease.
All secret service from my soul I hate;
All dark intrigues of pleasure, or of state.
I have no power, election-votes to gain;
No will to hackney out polemic strain;
To shape, as time shall serve, my verse, or prose,
To flatter thence, nor slur, a courtier's foes;
Nor him to daub with praise, if I prevail;
Nor shock'd by him with libels to assail.
Where these are not, what claim to me belongs?
Though mine the muse and virtue, birth and wrongs.

Where lives the statesman, so in honour clear,
To give where he has nought to hope, nor fear?

* In this character of the Rev James Foster, truth guided the pen of the muse. Mr. Pope paid a tribute to the modest worth of this excellent man: little did he imagine his Rev. Annotator would endeavour to convert his praise into abuse. The character and writings of Foster will be admired and read, when the works of the bitter controversialist are forgotten.

No!—there to seek, is but to find fresh pain :
 The promise broke, renew'd, and broke again ;
 To be, as humour deigns, receiv'd, refus'd ;
 By turns affronted, and by turns amus'd ;
 To lose that time, which worthier thoughts require ;
 To lose the health, which should those thoughts
 inspire ;

To starve and hope ; or, like camelions, fare
 On ministerial faith, which means but air.

But still, undrooping, I the crew disdain,
 Who, or by jobs, or libels, wealth obtain.
 Ne'er let me be, through those, from want exempt ;
 In one man's favour, in the world's contempt :
 Worse in my own !—through those, to poets who
 rise,

Themselves, in secret, must themselves despise ;
 Vile, and more vile, till they, at length, disclaim
 Not sense alone of glory, but of shame.

What though I hourly see the servile herd,
 For meanness honour'd, and for guilt prefer'd ;
 See selfish passion, public virtue seem ;
 And public virtue an enthusiast dream ;
 See favour'd falsehood, innocence belied,
 Meekness depress'd, and power-elated pride ;
 A scene will show, all-righteous vision haste ;
 The meek exalted, and the proud debas'd !—
 Oh, to be there !—to tread that friendly shore,
 Where falsehood, pride, and statesmen are no
 more !

But ere indulg'd—ere fate my breath shall claim,
 A poet still is anxious after fame.

What future fame would my ambition crave ?
 This were my wish—could ought my memory
 save,

Say, when in death my sorrows lie repos'd,
 That my past life no venal view disclos'd ;
 Say, I well knew, while in a state obscure,
 Without the being base, the being poor ;
 Say, I had parts, too moderate to transcend :
 Yet sense to mean, and virtue not to offend ;
 My heart supplying what my head denied,
 Say that, by Pope esteem'd I liv'd and died ;
 Whose writings the best rules to write could give ;
 Whose life the nobler science how to live.

AN EPISTLE

TO DAMON AND DELIA.

HEAR Damon, Delia hear, in candid lays,
 Truth without anger, without flattery, praise !

A bookish mind, with pedantry unfraught,
 Of a sedate, yet never gloomy thought :
 Prompt to rejoice, when others pleasure know,
 And prompt to feel the pang for others woe ;
 To soften faults, to which a foe is prone,
 And, in a friend's perfection, praise your own :
 A will sincere, unknown to selfish views ;
 A heart of love, of gallantry a muse ;
 A delicate, yet not a jealous mind ;
 A passion ever fond, yet never blind,
 Glowing with amorous, yet with guiltless fires,
 In ever-eager, never gross desires :
 A modest honour, sacred to contain
 From tattling vanity, when smiles you gain ;

Constant, most pleas'd when beauty most you
 please :

Damon ! your picture's shown in tints like these.

Say, Delia ! must I chide you or commend ?

Say, must I be your flatterer or your friend ?

To praise no graces in a rival fair,
 Nor your own foibles in a sister spare ;
 Each lover's billet, bantering, to reveal,
 And never know one secret to conceal ;
 Young, fickle, fair, a levity inborn,
 To treat all sighing slaves with flippant scorn ;
 An eye, expressive of a wandering mind :
 Nor this to read, nor that to think inclin'd ;
 Or when a book, or thought, from whim retards,
 Intent on songs or novels, drefs or cards ;
 Choice to select the party of delight,
 To kill time, thought, and fame, in frolic flight ;
 To flutter here, to flurry there on wing ;
 To talk, to teaze, to simper, or to sing ;
 To prude it, to coquet it—him to trust,
 Whose vain, loose life, should caution or disgust ;
 Him to dislike, whose modest worth should
 please.—

Say, is your picture shown in tints like these ?
 Your's !—you deny it—Hear the point then tried,
 Let judgment, truth, the muse, and love decide.
 What your's !—Nay, fairest trifler, frown not so :
 Is it ? the muse with doubt—Love answers no :
 You smile—Is't not ? Again the question try !—
 Yes, judgment thinks, and truth will yes, reply.

TO MISS MH*,

SENT WITH MR. POPE'S WORKS.

SEE female vice and female folly here,
 Raillied with wit polite, or lash'd severe :
 Let Pope present such objects to our view ;
 Such are, my fair, the full reverse of you.
 Rapt when, to Loddon's stream * from Windsor's
 shades,

He sings the modest charms of sylvan maids ;
 Dear Burford's hills in memory's eye appear,
 And Luddal's spring † still murmurs in my ear :
 But when you cease to bless my longing eyes,
 Dumb is the spring, the joyless prospect dies :
 Come then, my charmer, come ! here transport
 reigns !

New health, new youth, inspirits all my veins.
 Each hour let intercourse of hearts employ,
 Thou life of loveliness ! thou soul of joy !
 Love wakes the birds—oh, hear each melting lay !
 Love warms the world—come charmer, come a-
 way !

But hark !—immortal Pope resumes the lyre !
 Diviner airs, diviner flights, inspire :
 Hark where an angel's language tunes the line !
 See where the thoughts and looks of angels shine !
 Here he pour'd all the music of your tongue,
 And all your looks and thoughts, unconscious, sung.

* Alluding to the beautiful Epistle of Loddona, in Windsor Forest.

ON THE RECOVERY OF A LADY OF QUALITY

From the Small-Pox.

LONG a lov'd fair had blest'd her consort's sight
With amorous pride, and undisturb'd delight;
Till death, grown envious with repugnant aim,
Frown'd at their joys, and urg'd a tyrant's claim.
He summons each disease!—the noxious crew,
Writhing, in dire distortions, strike his view!
From various plagues, which various natures know,
Forth rushes beauty's fear'd and fervent foe.
Fierce to the fair, the missile mischief flies,
The sanguine streams in raging ferments rise!
It drives, ignipotent, through every vein,
Hangs on the heart, and burns around the brain!
Now a chill damp the charmer's lustre dims!
Sad o'er her eyes the livid languor swims!
Her eyes, that with a glance could joy inspire,
Like setting stars, scarce shoot a glimmering fire.

Here stands her consort, sore, with anguish, prest,
Grief in his eye, and terror in his breast.
The Paphian graces, smit with anxious care,
In silent sorrow weep the waining fair.
Eight suns, successive, roll their fire away,
And eight slow nights see their deep shades decay.
While these revolve, though mute each muse appears,

Each speaking eye drops eloquence in tears.
On the ninth noon, great Phœbus, listening bends!
On the ninth noon, each voice in prayer ascends!—
Great god of light, of song, and physic's art,
Restore the languid fair, new soul impart!
Her beauty, wit, and virtue claim thy care,
And thine own bounty's almost rival'd there.

Each paus'd. The god assents. Would death advance?

Phœbus, unseen, arrests the threatening lance!
Down from his orb a vivid influence streams,
And quickening earth imbibes salubrious beams;
Each balmy plant, increase of virtue knows,
And art, inspir'd, with all her patron, glows.
The charmer's opening eye, kind hope, reveals,
Kind hope, her consort's breast enlivening feels.
Each grace revives, each muse resumes the lyre,
Each beauty brightens with re-lumin'd fire.
As health's auspicious powers gay life display,
Death, sullen at the sight, stalks slow away.

THE FRIEND.

AN EPISTLE TO AARON HILL, ESQUIRE.

O MY lov'd Hill, O thou by heaven design'd
To charm, to mend, and to adorn mankind!
To thee my hopes, fears, joys, and sorrows tend,
Thou brother, father, nearer yet!—thou friend!

If worldly friendships oft cement, divide,
As interests vary, or as whims preside;
If leagues of luxury borrow friendship's light,
Or leagues subversive of all social right:
O say, my Hill, in what propitious sphere,
Gain we the friend, pure, knowing, and sincere?
'Tis where the worthy and the wise retire;
There wealth may learn its use, may love inspire;

VOL. VIII.

There may young worth, the noblest end obtain,
In want my friends, in friends may knowledge
gain;

In knowledge bliss; for wisdom virtue finds,
And brightens mortal to immortal minds.

Kind then my wrongs, if love, like yours, succeed;

For you, like virtue, are a friend indeed.

Oft when you saw my youth wild error know,
Reproof, soft-hinted, taught the blush to glow.
Young and unform'd, you first my genius rais'd,
Just smil'd when faulty; and when moderate
prais'd.

Me shun'd, me ruin'd, such a mother's rage!

You sung, till pity wept o'er every page.

You call'd my lays and wrongs to early fame;

Yet, yet, th' obdurate mother felt no shame.

Pierc'd as I was! your counsel soften'd care,

To ease turn'd anguish, and to hope despair.

The man who never wound afflictive feels,

He never felt the balmy worth that heals.

Welcome the wound, when blest with such relief!

For deep is felt the friend, when felt in grief.

From you shall never, but with life, remove

Aspiring genius, condescending love.

When some, with cold, superior looks, redress,

Relief seems insult, and confirms distress;

You, when you view the man with wrongs be-sieg'd,

While warm you act th' obliger, seem th' oblig'd.

All-winning mild to each of lowly state;

To equals free, unservile to the great;

Greatness you honour, when by worth acquir'd;

Worth is by worth in every rank admir'd.

Greatness you scorn, when titles insult speak;

Proud to vain pride, to honour'd meekness meek

That worthless bliss, which others court, you fly;

That worthy woe, they shun, attracts your eye.

But shall the muse resound alone your praise;

No—let the public friend exalt her lays!

O trace that friend with me!—he's your's!—he's mine!

The world's—beneficent behold him shine!

Is wealth his sphere? If riches, like a tide,

From either India pour their golden pride;

Rich in good works, him others want employ;

He gives the widow's heart to sing for joy.

To orphans, prisoners, shall his bounty flow;

The weeping family of want and woe.

Is knowledge his? Benevolently great,

In leisure active, and in care sedate;

What aid, his little wealth perchance denies,

In each hard instance his advice supplies.

With modest truth he sets the wandering right;

And gives religion pure, primæval light;

In love diffusive, as in light refin'd,

The liberal emblem of his Maker's mind.

Is power his orb? He then, like power divine,

On all, though with a varied ray, will shine.

Ere power was his, the man he once caress'd,

Meets the same faithful smile, and mutual breast;

But ask his friend some dignity of state;

His friend, unequal to th' incumbent weight?

Asks it a stranger, one whom parts inspire

With all a people's welfare would require?

His choice admits no pause; his gift will prove
 All private, well absorb'd in public love.
 He shields his country, when for aid she calls;
 Or, should she fall, with her he greatly falls:
 But, as proud Rome, with guilty conquest crown'd,
 Spread slavery, death and desolation round,
 Should e'er his country, for dominion's prize,
 Against the sons of men a faction rise,
 Glory in hers, is in his eye disgrace;
 The friend of truth; the friend of human race.

Thus to no one, no sect, no clime confin'd,
 His boundless love embraces all mankind;
 And all their virtues in his life are known;
 And all their joys and sorrows are his own.

These are the lights, where stands that friend
 confest;

This, this the spirit, which informs thy breast.
 Through fortune's cloud thy genuine worth can shine; [thine?

What would'st thou not, were wealth and greatness

AN EPISTLE

TO MR. JOHN DYER, AUTHOR OF GRONGAR-HILL,

In Answer to his from the Country *.

Now various birds in melting concert sing,
 And hail the beauty of the opening spring:
 Now to thy dreams the nightingale complains,
 Till the lark wakes thee with her cheerful strains;
 Wakes, in thy verse and friendship ever kind,
 Melodious comfort to my jarring mind. [see,

Oh could my soul through depths of knowledge
 Could I read nature and mankind like thee,
 I should o'ercome, or bear the shocks of fate,
 And e'en draw envy to the humblest state.
 Thou canst raise honour from each ill event,
 From shocks gain vigour, and from want content.

Think not light poetry my life's chief care!
 The muse's mansion is, at best, but air;
 But, if more solid works my meaning forms,
 Th' unfinish'd structures fall by fortune's storms.

Oft have I said we falsely those accuse,
 Whose godlike souls life's middle state refuse.
 Self-love, I cry'd, there seeks ignoble rest;
 Care sleeps not calm, when millions wake unblest;
 Mean let me shrink, or spread sweet shade o'er all,
 Low as the shrub, or as the cedar tall!—

'Twas vain! 'twas wild!—I sought the middle state,
 And found the good, and found the truly great.

Though verse can never give my soul her aim;
 Though action only claims substantial fame;
 Though fate denies what my proud wants require,
 Yet grant me, heaven, by knowledge to aspire:
 Thus to inquiry let me prompt the mind;
 Thus clear dimm'd truth, and bid her bless man-
 kind;

From the pierc'd orphan thus draw shafts of grief!
 Arm want with patience, and teach wealth relief!
 To serve lov'd liberty inspire my breath!
 Or, if my life be useless, grant me death;
 For he, who useless is in life survey'd,
 Burthens that world, his duty bids him aid.

* See Dyer's Poems.

Say, what have honours to allure the mind,
 Which he gains most, who least has serv'd man-
 kind?

Titles, when worn by fools, I dare despise;
 Yet they claim homage, when they crown the wise.
 When high distinction marks deserving heirs,
 Desert still dignifies the mark it wears.

But, who to birth alone would honours owe?
 Honours, if true, from seeds of merit grow.
 Those trees, with sweetest charms, invite our eyes,
 Which, from our own engraftment, fruitful rise.
 Still we love best what we with labour gain,
 As the child's dearer for the mother's pain.

The great I would not envy nor deride;
 Nor stoop to swell a vain superior's pride;
 Nor view an equal's hope with jealous eyes;
 Nor crush the wretch beneath who wailing lies.
 My sympathizing breast his grief can feel,
 And my eye weep the wound I cannot heal.
 Ne'er among friendships let me sow debate,
 Nor by another's fall advance my state;
 Nor misuse wit against an absent friend:

Let me the virtues of a foe defend! [weight;
 In wealth and want true minds preserve their
 Meek, though exalted; though disgrac'd, elate;
 Generous and grateful, wrong'd or help'd they live;
 Grateful to serve, and generous to forgive.

This may they learn, who close thy life attend;
 Which, dear in memory, still instructs thy friend.
 Though cruel distance bars my grosser eye,
 My soul, clear-sighted, draws thy virtue nigh;
 Through her deep woe that quickening comfort
 gleams,

And lights up fortitude with friendship's beams.

VERSES.

OCCASIONED BY THE VICE-PRINCIPAL OF
 ST. MARY-HALL, OXFORD.

Being presented by the Honourable Mrs. Knight, to the Living of Godsfield in Essex.

WHILE by mean arts and meaner patrons rise
 Priests, whom the learned and the good despise;
 This sees fair Knight, in whose transcendent mind,
 Are wisdom, purity, and truth enshrin'd.
 A modest merit now she plans to lift,
 Thy living, Godsfield! falls her instant gift.
 Let me (said she) reward alone the wise,
 And make the church-revenue virtue's prize.

She sought the man of honest, candid breast,
 In faith, in works of goodness, full exprest;
 Though young, yet tutoring academic youth
 To science moral, and religious truth.
 She sought where the disinterested friend,
 The scholar, sage, and free companion blend;
 The pleasing poet, and the deep divine, [thine.
 She sought, she found, and, Hart! the prize was FULVIA.

A POEM.

LET Fulvia's wisdom be a slave to will,
 Her darling passions, scandal and quadrille;
 On friends and foes her tongue a satire known,
 Her deeds a satire on herself alone.

On her poor kindred deigns she word or look?
 'Tis cold respect, or 'tis unjust rebuke;
 Worse when good-natur'd, than when most severe:
 The jest impure then pains the modest ear.
 How just the sceptic! the divine how odd!
 What turns of wit play smartly on her god!
 The fates, my nearest kindred, foes decree:
 Fulvia, when piqu'd at them, strait pities me.
 She, like Benevolence, a smile bestows,
 Favours to me indulge her spleen to those.
 The banquet serv'd, with peeresses I sit:
 She tells my story, and repeats my wit.
 With mouth distorted, through a sounding nose
 It comes, now homeliness more homely grows.
 With see-saw sounds, and nonsense not my own,
 She skews her features, and she cracks her tone.
 How fine your bastard! why so soft a strain?
 What, such a mother? satirise again!

Oft I object—but fix'd is Fulvia's will—
 Ah! though unkind, she is my mother still!
 The verse now flows, the manuscript she claims.
 'Tis fam'd—The fame each curious fair enflames:
 The wild-fire runs; from copy, copy grows:
 The Brets, alarm'd, a separate peace propose.
 'Tis ratified—How alter'd Fulvia's look!
 My wit's degraded, and my cause forsook.
 Thus she: What's poetry but to amuse?
 Might I advise—there are more solid views.
 With a cool air she adds: This tale is old:
 Were it my case, it should no more be told.
 Complaints—had I been worthy to advise—
 You know—But when are wits, like women, wise?
 True it may take; but, think what'er you list,
 All love the satire, none the satirist.

I start, I stare, stand fix'd, then pause a while;
 Then hesitate, then ponder well, then smile.
 Madam—a pension lost—and where's amends!
 Sir, (she replies) indeed you'll lose your friends.
 Why did I start? 'twas but a change of wind—
 Or the same thing—the lady chang'd her mind.
 I bow, depart, despise, discern her all;
 Nanny revisits, and disgrac'd I fall.

Let Fulvia's friendship whirl with every whim!
 A reed, a weathercock, a shade, a dream:
 No more the friendship shall be now display'd
 By weathercock, or reed, or dream, or shade;
 To Nanny fix'd unvarying shall it tend,
 For souls, so form'd alike, were form'd to blend.

EPITAPH ON A YOUNG LADY.

CLOS'D are those eyes that beam'd seraphic fire;
 Cold is that breast which gave the world desire;
 Mute is the voice where winning softness warm'd,
 Where music melted, and where wisdom charm'd,
 And lively wit, which, decently confin'd,
 No prude e'er thought impure, no friend unkind.

Could modest knowledge, fair untrifling youth,
 Persuasive reason and endearing truth,
 Could honour, shown in friendships most refin'd,
 And sense, that shields th' attempted virtuous mind;
 The social temper never known to strife,
 The heightening graces that embellish life;
 Could these have e'er the darts of death defied,
 Never, ah! never had Melinda died;

Nor can she die—ev'n now survives her name,
 Immortaliz'd by friendship, love, and fame.

THE GENIUS OF LIBERTY.

A POEM.

OCCASIONED BY THE DEPARTURE OF THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF ORANGE.

(Written in the Year 1734.)

MILD rose the morn! the face of nature bright
 Wore one extensive smile of calm and light;
 Wide, o'er the land, did hovering silence reign,
 Wide o'er the blue diffusion of the main;
 When lo! before me, on the southern shore,
 Stood forth the power, whom Albion's sons adore;
 Blest Liberty! whose charge is Albion's isle;
 Whom reason gives to bloom, and truth to smile;
 Gives peace to gladden, sheltering law to spread,
 Learning to lift aloft her laurel'd head,
 Rich industry to view, with pleasing eyes,
 Her fleets, her cities, and her harvests rise.
 In curious emblems every art, express'd,
 Glow'd from the loom, and brighten'd on his vest,
 Science in various lights attention won,
 Wav'd on his robe, and glitter'd in the sun.

My words, he cried, my word observance claim:
 Refound, ye muses; and receive them, fame!
 Here was my station, when, o'er ocean wide,
 The great, third William, stretch'd his naval pride:
 I with my sacred influence swell'd his soul;
 Th' enslav'd to free, th' enslaver to controul.
 In vain did waves disperse, and winds detain:
 He came, he sav'd; in his was seen my reign.
 How just, how great, the plan his soul design'd,
 To humble tyrants, and secure mankind!
 Next Marlborough in his steps successful trod:
 This, godlike plann'd; that, finish'd like a god!
 And, while oppression fled to realms unknown,
 Europe was free, and Britain glorious shone.

Where Nassau's race extensive growth display'd,
 There freedom ever found a sheltering shade.
 Still heaven is kind!—See, from the princely root,
 Millions to bless, the BRANCH auspicious shoot!
 He lives, he flourishes, his honours spread;
 Fair virtues blooming on his youthful head:
 Nurse him, ye heavenly dews, ye sunny rays,
 Into firm health, fair fame, and length of days!

He paus'd, and casting o'er the deep his eye,
 Where the last billow swells into the sky,
 Where, in gay vision, round th' horizon's line,
 The moving clouds with various beauty shine;
 As dropping from their bosom, ting'd with gold,
 Shoots forth a sail, amusive to behold!
 Lo! while its light the glowing wave returns,
 Broad like a sun the bark approaching burns.
 Near, and more near, great Nassau soon he spy'd,
 And beauteous Anna, Britain's eldest pride!
 Thus spoke the Genius, as advanc'd the sail—
 Hail, blooming hero! high-born princess, hail!
 Thy charms thy mother's love of truth display,
 Her light of virtue, and her beauty's ray;
 Her dignity; which, copying the divine,
 Soften'd, through condescension, learns to shine.

Greatness of thought, with prudence for its guide;
Knowledge, from nature and from art supply'd;
To noblest objects pointed various ways;
Pointed by judgment's clear, unerring rays.

What manly virtues in her mind excel!
Yet on her heart what tender passions dwell!
For ah! what pangs did late her peace destroy,
To part with thee, so wont to give her joy! [mien!
How heav'd her breast, how sadden'd was her
All in the mother then was lost the queen.
The swelling tear then dimm'd her parting view,
The struggling sigh stopp'd short her last adieu:
Ev'n now thy fancied perils fill her mind;
The secret rock, rough wave, and rising wind;
The shoal, so treacherous, near the tempting land;
Th'ingulphing whirlpool, and the swallowing sand;
These fancied perils all, by day, by night,
In thoughts alarm her, and in dreams affright;
For thee her heart unceasing love declares,
In doubts, in hopes, in wishes, and in prayers!
Her prayers are heard!—For me, 'tis thine to brave
The sand, the shoal, rock, whirlpool, wind, and wave:

Kind safety waits, to waft thee gently o'er,
And joy to greet thee on the Belgic shore. [tell
May future times, when their fond praise would
How most their favourite characters excel; [clare,
How blest! How great!—then may their songs de-
So great! so blest!—such Anne and Nassau were.

E GRÆCO RUF.

Qui te videt beatus est,
Beatior qui te audiet,
Qui basiat semideus est,
Qui te potitur est Deus. BUCHANAN.

THE FOREGOING LINES PARAPHRASED.

HAPPY the man, who, in thy sparkling eyes,
His amorous wishes sees, reflecting play;
Sees little laughing Cupids, glancing, rise,
And, in soft-swimming languor, die away.
Still happier he! to whom thy meanings roll,
In sounds which love, harmonious love, inspire;
On his charm'd ear sits, rapt, his listening soul,
Till admiration form intense desire.
Half-deity is he who warm may press
Thy lip, soft-swelling to the kindling kifs;
And may that lip assentive warmth express,
Till love draw willing love to ardent blifs!
Circling thy waist, and circled in thy arms,
Who, melting on thy mutual melting breast,
Entranc'd enjoys love's whole luxurious charms,
Is all a God!—is of all heaven posselt.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF BEAUTY.

A POEM.

Addressed to Mrs. Bridget Jones, a young Widow Lady of Llanelly, Caermarthenshire.

ONCE beauty, wishing fond desire to move,
Contriv'd to catch the heart of wandering love.
Come, purest atoms! beauty aid implores;
For new soft texture leave ætherial stores.

They come, they crowd, the shining hues unfold,
Be their's a form, which beauty's self shall mould!
To mould my charmer's form she all apply'd—
Whence Cambria boasts the birth of Nature's pride.

She calls the Graces—Such is beauty's state,
Prompt, at her call, th' obedient Graces wait.
First your fair feet they shape, and shape to please;
Each stands desigu'd for dignity and ease.
Firm, on these curious pedestals, depend
Two polish'd pillars; which, as fair, ascend;
From well wrought knees, more fair, more large,
they rise;

Seen by the muse, though hid from mortal eyes,
More polish'd yet, your fabric each sustains;
That purest temple where perfection reigns,
A small, sweet circle forms your faultless waist,
By beauty shap'd, to be by love embrac'd.
Beyond that lessening waist, two orbs devise,
What swelling charms, in fair proportion, rise!
Fresh peeping there, two blushing buds are found,
Each like a rose, which lilies white surround.
There feeling sense, let pitying sighs inspire,
Till panting pity swells to warm desire:
Desire, though warm, is chaste; each warmest kiss,
All rapture chaste, when Hymen bids the blifs.
Rounding and soft, two taper arms descend;
Two snow-white hands, in taper fingers, end.
Lo! cunning beauty, on each palm, designs
Love's fortune and your own, in mystic lines;
And lovely whiteness, either arm contains,
Diversified with azure wandering veins;
The wandering veins conceal a generous flood,
The purple treasure of celestial blood.
Rounding and white your neck, as curious, rears
O'er all a face, where beauty's self appears.
Her soft attendants smooth the spotless skin,
And, smoothly oval, turn the shapely chin;
The shapely chin, to beauty's rising face,
Shall, doubling gently, give a double grace,
And soon sweet opening, rosy lips disclose
The well rang'd teeth, in lily-whitening rows;
Here life is breath'd, and florid life assumes
A breath, whose fragrance vies with vernal blooms;

And two fair cheeks give modesty to raise
A beauteous blush at praise, though just the praise.
And nature now, from each kind ray, supplies
Soft, clement smiles, and love-inspiring eyes;
New graces, to those eyes, mild shades, allow;
Fringe their fair lids, and pencil either brow.
While sense of vision lights up orbs so rare,
May none, but pleasing objects, visit there!
Two little porches, (which, one sense empowers,
To draw rich scent from aromatic flowers)
In structure neat, and deck'd with polish'd grace,
Shall equal first, then heighten, beauty's face.
To smelling sense, oh, may the flowery year,
Its first, last, choicest incense, offer here!
Transparent next, two curious crescents bound
The two-fold entrance of inspiring sound,
And, granting a new power of sense to hear,
New finer organs form each curious ear;
Form to imbibe what most the soul can move,
Music and reason, poetry and love.

Next, on an open front, is pleasing wrought
A pensive sweetness, born of patient thought:
Above your lucid shoulders locks display'd,
Prone to descend, shall soften light with shade.
All, with a nameless air and mein, unite,
And, as you move, each movement is delight.
'Tun'd is your melting tongue and equal mind,
At once by knowledge heighten'd and refin'd.

The virtues next to beauty's nod incline;
For, where they lend not light, she cannot shine;
Let these, the temperate sense of taste reveal,
And give, while nature spreads the simple meal.
The palate pure, to relish health design'd,
From luxury as taintless as your mind.
The virtues, chastity and truth, impart,
And mould to sweet benevolence your heart.

Thus beauty finish'd—Thus she gains the sway,
And love still follows where she leads the way.
From every gift of heaven, to charm is thine;
To love, to praise, and to adore, be mine.

SENT TO MRS. BRIDGET JONES,

WITH THE WANDERER.

*Alluding to an Episode, where a young Man turns
Hermit, for the loss of his Wife Olympia.*

WHEN with delight fond love on beauty dwelt,
While this the youth, and that the fair express'd,
Faint was his joy compar'd to what I felt,
When in my angel Biddy's presence blest.

Tell her, my muse, in soft, sad, sighing breath,
If she his piercing grief can pitying see,
Worse than to him was his Olympia's death,
From her each moment's absence is to me.

ON FALSE HISTORIANS.

A SATIRE.

SURE of all plagues with which dull prose is curst,
Scandals, from false historians, spot the worst.
In quest of these the muse shall first advance,
Bold, to explore the regions of romance;
Romance, call'd history—Lo! at once she skims
The visionary world of monkish whims;
Where fallacy, in legends, wildly shines,
And vengeance glares from violated shrines;
Where saints perform all tricks, and startle thought
With many a miracle that ne'er was wrought;
Saints that never liv'd, or such as justice paints,
Jugglers, on superstition palm'd for saints.
Here, canoniz'd, let creed-mongers be shown,
Red-letter'd saints, and red assassins known;
While those they martyr'd, such as angels rose!
All black enroll'd among religion's foes,
Snatch'd by sulphureous clouds, a LIE proclaims
Number'd with fiends, and plung'd in endless flames.

History, from air or deep draws many a spright,
Such as, from nurse or priest, might boys affright;
Or such as but o'er feverish slumbers fly,
And fix in melancholy frenzy's eye.
Now meteors make enthusiast wonder stare,
And image wild portentous wars in air!

Seers fall entranc'd! some wizard's lawless skill
Now whirls, now fetters nature's works at will!
Thus history, by machine, mock-epic, seems,
Not from poetic, but from monkish dreams.

The devil, who priest and forcerer must obey,
The forcerer us'd to raise, the parson lay,
When Echard wav'd his pen, the history shows,
The parson conjur'd, and the fiend arose.
A camp at distance, and the scene a wood,
Here enter'd Noll, and there old Satan stood:
No tail his rump, his foot no hoof reveal'd;
Like a wise cuckold, with his horns conceal'd:
Not a gay serpent, glittering to the eye;
But more than serpent, or than harlot fly:
For, lawyer-like, a fiend no wit can 'scape,
The demon stands confest in proper shape!
Now spreads his parchment, now is sign'd the scroll;

Thus Noll gains empire, and the devil has Noll.

Wondrous historian! thus account for evil,
And thus for its success—'tis all the devil.
Though ne'er that devil we saw, yet one we see,—
One of an author sure, and—thou art he.

But dusky phantoms, muse, no more pursue!
Now clearer objects open—yet untrue.
Awful the genuine historian's name!
False ones—with what materials build they fame;
Fabrics of fame, by dirty means made good,
As nests of martins are compil'd of mud.
Peace be with Curll—with him I wave all strife,
Who pens each felon's, and each actor's life;
Biography that cooks the devil's martyrs,
And lards with luscious rapes the cheats of Chartres.

Materials, which belief in gazettes claim,
Loose-strung, run glingling into history's name.
Thick as Egyptian clouds of raining flies;
As thick as worms where man corrupting lies;
As pests obscene that haunt the ruin'd pile;
As monsters floundering in the muddy Nile;
Minutes, memoirs, views, and reviews appear,
Where slander darkens each recorded year.
In a past reign is feign'd some amorous league;
Some ring or letter now reveals th' intrigue:
Queens, with their minions, work unseemly things;
And boys grow dukes, when catamites to kings.
Does a prince die? What poisons they surmise!
No royal mortal sure by nature dies.
Is a prince born? What birth more base believ'd?
Or, what's more strange, his mother ne'er con-
ceiv'd!

Thus slander popular o'er truth prevails,
And easy minds imbibe romantic tales
Thus, 'stead of history, such authors raise
Mere crude wild novels of bad hints for plays.

Some usurp names—an English garreteer,
From minutes forg'd, is Monsieur Mesnager*.

* The Minutes of Mons. Mesnager; a book calculated to vilify the administration in the four last years of Queen Anne's reign. The truth is that this libel was not written by Mons. Mesnager, neither was any such book ever printed in the French tongue, from which it is impudently said in the title page to be translated.

Some, while on good or ill success they stare,
Give conduct a complexion dark or fair:
Others, as little to inquiry prone,
Account for actions, though their spring's unknown.

One statesman vices has, and virtues too;
Hence will contested character ensue.
View but the black, he's fiend; the bright but scan,
He's angel: view him all—he's still a man.
But such historians all accuse, acquit;
No virtue these, and those no vice admit;
For either in a friend no fault will know,
And neither own a virtue in a foe.

Where hear-say knowledge sits on public names,
And bold conjecture or extols or blames,
Spring party libels; from whose ashes dead,
A monster, misnam'd History, lifts its head.
Contending factions crowd to hear its roar!
But when once heard, it dies to noise no more.
From these no answer, no applause from those,
O'er half they simper, and o'er half they doze.
So when in senate, with egregious pate,
Perks up Sir * * * * in some deep debate;
He hems, looks wise, tunes thin his labouring
throat,

To prove black white, postpone or palm the vote:
In sly contempt, some, Hear him! Hear him! cry;
Some yawn, some sneer; none second, none reply.

But dare such miscreants now rush abroad,
By blanket, cane, pump, pillory, unaw'd?
Dare they imp falsehood thus, and plume her
wings,

From present characters and recent things?
Yes: What untruths! or truths in what disguise!
What Boyers and what Oldmixons arise!
What facts from all but them and slander screen'd!
Here meets a council, no where else conven'd;
There, from originals, come, thick as spawn,
Letters ne'er wrote, memorials never drawn;
To secret conference never held they yoke,
Treaties ne'er plann'd, and speeches never spoke.
From, Oldmixon, thy brow, too well we know,
Like sin from Satan's far and wide they go.

In vain may St. John safe in conscience sit;
In vain with truth confute, condemn with wit:
Confute, condemn, amid selected friends;
There sinks the justice, there the satire ends,
Here, though a century scarce such leaves uncloze,
From mould and dust the slander sacred grows.
Now none reply where all despise the page;
But will dumb scorn deceive no future age?
Then, should dull periods cloud not seeming fact,
Will no fine pen th' unanswer'd lie extract?
Well-set in plan, and polish'd into style,
Fair and more fair may finish'd fraud beguile;
By every language snatch'd, by time receiv'd,
In every clime, by every age believ'd:
How vain to virtue trust the great their name,
When such their lot for infamy or fame?

A CHARACTER.

FAIR truth, in courts where justice should preside,
Alike the judge and advocate would guide;
And these would vie each dubious point to clear,
To stop the widow's and the orphan's tear;

Where all, like Yorke, of delicate address,
Strength to discern, and sweetness to express,
Learn'd, just, polite, born every heart to gain,
Like Cummins mild; like * Fortescue humane,
All eloquent of truth, divinely known,
So deep, so clear, all science is his own.

Of heart impure, and impotent of head,
In history, rhetoric, ethics, law, unread;
How far unlike such worthies, once a drudge,
From floundering in low cases, rose a judge.
Form'd to make pleaders laugh, his nonsense
thunders,

And, on low juries, breathes contagious blunders.
His brothers blush, because no blush he knows,
Nor e'er † "one uncorrupted finger shows."
See, drunk with power, the circuit lord express!
Full, in his eye, his betters stand confest: [loose,
Whose wealth, birth, virtue, from a tongue so
'scape not provincial, vile, buffoon abuse.
Still to what circuit is assign'd his name,
There, swift before him, flies the warner—Fame.
Contest stops short, consent yields every cause
To cost; delay, endures them, and withdraws.
But how 'scape prisoners? To their trial chain'd,
All, all shall stand condemn'd, who stand arraign'd,
Dire guilt, which else would detestation cause,
Prejudg'd with insult, wondrous pity draws.
But 'scapes e'en innocence his harsh harangue?
Alas!—e'en innocence itself must hang;
Must hang to please him, when of spleen possess'd;
Must hang to bring forth an abortive jest.

Why liv'd he not ere star-chambers had fail'd,
When fine, tax, censure, all but law prevail'd;
Or law, subservient to some murderous will,
Became a precedent to murder still?
Yet e'en when patriots did for traitors bleed,
Was e'er the job to such a slave decreed,
Whose savage mind wants sophist-art to draw,
O'er murder'd virtue, spacious veils of law?

Why, student, when the bench your youth admits; [fits;
Where, though the worst, with the best rank'd he
Where sound opinions you attentive write,
As once a Raymond, now a Lee to cite,
Why pause you scornful when he dins the court?
Note well his cruel quirks, and well report.
Let his own words against himself point clear
Satire more sharp than verse when most severe.

EPITAPH ON MRS. JONES,

GRANDMOTHER TO MRS. BRIDGET JONES, OF LLANELLY IN CAERMARTHENSHIRE.

In her, whose relics mark this sacred earth,
Shone all domestic and all social worth:
First, heaven her hope with early offspring
crown'd;
And thence a second race rose numerous round.
Heaven to industrious virtue blessing lent,
And all was competence, and all content.

* The Honourable William Fortescue, Esq. one of the Justices of his Majesty's Court of Common Pleas.

† When Page one uncorrupted finger shows.

D. OF WHARTON.

Though frugal care, in wisdom's eye admir'd,
 Knew to preserve what industry requir'd;
 Yet, at her board with decent plenty blest,
 The journeying stranger sat a welcome guest.
 Prest on all sides, did trading neighbours fear
 Ruin, which hung o'er exigence severe?
 Farewell the friend, who spar'd th' assistant loan—
 A neighbour's woe or welfare was her own.
 Did piteous lazars oft attend her door?
 She gave—farewell the parent of the poor.
 Youth, age, and want, once cheer'd, now sighing
 swell,
 Bless her lov'd name, and weep a last farewell.

VALENTINE'S DAY.

A POEM.

Addressed to a young Widow Lady.

ADIEU, ye rocks that witness'd once my flame,
 Return'd my sighs, and echo'd Chloe's name!
 Cambria, farewell!—my Chloe's charms no more
 Invite my steps along Llanelly's shore;
 There no wild dens conceal voracious foes,
 The beach no fierce, amphibious monster knows;
 No crocodile there flesh'd with prey appears,
 And o'er that bleeding prey weeps cruel tears;
 No false hyæna, feigning human grief,
 There murders him, whose goodness means relief:
 Yet tides, conspiring with unfaithful ground,
 Though distant seen, with treacherous arms, sur-
 round.

There quicksands, thick as beauty's snares, annoy,
 Look fair to tempt, and whom they tempt, destroy,
 I watch'd the seas, I pac'd the sands with care,
 Escap'd, but wildly rush'd on beauty's snare.

Ah!—better far, than by that snare overpower'd,
 Had sands engulf'd me, or had seas devour'd.

Far from that shore, where fyren beauty dwells,
 And wraps sweet ruin in resistless spells; [boast,
 From Cambrian plains; which Chloe's lustre
 Me native England yields a safer coast.

Chloe, farewell!—Now seas, with boisterous pride,
 Divide us, and will ever far divide:

Yet while each plant, which vernal youth resumes,
 Feels the green blood ascend in future blooms;
 While little feather'd songsters of the air
 In woodlands tuneful woo and fondly pair,
 The muse exults, to beauty tunes the lyre,
 And willing loves the swelling notes inspire.

Sure on this day, when hope attains success,
 Bright Venus first did young Adonis bless.
 Her charms not brighter, Chloe, sure than thine;
 Though flush'd his youth, not more his warmth than mine.

Sequester'd far within a myrtle grove,
 Whose blooming bosom courts retiring love;
 Where a clear sun, the blue serene displays,
 And sheds, through vernal air, attemper'd rays;
 Where flowers their aromatic incense bring,
 And fragrant flourish in eternal spring;
 There mate to mate each dove responsive coos,
 While this assents, as that enamour'd woos,
 There rills amusive, send from rocks around,
 A solitary, pleasing, murmuring sound;

Then form a limpid lake. The lake serene
 Reflects the wonders of the blissful scene.
 To love the birds attune their chirping throats,
 And on each breeze immortal music floats.
 There seated on a rising turf is seen,
 Graceful, in loose array, the Cyprian queen;
 All fresh and fair, all mild, as Ocean gave
 The goddess, rising from the azure wave;
 Dishevel'd locks distil celestial dews,
 And all her limbs, divine perfumes diffuse.
 Her voice so charms, the plumy, warbling throngs,
 In listening wonder lost, suspend their songs.
 It sounds—"Why loiters my Adonis?"—cry,
 "Why loiters my Adonis?"—rocks reply.
 "Oh, come away!"—they thrice, repeating, say;
 And echo thrice repeats,—“Oh, come away!”—
 Kind zephyrs waft them to her lover's ears;
 Who, instant at th' enchanting call, appears.
 Her placid eye, where sparkling joy refines,
 Benignant, with alluring lustre shines.
 His locks, which, in loose ringlets, charm the view,
 Float careless, lucid from their amber hue.
 A myrtle wreath her rosy fingers frame,
 Which, from her hand, his polish'd temples claim;
 His temples fair, a streaking beauty stains,
 As smooth white marble shines with azure veins.
 He kneel'd. Her snowy hand he trembling seiz'd,
 Just list'd to his lip, and gently squeez'd;
 The meaning squeeze return'd, love caught its lore
 And enter'd, at his palm, through every pore.
 Then swell'd her downy breasts, till then enclos'd,
 Fast heaving, half-conceal'd and half-expos'd:
 Soft she reclines. He, as they fall and rise,
 Hangs, hovering o'er them, with enamour'd eyes,
 And, warm'd, grows wanton—As he thus ad-
 mir'd,

He pry'd, he touch'd, and with the touch was fir'd,
 Half-angry, yet half pleas'd, her frown beguiles
 The boy to fear; but, at his fear, she smiles.
 The youth less timorous and the fair less coy,
 Supinely amorous they reclining toy.
 More amorous still his sanguine meaning stole
 In wistful glances, to her softening soul:
 In her fair eye her softening soul he reads:
 To freedom, freedom, boon, to baon, succeeds.
 With conscious blush, th' impassion'd charmer
 burns; [turns.
 And, blush for blush, the impassion'd youth re-
 They look, they languish, sigh with pleasing pain,
 And wish and gaze, and gaze and wish again.
 'Twixt her white, parting bosom steals the boy,
 And more than hope preludes tumultuous joy;
 Through every vein the vigorous transport ran,
 Strung every nerve, and brac'd the boy to man.
 Struggling, yet yielding, half o'erpower'd, she pants,

Seems to deny, and yet, denying, grants.
 Quick, like the tendrils of a curling vine,
 Fond limbs with limbs, in amorous folds, entwine.
 Lips press on lips, caressing and caress,
 Now eye darts flame to eye, and breast to breast.
 All she resigns, as dear desires incite,
 And rapt he reach'd the brink of full delight.
 Her waist compress'd in his exulting arms,
 He storms, explores, and rifles all her charms;

Clasps in ecstatic bliss th' expiring fair,
 And, thrilling, melting, nestling, riots there.
 How long the rapture lasts, how soon it fleets,
 How oft it pauses, and how oft repeats;
 What joys they both receive and both bestow,
 Virgins may guess, but wives experienc'd know:
 From joys, like these, (ah, why deny'd to me?)
 Sprung a fresh, blooming boy, my fair, from thee.
 May he, a new Adonis, lift his crest,
 In all the florid grace of youth confest!
 First let him learn to lisp your lover's name,
 And, when he reads, here annual read my flame.
 When beauty first shall wake his genial fire,
 And the first tingling sense excite desire;
 When the dear object, of his peace possess'd,
 Gains and still gains on his unguarded breast:
 Then may he say, as he this verse reviews,
 So my bright mother charm'd the poet's muse.
 His heart thus flutter'd oft 'twixt doubt and fear,
 Lighten'd with hope, and sadden'd with despair,
 Say, on some rival did she smile too kind?
 Ah, read—what jealousy distracts his mind!
 Smil'd she on him? He imag'd rays divine.
 And gaz'd and gladden'd with a love like mine.
 How dwelt her praise upon his raptur'd tongue!
 Ah!—when she frown'd, what plaintive notes he sung!

And could she frown on him—Ah, wherefore, tell!
 On him, whose only crime was loving well?

Thus may thy son his pangs with mine compare,
 Then wish his mother had been kind as fair.
 For him may love the myrtle wreath entwine;
 Though the sad willow suits a woe like mine!
 Ne'er may the filial hope, like me, complain!
 Ah! never sigh and bleed, like me in vain!—

When death affords that peace which love denies,
 Ah, no!—far other scenes my fate supplies;
 When earth to earth my lifeless corse is laid,
 And o'er it hangs the yew or cypress shade:
 When pale I flit along the dreary coast,
 An helpless lover's pining plaintive ghost;
 Here annual on this dear returning day,
 While feather'd choirs renew the melting lay;
 May you, my fair, when you these strains shall see,
 Just spare one sigh, one tear, to love and me,
 Me, who, in absence or in death, adore
 Those heavenly charms I must behold no more.

TO JOHN POWELL, ESQUIRE,

BARRISTER AT LAW.

In me long absent, long with anguish fraught,
 In me, though silence long has deaden'd thought,
 Yet memory lives, and calls the muse's aid,
 To snatch our friendship from oblivion's shade.
 As soon the sun shall cease the world to warm,
 As soon Llanelly's* fair that world to charm,
 As grateful sense of goodness, true like thine,
 Shall e'er desert a breast so warm as mine.

When imag'd Cambria strikes my memory's eye,
 (Cambria, my darling scene!) I, sighing, cry,
 Where is my Powell? dear associate!—where?
 To him I would unbosom every care;

* Mrs. Bridget Jones.

To him, who early felt, from beauty, pain;
 Gall'd in a plighted, faithless virgin's chain.
 At length, from her ungenerous fetters, freed,
 Again he loves! he woos! his hopes succeed!
 But the gay bridegroom, still by fortune cross'd,
 Is, instant, in the weeping widower lost.
 Her, his sole joy! her from his bosom torn,
 What feeling heart, but learns, like his to mourn?
 Can nature then, such sudden shocks, sustain?
 Nature thus struck, all reason pleads in vain!
 Though late, from reason yet he draws relief,
 Dwells on her memory; but dispels his grief.
 Love, wealth, and fame (tyrannic passions all!)
 No more enflame him, and no more enthrall.
 He seeks no more, in Rufus' hall, renown;
 Nor envies Pelf the jargon of the gown;
 But pleas'd with competence, on rural plains,
 His wisdom courts that ease his worth obtains.
 Would private jars, which sudden rise, encrease?
 His candour smiles all discord into peace.
 To party storms is public weal resign'd?
 Each steady patriot-virtue steers his mind.
 Calm, on the beach, while maddening billows rave,
 He gains philosophy from every wave;
 Science, from every object round, he draws;
 From various nature, and from nature's laws.
 He lives o'er every past historic age;
 He calls forth ethics from the fabled page.
 Him evangelic truth, to thought excites;
 And him, by turns, each classic muse delights.
 With wit well-natur'd; wit, that would disdain
 A pleasure rising from another's pain;
 Social to all, and most of bliss possess'd,
 When most he renders all, around him, blest:
 To unread 'squires illiterately gay;
 Among the learn'd, as learned full as they;
 With the polite, all, all-accomplish'd ease,
 By nature form'd, without deceit, to please.

Thus shines thy youth; and thus my friend, elate
 In bliss as well as worth, is truly great.
 Me still should ruthless fate, unjust, expose
 Beneath those clouds, that rain unnumber'd woes;
 Me, to some nobler sphere, should fortune raise,
 To wealth conspicuous, and to laurel'd praise;
 Unalter'd yet be love and friendship mine;
 I still am Chloe's, and I still am thine.

LONDON AND BRISTOL DELINEATED*.

Two sea-port cities mark Britannia's fame,
 And these from commerce different honours claim.
 What different honours shall the muses pay,
 While one inspires and one untunes the lay?
 Now silver Isis brightening flows along,
 Echoing from Oxford shore each classic song;
 Then weds with Tame; and these, O London, see
 Swelling with naval pride, the pride of thee!
 Wide, deep, unsullied Thames, meandering glides
 And bears thy wealth on mild majestic tides.
 Thy ships, with gilded palaces that vie,
 In glittering pomp, strike wondering China's eye

* The Author prefer'd this title to that of London and Bristol compared; which, when he began the piece, he intended to prefix to it.

And thence returning bear, in splendid state,
To Britain's merchants, India's eastern freight.
India, her treasures from her western shores,
Due at thy feet, a willing tribute pours;
Thy warring navies distant nations awe,
And bid the world obey thy righteous law.
Thus shine thy manly sons of liberal mind;
Thy change deep-busied, yet as courts refin'd;
Councils, like senates, that enforce debate,
With fluent eloquence and reason's weight.
Whose patriot virtue, lawless power controls;
Their British emulating Roman souls.
Of these the worthiest still selected stand,
Still lead the senate, and still save the land:
Social, not selfish, here, O learning, trace
Thy friends, the lovers of all human race!

In a dark bottom sunk, O Bristol now,
With native malice, lift thy lowering brow!
Then as some hell-born sprite in mortal guise,
Borrows the shape of goodness and belies,
All fair, all smug, to yon proud hall invite,
To feast all strangers ape an air polite!
From Cambria drain'd, or England's western coast,
Not elegant, yet costly banquets boast!
Revere, or seem the stranger to revere;
Praise, fawn, profess, be all things but sincere;
Insidious now, our bosom-secrets steal,
And these with fly sarcastic sneer reveal.
Present we meet thy sneaking treacherous smiles;
The harmless absent still thy sneer reviles;
Such as in thee all parts superior find,
The sneer that marks the fool and knave combin'd;
When melting pity would afford relief,
The ruthless sneer that insult adds to grief.
What friendship canst thou boast? what honours
claim?

To thee each stranger owes an injur'd name.
What smiles thy sons must in their foes excite!
Thy sons, to whom all discord is delight;
From whom eternal mutual railing flows;
Who in each other's crimes, their own expose:
Thy sons, though crafty, deaf to wisdom's call;
Despising all men, and despis'd by all;
Sons, while thy cliffs a ditch-like river laves,
Rude as thy rocks, and muddy as thy waves,
Of thoughts as narrow as of words immense,
As full of turbulence as void of sense?
Thee, thee, what senatorial souls adorn!
Thy natives sure would prove a senate's scorn.
Do strangers deign to serve thee; what their praise?
Their generous services thy murmurs raise.
What fiend malign, that o'er thy air presides,
Around from breast to breast inherent glides,
And, as he glides, there scatters in a trice
The lurking seeds of every rank device?
Let foreign youths to thy indentures run!
Each, each will prove, in thy adopted son,

Proud, pert, and dull—though brilliant once from schools,

Will scorn all learning's as all virtue's rules;
And, though by nature friendly, honest, brave,
Turn a fly, selfish, simpering, sharpening knave.
Boast petty-courts, where 'stead of fluent ease,
Of cited precedents and learned pleas;
'Steal of sage counsel in the dubious cause,
Attornies, chattering wild, burlesque the laws—
(So shameless quacks, who doctors rights invade,
Of jargon and of poison form a trade.
So canting cobblers, while from tubs they teach,
Buffoon the gospel they pretend to preach.)
Boast petty courts, whence rules new rigour draw;
Unknown to nature's and to statute-law;
Quirks that explain all saving rights away,
To give th' attorney and the catchpoll prey.
Is there where law too rigorous may descend,
Or charity her kindly hand extend?
Thy courts, that, shut when pity would redress,
Spontaneous open to inflict distress.
Try misdemeanours!—all thy wiles employ,
Not to chastise the offender, but destroy;
Bid the large lawless fine his fate foretell;
Bid it beyond his crime and fortune swell;
Cut off from service due to kindred blood,
To private welfare and to public good,
Pitied by all, but thee, he sentenc'd lies;
Imprison'd languishes, imprison'd dies.

* * * * *

Boast swarming vessels, whose plebeian state
Owes not to merchants but mechanics freight.
Boast nought but pedlar-fleets—in war's alarms,
Unknown to glory, as unknown to arms.
Boast thy base* Tolsey, and thy turn-spit dogs,
Thy† Halliers horses and thy human hogs;
Upstarts and mushrooms, proud, relentless hearts;
Thou blank of sciences! thou dearth of arts!
Such foes as learning once was doom'd to see!
Huns, Goths, and Vandals, were but types of thee.

Proceed, great Bristol, in all-righteous ways,
And let one Justice heighten yet thy praise;
Still spare the catamite, and swinge the whore,
And be, whate'er Gomorrha was before.

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR

EDINBURGH:

1824.

THE LIFE OF HILL.

AARON HILL was the eldest son of George Hill, Esq. of Malmesbury Abbey, in Wiltshire, and born in Beaufort Buildings, in the Strand, London, February 10. 1684-5.

His father having, by his mismanagement, deprived him of the succession to the family estate of about 2000 l. a-year, he was left to the care of Mrs. Gregory, his grandmother, "a woman of uncommon understanding, and great good nature."

At nine years old, he was sent to the school of Barnstaple in Devonshire, under the care of Mr. Rayner; from whence he was removed to Westminster school, under the care of Dr. Knipe, where his genius soon became conspicuous, and often made him ample amends for his very scanty allowance of pocket-money, by enabling him to perform the tasks of others who had not his capacity.

He left Westminster school, on account of his narrow circumstances, in 1699, at fourteen years of age. Soon after, he formed a resolution of paying a visit to his relation, Lord Paget, then ambassador at Constantinople; and meeting with no opposition from his grandmother, he accordingly embarked on board a vessel going there, March 2. 1700.

On his arrival, he was received with the utmost kindness and cordiality, by Lord Paget, who was no less pleased than surprised at that ardour for improvement, which could induce a youth of his tender years, to run the hazard of such a voyage, to visit a relation whom he only knew by character.

The ambassador immediately provided him a tutor in his own house; under whose care he very soon sent him to travel through Egypt, Palestine, and the greatest part of the East, being desirous of gratifying that laudable curiosity, and thirst of knowledge, which seemed so strongly impressed on the amiable mind of his young relation.

He returned home with Lord Paget, about the year 1703; and, on his journey, had an opportunity of seeing great part of Europe, at most of the courts of which his Lordship made some little stay.

It is supposed that Lord Paget would have made some provision for him at his death, had not the malevolence of a certain female, who had great influence with him, prevented his kind intentions towards him.

A few years after, his abilities and sobriety recommended him to Sir William Wentworth, Bart. of Yorkshire, who was then going to make the tour of Europe, with whom he travelled two or three years.

In 1709, he published a History of the Ottoman Empire, compiled from the materials which he had collected in his travels, and during his residence at the Turkish court. This work, though it met with success, he afterwards very severely criticised, and with some justice; for there are in it a great number of puerilities. It is the production of youthful genius, rather choosing to indulge the imagination of the poet, than to make use of the plainness and perspicuity of the historian. Sprat, however, used to observe that "there is certainly in that book, the seeds of a great writer;" a prediction which was amply verified by the merit of his subsequent writings.

The same year, he published his first poetical piece, intituled Camillus, in vindication of the Earl of Peterborough; who was so well pleased with the compliment, that he appointed him his secretary, and introduced him to Harley, and St. John, and other leaders of the Tory party, of which he appears to have been an adherent.

In 1710, he quitted the service of Lord Peterborough, and married the only daughter of Edmund Morris, Esq. of Stratford, in Essex, a young lady of great merit and beauty, with whom he had a very handsome fortune.

The same year, he was appointed Manager of the theatre in Drury Lane, and, at the desire of Booth the player, wrote his first tragedy of Elfrid, or, the Fair Inconstant, which was favourably received on the stage, though he has himself described it to be "an unpruned wilderness of fancy, with here and there a flower among the leaves, but without any fruit of judgment." To this play was annexed, in the representation, a dramatic piece, called The Walking Statue; or, the Devil in the Wine Cellar: the plot of which is farcical, and the incidents beyond the limits of possibility.

The year following, he wrote the opera of Rinaldo, which was performed at the theatre in the Hay-Market, of which he was director, and met with very great success. The music was the first that Handel composed after his arrival in England.

His genius seems to have been admirably adapted to the business of the stage; and while he held the management, he conducted both theatres, highly to the satisfaction of the public; but having a misunderstanding with the Duke of Kent, then Lord Chamberlain, he relinquished it in a few months; and though he was not long after very earnestly solicited by a person of the first distinction, to resume the theatrical direction, he still declined it.

It is probable, however, that neither pride nor resentment were the motives of this refusal, but an ardent zeal for general improvement, and the public good, which seems to have been his darling passion, and to which, on different occasions, he sacrificed not only his ease, but large sums of money.

In 1713, he undertook to make an oil as sweet as that from olives, from beech nuts, and obtained a patent for the purpose; but being an undertaking of too great extent for his private fortune, he took a subscription of 25,000 l. on shares and annuities, in security of which, he assigned over his patent in trust for the subscribers, forming a Company who were to act in concert with the patentee, under the denomination of The Beech Oil Company.

The success of this undertaking, at a time when profits were already arising from it, was frustrated, by the erroneous warmth and impatience of those persons with whom he was obliged to unite himself; and after three years labour and application, came to nothing.

In 1716, he published An Impartial State of the Case between the Patentee, Annuity-holders, and Shareholders in the Beech Oil Company, by which it appeared that all the money that had been employed, had been fairly expended for the benefit of the Company, and that the patentee had not availed himself of the advantages to which, by the agreement, he had been entitled.

After the failure of this project, he was concerned with Sir Robert Montgomery, in a design for establishing a plantation in that part of South Carolina, which has since been extensively cultivated under the name of Georgia; yet, through inequality of his fortune, it never proved of any advantage to him.

In 1716, he brought on the stage at Lincoln's Inn-fields, The Fatal Vision; or, The Fall of Siam, a tragedy; which was acted with success. The scene is laid in Siam, but the fable is fictitious, and the characters imaginary. The moral is to expose the dangerous consequences of giving way to rage and rashness of determination. It is dedicated to the two critics, Dennis, and Gildon. He prefixed to it this motto from Horace, to which he declared his constant adherence.

I not for vulgar admiration write,
To be well read, not much, is my delight.

The same year, he published the two first books of an epic poem, called Gideon, in twelve books, on the foundation of the story of the redemption of Israel by Gideon, in the book of Judges; of which he afterwards wrote six books more, which made eight; but did not finish it.

In 1718, he wrote a poem called The Northern Star, a panegyric on Peter the Great; for which he was afterwards complimented with a gold medal from the Empress, Catherine, according to the Emperor's desire before his death. By an advertisement to the fifth edition of this poem, printed in 1739, it appears that he was to have wrote the life of Peter, from his papers which were to have been sent to him; but the death of the Empress prevented it.

In 1720, he wrote The Fatal Extravagance, a tragedy in one act, which he gave to Mr. Joseph Mitchell, at that time in great distress, and got it acted at the theatre in Lincoln's Inn-fields, and supported it on the supposed author's third night, with all that ardour of benevolence which constituted his character. It was afterwards enlarged into five acts, and exhibited at Drury Lane, in 1726, with great success. It is one of the most interesting dramas in the English language.

In 1723, he brought on the stage, at Drury Lane, his tragedy of Henry V. or, The Conquest of France by the English; which is justly esteemed a very good play. The plot and language are in some places borrowed from Shakspeare; yet, on the whole, it is greatly altered, and a second plot is introduced by the addition of a new female character, a niece to Lord Scroope, who has been formerly seduced by the king.

In 1724, for the benefit of a distressed officer in the army, he began a periodical paper, called, The Plain Dealer, in conjunction with William Bond, Esq. whom Savage called the two contending powers of light and darkness. They wrote by turns, each six essays; and the character of the work was observed regularly to rise in Hill's weeks, and fall in Mr. Bond's.

"I am particularly indebted" says Savage, in the preface to his 'Miscellany,' "to the author of 'The Plain Dealer,' who was pleased, in two of his papers (which I entreat his pardon for reprinting before my Miscellany), to point out my unhappy story to the world, with so touching a humanity, and so good an effect, that many persons of quality, of all ranks, and of both sexes, distinguished themselves with the promptness he here hinted to the noble minded, and not staying till they were applied to, sent me the honour of their subscriptions, in the most liberal and handsome manner. I ought here to acknowledge several favours from Mr. Hill, whose writings are a shining ornament of this Miscellany; but I wave detaining my readers, and beg leave to refer them to a copy of verses called "The Friend," which I have taken the liberty to address to that gentleman."

Mallet communicated to Hill the first sketch of his beautiful ballad of "William and Margaret," originally printed in The Plain Dealer.

In 1728, he made a journey into the north of Scotland, where he had been about two years before, having contracted with the York-Buildings Company, to apply the timber upon their estates, on the river Spey, to the uses of the navy. In this undertaking, however, he found various obstacles; for when the trees were by his order chained together into floats, the ignorant Highlanders refused to venture themselves on them down the Spey, till he first went himself, to show there was no danger.

The rocks in the river were another impediment, which his sagacity and perseverance overcame by ordering fires to be made on them, where they were most exposed, and throwing great quantities of water on them, they were, by the help of proper tools, broken to pieces, and a free passage opened for the floats.

"The shore of the Spey," says he, in a letter to his wife, from the Golden Groves of Abernethy, August 18. 1728, "is all covered with masts, from 50 to 70 feet long, which they are daily bringing out of the wood, with ten carriages, and above a hundred horses, and bring down from forty to fifty trees a-day, one day with another.

"In the middle of the river lie at anchor, a little fleet of our rafts, which are just putting off for Findhorn harbour; and it is one of the pleasantest sights possible, to observe the little armies of men, women, and children, who pour down from the Highlands, to stare at what we have been doing."

The undertaking was for some time carried on with great vigour, and considerable advantage, till the directors thought proper to call off the men and horses from the woods of Abernethy, to work their lead mines.

What private emolument he received from this project, is not certainly known; but, during his residence in the Highlands, the Magistrates of Aberdeen, Inverness, &c. complimented him with the freedom of their respective towns; and he met with distinguished civilities from the Duke of Gordon, and other persons of rank in that part of the country. His prophetic Verses, in compliment to Scotland, are generally known.

In his return from the north, he spent some time in Yorkshire, where his wife then was, with some relations, for the recovery of her health; which afforded an opportunity to some persons to be guilty of a breach of trust, that would have been of very unhappy consequence to his fortune; but he returned time enough to frustrate their villainous intentions.

During his peregrination in the north, he wrote an allegorical poem, intituled, The Progress of Wit, a Caveat for the use of an eminent Writer, which gave great uneasiness to Pope, who had been the aggressor in "The Dunciad."

About the same time, he wrote his Advice to the Poets, in which he praises worthy poetry, censures the misapplication of poetry in general, and reproves Pope for descending below his genius.

While every meaner art exerts her aim,
O'er rival arts to lift her question'd fame;
Let half-soul'd poets' still on poets fall,
And teach the willing world to scorn them all.
But let no muse, pre-eminent as thine,
Of voice melodious, and of force divine,
Stung by wits, wasps, all rights of rank forego,
And turn and snarl, and bite at every foe;
No—like thy own Ulysses make no stay,
Shun monsters—and pursue thy streamy way.

In 1731, he had the affliction to lose his wife, to whom he had the sincerest and tenderest attachment. By her he had nine children; four of whom (a son and three daughters) survived him.

Her amiable worth and elegant accomplishments are finely delineated by Savage, in his verses To the Excellent Miranda, Consort of Aaron Hill, Esq. on reading her Poems.—

Each softening charm of Clio's smiling song,
Montague's soul, which shine divinely strong;
These blend, with graceful ease, to form thy rhyme,
Tender, yet chaste, sweet-sounding, yet sublime,
Wisdom and wit have made thy works their care,
Each passion glows, refin'd by precept there;
To fair Miranda's form each grace is kind,
The muses and the virtues tune thy mind.

The thought of the following epitaph for a monument he designed to erect over her grave, though not original, is truly poetical.

Enough, cold stone! suffice her long-liv'd name,
Words are too weak to pay her virtue's claim:
Temples, and tombs, and tongues, shall waste away,
And power's vain pomp in mould'ring dust decay,
But e'er mankind a wife more perfect see,
Eternity, O Time! shall bury thee.

The same year, he brought his tragedy of Athelwold upon the stage in Drury Lane, written on the subject of his Elfrid; or, The Fair Inconstant. The difference of time and judgment is visible in favour of Athelwold. The language is poetical and spirited, the characters chaste and genuine, and the descriptions affecting and picturesque.

In 1733, his tragedy of Zara, taken from Voltaire, was acted for the benefit of Mr. Bond, at the Long-room in Villars Street, York-Buildings, who performed the part of Lusignan, but died before the run of the play was over. It was afterwards brought on the stage at Drury Lane, 1735, where the part of Zara was played by Mrs. Cibber, being her first attempt in tragedy. This is justly esteemed one of his best plays.

In 1735, he projected a periodical paper, called The Prompter, designed to correct the imperfections of the stage, to which he contributed the papers signed B.

In 1736, his Alzira, or, The Spanish Insult Repented, a tragedy, taken from Voltaire, was acted at Lincoln's Inn-fields. This play has been much improved in the English version; as was generously acknowledged by Voltaire himself: the language is nervous and forcible, but it abounds in declamation, rather than passion, which, however strongly it may be supported, renders it tedious to an English audience.

In 1737, he published The Tears of the Muses, a satire, which he calls a "Species of Poetry that can only be reconciled to humanity by the general benevolence of its purpose, attacking particulars for the public advantage."

In 1738, he published An Inquiry into the merit of Assassination, with a view to the Character of Caesar; on whose death he had written a tragedy the year before, named The Roman Revenge, which was acted at the theatre in Bath, 1753, with success. "The tragedy," says Bolingbroke, to whom it was dedicated, "is finely wrote; the characters are admirably well drawn, the sentiments are noble, beyond the power of words, and the expression, dignified as it is, can add nothing to their sublime. By inscribing to me one of the noblest dramas that our language, or any age can boast, you transmit my character to posterity with greater advantage, than any I could have given it."

About this time, he withdrew himself from the world, and settled at Plaistow in Essex, where he devoted himself entirely to his study, family, and garden; and the perfection of many profitable improvements; one of which only he lived to complete, though not to reap any benefit from it himself, the Art of making Pot Ash, equal to that brought from Russia.

In his solitude he wrote an heroic poem, called The Fanciad, inscribed to the Duke of Marlborough, 1743, The Impartial, a poem, inscribed to Lord Carteret; a poem upon Faith, 1746, the Art of Aëling, a poem, dedicated to Lord Chesterfield, 1747; a tract on War, and another on Agriculture, which he left unfinished, with several other pieces.

In 1749, he revised the eight books he had finished of his epic poem, called Gideon, and published three of the books to which he gave the title of Gideon, or, The Patriot, with a dedication to Lord Bolingbroke; in which he accounts for the alterations he had made since the first publication of two books.

He also adapted to the English stage, Voltaire's tragedy of Merope, which was acted at Drury-Lane, 1749, with great applause, and was the last work he lived to complete.

This play, which he has made entirely his own, by his manner of translating it, still continues to be acted with applause, and the use which has been made of the design, in "Barbarossa, Creusa, Douglas," &c. affords a strong evidence in its favour.

He just lived to see his tragedy introduced to the public, and to write a dedication to Lord Bolingbroke, in which there is a melancholy preface of his approaching dissolution.

Cover'd in fortune's shade I rest reclin'd,
My griefs all silent, and my joys resign'd;
With patient eye life's evening gloom survey,
Nor shake th' out-hasting sands, nor bid them stay;
Yet while from life my setting prospects fly,
Fain would my mind's weak offspring shun to die;
Fain would their hope some light through time explore,
The name's kind passport, when the man's no more;

Mallet had made interest with the Prince of Wales, to have it performed for his benefit; but the day before it was, by the command of the Prince, to have been represented, he died, Feb. 8. 1749-50, before he had completed his 68th year, as it is said, in the very minute of the earthquake, after enduring a twelvemonth's torment of body, with great fortitude and resignation.

He was buried in the same grave with his wife, in the great cloister of Westminster Abbey, near Lord Godolphin's tomb.

A collection of his Original Poems and Letters, was printed for the benefit of the family, by subscription, in 4 vols. 8vo, 1751; with a poetical dedication to the princess of Wales, by his daughter, Mrs. Urania Johnson, who seems to have inherited a large portion of his taste, and amiable benevolence.

His dramatic works, including the plays above-mentioned, and The Roman Revenge, a tragedy, 1753, The Insolvent, or, Filial Piety, a tragedy, 1758, Merlin in Love, an occasional prelude, The Muse in Mourning, a comic opera, The Snake in the Grass, a dramatic satire, Saul, a tragedy, and Daraxes, a tragedy, were printed in 2 vols. 8vo, 1759. A selection from the mass of his miscellaneous compositions is now, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry.

The character of Hill was in every respect perfectly amiable. His person was, in his youth, extremely fair and handsome. He was tall, not too thin, yet genteelly made. His eyes were a dark blue, bright and penetrating, his hair brown, and his face oval. His countenance was generally animated by a smile. His address was most engagingly affable, yet mingled with a native unassumed dignity, which rendered him at once respected and admired. His voice was sweet, and his conversation elegant; and so extensive was his knowledge in all subjects, that scarcely any could occur, on which he did not acquit himself in a most masterly and entertaining manner. His temper, though naturally warm when roused by injuries, was equally noble in a readiness to forgive them; and so much inclined was he to repay evil with good, that he frequently exercised that christian lesson, to the prejudice of his own circumstances. He was a generous master, a sincere friend, an affectionate husband, and an indulgent and tender parent; and, indeed, so benevolent was his disposition in general, even beyond the power of the fortune he was blessed with, that the calamities of those he knew, and valued as deserving, affected him more deeply than his own. In consequence of this he bestowed the profits of many of his works for the relief of his friends, and particularly his dramatic pieces, none of which he could ever be prevailed on to accept of a benefit for, except his Merope, which, at the very close of his life was commanded to be represented for the relief of its author, from those difficulties out of which he had frequently been the generous instrument of extricating others. His manner of living was temperate to the greatest degree, in every respect but that of late hours, which his indefatigable love of study frequently drew him into. No labour deterred him from the prosecution of any design that appeared to him to be praise-worthy and practicable; nor was it in the power of misfortune, which from his birth he seemed destined to encounter, to overcome, or even shake his fortitude of mind.

He seems to have lived in perfect harmony with all the writers of his time, except Pope, with whom he had a short controversy, greatly to his advantage, occasioned by the following lines in the "Dunciad."

Then H— essay'd; scarce vanish'd out of sight,
He buoys up instant, and returns to light;
He bears no token of the fabler streams,
And mounts far off among the swans of Thames.

This, though the gentlest piece of satire in the whole poem, and conveying at the same time an oblique compliment, he retaliated in his Progress of Wit, which begins with the following lines, in which Pope's well known disposition is elegantly, yet very severely characterised.

Tuneful Alexis, on the Thame's fair side,
The ladies' play-thing and the muse's pride;
With merit popular, with wit polite,
Easy, though vain, and elegant, though light;
Desiring, and deserving others praise,
Poorly accepts a fame he ne'er repays;
Unborn to cherish, sneakingly approves,
And wants the soul to spread the worth he loves.

The "sneakingly approves" in the last couplet affected Pope extremely; who, indeed, through the whole controversy, seems rather to express his repentance by denying the offence, than to vindicate himself, supposing it to have been given.

"That the letters, A. H." says he, "were applied to you in the papers, I did not know, (for I seldom read them) I heard it only from Mr. Savage, as from yourself, and sent my assurance to the contrary. But I don't see how the annotator to the Dunciad could have rectified that mistake publicly, without particularising your name in a book, where I thought it too good to be inserted, &c."

"I should imagine," he adds, in another place, "the Dunciad meant you a real compliment, and so it has been thought by many, who have asked to whom that passage made that oblique panegyric. As to the notes, I am weary of telling a great truth; which is, that I am not the author of them; though I love truth so well, as fairly to tell you, I think even that note a commendation, and should think myself not ill used to have the same words said of me.—But I ask you not to believe this, except you are vastly inclined to it. I will come closer to the point; would you have the note left out? It shall. Would you have it expressly said you were not meant? It shall, if I have any influence on the editors."

"As to your oblique panegyric," says Hill, "I am not under so blind an attachment to the goddess I was devoted to in the Dunciad, but that I knew it was a commendation, though a dirtier one than I wished for; who am neither fond of some of the company in which I was lifted, the noble reward for which I was to become a diver, the allegorical muddiness in which I was to try my skill, nor the instituter of the games you were so kind to allow me a share in."

"Your offer is very kind," he adds, "to prevail on the editor of the Dunciad to leave out the note, or declare that I was not meant in it; but I am satisfied:—It is over, and deserves no more of your application."

The controversy ended in a perfect reconciliation; and Pope ever afterwards treated Hill with a degree of respect, that implied a sense of superiority, bordering on reverence.

The passage in the Dunciad relating to Hill, stands thus in the later editions:

Then * essay'd; scarce vanish'd out of sight, &c.

With this note under it. "A gentleman of genius and spirit, who was secretly dipt in some papers of this kind, on whom our poet bestows a panegyric instead of a satire, as deserving to be better employed than in party quarrels, and personal invectives."

As a great and general writer, Hill must be allowed to stand in a very exalted rank of merit. His tragedies, particularly Zara and Merope, are generally known and admired. His poems seem not to have hitherto obtained so much notice as they deserve. Dr. Warton has unjustly represented him as "an affected and fustian writer," who, "by some means or other, gained Pope's confidence and friendship." Although it may be allowed, that the rigid correctness with which he constantly re-perused his compositions for alteration, the frequent use of compound epithets, singularity of sentiment, bold experiments in language, and an ordo verborum peculiar to himself, have justly laid him open to the charge of being, in some places rather too turgid, and in others somewhat stiff and obscure; yet, the nervous power, force, and weight of sentiment, opulence of imagery, and intrinsic sterling sense with which his writings abound, amply atone for the harshness of the style, and the peculiarity of the diction. They are evidently the production of a genius truly poetical; they have an air of originality, which has no resemblance of any contemporary writer; and the versification and sentiments have a cast peculiar to themselves, which cannot be successfully imitated. The images are animated, though sometimes indistinct; the descriptions forcible, though sometimes quaint; the language elevated, though sometimes forced; and the numbers majestic and flowing, though sometimes encumbered and sluggish. His faults are, not want of fire or enthusiasm, of which he has an ample share; but an elaborate exactness of language, that rather obscures than heightens the beauty and force of the thought, and a studied refinement of sentiment, supported by the utmost effort of language, which has more magnificence than sublimity, more dignity than grace.

In extenuation of his faults, it ought to be observed, that the versatility of his genius was unfavourable to the attainment of excellence; and that he cultivated poetry only as a relaxation from the study of history, criticism, geography, physic, commerce, agriculture, war, law, chemistry, and natural philosophy, to which he devoted the greatest part of his time.

"In all events," says he, "I will be easy, who have no better reason to wish well to poetry, than my love for a mistress I shall never be married to; for, whenever I grow ambitious, I shall wish to build higher, and owe my memory to some occasion of more importance than my writings."

Of the poetical pieces which he at different times composed, the present collection exhibits but a small number. The epic poem of Gideon, his greatest work, has been omitted, for a reason which he has himself given, in one of his letters to Clio, the poetical name of the celebrated Mrs. Sansom; "It will require a good share of your patience, for it is a very long one. I will have it writ fair, book by book, for your perusal, if you have courage enough to resolve on going through with so formidable a mortification, as to pick out the fine things of the story from the dull ones of the author." It has been praised by Savage; and must be allowed to have some fine passages; but the measure is injudiciously chosen, and the story tedious and uninteresting. All the riches of poetic diction are required to invest epic poetry in suitable splendor; but it rejects the variety of measure which is appropriated to lyric composition. The Fanciad is not liable to the same objections; but a copy of it could not be procured. An episode from Gideon, is inserted among his Original Poems, &c. but the Fanciad, and many of his earlier pieces, are omitted in the collection of his works.

The list of his pieces which have been selected for republication, might perhaps have been augmented without any injury to his reputation; but, it is hoped, the selection, imperfect as it is, when every deduction is made which criticism requires, will make good his claim to more notice than he has hitherto obtained, and justify the revival of his writings.

It consists of pieces in various kinds of composition, serious, sentimental, humorous, satirical, descriptive, and amatory, which have all their brighter passages; but require no distinct consideration, nor particular criticism.

On the character of Hill, it is unnecessary to enlarge, as the testimonies to his merit, by Bolingbroke, Pope, Chesterfield, Voltaire, Thomson, Mallet, Savage, Richardson, Sewell, Dyer, Fielding, Victor, and Garrick, are sufficiently known to the general readers of English poetry. The following complimentary epigram by Richardson does not appear extravagant; and it is hoped this article will not be thought too long, when it is remembered that Hill, however neglected in later days, was celebrated by the most eloquent of his poetical contemporaries, and commended by the excellent author of "Clarissa," and "Sir Charles Grandison."

When noble thoughts with language pure unite,
To give to kindred excellence its right,
Though unencumber'd with the clogs of rhyme,
Where tinkling sounds, for want of meaning chime,
Which like the rocks in Shannon's midway course,
Divide the sense and interrupt its force;
Well may we judge so strong and clear a rill,
Flows higher from the Muses' sacred HILL.

THE WORKS OF HILL.

MISCELLANEOUS POEMS.

TO CLIO.

SNAR'D in entangling mazes of thy charms,
Teach me to shake these silky chains away :
Slow, thy sweet force, my stubborn mind disarms,
'Till ev'n ambition bends beneath thy sway.
What shall I do to free my struggling soul,
Bow'd to the soft'ning bias of thy song ?
As circling straws in whirlwinds driving roll,
So are my hurry'd passions swept along.
Fool as I was !—I felt thy distant fire,
E'er from those eyes it flash'd undying flame ;
Yet sure, said I—for once—I may aspire,
And view that heav'n whence all this brightness came.
So the light cork that on the Thames' smooth side
Embay'd, glides buoyant, and just skims the shore,
Edges, ambitious, to the rapid tide,
And rushing down the stream returns no more.
Late my free thoughts, unbounded as the air, [sky;
Could, with an eye beam's swiftness, scale the Wander in starry worlds, and busy'd there,
From human cares and human passions fly.
Down to dark earth's deep centre could I roam,
And through her chafmy lab'rins wind my way ;
See gold unripen'd in its dusky home,
And mark how springs in veiny bendings stray.
Oft as th' alarming trumpet struck my ear, [rose,
Or the big drum's dead beat hoarse-thund'ring
My summon'd soul sprung out to war's wish'd sphere,
And plung'd me in the ranks of fancy'd foes.
Wide as unmeasur'd nature's trackless space,
Untir'd imagination restless flew ;
Disdain'd to fix on object, or on place,
And every moment some fresh labour knew.
Clio was then unseen, unread, unknown ;—
Now, lovely tyrant, she usurps my mind ;
Devoted fancy vows itself her own :
And my whole thought is to one theme confin'd.
Yet, pow'rful as she is—she doubts her lays ;
Blind, like the sun, to her own blazing flame,

Transports the list'ning soul---engrosses praise ;
Yet humbly wishes---an immortal name.

Oh ! that I could but live, till that late day
When Clio's unremember'd name shall die !
Then should I hope full leisure to display
Those unborn deeds which in my bosom lie.
But, as it is, our fleeting sands so fast
Ebb to their end, and lead us to decay,
That ere we learn to see, our daylight's past,
And, like a melting mist, life shrinks away.

TO MR. POPE.

THE glow-worm scribblers, of a feeble age,
Pale twinklers of an hour, provoke my rage ;
In each dark hedge we start an insect fire,
Which lives by night and must at dawn expire.
Yet such their number, that their specks combine,
And the unthinking vulgar swear they shine.
Poets are prodigies, so greatly rare,
They seem the tasks of heaven, and built with care.
Like suns unquench'd, unrivall'd, and sublime,
They roll immortal o'er the wastes of time :
Ages in vain close round, and snatch in fame,
High over all still shines the poet's name :
Lords of a life, that scorns the bounds of breath,
They stretch existence—and awaken death.
Pride of their envy'd climes ! they plant renown,
That shades the monarch's by the muse's crown :
To say that Virgil with Augustus shin'd,
Does honour to the lord of half mankind.
So, when three thousand years have wan'd away,
And Pope is said to've liv'd when George bore sway,
Millions shall lend the king the poet's fame,
And bless, implicit, the supported name.

STUNG BY A NETTLE.

REVENGE, you see, is sure, though sometimes slow ;
Take this—'tis all the pain I'd have you know !
There's odds enough yet left betwixt our smart,
I sting your fingers, and you sting my heart.

THE SNUFFERS.

DESPIS'D and worthless though I seem to be,
Yon new-top'd flames owe their best light to me.

Though scorn'd—you see I can do service still!
Some good lies hid in every seeming ill.
And hence let fortune's fav'rites learn to know,
That virtue's virtue though in rags it go.

TO A SATIRICAL YOUNG LADY.

FORBEAR, loud thing! to live in laugh and jest,
Wit is like love—the softest is the best!
If thou, by this, wouldst lively thought proclaim,
If empty praise is thy wild fancy's aim;
A while this salt may season single life,
But no man's taste approves a piquant wife.
Be wise, and match, and charm by judgment's aid,
Or witty, and despis'd, and die—a maid.
So the thin razors which young learners please,
Grow notch'd and edgeless, by unmark'd degrees,
Till worn and blunted, by too frequent use,
Th' experienc'd hand detects the steel's abuse;
Then cheaply thrown aside, they gather dust,
Like thee neglected, till consum'd by rust.

TO THE EXCELLENT DAUGHTERS

OF A DECEASED LADY.

Why should ye thus, to prove but vainly kind,
And a weak body to a sickly mind?
Could but your pious grief recal her breath,
Or tears of duty win her back from death,
We would not blame the passion you express,
But share it with you, if 'twould make it less!
But oh! when certain death's uncertain hour
Exerts his known, his unresisted pow'r;
When we are summon'd from our cares below,
To joys which living merit must not know;
When souls, like your dear mother's, quit their
clay,
And change earth's darkness for eternal day:
From their bliss-circled seats, perhaps, they view
These humbler regions, which themselves once knew. [kind,
And swell'd with thoughts, which make the angels
Pity the pledges they have left behind.
'Tis true, the loss you mourn is vastly great,
But in that loss your country shares your fate;
The public good her wishes would have done,
Made ev'ry man in ev'ry land her son:
Thence, lovely mourners! give us leave to prove,
We ought to share your grief, who shar'd your mother's love.
Yet may all parties make their sorrow less,
And you, and we, concern enough express;
You may with comfort calm your ruffled mind,
To think your mother left her cares behind;
And we, though losers, should be thankful too,
Since we are still left rich, possessing you.

PARAPHRASE

ON THE THIRD CHAPTER OF HABAKKUK.

God of my fathers! stretch thy oft-try'd hand,
And yet, once more, redeem thy chosen land:
Once more, by wonders, make thy glories known,
And, 'midst thy anger, be thy mercy shown!
O, I have heard thy dreadful actions told,
And my soul burns thy terrors to unfold!

At Israel's call, th' Almighty's thunder hurl'd,
From Paran's summit shook the astonish'd world;
The flaming heav'n's blaze dreadful through the sky,

And earth's dark regions gleam beneath his eye.
High, in his undetermin'd hands, he bore [store;
Judgment's heap'd horn, and mercy's struggling
Meagre before him, death, pale horror, trod!
And, grinning shadowy, watch'd the Almighty nod:

Gath'ring beneath his feet flash'd light'nings broke,
And the aw'd mountain shook, conceal'd in smoke.
He stood; and, while the measur'd earth he ey'd,
The starting nations dropp'd their conscious pride;
High-boasting Cushan struck her tents, in shame,
And Midian groan'd beneath repented fame.
He mov'd; and, from their old foundations rent,
The everlasting hills before him bent;
He slept; and all th' uprising mountains stray
And roll in earthquakes, to escape his way:
From their enormous chasms, with roaring tide,
Earth-cleaving rivers spout, and deluge wide:
The sea, alarm'd, climb'd fast, its God to spy,
And in outrageous triumph swept the sky.
Conscious of wrath divine, the sun grew pale,
And o'er his radiance drew a gloomy veil.

Thus did my God (to save th' endanger'd land)
March forth, indignant, with vindictive hand;
This, when I hear, chill blasts my soul o'erspread,
And my lips quiver with the rising dread:
Trembling all o'er, my limbs I faintly draw,
And my bones crumble with ideal awe. [yield;
Now, though the fig-tree ne'er should blossom
Though sterile coldness curse th' unripening field;
Though vines and olives fail their loady cheer;
Nor fainting herds out-live the pining year;
Yet shall my soul in God's sure aid rejoice,
And earth's High Sov'reign claim my heav'n-tan'd voice.

THE

MUSE'S EXPOSTULATION WITH A LADY.

Who denied herself the freedom of Friendship, from too delicate an apprehension of the World's mistaken Censure.

O BORN to pity woes, yet form'd to give,
Shut from whose presence 'twere a pain to live!
Who make all converse tedious but your own;
And, that withheld, leave the forsaken none.
Urg'd by what motives would you wish to shun
The sight and voice of him whose soul you won?
On what false fears does this cold flight depend?
What fancy'd foe does prudence apprehend?

When bodies only are to bodies dear,
The danger there consists in being near;
And when the fair the soft contagion spy,
Discretion calls 'em—and 'tis wise to fly.
But where associate spirits catch the flame,
Flight is a cruel, and a fruitless aim.
Souls have no sexes; and if minds agree,
Parting is dying, to set fancy free.

Nor let mistaken virtue wrong the breast,
That opens kindly to so sweet a guest:

Not saints in heav'n a purer warmth express,
Than reason feels, when touch'd by tenderness.
Relenting wisdom dignifies desire,
And rais'd ideas fan the bright'ning fire;
Till the white flame, ascending to the sky,
Spreads its low smoke in envy's darken'd eye.

Whence grew society, so wish'd an art,
If the mind's elegance betrays the heart?
Were it a crime in flashing souls to rise,
And strike each other through the meeting eyes?
Those op'ning windows had not let in light,
Nor stream'd ideas out, to voice the sight.

Why are you form'd so pow'rful in your charms,
If beauty ought to fly the wish it warms?
Vainly did heav'n inspire that tuneful tongue,
With notes more sweet than ever seraph sung!
If, justly, all that harmony you hide,
Your music useless, and its pow'r untry'd.
Have wit and eloquence in vain conspir'd,
And giv'n you brightness, but to shine retir'd?
Must you be loveliest, yet be never shown?
Than all be wiser, yet be heard by none?
Oh, 'tis too delicate!—'tis falsely nice,
To bar the heart against the mind's advice.

But you will say that honour's call you hear;
That fame is tender—reputation dear:
'That from the world's malignant blast you fly,
Fear the fool's tongue, and the discerners eye.
The spleen of disappointed wishes dread,
Or envy's whispers, by detraction spread?
Alas! what bounds can limit your retreat?
Where will sought safety rest your flying feet?
Is there a corner in the globe so new,
That malice will not find as sure as you?
The very flight that shuns, attracts the wrong?
And every censure fear'd, you force along. [say,
"There's cause, no doubt, for her retreat, they'll
"A fearless innocence had dar'd to stay!"
Scandal has, either way, an edge to strike,
And wounds distinction every where alike:
Superior excellence is doom'd to bear
The stings of scandalous hate, and rash despair:
'Tis the due tax your rated merit pays,
And ev'ry judging ear will call it praise.

Think—and be kind—convert this fruitless pain
To a fix'd firmness, and a calm disdain.
Since cautious absence can no more be free
From false reproach, than present smiles will be,
Diffuse those gifts which heav'n design'd should bless,

Nor let their greatness make their pity less.
Indulging freedom ev'ry fear disarm,
And, with a conscious scorn of slander, charm.
Bold in your guarded strength your heart unbind,
And to be safe—suppose yourself all mind.

Yet needless that! since such respect you draw,
That ev'n your tenderness is arm'd with awe:
Permitted love would silently admire,
And a soft reverence tremble through desire;
The warmest wishes, when inspir'd by you,
Strike—but as heav'nly inspirations do.
The op'ning heart makes room for joys refin'd,
And ev'ry gross idea shrinks behind.

You need not then the gentle sound reject,
Should love's fear'd name be given to soft respect:
When ill-distinguish'd meanings are the same,
How poor the difference which they draw from
 name!

There are, in love, th' extremes of touch'd desire,
The noblest brightness, or the coarsest fire!
In vulgar bosoms vulgar wishes move;
Nature guides choice, and, as men think, they love,
But when a pow'r like yours impels the wound,
Like the clear cause, the bright effect is found.
In the loose passion, men profane the name,
Mistake the purpose, and pollute the flame:
In nobler bosoms, friendship's form it takes,
And sex alone, the lovely difference makes.
Love's generous warmth does reason's pow'r display,

And fills desire, as light embodies day.

Love is to life what colour is to form:
Plain drawings oft are just, but never warm.
Love, in a blaze of tints, his light'ning throws;
Then the form quickens, and the figure glows.

AN EPIGRAM,

Occasioned by some Verses on a Monument in Westminster Abbey.

How lost this pomp of verse! how vain the hope,
That thought can dwell on Craggs, in view of Pope!

When upon Rubicon's fam'd bank is shown
Cæsar's press'd foot, on the remember'd stone;
No traveller once asks the quarry's name,
Whence the coarse grit, by chance distinguish'd
 came;

But thinks, with reverence, here great Julius trod,
And hails the footstep of a Roman god!

TO MRS. L——R,

PLAYING ON A BASS VIOL.

WHILE o'er the dancing chords your fingers fly,
And bid them live, till they have made us die;
Trembling, in transport, at your touch they spring,
As if there dwelt a heart in every string.

Your voice, soft rising, through the lengthen'd
 notes,

The marry'd harmony, united, floats;
Two charms, so join'd, that they compose but one;
Like heat and brightness from the self-same sun.

The wishful viol would its wealth retain,
And, sweetly conscious, hugs the pleasing pain,
Envious, forbids the warbling joys to roll,
And, murm'ring inward, swells its sounding soul.

Proud of its charming pow'r, your tuneful bow
Floats o'er the chords majestically slow;
Careless and soft, calls out a tide of art,
And, in a storm of music, drowns the heart.

So when that god, who gave you all your skill,
To angel forms (like yours) intrusts his will,
Calm they descend, some new-meant world to
 found,

And, smiling, see creation rising round!

THE CHANGE;

TO THE LOVELY CAUSE OF IT.

SWEET enslaver! can you tell,
 Ere I learnt to love so well,
 How my hours had wings to move,
 All unbusied by my love!
 'Tis amazement now to me,
 What could then a pleasure be!
 But you, like God, new sense can give,
 And now, indeed, I feel I live.

Oh! what pangs his breast alarm,
 Whom soul and body join to charm!
 Endless transports dance along,
 Sweetly soft! or nobly strong!
 Flaming fancy! cool reflection!
 Fierce desire! and aw'd subjection!
 Aching hope! and fear encreasing!
 Struggling passions, never ceasing!
 Wishing! trembling! soul adoring!
 Ever blest, and still imploring.

Let the dull, the cold, and tame,
 All those dear disorders blame;
 Tell 'em that in honour's race,
 Charm'd by some such heav'nly face,
 Lovers always foremost ran;
 Love's a second soul to man.
 Ease is languid, low, and base;
 Love excites a generous chase:
 Glory! wealth! ambition! wit!
 Thoughts for boundless empire fit!
 All at love's approach are fir'd,
 Bent more strong, and never tir'd,
 He who feels not love's sweet pain
 Lives at ease—but lives in vain!

Little dream you what is due,
 Angel form! to love and you:
 'Tis from you I joy possess;
 'Tis by you my grief grows less:
 Sadly pensive, when alone,
 I the shades of life bemoan;
 If some voice your name impart,
 Care lies lighten'd at my heart;
 Ev'ry woe disarms its sting,
 And I look down on Britain's king.

When my fancy brings to view
 Works which wealth and pow'r can do;
 All my spurr'd excitements wake,
 And fortune charms me for your sake.
 Oh! I cry—'twere heaven possess,
 To make her great who made me blest.

In the morning when I rise,
 If the sun-shine strikes my eyes,
 All that pleases in his view,
 Is my hope to look on you.

When the fable sweep of night
 Drowns distinction from my sight,
 I no inward darkness find;
 You are day-light to my mind.

All my dreams are lives of joy,
 Which, in waking, I destroy:
 You, a slave to custom made,
 Are of forms and rules afraid;
 But your happier image, free
 From fantastic tyranny;

Independent, kind, and wise,
 Scorns restraint, and knows no ties,
 Oh! the dear, the racking pain;
 Who that sleeps thus would wake again.

A SONG.

Oh! forbear to bid me flight her,
 Soul and senses take her part;
 Could my death itself delight her,
 Life should leap to leave my heart.
 Strong, though soft, a lover's chain,
 Charm'd with woe, and pleas'd with pain.
 Though the tender flame were dying,
 Love would light it at her eyes;
 Or, her tuneful voice applying,
 Through my ear my soul surprise.
 Deaf, I see the fate I shun;
 Blind, I hear I am undone.

A SONG.

Now ponder well, ye husbands dear,
 The fate of wives, too bright;
 A woeful cause you have to fear,
 Their day will turn to night.
 At first all gay, and rais'd with joy,
 They charm the poor man's heart;
 With smiling eyes they sport and toy,
 And gild the nuptial dart.
 But ah! too soon they quench their fire;
 (Alas! good hearer, weep)
 Then gape, and stretch, and yawn, and tire,
 And hum their souls to sleep.

HINT FROM SOME OLD VERSES,

On a Stone in Stepney Churchwall.

Two thousand years, ere Stepney had a name,
 In Carthage walls I shar'd the punie fame;
 There to the strongest, added strength I lent,
 And proudly propp'd the world's best ornament.
 Now to cold Britain a torn transport thrown,
 I piece a church-yard pile unmark'd, unknown:
 Stain'd, and half sunk in dirt, my sculpture lies,
 And moulders, like the graves which round me
 rise. [claim,
 Oh! think, blind mortals! what frail dust you
 And laugh at wealth, wit, beauty, pow'r, and
 fame;
 Short praise, can fleeting hopes like yours supply,
 Since times, and tongues, and tow'rs, and empires die.

ON CLIO'S BIRTH-DAY.

O'er the blue violet, while the amorous wind
 Bends and perfumes his wings, to fan this day;
 Why has pale sickness winter'd o'er my mind,
 And, with chill agues, check'd the warmth of
 May?

Is it not Clio's birth-day?—Toil of thought!
 Height beyond all that e'er ambition trod.
 Sum of refin'd desire! by angels taught,
 To look, and think, and act a female god!

Oh! my rapt soul sits trembling in my eyes,
 Starting, impatient, at her pow'rful name:
 Dearer than life, to that sweet sound it flies,
 And health rides rosy on the living flame.
 Wak'd into sudden strength, I blaze again,
 Love, the restorer, dress'd in Clio's smile,
 Triumph'd o'er nature, gave delight to pain,
 Sweeten'd affliction, and could death beguile.
 May joys unnumber'd, as the charmer's sweets,
 Bless this revolving day's eternal round;
 Till the proud world its dawn with rapture greets,
 Conscious of her who made it first renown'd.
 Long—let 'em say—long ere our father's days,
 Three thousand years ago, on this sweet day,
 That Clio, whom contending nations praise,
 Embloom'd, by her sweet birth, the first of May.
 Britain, illustrious by the starry lot,
 Far in the north, distinguish'd island, lies,
 Now known by later names—oh, envy'd spot!
 Why did she not in our warm climates rise?
 Sure she was heav'nly grac'd; for to this hour,
 After such length of ages roll'd away,
 Fame of her charms, augments her sexed pow'r,
 And her thought's lustre gives our wits their fway.

TO A LADY,

DESIRING HER LETTERS MIGHT NOT BE EXPOSED.

No! thou best soul that e'er this body knew,
 Unhappy I may be, but not untrue.
 Blest, or unblest, my love can ne'er decay,
 Nor could I, where I could not love, betray.
 Cold, and unjust, the shocking caution kills,
 And, in one meaning, spots me o'er with ills.
 Silent, as sacred lamps, in bury'd urns,
 The conscious flame of lovers inward burns:
 Life should be torn, and racks be stretch'd in vain,
 And vary'd tortures tire their fruitless pain,
 Ere but a thought of mine should do thee wrong,
 Or spread thy beauties on the public tongue.
 Yet thou canst fear me—oh! be lost the shame,
 Nor heap dishonour on my future name!
 Have I been never lov'd?—yet, cruel, tell,
 Whom I betray'd to thee, though lov'd so well?
 Take thy sweet mischief back, their charms erase,
 Oh! leave me poor, but never think me base.
 Not e'en when death shall veil thy starry eyes,
 Shall thy dear letters from my ashes rise;
 Fix'd to my heart, the grave shall give 'em room
 To charm my waking soul in worlds to come.
 While in my verse, with far more faint essay,
 Thy wonders I to after times convey;
 Tell thy vast heav'n of sweets, and sing thy name,
 Till, fir'd by thee, whole kingdoms catch thy flame.

EPITAPH ON SIR ISAAC NEWTON.

MORE than his name were less.—'Twould seem to fear, [here.
 He who increas'd heav'n's fame could want it
 Yet when the suns he lighted up shall fade,
 And all the worlds he found are first decay'd;

Then void and waste eternity shall lie,
 And time and Newton's name together die.

TO MR. DYER, ON HIS ATTEMPTING CLIO'S PICTURE.

SOUL of your honour'd art! what man can do
 In copying nature may be reach'd by you:
 Your peopling pencil a new world can give,
 And, like Deucalion, teach the stones to live.
 From your creating hand a war may flow,
 And your warm strokes with breathing action
 glow:

But, from that angel form to catch the grace
 And kindle up your ivory with her face;
 All unconsum'd to snatch the living fire,
 And limn th' ideas which those eyes inspire;
 Strong to your burning circle to confine
 That awe-mix'd sweetness, and that air divine;
 That sparkling soul, which lightens from within,
 And breaks in unspoke meanings through her skin.
 This, if you can—hard task, and yet unprov'd:
 Then shall you be adorn'd, as now belov'd.
 Then shall your high-aspiring colours find
 The art to picture thought and paint the wind:
 Then shall you give air shape, imprison space,
 And mount the painter to the maker's place.

WHITEHALL STAIRS.

FROM Whitehall Stairs, whence oft, with distant
 view,

I've gaz'd whole moon-shine hours on hours away,
 Blest but to see those roofs which cover'd you,
 And watch'd beneath what star you sleeping lay.

Launch'd on the smiling stream, which felt my hope,

And danc'd and quiver'd round my gliding boat,
 I came this day to give my tongue free scope,
 And vent the passion which my looks denote.

To tell my dear, my soul-disturbing muse,
 (But that's a name can speak but half her charms)
 How my full heart does my pen's aid refuse,
 And bids my voice describe my soul's alarms.

To tell what transports your last letter gave,
 What heav'ns were open'd in your soft complaint;
 To tell!—what pride I take, to be your slave,
 And how triumphant love disdains restraint.

But when I miss'd you, and took boat again,
 The sympathetic fun condol'd my woe;
 Drew in his beams, to mourn my pity'd pain
 And bid the shadow'd stream benighted flow.

Sudden, the weeping skies unfluic'd their store,
 And torrents of big tears unceasing shed;
 Sad I drove downward to a flooded shore,
 And, disappointed, hung my dripping head.

Landed at length, I sate coffee drink,
 And ill surrounded by a noisy tribe,
 Scornful of what they do, or say, or think,
 I, rapt in your dear heav'n, my loss describe.

TO THE SAME.

Yes—now 'tis time to die—despair comes on;
 Who keeps the body when the soul is gone?

She sets—fair light, that show'd me all my joy,
And, like the sun's, her absence must destroy.
She, who once wept my fancy'd loss of breath,
Now, crimeless murd'rer! gives me real death.

Yet have a care, touch'd heart, nor sigh one
thought,
That stains such goodness with a purpos'd fault.
Soft as her tears, her gentle meanings move;
Her soul sheds sweetness though her look is love.
Her voice is music, tun'd to heav'n's low note;
Her touch bids transport, through each art'ry,
float;
Her step is dignity, by pity check'd;
At once she fans desire and plants respect.
Unconscious of her charms, she dreams of none,
And doubling other's praises shuns her own.
Modest in pow'r, as kneeling angels pray,
Noiseless as night's soft shade, though bright as
day.
Wife unassumingly; serenely deep,
Easy as air, and innocent as sleep:
Blooming like beauty, when adorn'd for sin;
Yet like the bud unblown all blush within.

O! 'tis impossible, to quit such bliss,
Yet live superior to a loss like this!
Where will she next her thousand conquests make?
On what new climate will her sun-shine break?
Where will she next (sweet tasker of my care!)
Teach our charm'd sex, to hope, to wish, to dare?
Far from her fruitless guardian's watchful eye,
What may she hear! what answer! oh! I'll die.
Bless'd by her sight—time's race were one short stage;
She gone—one widow'd moment were an age.

A SONG.

CLIO! smiling, soul-invader!
Soft amuser of my days,
Be my silent passion's aider,
Teach my tongue to speak thy praise.
Thou, like heroes, scarr'd all over,
Wanting room to suffer more;
Pill'd with praise, can't hear no lover
Tell thee ought, untold before.
Truth, with modest bounds contented,
Rightly praising thee, must say,
More than falsehood e'er invented,
When she widest went astray.

WRITE ON A BLANK LEAF OF AN OB-SCENE POEM.

THE sacred nine, first spread their golden wings,
In praise of virtue, heroes, and of kings:
Chaste were their lays, and ev'ry verse design'd
To soften nature, and exalt the mind.
Loosely the moderns live, and loosely write,
And woo their muse, as mistresses, for delight.
Thick in their lays obscenities abound,
As weeds spring plenteous in the rankest ground:
All who write verse, to taint a guiltless heart,
Are vile profaners of the sacred art.

Cloy'd the sick reader from the work retires;
And e'er the writer dies his fame expires.

TO MRS. T——T.

WHERE in this land (Alzira cry'd)
Shall Indian virtues rest?
Who will be here the stranger's guide,
And lead her to be blest?
Seek, said the whispering muse, some fair
Of England's beauteous race;
Who does herself those virtues share
Which most Alzira grace.
One who has taste as nobly strong,
And charms as softly sweet,
Will guard her sister soul from wrong,
While graces graces meet.
I took the muse's kind advice,
Look'd round the fair and bright,
And found Alzira, in a trice,
Was matchless T——t's right.

A SONG.

O CELIA! be wary when Celadon sues,
These wits are the bane of your charms:
Beauty play'd against reason will certainly lose,
Warring naked with robbers in arms.
Young Damon, despis'd for his plainness of parts,
Has worth that a woman should prize;
He'll run the race out, though he heavily starts,
And distance the short-winded wife.
The fool is a saint in the temple of love,
And kneels all his life there to pray:
The wit but looks in, and makes haste to remove,
'Tis a stage he but takes in his way.

THE RECONCILIATION.

Sick of the worthless world, and courting rest,
My sullen soul, with pensive weight oppress'd,
Disturb'd and mournful sought the silent shade,
And fed reflection in the breezy glade:
Stretch'd on the grassy margin of a brook,
Whose murm'ring fellowship my mind partook,
Actively idle I repining lay,
Gaz'd on the flood and sigh'd the stream away.

Who knows, I cry'd, what course thou hast to pass, [grasps]
Sweet stream, that thou creep'st softly through this
How wilt thou flow!—Anon, perhaps, slid hence,
Thy deep'ning channel fills some moated fence,
Hems in some farm, where homely rustics meet,
And their sweet bread, prize of hard labour, eat;
Thence, through some lord's delightful garden, led,
Thou may'st thy vegetative influence spread;
Where, as through fragrant beds, thy purlings slide,
The grateful flow'rs shall kiss 'em as they glide:
There, charm'd and ling'ring, thou may'st wish to stay,
And, hoarsely murm'ring, roll displeas'd away.

But while, with careless pace, thou journey'st
flow,
Oft halting to look back at this fair show,

Some precipice, that in close ambush lies,
 Thy virgin current shall at once surprize,
 Cross whose broad shoulders thrown, and tumbling o'er, [roar.
 Thy frightened stream shall rush with unavailing
 Next may thy silver current's brightness die,
 And muddily some stagnate fen supply;
 Where shadow'd reeds in thy slow stream shall shake, [make:
 And floods fly trembling from the gloom they
 Frighted, are glad to 'scape this horrid place,
 Thou may'st wind short, and new-direct thy race,
 Through verdant meads, o'erjoy'd, may'st dancing go,

'Till cattle sip thy whirlpools, as they flow:
 Thence, for protection of thy ruffled charms,
 Thou may'st rush swift to some great lover's arms;
 Some stately stream by keely courtship prest,
 And mark'd with wealth's proud furrows on his breast: [brace,

Grave Thames may next receive thy mix'd em-
 And fam'd Augusta see thy fully'd face;
 From her wash'd foot thy scatter'd flood may stray,
 And to the swallowing ocean roll away:
 There, wasted stream, in wind-driv'n billows tost,
 Thy oft-chang'd being shall be wholly lost.

So, gentle brook, I cry'd, does human life,
 'Midst endless changes, and in endless strife,
 Glide, with impatience, through unknown events,
 'Till nature asks repose and death consents.

Why then is such a life so much desir'd?
 By what pursuits is vain ambition fir'd?
 Friendship is lost on earth; love goes astray;
 And men, like beasts, each on the other prey:
 Ev'n the soft sex their downy bosoms hide
 With inward artifice or outward pride.

Beauty's spoil'd shafts no more the soul can hit,
 Dull'd by gross folly or misguided wit.
 Nothing is now worth wishing for on earth,
 And death is grown a much less woe than birth.

While thus I mourn'd---back roll'd th' astonish'd brook, [shook;

The trees bow'd down, the earth beneath me
 All heav'n descended to the glowing ground,
 And radiant terror dazzling shone around:
 Blind with the strong refulgence, fix'd I lay
 Bury'd in brightness and o'erwhelm'd with day.

Listen, a sound broke out---impatient youth,
 Listen and mark the voice of sacred truth,
 Rous'd at that name, I would have blest'd my sight,
 But strove in vain to stem the tide of light;
 Still as I rais'd my eyes, their balls struck fire,
 And wat'ry gushings wept the rash desire:
 The unseen phantom's voice, sudden and loud,
 Startled the ear as thunder rends a cloud;
 But soft'ning more and more, grew sweet and
 kind,

And dy'd away like music in the wind:
 I come, continues she, to bring thee peace,
 To bid thy diffidence in friendship cease;
 Again to reconcile thee to mankind,
 New-wing thy transports, and unclog thy mind;
 To guide thy wand'ring choice, to find that joy
 Distrust of which does thy sad hours employ:

There lives a charmer, whom divinely fir'd
 E'en her whole sex's virtues have inspir'd;
 Where all that's manly joins with all that's sweet,
 And in whose breath engross'd perfections meet;
 Her mind no conscious pride of merit stains;
 O'er her wide soul unfully'd reason reigns:
 Blind to her worth, she feels not her own flame,
 Enriches merit, yet despises fame.
 Her unaffected charms what words can paint?
 She looks an angel, and she speaks a saint:
 While sparkling gayness wantons in her eye,
 In her wise soul the laughing Cupids die.
 A thousand graces round her person play,
 And all the muses mark her fancy's way:
 To hear her speak, the soul with rapture fills,
 Her looks alarm---but when she writes she kills.
 Rise, then, and meet her, as she this way strays,
 And thy own wonder shall outspoke my praise.

The goddess vanish'd to her native skies,
 And the recover'd shade unbarr'd my eyes;
 I look'd, and lo! within the honour'd wood,
 Lovely Cleora hid in bay leaves stood;
 Cleora---but her wonders to reveal,
 Were to describe what I can only feel!
 Now reconcil'd to the shunn'd world I'll live:
 Her friendship---joys worth living for can give.

ON THE BIRTH-DAY OF MISS ———

CARE, be banish'd far away---
 Fly, be gone, approach not here:
 Mirth and joy demand this day,
 Happiest day of all the year!

Summers three times sev'n have shone,
 All outshin'd by Delia's eyes:
 Winters three times sev'n are gone,
 All whose snows her breast supplies:

Dance we then the cheerful round,
 Music might have stay'd away;
 She but speaking, organs sound:
 She but smiling, angels play.

'Tis her birth-day---let it blaze;
 Born to charm and form'd for bliss;
 Live she lov'd a world of days,
 Ev'ry day as blest'd as this,

Let her beauty not increase;
 Too, too strong, already there;
 But let heav'n augment her peace,
 'Till she's happy as she's fair.

THE GLOVE.

TELL me, sweet glove! what name the charmer
 bears,

Whose downy hand thy snowy cov'ring wears?

'Tis a dear name I am forbid to tell,
 But these distinguish'd marks may paint her well:
 She gently awful, winningly severe,
 Charms when she speaks, yet rather loves to hear;
 Wise as a god; as fancy'd angels fair;
 Lovely as light, and soft as upper air.

Enough, sweet glove! by this plain picture
 taught,

He---e, I find, is the dear name I sought.

RONALD AND DORNA :

BY A HIGHLANDER, TO HIS MISTRESS.

From a literal Translation of the Original.

COME, let us climb Skorr-urran's snowy top ;
 Cold as it seems, it is less cold than you :
 Thin through its snow these lambs its heath-twigs crop ;
 Your snow, more hostile, starves and freezes too.
 What though I lov'd of late in Skie's fair isle ;
 And blush'd—and bow'd—and shrunk from Kenza's eye ;
 All she had power to hurt with was her smile ;
 But, 'tis a frown of your's for which I die.
 Ask why these herds beneath us rush so fast
 On the brown sea-ware's stranded heaps to feed ?
 Winter, like you, with-holds their wish'd repast,
 And, robb'd of genial grafs, they brouse on weed.
 Mark with what tuneful haste Sheleila flows,
 To mix its wid'ning stream in Donnan's lake ;
 Yet, should some dam the current's course oppose,
 It must, per force, a less lov'd passage take.
 Born, like your body, for a spirit's claim,
 Trembling, I wait, unsoul'd, till you inspire :
 God has prepar'd the lamp, and bids it flame ;
 But you, fair Dorna, have with-held the fire.
 High as yon pine; when you begin to speak,
 My light'ning heart leaps hopeful at the sound ;
 But fainting at the sense, falls, void and weak,
 And sinks and saddens like yon mossy ground.
 All that I taste, or touch, or see, or hear,
 Nature's whole breadth reminds me but of you ;
 Ev'n heav'n itself would your sweet likeness wear,
 If, with its power, you had its mercy too.

ABSTRACT FROM PSALM CXIV.

WHEN from proud Egypt's hard and cruel hand,
 High-summon'd Israel fought the promis'd land,
 The opening sea divided at her call,
 And reflux Jordan rose, a wat'ry wall :
 Light as met lambs the starting hills leap'd wide,
 And the slow mountains roll'd themselves aside.
 Why, O thou sea ! did thy vast depth divide ?
 And why, O Jordan ! fled thy back'ning tide ?
 Why leapt your lines, ye frightened hills, astray ?
 And what, O mountains ! rent your roots away ?
 Hark ! I will tell—proud earth confess'd her God,
 And mark'd his wond'rous footsteps as he trod.
 While bent to blefs, He cheer'd his thirsty flock,
 And into floods of liquid length dissolv'd the loosening rock.

THE SINGING BIRD.

POPE, in absence of his pain,
 Easy, negligent, and gay,
 With the fair in am'rous vein,
 Lively as the smiling day,
 Talk'd, and toy'd the hours away,
 Tuneful, o'er Belinda's chair,
 Finely cag'd, a linnet hung ;
 Breath'd its little soul in air,

Flutt'ring round its mansion sprung ;
 And its carols sweetly sung.

Winding, from the fair one's eye,
 On her feather'd slave to gaze ;
 Meant, cry'd Pope, to wing the sky,
 Yet, a captive all thy days,
 How dost thou this music raise !
 Since a prisoner thou can'st sing,
 Sportive, airy, wanton, here,
 Hadst thou liberty of wing,
 How thy melody would cheer !
 How transport the list'ning ear !
 No, reply'd the warbling song.
 Rais'd—articulate, and clear !
 Now, to wish me free were wrong ;
 Loftier in my native sphere,
 But with fewer friends than here.
 Though with grief my fate you see,
 Many a poet's is the same ;
 Aw'd, secluded, and unfree,
 Humble avarice of fame,
 Keeps 'em fetter'd, own'd, and tame.
 To our feeders, they and I
 Lend our lives in narrow bound ;
 Perch'd within our owner's eye,
 Gay we hop the gilded round,
 Changing neither note nor ground.
 For, should freedom break our chain,
 Though the self-dependent flight
 Would to heav'n exalt our strain,
 Yet unheard and out of sight,
 All our praise were forfeit by't.

A SONG.

GENTLE love, this hour befriend me,
 To my eyes resign thy dart ;
 Notes of melting music lend me,
 To dissolve a frozen heart.
 Chill as mountain snow her bosom,
 Though I tender language use,
 'Tis by cold indiff'rence frozen,
 To my arms, and to my muse.
 See ! my dying eyes are pleading,
 Where a breaking heart appears :
 For thy pity interceding,
 With the eloquence of tears,
 While the lamp of life is fading,
 And beneath thy coldness dies,
 Death my ebbing pulse invading,
 Take my soul into thy eyes.

MY SOUL'S LAST SIGH,

TO THE DIVINE LOTHARIA.

LET plaintive thoughts in mournful numbers flow,
 Prose is too dull for love, too calm for woe.
 Has she not bid thee quit thy faithful flame ;
 Sell her and truth for equipage and name ?
 Nay, she has bid thee go—Whence this delay ?
 Whence this fond, fruitless, ling'ring wish to stay ?
 Lotharia bids thee go—she, who alone
 Makes all life's future blessings, means thee none !

Begone then—let thy struggling heart obey,
And in long distance sigh sad life away.
Still, still, vain flatt'ring hope misleads desire,
Fed by faint glimm'ring shoots of glow-worm fire.
What though she sweetly writes to ease thy grief,
Or points kind comfort by the folded leaf:
Such pity must thy grateful rev'rence move,
But judge it right—nor think compassion love.
What though each word she marks, like spring's soft show'rs, [flow'rs,
Flows sweet as new-blown breath of op'ning
Such borrow'd sounds she need not have apply'd,
Her own, more tuneful, thou too oft has try'd.
To speak in music ever was her claim,
And all grows harmony that bears that name.

Had'st thou e'er touch'd her heart with one soft pain,
And blest'd in loving been belov'd again,
All her cold reasoning doubts had ceas'd to move,
And her whole gen'rous breast conceiv'd but love.
She who believes not, loves not---Feel thy fate :
Friendship from her pains more than other's hate.
All the kind passions, wanting one, she'll own ;
But, that one wanting, all the rest are none.
Would love and she disperse the threat'ning storm,
Let her believe, and trust, and break through form:
Let her command thy stay to know success,
Nor fear the god-like attribute to blest :
Born to distinguish her from womankind,
To court her converse and to take her mind ;
Form'd for her empire, with her image fill'd,
Charm'd by her form, and in her temper skill'd ;
Piercing her tim'rous heart's most secret thought,
And knowing, and adoring each dear fault,
How art thou pain'd---to find her soft'ning will
Held against love by ev'ry guard of skill !
How art thou doom'd to lengths of op'ning woe,
Should she feel love---yet fear to tell thee so ?

If she distrusts thy truth---all hope must fall,
Doubting her pow'r, she disbelieves thee all.
And none who doubts her lover dares to love.
Go, then---to climes cold as her heart remove;
A distant fate thy gloomy choice prefers,
Present thou can'st not live and not live hers.

Farewell, kind, cautious, unresolving fair !
To hear the blest'd will charm amidst despair.
'Tis death to go---'tis more than death to stay,
Rest will be soonest reach'd the first dark way.
Ne'er may'st thou know a pain ; still cheerful be,
Nor check life's comforts, with one thought of me.

TO MR. JAMES THOMSON,

On his asking my advice to what Patron he should address his Poem, called Winter.

SOME peers have noble skill to judge, 'tis true,
Yet, no more prospect bounds the muse's view :
Firm, in your native strength, thus greatly shown,
Slight such delusive props, and stand alone :
Fruitless dependance oft has prov'd too late,
That greatness dwells not always with the great.
Patrons are nature's nobles, not the state's,
And wit's a title no broad seal creates : [flow,
E'en kings, from whose high source all honours
Are poor in pow'r when they would souls bestow.

He who stoops safe beneath a patron's shade,
Shines, like the moon, but by a borrow'd aid :
Truth should, unbias'd, free and open steer,
Strong as heav'n's heat, and as its brightness clear;
Heedless of fortune, then, look down on state,
Balanc'd within by merit's conscious weight :
Divinely proud of independent will,
Prince of your wishes live a sov'reign, still ;
Oh ! swell not, then, the bosoms of the vain,
With false conceit you their protection gain,
Poets, like you, their own protectors stand,
Plac'd above aid from pride's inferior hand.
Time, that devours a lord's unlasting name,
Shall lend her soundness depth to float your fame ;
On verse like yours no smiles from pow'r expect,
Born with a worth that doom'd you to neglect.
Yet, would your wit be prais'd—reflect no more,
Let the smooth veil of flatt'ry silk you o'er,
Aptly attach'd, the court's soft climate try ;
Learn your pen's duty from your patron's eye.
Ductile of soul each pliant purpose wind,
And, following int'rest close, leave doubt behind :
Then shall your name strike loud the public ear,
For through good fortune virtue's self shines clear.

But, in defiance of our taste—to charm,
And fancy's force with judgment's caution arm,
Disturb with busy thought so lull'd an age,
And plant strong meanings o'er the peaceful page,
Impregnate sound with sense, teach nature art,
And warm ev'n winter, 'till it thaws the heart :
How could you thus your country's rules trans-
gress,
Yet think of patrons, and presume successful

A SONG.

VAINLY now ye strive to charm me,
All ye sweets of blooming May;
How can empty sunshine warm me,
While Lotharia keeps away?

Go, ye warbling birds ; go, leave me,
Shade, ye clouds, the smiling sky ;
Sweeter notes her voice can give me,
Softer sunshine fills her eye.

VERSES.

Writ for and sent to a Widow Gentlewoman, on occasion of her Son's melancholy, upon their losses and disappointments in life.

WELCOME, ah! welcome, life's last friend, decay!
Faint on tir'd soul, and lapse, unmourn'd, away;
Now I look back, agham'd at hope's false blaze,
That shone, delightful, on my happier days;
In their true colours now, too late, I see
What youth, and pride, and mirth, and praise, must be!

Bring, then, great curer, death, thy dark relief,
And save me from vain sense of hopeless grief.
Shut me for ever from the suffering scene,
And leave long voids for silent rest between ;
Thy hand can snatch me from a weeping son,
Heir to my woes, and born to be undone !
Place me where I no more his wrongs shall hear,
Nor his told sorrows reach my shelter'd ear.

Thus while I mourn'd, retir'd from hated light,
 Sleep came, and hid affliction in the night;
 The night, instructive to my bold complaint,
 In a long dream did that sad march repaint,
 That pomp of tears which did for Sheffield flow,
 Who lately blacken'd half our streets with woe.
 There, cry'd a pointing seraph, look! compare!
 And blush, forgetful of your light despair!
 What has this mother lost, as far distress'd
 Beyond her sex, as late beyond 'em blest.
 Son of her soul! her child, by mind and birth,
 Bright by her fires, and guardian of her worth;
 Promise of virtues to the rising age.
 Yet, ah! how blasted is the lov'd presage!
 Think of her loss, her weight of woe bemoan,
 And, humbly conscious, sigh not for your own.

ST. MATTHEW, CHAP. VI.

Part of the Sermon on the Mount.

LET shining charity adorn your zeal,
 The noblest impulse gen'rous minds can feel:
 But have a care you take this virtue right,
 And shun the glare of the proud hypocrite.
 Mistaken men! who, fond of public fame,
 Disgrace the act, while they affect the name!
 On earth, vain-glorious zeal may meet regard,
 But heav'n nor owns it, nor vouchsafes reward.
 Thou, on the contrary, whose pitying breast
 Wou'd, as it ought, give ease to the distress;
 Scarce tell thy right hand, what thy left will do,
 But be at once resolv'd and silent too.
 Secret, as night, thy pious alms convey;
 For God, who sees by night, rewards by day.
 So, when thy soul approaches God in pray'r,
 Be not deceiv'd, as those false zealots are,
 Who daily into crowded temples press,
 And there, with feign'd devotion, heav'n address;
 But, when thou pray'st, all public notice shun,
 And, private, to thy inmost closet run:
 There, close and earnest, to thy duty fall,
 And God will show thee that he hears thy call.
 Swell not thy forms of pray'r with wild desires,
 Excess of fuel chokes the brightest fires;
 The erring heathen so mistake their way,
 And think they best are heard who most can say.
 But shun thou this, and know God's piercing eye
 Sees all thy wants before thy words come nigh.
 From rising malice guard thy yielding will,
 Nor proudly dare to take revenge for ill:
 Thou must forgive, that God may pardon thee;
 For none who pities not shall pitied be.

Misled by av'rice, seek not wealth to gain,
 By hoarding treasures which are got in vain:
 Deceitful riches, which the moth destroys,
 Which rust consumes, or the bold thief enjoys!
 In heav'n's high storehouse, let your heaps be laid,
 A wealth which no destroyer can invade;
 No moth there enters, rust corrupts not there,
 Nor plund'ring thief alarms the owner's care:
 Safe, therefore, in that place, your treasures lay;
 For where your riches are, your heart will stay.

Secure of heav'n's regard, live free from care,
 Nor toil, life's common comforts to prepare:

Banish vain forecast for thy needful gain,
 Nor let meat, drink, and clothing, give thee pain.
 Observe the fowls—they neither reap, nor sow,
 Yet find their wants supply'd, where'er they go.
 Look on the lilies of the ripening field:
 No toil of theirs does those sweet colours yield;
 Yet was not Solomon, when drest to please,
 So gloriously adorn'd as one of these.
 If, therefore, God so feeds the feather'd train,
 So clothes the grass, which withers on the plain;
 How much more careful will he be of you,
 O, faithless man! who yet distrusts him too?

TO THE LOVELY MRS. H——E,

On her Descent from the first Saxon Kings of our Island.

H——E, sweet name! whose princely meaning shows, [flows,
 From what high spring your blood's rich current
 With needless awe, reminds us of your race,
 Since heav'n has stamp'd dominion on your face.
 Still in your sov'reign form, distinctly live
 All royal rights your father kings could give.
 In your commanding air, we mark their state,
 And, in your words, their wisdom and their weight.
 Warm in your noble breast, their courage lies,
 And all their pow'cr and mercy in your eyes.

THE GARDEN WINDOW.

HERE, Amanda, gently bending,
 Sweetly pensive, loves to lean
 O'er the groves, her sight extending
 Through the walks that shoot between;
 Plac'd, says she, within this window
 Screen'd, I distant charms survey,
 Taught by poor deceiv'd Olindo,
 Nothing's safe that looks too gay.
 Here, I view, in soften'd shadings,
 Am'rous flow'r to flow'r incline,
 Too remote to mourn their fadings,
 When with hanging heads they pine.
 Here I smell the fragrant breezes,
 Safe from ev'ning's chilly blast;
 Here the noonday sunshine pleases,
 Fearless when 'twill overcast.
 Hence I hear the tempest rising,
 See the grovy greatness shake,
 Ev'ry distant ill despising,
 While I every good partake.
 So commanding life's gay garden,
 Let me thornless wear the rose;
 Choice like mine let fashion pardon,
 Tasting charms but shunning woes.

AT SETTING DAY.—A SONG.

SINCE sounding drums, and rising war,
 Invite my love to danger,
 I'll ask of every smiling star
 To shield my roving ranger.
 While o'er the field, unfearing wounds,
 You press the foe retreating,

I'll trace the dear remember'd bounds
Of our more gentle meeting.

I'll pass whole days in yon sweet grove,
Where first thy tongue deceiv'd me,
When, list'ning dumb, I blush'd my love,
And no fear'd absence griev'd me.

On ev'ry bank thy side hath prest,
I'll sleep, and dream I'm near thee;
And each sweet bird, that strains its breast,
Shall wake my hopes to hear thee.

To all our haunts I will repair,
And cold on yon bleak mountain,
Trace all thy once-trod footsteps there,
And weep o'er each sad fountain.

There will I teach the trees to wear
Thy name, in soft impression,
And borrow sighs from ev'ning air,
To swell my soul's confession.

EPILOGUE,

For a Lady who acted Eudocia, in the Siege of Damascus, represented at the Duke of Bedford's at Woburn.

I've heard of maids, who first resolve to fast,
And then weigh arguments, when facts are past;
Young, though my reason is not so, it stray'd;
But first found pleadings for the part I play'd.

Play'd, said I,—second thought that word retracts;

Fancies and follies play, but passion acts:
Passion! the spring that all life's wheels employs,
Winds up the working thought—and heightens joys.

Passion! the great man's guide, the poor man's
The soldier's laurel, and the sinner's flame.

Passion! that leads the grave, impels the gay,
Bids the wise tremble, and the fool betray.

Ev'n at this hour, what's here our pastime made,
Gives the court business, and the kingdom trade;
When factions quarrel, or when statesmen fall,
Each does but act his part at passion's call.

Like our's, to night, Lord Passion sets their task;
Their fears, hopes, flatteries, all are passion's masque.

The world's wide stage, for this one practice, fill'd,
Sees some act nobly, others play unskill'd.

Triflers and smarts, who toy time's dream away,
Sots, beaux, and hounds of party, these but play.
Sons of their country's hope, sublimely rack'd
For other's rest.—These do not play, but act.

Who play the poorest parts?—the bought, the vain,

The light believer, and the perjur'd swain;
The dull dry joker, the coarse ill-bred bear,
The friends of folly, and the foes of care.

Who act their parts with praise—the firm, the
Who sell no sentiments, and break no trust;
The learn'd, the soft, the social, and the kind,
The faithful lover, and the plain good mind.

Such the best actors—form'd for honour's stage!
Who play no farces, and disgrace no age.

But copying nature, with true taste, like ours,
Please, and are pleas'd, and wing the guiltless hours.

APOLOGY FOR DEATH.

WHENCE this reluctance, when we cease to run
Life's slow sad race, and leaves its toy unwon?
Death's but our tide of ebb, to that dark sea,
Time's shoreless swallower, void eternity!

'Tis rest from labour—'tis escape from care;

'Tis shunn'd oppression, and reliev'd despair.

'Tis but to redissolve to formless flow,

And join the mingled mass, that feels no woe.

Fluid to fade, as all things round us do,

Or from old being launch, to find out new.

Emerging, or emerg'd, life rolls away,

Foams into note, or flattens to decay.

Round, with unceasing wheel, distinction glides,

And through time's maze, in short succession slides;

Flames its hot hour, like humbler household fires,

Shines but to leave us, and in use expires.

'Tis the flash'd spark of thought, that bursts to light,

Strains soon, and big, and rushes into night:

So the proud storm, that frights us with its roar,

Breathes itself weary, and is heard no more.

See that soft flow'r, whose sighs perfume the gales,

Blooms into dust, and its snuff'd life exhales!

All nature heaves, and sets, like human breath,

And life's loose links but stretch the chain of death.

Why then does erring fancy fright the mind?

Why call that cruel, nature meant for kind?

Who knows but fates we tremble at may bless,

And length of happiest life be found distress?

Murder! that blast of thought, that bane of law,

The good man's horror, and ev'n villain's awe!

Murder! that nature dreads, and conscience flies,

Perhaps but spurs us to some waiting prize!

Else, why should creature still with creature jar?

And clash'd existence wage eternal war?

Beast bleeds by beast; fishes on fishes prey;

And birds act murder with more waste than they;

Ev'n the sweet thrush, that bribes us with her song,

To guard her dread of death from beaks more strong,

Sav'd from the kite, strait bloodier grows than he,

And snaps the shiv'ring insect from the tree.

Life starts but up, to answer death's due call,

And one mysterious darkness wraps us all!

PASSING A LADY,

IN THE PARK, WITHOUT SEEING HER.

So slide our comforts by, unmark'd, unknown,

While our ill-fate comes felt, and all our own!

Too cruel world! where things we wou'd refuse,

We start upon—and, what we wish we lose!

And yet Lotharia would be hid in vain,

She cannot be conceal'd whom thoughts retain.

Air, and Lotharia, every where are found;

Held by our breath, and to our being bound!

Darkness itself wants pow'r to cover friends,

Whom the soul dwells with, and the sense attends.

TO THE LADY THAT LAUGHS,

AT DYING IN METAPHOR.

AND why, fair trifler, does that meaning eye
Smile in contempt, when lovers swear they die?

'Twixt death and love, but one small diff'rence
lies,
The soul, in both, from its left body flies :
In death 'tis gone, like smoke dissolv'd in air.
Lost in expanse, the loser knows not where :
In love we trace it with such willing pain,
'Twere to die twice to take it back again.

MODESTY.

As lamps burn silent, with unconscious light,
So modest ease, in beauty, shines most bright :
Unaiming charms, with edge resistless fall,
And she who means no mischief does it all.

TO A LADY,

Who sent back the top of a Sweet briar Branch, and retained the worst end of it.

WHILE the way of the world is, to keep all the best,
And then in due form oblige friends with the rest,
You, Madam, who would lend ev'n trifles a grace,
Teach your meanings to borrow a smile from your
face ;
And polite to your pain, when a present you send,
Give the thorn to yourself, and the rose to your friend.

TO THE LADY,

Who sends me all her good Wishes.

SUPPOSE that the sun had a tongue, and shou'd say,
May your journey be bless'd with a very fine day :
Then, withdrawing his face, slip aside with his light, [night ;
And surround me, at once, with the coldness of
What would Florimel say to this trick of the sun ?
I would say, cry'd the charmer, 'twas cruelly done.
Would you so, answer'd I !—have a care what you own, [none.
Who have wish'd me all blessings, yet granted me

Writ upon a Pane of Glass in Westminster House, under the names of his four Children.

ALL happy, then while o'er their smiling air,
A living mother breath'd her guardian care ;
But, joyless, since their sweet supporter dy'd,
They wander now through life with half a guide.

August 25. 1731.

BELLARIA AT HER SPINET.

SWEETLY confus'd, with scarce consenting will,
Thoughtless of charms, and diffident of skill ;
See ! with what blushful bend, the doubting fair
Props the rais'd lid—then sits with sparkling air,
Tries the touch'd notes—and, halt'ning light along, [wrong.
Calls out a short complaint, that speaks their
Now back'ning, awful, nerv'd, erect, serene,
Asserted music swells her heighten'd mein.
Fearless, with face oblique, her formful hand
Flies o'er the ivory plain, with stretch'd command ;

Plunges, with bold neglect, amidst the keys,
And sweeps the sounding range with magic ease.

Now, two contending senses—ear and eye,
In pride of feasted taste, for transport vie ;
But what avails two destin'd slaves debate,
When both are sure to fall, and share one fate ?
Whether the god within, evolving round,
Strikes in her notes, and flows dissolv'd in sound ;
Or silent in her eyes, enthron'd in light,
Blazes, confess'd to view, and wounds our sight.
This way, or that, alike his pow'r we try,
To see, but kills us—and to hear, we die.

Oh ! far-felt influence of the speaking string,
Prompt at thy call the mounting soul takes wing ;
Waves in the gale, fore-runs th' harmonious
breeze,

And sinks and rises to the changeful keys.

But, hark ! what length'ning softness, thrilling new,
Steals, 'twixt the solemn swells, and threads 'em
through :

'Tis her transporting voice !—she sings—be still,
Sweet strings, forbear !—ye hurt her sweeter skill.
Yet, no—sound on—the strong and sweet should join ;

With double pow'r, mix'd opposites combine.
'Tis plain ! my captive senses feel it true ;
Ah, what dire mischief may not union do !
Cou'd she not save delight from half this strain ?
Heard and beheld at once !—'tis hopeless pain.
Fly and escape—let one press'd sense retire ;
The rais'd hat shades it from the darted fire.
Alas, vain screen !—the soul's unclouded ray
Sees from within by a new blaze of day :
Sees the spread roof, with op'ning glories crown'd,
And radiant deities descending round !
Throng'd in bright lines, or wing'd in ambient air,
Spirits, in fairy forms, enclose the fair.

Some, on the keys, in am'rous ambush lie,
And kiss the tune-tipt fingers dancing by.
Some hov'ring wide, expiring shakes prolong,
And pour 'em back to swell the rising song.
Gods, in abridgment, crowd their needless aid,
And pow'rs, and virtues, guard th' unconscious
maid.

Pity, with tears of joy, stands weeping near ;
Kneeling devotion hangs her list'ning ear ;
Candour and truth firm fix'd on either hand,
Propping her chair, two sure supporters stand !
Round her, while wrong'd belief imbibes new strength, [length,

And hugs th' instructive notes, and aids their
Love, and his train of Cupids craftier cares,
Scatter, with plummy fans, the dreaded airs.
Pride, from a distant corner, glooms a leer,
And longs, yet hopes not, to be call'd more near :
But charity sits close—a well known guest,
Bold, and domestic—and demands her breast.
High o'er her cheeks, to shade their tempting glow,
Shame and soft modesty their mantles throw.
While, from her brow, majestic wisdom seen,
Tempers her glory, and inspires her mein.

Such, and perhaps more sweet, those sounds shall rise,

Which wake rewarded saints, when nature dies :

When heaven's heard blast shall shake the stubborn
mind,
And one mix'd melody unite mankind!
When time's last wreck shall sink in seas of flame,
And void eternity resumes its name.

CELIA IN THE GARDEN.

Come, walk, and rouse the languid year:
All nature blooms when you appear;
Each leafless oak would bud a-new,
And push out shade, to shelter you.
Your sight would summer's want supply;
You gone---'tis winter---and we die.

Yon warbling nightingale complains,
Your praise, too seldom, tempts her strains:
The tow'ring lark but hears you sing,
And soars to heav'n with silent wing.
Come, angels come (he cries)---and see
Yourself as much outdone as me.

Each violet sighs itself to death,
To scent the gales that fans your breath:
Stop but, and see th' unfolding rose,
With emulative blushes glows:
While hood-wink'd lilies prostrate lie,
Asham'd to see your breast so nigh.

Look round, and smile---and ev'ry flow'r
Smiles too---and charms, with ten-fold pow'r.
Depart, and lo! they bend and fall,
And weeping dew-drops waste 'em all.
'Tis thus your love inflames my joy,
And thus your coldness might destroy.

THE RECOLLECTED COMPLAINER.

ALL mother as I am, and loth to part
With this poor playful gladd'ner of my heart,
I know too well, and I confess my crime,
'Tis not my right, but heav'n's, to limit time:
Parent at once, of progeny and pain,
Of what would my regardless grief complain?
I gave him birth, but ah, discern'd not why!
Children are born, poor suff'rers, but to die!

Pity, 'tis true, revolves their leapful springs,
Smil'd thanks, atoning pray'rs, embracing clings,
Sallies of guiltless joy, gay gleams of sense,
Soft stroking flatt'ries---active impotence;
Tricks of dumb love, which grateful wills express,
And all their nameless pow'rs of prettiness!
These the fond mother's feeling mem'ry seize,
And then the tear of nature flows for ease.

But reason's voice corrects the bold complaint,
Enjoins submission, and instructs restraint.
Thus wipes the plaintive parent's weeping eye,
And bids the unpermitted drop---be dry.
What is it, thou thyself, mistaking mind!
Hast found in this bad world, or hop'st to find?
That thy presumptuous wish would dare retain,
Whom heaven's kind call exempts from future
pain:

Grant that the worst thou fear'st, should end this blow,
And death's dark screen defends thy child from woe!

VOL. VIII,

Are not thy sad forebodings, too, no more?
Are not thy fears for all his perils o'er? [way!
Of what proud wrongs might clog his life's long
What crimes might blast him, or what wiles betray!

What follies draw down scorn, what vice disgrace!
What loss of honour might bespot thy race!
What want of duty might neglect thy tears!
What want of prudence grind his waning years!
What bloody dangers might cut short his fame,
Or hooting infamy prolong his shame!

Look up, fond sorrower! see the morning's ray;
Now, if you canst, fore-judge the rising day:
Shall its ascending shine continue bright?
Or shall o'ercasting tempests call down night?
Canst thou not tell?---Why then dost thy bold guess
Presume to call an infant's death distress?
Blind to the future, thank a watchful God, [rod.
That snatch'd the child from school, to spare the

THE RESIGNATION.

WELL, be it so!--Sorrow, that streams not o'er,
Spare but the eye, to wound the heart the more:
Dumb, infelt pangs, too well supply the woe,
That grief, in suff'ring silence, shuns to show.
Yet let my will's reluctant pride submit,
And learn to love the lot that heav'n find fit.
All I can lose, God gave---and, when 'tis flown,
Whom does he wrong, who but resumes his own?

Should I in fruitless agony complain,
Fretting my wound but multiplies my pain:
While they, who patiently embrace distress,
Teach shame to satisfy, and grief to bless.
Whate'er has been, 'tis madness to regret;
Whate'er must be, shocks least when braveliest met,
Learn then, my soul, thy course resign'd to run,
And never pray thy will---but God's be done.

COPIES

FOR CHILDREN TO LEARN TO WRITE.

THE body's beauty dwells in shape and face,
The soul's in mildness, modesty, and grace;
The first but charms an earthly lover's eye,
The last draws angels from beyond the sky;
One, for a moment, man's frail heart procures,
The other makes your God for ever yours.

ADVICE

TO THE VIRGINS, TO GUARD AGAINST FLAT-TERY.

FAIREST, forgive the too officious lay,
That send the muse you charm to smooth your way;
I, though admiring, act no lover's part,
Nor bid soft sounds seduce your list'ning heart:
Candidly touch'd my pen's obtrusive fear,
Nor dares to shock, nor aims to soothe your ear;
Needless, 'tis true, to bid such nymphs beware,
Who ev'ry grace and virtue make their care:
Yet modest excellence will oft descend
To thank unwanted caution in a friend.
A faithful pilot, fervent in his fears,
And, trembling, anxious for the worth he steers,

U u

'Twere mortal pain, to see such beauty mourn,
By bold distress, or impious falsehood, torn.
Love's gay delusion tempts a thousand ways;
Now wounds with softness, now destroys with praise.

Thy veil, O flattery! hides a traitor's heart,
And gives up confidence---a prey to art:
Unbridled youth, to consequences blind,
Indulging body, hears no call of mind.
Feeble discretion, so by warmth o'er-run,
Does, with a peacock's feather, fan the fun.
Beauty, that trusts too fast, is beauty's bane,
A self-betrayer, that embraces pain.
Oh, hear suspicious, when the lover sues!
She most attracts, who longest can refuse.
Poise the try'd terms on which his hope depends,
Prop'd on the parent's counsel, and the friend's:
So, leaning safe, and wanting space to stray,
Love's guardian angels crown your nuptial day.
Or should the gilded hypocrite at last
Show, that he meant your spotless fame to blast,
Fly the found tempter, each low lure despise,
And lift your heart's wrong'd wish above surprise.
Nature, that form'd you loveliest, doubly kind,
To like perfection rais'd your conquering mind.
Fram'd you to truth, to virtue turn'd your taste,
For honour dress'd you, and for rev'rence grac'd.
Freedom regain'd, pursue the shining track,
And leave the base repentor to his rack.
Then bless the verse, that from such ruin sav'd
An artless conqueror, by success enslav'd:
Now happy, painless hours shall unperplex
The best-lov'd pattern of the loveliest sex.

LESBIA'S LAMENTATION

ON THE DEATH OF HER SPARROW.—ALTERED
FROM MR. CARTWRIGHT.

TELL me not of joy—there's none;
Now my little sparrow's gone:
He, just like you,
Would toy and woo:
He would chirp, and flatter me:
And, till he saw me look, and smile,
Lord, how fullen he would be!
He would catch a crumb, and then,
Sporting, let it go again;
He from my lip
Would sit and sip;
From my plate he lov'd to feed;
Here would hop, and there would run,
And ev'ry look and motion heed,
Till my very heart he won.
O, how eager he would fight,
And never hurt, though often bite!
He perch'd, alas!
Upon my glass,
And ev'ry thing I did would do:
Ruffling now his feathers all,
Now as sudden let them fall,
And then grew proud, and sleek'd 'em too.
Would'st thou, Cupid, reach a heart?
With his feathers wing thy dart?
Love might that way
Sure wounds convey.

But my faithful bird is gone;
Mournful turtles murmur on.
Hop, ye red-breasts, o'er his stone;
Cease to sing, and learn to mourn.

THE MESSENGER.

Go, happy paper, gently steal,
And soft beneath her pillow lie:
There, in a dream, my love reveal,
A love that awe must else conceal,
In silent doubt to die.
Should she to flames thy hope consign,
Thy suff'ring moment soon expires,
A longer pain, alas! is mine,
Condemn'd in endless woe to pine,
And feel unslack'ning fires.
But if inclin'd to hear and bless,
While in her heart soft pity stirs;
Tell her—her beauties might compel
A hermit to forsake his cell,
And change his heav'n for her's.
Oh, tell her—were her treasures mine,
Nature and art would court my aid;
The painter's colours want her shine;
The rainbow's brow not half so fine
As her sweet eye-lids shade!
By day the sun might spare his rays;
No star make ev'ning bright;
Her op'ning eyes, with sweeter blaze,
Should measure all my smiling days,
And, if she slept, 'twere night.

THE GNAT.

WHILE in the Mall my Celia shone,
And drew th' adoring world to gaze,
A wanton gnat came buzzing on,
To gambol in her blaze.
Enliven'd by her lucid beams,
And urging bliss too nigh,
Th' attractive beauty's pow'ful streams
O'erwhelm'd him in her eye.
The glowing orb swift catching fire,
Now heat was mix'd with light;
The wing, that durst so high aspire,
She rubb'd to dust in spite.
Mean while the clouded sight shone dim;
Her sun through mists appears;
Moist anguish rose above the brim,
And flow'd away in tears.
O Gnat! too happy thus to die!
My Celia weeps thy fate;
She kills me ev'ry day—yet I
No pity can create.
Mysterious sex! by custom led,
Mere trifles, most to prize!
O, truth, to turn a lover's head!
They murder men, and weep for flies.

THE KISS THROUGH A WINDOW.

SAV'D on a shoal the shipwreck'd sailor stands,
And views with wat'ry eyes, and wringing hands
Soul-cheering prospects from the neighb'ring lands;

But if he tempts the waves, he toils in vain,
Big, buoyant billows rise between, and float him back again.

Oh! shameful loss of an invited kiss!
Can brittle glass impede so near a bliss?
Frail is our am'rous hope, if love must be
Subservient to a thing so weak as thee!
We knew before, nor sought thy aid to prove,
That light's a nat'ral enemy to love!
But now, thy malice does new arts employ;
First, give the hope, then dash the proffer'd joy.
Thus absent fanciers dream they meet the ghost
Of some dead partner, whom they value most:
But when, with op'ning arms, they rush to greet,
And, mix'd in mutual grasp, would warmly meet,
Cold blasts of wind divide the starting pair,
And the thin phantom flows away in air.

EPITAPH,

ON THE TOMB OF HENRY JERNEGAN, ESQ.

ALL that accomplish'd body lends mankind,
From earth receiving, he to earth resign'd:
All that e'er grac'd a soul from heav'n he drew,
And took back with him as an angel's due.

THE HAPPY MAN.

HIGH o'er the winding of a cliffy shore, [roar;
From whose worn steep the black'ning surges
Freeman—sweet lot! in quiet plenty lives;
Rich in the unbought wealth which nature gives;
Unplanted groves rise round his shelter'd seat,
And self-sown flow'rs attract his wand'ring feet;
Lengths of wild garden his near views adorn,
And far seen fields wave with domestic corn.

The grateful herds, which his own pastures feed,
Pay their ask'd lives, and, in due tribute bleed.
Here, in learn'd leisure he relaxes life,
'Twixt prattling children, and a smiling wife.
Here, on dependent want he sheds his care,
Moves amid smiles, and all he hears is pray'r.
The world lies round him like a subject soil,
Stor'd for his service, but beneath his toil.

Hence, in a morning walk, his piercing eye
Skims the green ocean to the circling sky.
And marks at distance some returning sail,
Wing'd by the courtship of a flatt'ring gale.
The fearless crew concluding danger o'er;
With gladd'ning shouts salute the op'ning shore;
They think how best they may their gains employ,
And antedate thin scenes of promis'd joy.
Till a near quick-sand checks their shorten'd way,
And the sunk masts point through the rising spray.
Freeman starts, sad! revolves the changeful sight,
Where mis'ry can so soon succeed delight;
Then shakes his head in pity of their fate,
And sweetly conscious, hugs his happier state:

THE POWER OF ROYAL PITY.

Verses made for a Young Gentleman in Despair, and sent to Queen Caroline, by N. C—p—r.

FROM a moist bank, beneath a silent shade,
Whose dark'ning arch depending willows made,

A death-devoted youth, in day's cool dawn,
Weary of insults, and from woes withdrawn,
Long on the fallen surface fix'd his view,
And sigh'd—resolv'd to bid loath'd life adieu.

'Tis but to plunge, he cry'd, one moment there
Saves me from sorrow, and outleaps despair;
Cover'd with calmness in this lulling bed,
No fear shall reach my heart, no pain my head:
Terror, and shame, and want, shall with me die,
And anguish be no more alive than I.

Yet, one dear mourner will my death distress,
Whom I would live for, could I live to bless!
Her tears are tortures which I cannot bear;
Her charms give madness, and her wants despair.

Just at this word the dear distruster came,
Pierc'd the deep gloom, and catch'd the fatal aim.
Trembling with horror, yet by love impell'd,
Timely she grasp'd him; and, convulsive held:
Ah! let me keep thee, though we beg, she cry'd;
Life has no want, but what's by love supply'd:
Wretched with thee, there's recompence in pain,
And bless'd without thee, I were bless'd in vain.
Hope, suffer, think, resolve, submit, contend,
Move every foe—solicit every friend!
Die not thus young—e'er half our days are past,
Love has long years to come: death pulls too fast.
I will not feel distress while you are kind;
Nor bear a joyless world you leave behind.

See! be advis'd: turn there your hopeless eye,
View those sweet rising shades that spread so nigh,
Think, did their royal planter hear my pray'r,
How would she pity my poor heart's despair!
She the best wife, best mother, daughter, queen!
Ah! that she, now, beheld this dreadful scene!
Think on her smiles—and do but live to try!
And, if that hope proves vain—I, too, will die.

THE WEDDING DAY.

'Twas one May morning when the clouds un-
drawn,
Expos'd, in naked charms, the waking dawn;
When night-fall'n dews, by day's warm courtship won,

From reeking roses, climb'd to kiss the sun.
Nature, new-blossom'd, shed her odours round,
The dew-bent primrose kiss'd the breeze-swept
ground.

The watchful cock had thrice proclaim'd the day,
And glimmering sun-beams faintly forc'd their
way:

When, join'd in hand: and heart, to church we
Mutual in vows, and pris'ners by consent.

Aurelia's heart beat high with mix'd alarms,
But trembling beauty glow'd with double charms,
In her soft breast a modest struggle rose,
How she should seem to like the lot she chose,
A smile she thought would dress her looks too gay;
A frown might seem too sad, and blast the day:
But, while, nor this, nor that, her will could bow,
She walk'd, and look'd, and charm'd—and knew not how.

Our hands, at length, th' unchanging fiat bound
And our glad souls sprung out to meet the sound:

Joys meeting joys unite, and stronger shine;
 For passion purify'd grows half divine.
 Aurelia, thou art mine, I cry'd---and she
 Sigh'd soft---now, Damon, thou art lord of me.
 But wilt thou, whisper'd she, the knot now ty'd,
 Which only death's keen weapon can divide,
 Wilt thou, still mindful of thy raptures past,
 Permit the summer of love's hope to last?
 Shall not cold wint'ry frosts come on too soon?
 Ah, say! what means the world by honeymoon?
 If we so short a space our bliss enjoy,
 What toils does love for one poor month employ?
 Women thus us'd like bubbles blown with air,
 Owe to their outward charms a sun-gilt glare.
 Like them we glitter to the distant eye;
 But, grasp'd like them, we do but weep and die.

Lest more, said I, thou should'st profane the bliss,
 I'll seal thy dang'rous lips with this close kiss;
 Not thus the heav'n of marriage hopes blaspheme,
 But learn from me to speak on this lov'd theme.
 There have been wedlock joys of swift decay,
 Like lightning, seen at once, and shot away:
 But theirs were hopes, which, all unfit to pair,
 Like fire and powder, kiss'd and flash'd to air.
 Thy soul and mine, by mutual courtship won,
 Meet, like two mingling flames, and make but one.
 Union of hearts, not hands, does marriage make;
 'Tis sympathy of mind keeps love awake.

Our growing days increase of joy shall know,
 And thick-sown comforts leave no room for woe.
 Thou, the soft swelling vine, shall fruitful last;
 I, the strong elm, will prop thy beauties fast:
 Thou shalt strow sweets to soften life's rough

way,
 And, when hot passions my proud wishes sway,
 Thou, like some breeze, shall in my bosom play.
 Thou for protection shalt on me depend;
 And I, on thee, for a soft faithful friend.

I, in Aurelia shall for ever view,
 At once my care, my fear, my comfort too!
 Thou shalt first partner in my pleasures be,
 But all my pains shall last be known to thee.

Aurelia heard, and view'd me with a smile,
 Which seem'd at once to cherish and revile!
 O, God of Love! she cry'd, what joys were thine,
 If all life's race were wedding days like mine!

THE DREAM.

SLOW-RISING night had her black flag unfurl'd,
 And spread her sooty mantle o'er the world;
 The waning moon shed pale, a sickly light,
 And stars scarce twinkl'd to th' inquiring sight.
 Half the lost earth by darkness over-run,
 Wept in cold dews the absence of the sun.
 The waves were hush'd; the winds forgot to roar,
 And storms detach'd in breezes cours'd the shore.
 The mix'd creation was involv'd in sleep;
 Fishes roll'd flumb'ring through the stagnate deep,
 Beasts, birds, and serpents, various beds possess'd,
 Some in thick woods, some in dark caverns rest.
 Antipathies in common sleep took part;
 Care curs'd not thought, and woe forgot to smart.
 Immers'd in rest my drowsy senses lay,
 And death's proud image practis'd on my clay.

But while, disdainful of the mean controul,
 No dull desires invade my wakeful soul;
 Active the inspirer, skilful to pursue
 Through the wild tracks of mazy mem'ry flew;
 There scatter'd images to union brought,
 And form'd this wond'rous vision to my thought:
 I found myself at dead of deepest night,
 Cheer'd, by no glimm'ring spark of remnant light,
 Lock'd in that ancient venerable pile,
 Which holds her sacred dust, who, lately blest our
 isle;

Ascending damps the gloomy concave fought,
 And hung imprison'd to th' impervious vault:
 While my shod feet trac'd swift the dusky round,
 Hoarse echoes multiply'd the trampling found,
 The sweating stones distill'd a noisome dew,
 And earthy scents my death-fed nostrils drew.
 Cold frosts of fear pierc'd keen through ev'ry part,

And shiv'ring agues shook my ice-bound heart.
 A hollow wind from whistling murmurs bore
 As gath'ring din more high, and strove to roar!
 The tatter'd trophies fann'd the prison'd air,
 And chill amazement stiffen'd up my hair.

While fix'd I stood, intent on rumblings near,
 And distant groans alarm'd my aching ear;
 Sudden, the temple shone, with rushing light,
 And new-born terrors overwhelm'd my sight.
 Ghosts from the loos'ning pavement rais'd their
 head,

And yawning graves disclose their shrouded dead.
 Shot up in streams, a mist of spirits rise,
 As morning exhalations streak the skies.
 Soul-freezing horror tingled through my blood,
 And curdling fear bound hard the vital flood!
 Unbending nerves their dying vigour lost,
 And drooping life scarce held her dang'rous post!
 Large drops of sweat, from every finger shed,
 And the whole frame of nature shook with dread!

From the east end, where mould'ring monarchs lie,

And worms, luxuriant, feast on royalty;
 Where each proud tomb some dust of princes boasts,
 There marches out a troop of sov'reign ghosts:
 Each in his shadowy hand a sceptre brings,
 Th' acknowledg'd mark of pow'r in living kings.
 A glittering diadem each forehead wore,
 Their robes trail'd loose, and swept the honour'd
 floor.

With slow and stately stride, the monarchs tread,
 And ev'ry meaner spirit bows its head.
 In foremost rank, as latest known to fame,
 The grave-brow'd ghost of awful ANNA came;
 Calm and serene the silent walks they trace,
 And halt, regardful, at each solemn place:
 Visit each tomb, and in mysterious state,
 Hail the dry remnants of the wasted great.

This pomp of death, thus, wore half night away,
 And came, at length, where DENMARK's body lay:
 There ANNA staid, and looking careful round,
 With shadowy sceptre, touch'd the conscious ground.
 'Tis strange, she sigh'd, that he whom most I blest,
 Has never thank'd me, since I came to rest.

The willing ghost his marbly fetters broke,
 And rose up, slowly, at the pow'rful stroke:

An air of sorrow bent his serious head,
His eyes some seeming tears, reluctant, shed ;
With folded arms, and discontented look,
Thrice bow'd he, gently, and thus faintly spoke :
Hail, happy shade ! rest here, unforc'd to reign,
Nor toil, to save a stubborn land in vain :
How did just pity sweeten thy controul ?
How did'st thou strain thy virtue-propping soul ?
How did'st thou wish th' unfinish'd course to run ?
And act in will, what pow'r has left undone !
For this, since death, detraction wounds thy fame,
And insolent reproach corrodes thy name,
Ungrateful people ! unrepenting state !
Hast thou, O queen ! deserv'd th' ungentle fate ?
He ceas'd :—Each list'ning monarch shook his

head,
While she to whom he spoke, thus answ'ring said :
O DENMARK ! wonder not at ills like those ;
Angels, if crown'd in England, would have foes !
Desert like mine, with living glories paid,
Can fear no scandal, when become a shade.
If aught's left wanting to my people's pray'r,
Mourn not th' unfinish'd progress of my care :
When princes some wish'd good in vain pursue,
By them not done, 'tis left for heav'n to do.
Let us in peace enjoy our silent bed,
Truth always triumphs when she serves the dead.

THE NORTHERN STAR.

BORN in an age, when virtue veils her face,
And bold corruption turns the blush on grace ;
Where reptile genius winds, at pow'rs controul,
And fortune's whelmy tides engulf the soul :
Where sense by flatt'ry ; shame by want is weigh'd,
And servile poets make their art a trade,
Rise, gen'rous muse ! out-soar the venal view ;
For praise is insult where 'tis giv'n undue.
Though pension'd fame can fawn, till fools are taught
To boast th' imputed wit their brib'ry bought ;
Yet man to man's respect is rais'd, not born,
And dullness dignifi'd, but doubles scorn.
Ah ! narrow hearts ! that know not wisdom's
weight,

But impudently call the proud the great.
Spread the broad wings of truth, impartial muse !
Dare a new theme—nor, now, let fancy choose ;
Serious, and sad, the faults of custom mend,
To friendless genius fame's due succour lend—
If, in some dusky corner, thou shalt find
A ragged fortune hide a nobler mind,
Disperse the cloud ; and be the labour thine,
To teach the shame-fac'd virtue, how to shine.

Or, should some wealth-encumber'd churl withhold

Th' enlivening use of unpartaken gold,
If meanly proud, the wretch disdains to weigh,
The wise man's wants, against the treasure'd clay.
With ceaseless satire, goad his sneaking soul,
Till his pride, suff'ring, gives his taste controul.

Then, muse ! from life's low wrongs, indignant,
turn,

With loftier flame, for suff'ring nations, burn.

On flatter'd statesmen, scowl a patriot eye ;
Strip their badg'd poets, when they write, to lie.
If, rais'd by chance, some tarnisher of sway,
Blund'ring through shifts, mistakes th' unwinding
way,

If, lumb'ring clogg'd, he drags, be-mir'd, along,
Cow'rs, to be safe—yet, injures, to be strong,
Tell him,—that hair-breadth 'scapes, and life-long
fear,

Buy pow'r, and pomp, and infamy, too dear.
Pass, pass, these sulph'ry meteors, of a day ;
Their blaze too dang'rous ! and too lost, their
way !

On suns, not comets, fix thy eagle ken,
Touch the proud hearts of monarchs, into men.
Thence, flows contagion : light must generate
light,

Or mimic millions catch the royal blite :
Kings, who are kings, shed lustre o'er mankind ;
But dim-ey'd princes make whole nations blind.
—So, godlike Cæsar rul'd ungrateful Rome,
And short-liv'd virtue shot a blasted bloom :
But, when lewd Nero stain'd imperial sway,
Vice, with a rapid stream, swept shame away.

Let the low muse, that strikes the venal strings,
Tune her tame lyre, and swell the pomp of kings.
Undreading, thou, where'er the censure falls,
Enter proud palaces imperious walls.
There,—good, or evil—seize th' unshadow'd fact,
And call truth, truth, however princes act.

Sublimely fir'd, I snatch the glorious aim !
'Twere great, indeed, to give the royal, fame !
But,—where, O spotless light, of reason's eye !
Where, among princes, wilt thou greatness spy ?
Shall Britain's boast o'erload my lab'ring lines ?
No—with known force, domestic glory shines !
Flatt'ry were base : and needless the design,
To say (to angels), heav'n is all divine.

Northward, departing muse, extend thy flight ;
There, a new sun inflames the land of night ;
There, arts and arms, the world's fifth empire raise ;

There dateless times shall hail my prophet praise ;
Thy line, great Czar ! shall stretch that shorten'd
name,

To more than Cæsar's pow'r, and all his fame.
Taught, by thy plans, to reign victorious still,
And length'ning down, through time, thy death-
less skill,

Legions of kings, shall wait their doomful nod,
As hosts, from Moses, watch'd th' inspiring God !

O ! pride, celestial, of my muse's praise !
Thou ! best invok'd !—inspire my rising lays,
Kindle my glowing soul, with fires, like thine,
And lend me light, to make my off'ring shine !
Though right to mark, how tow'ring eagles fly,
Asks the try'd sharpness of an eagle's eye ;
Though high-rais'd view, can best, a prospect show,
Which he but ill describes, who stands too low ;
Yet, if, aspiring to the theme,—I feel

Thy glory's love propel my trembling zeal,
O, prince ! the grateful arrogance forgive ;
No genuine muse, so charm'd, can silent live.

Perish the pride, in poor distinction shown,
That makes man blind, to blessings not his own !

Briton and Russian differ, but in name :

In nature's sense, all nations are the same.

One world, divided, distant brothers share,
And man is reason's subject---every where.

So, does dark Nile's mysterious torrent stray,
And oozy wealth, in annual flood, convey.
Memphia's rich plains, imbibe th' impregnate
flow,

And pleas'd Egyptians see proud harvests grow.
Yet while on Egypt partial harvests smile,
Egypt's glad sons engross not all their Nile.
Egypt, and all the world, the river claim :
Egypt in influence, and the world in fame.
So, Russia feels her Czar's intensest heat :

But the warm'd world his distant brightness greet.
Ages, obscurely lost to slighted fame,
Rob'd the dim empire of its bury'd name ;
One city's bounds usurp'd her monarch's rights,
And shrunk his thousand states to Muscovites.
Unmeasur'd realms lay hid in noiseless reign,
And Russia cover'd half the world in vain !
Till rip'ning time this giant-genius sent ;
Divinely siz'd---to suit his crown's extent !
He breath'd prolific soul, inspir'd the land,
And call'd forth order, with directive hand.
Then pow'r's whole energy, at once spread wide,
And old obstruction sunk beneath its tide.
Then, shad'wing all, the dread dominion rose,
Which late no hope, and now no danger knows !

Did not, O prince ! thy love of art's soft charms
Suspend the keener influence of thy arms,
Astonish'd Europe, envious of thy sway,
Must wink malignant, in thy stream of day !
But 'tis thy generous task, to steer thy reign,
'Twixt the two wide extremes of mean and vain.
To teach fierce conquerors all that arts bestow,
Yet hold back arms till justice names the foe.

Not so, of old, when, stern in horrid arms,
The needy north pour'd forth her Gothic swarms ;
Roughly they warr'd, on arts they could not taste.
And, blindly laid the tracks of learning waste.
This heav'n remember'd, and, with kind command,
Call'd for atonement from the barb'rous land.
The prince, disdainful of his country's crime,
Guileless, springs forward, to uncurse the clime :
And, nobly just, has taught the nations more,
Than the world's empire ruin'd---lost before !

How vast the engine!--and the force how great !

That could, so swiftly, move such pond'rous
Enormous boast of kings ! who,---though his reign
Stretch'd empire's endless line, from main to main,
Counts not his greatness by his country's length,
Nor from dependent millions steals his strength.
But, to himself (like heav'n) his effluence owes,
And gives---not takes---what pow'r from number
flows.

Born, for eternal growth---and stor'd with
For whit'ning time, with ever-blooming themes.
Wonders on wonders gild a glowing land,
That almost ow'd distinction to his hand !
From frozen climes, where nature, stiff with cold,
Nourish'd no hope ; and time in tears grew old :
Warm'd by the monarch's worth, we rising saw
Springs of gay virtue---and ripe fruits of law !

Doubly supreme ! thy unrestrain'd controul
Directs the body, and empow'rs the soul !
While vulgar kings their views supinely scan,
And limit what they would by what they can ;
Thy nobler pow'r, with more than martial sway,
Commands---and makes men able to obey !
Transporting thought !---let me indulge it long,
Hence realms grow mighty and their influence
strong.

Ah ! why by civil broils should patriots bleed,
For parts in pow'r, they not enjoy nor need ?
Less factious subjects happier freedom share ;
Mis-reckon'd slaves in such a sovereign's care.
Slaves are blind buff'lers, who, deceiv'd by names,
Promote, unknowingly, their spoiler's aims :
Who (told sedition sets a nation free)
Hug the new chain---and call it liberty.
Then---walking gall'd, beneath th' incumbent
weight,

Grind a curb'd curse, and bear th' impos'd deceit.

If just Athenians, by a Theseus led,
Their scatter'd country's strength-uniting head !
To lasting praise consign'd his cherish'd fame,
And, conscious of his bounty, bless'd his name ;
If hard Lycurgus, now immortal grown,
Sheds deathless glory round a realmless throne ;
If, Romulus ! thy mem'ry triumphs still,
For teaching Rome to rob with safer skill ;
For reining rapine in from private harms,
To mightier mischief in confed'rate arms :
What praise, prodigious Czar ! shall dare to tread,
In awful circles, near thy sacred head ?
To whom, not one small portion singly kneels,
In thanks for sep'rate benefits it feels :
But nations, numberless as Libyan sands,
Share the long bounties of thy reaching hands---
Thy hands ! to whom delighted with thy praise,
God gave not thrones to reign on---but to raise.

Thy catching lustre fires the north's wide soul,
And thaws the icy influence of the pole.

The shaggy Samoid, shaking off the snow,
Warms his cold breast with new desire to know.
The rugged Tartar, from whose swarthy bands
A gloom of horror us'd to shade thy lands,
Charm'd by thy gen'rous daring, checks his own,
Assumes new nature, and adorns thy throne.
Beams of young learning, active as the wind,
Radiant, flame out, and light up half mankind :

Stern superstition's misty cloud dispell'd, [held :
Quits her chief throne, through long dark ages
And Russian arms a glitt'ring terror cast, [past :
O'er realms, where scarce the Russian name had

Blush, ye bought bards ! of our degen'rate days,
Whom pension prostitutes to high-way praise :
Who fear it fruitless for a muse to roam,
Thence, poorly, pin your venal hearts at home !
The world's my country : born, no matter where,
Man is a denizen of earth and air :
Native to truth, 'tis his all worth to show,
And love the hostile virtues of a foe.

Ah ! how too weak my willing verse pursues,
And flags beneath new heights of op'ning views !
Touch my charm'd heart, thou God ! that didst
inspire

His force ! and let me feel th' impulsive fire.

Sunk amid fens, in fortune's stagnate tract,
And curs'd myself, with want of power to act.
Let me at least describe, with conscious blaze,
And, from another's triumph, force some praise.

O! great Eternal Pow'r, that bounds our minds,
What circling darkness human foresight blinds?
Where are the lost effects of statesmen's dreams?
Whose erring envy spun such cobweb schemes!
Long—each vain terror beat one devious road;
And sigh'd at growing France with false forebode:
While, unobserv'd, th' exulting northern bear
Grin'd over gen'ral empire, rising there.

Henceforth, let none the strength of states compare:

Nor what they may be, judge from what they are.
Low the lord's genius, all his realms the same:
The king's breast wid'ning, swells his throne to fame.

Then, pow'r effulging, distanc'd equals find,
That man's whole boundless diff'rence dwells in mind.

This truth,—dread dark'ner of each rival throne!
Well has thy life's long tract of wonders shown;
What sudden fleets have shadow'd distant seas,
With flags that start to pow'r, and scorn degrees;
Glooming at pleasure, ev'ry hostile shore,
Far-trembling nations hear new thunders roar;
Th' intrepid Swede does fortune's change upbraid,
And sees th' assaulted enemy invade!

The Dane finds gratitude too weak for fear,
And hates his helper's strength, display'd too near.
The furrow'd Baltic a new lord obeys,
And to strange keels reluctant homage pays.
The virgin Caspian, he, bold lover! woes;
Nor vainly, for her envy'd favour sues:

Grasp'd to his wish, she has her love confess'd,
And giv'n him leave to wander o'er her breast.
Persia's heap'd wealth shall her huge portion be,
And India's sovereign's give her lord the knee.

From nameless outlets, endless naval hosts,
Black'ning, still more, the fable Euxine's coasts,
Shall teach the Porte's imperial walls to shake,
And the fell sultan's iron sceptre break.
Grecia's lost soul shall be restor'd by thee!
Great savor! setting empire's genius free!
Then, Hellespont, whose stream indignant glides,
And a subjected world's two bounds divides;
Shall feel, while reaching both, thy thunder roars,
Europe and Asia, trembling to her shores.

Then, may thy floating empire's conqu'ring sweep
New greet vast Russia round th' Atlantic deep.

So spring the seeds of pow'r, when wisely sown!
So pregnant genius plans the future throne!
Mean while, great founder! gath'ring strength
from blows,

They spread thy glory who thy arms oppose.
The self-priz'd lords of China's boastful land,
Feel their pride shrink beneath thy bord'ring hand:
The trackless wilds, which both vast states disjoin,
Are ev'n, when arm'd with shiv'ring winter,
thine!

O'er realms of snow thy furry squadrons fly,
And bring, at ease, the dreadful distance nigh!
In vain oppos'd, th' enormous wall they see;
Proclaim'd defiance can but quicken thee.

Zembla's white cliffs—eternal hoards of frost,
Where proud discov'ry has so oft been lost;
Through every period of the world till now,
Have check'd all keels that would those oceans plow.

Nature's last barrier! they all search withstood,
And bound ambition up in freezing blood.
Reserv'd by heav'n, and for thy reign design'd,
Thy piercing eye shall that dark passage find.
Or, east's and west's embracing confines shown,
Join two emerging world's; and both thy own.

Stop, headlong muse!—Ah! whither would'st thou go?

Look down with caution on the depths below:
Prospects too vast the rash presumer fright;
And, dazzling, wound an uncollected sight.
Congratulate a while our church's gain,
And mingling joy, relax thy wonder's strain.

Shall then, at last, beneath propitious skies,
The cross triumphant o'er the crescent rise?
Shall we behold earth's long-sustain'd disgrace
Reveng'd in arms on Osman's haughty race?
Shall Christian Greece shake off a captive shame,
And look unblushing at her Pagan fame?

'Twill be—Prophetic Delphos claims her own:
Hails her new Cæsars on a Russian throne.

Athens shall teach once more! once more aspire!
And Spartan breasts reglow with martial fire:
Still, still, Bizantium's bright'ning domes shall shine,

And rear the ruin'd name of Constantine, [be!
Transcendent prince! how happy must thou
What can'st thou look upon, unblest'd by thee?
What inward peace must that calm bosom know,
Whence conscious virtue does so strongly flow!
Each fame, of ages past, in ruin lies:

How timely, therefore, does thy greatness rise,
To fire forgetful thrones, with thirst of praise;
And build example for these feeble days! [shine,

Such, are the kings, who make God's image
Nor blush to dare assert their right divine!
No earth-born bias warps they climbing will;
No pride their power—no av'rice whets their skill.
They poise each hope which bids the wise obey,
And shed broad blessings from their wid'ning sway.
To raise th' afflicted, stretch the healing hand,
Drive crush'd oppression from each rescu'd land.
Bold in alternate right, or sheath or draw
The sword of conquest, or the sword of law.
Spare what resists not; what opposes, bend;
And govern cool, what they with warmth defend.

How blest'd were man! would heav'n hereafter please,

That all earth's princes should be form'd like these!
Wish it, O muse! howe'er the wish be vain;
It gives some joy to hope th' unlikelyst gain. [shine

Adieu—dread flame! that bids the pole out-
The torrid brightness of the burning line!
Drawn by thy beamy force, I still would gaze;
But my eyes ake beneath th' oppressive blaze,
Descend, rash muse!—'tis decent to retire;

Thy fall were dang'rous, if thy flight were higher.
'Thou, too, great prince! forbear th' ador'd excess!

Rest—for thy life, and make thy glory less.

Heav'n must reclaim thee—nor thy absence bear,
When earth yields no new wonder worth thy care.
Mourn'd, the near prospect! yet not mourn'd
by all!

There are, whose humbler glory waits thy fall.
When thou, great sun of royalty! shalt set,
And pay sad nature's last and surest debt:
Then earth's low lords may boast their poor designs,
And ev'ry upstart twinkler think—he shines.

Then, when no more thy wonders wake mankind,
But dying envy leaves delight behind,
Here, while thy steps admiring ages trace,
Where shall amazement first encomium place?
Arduous decision! which most honour won?
Thy actions, or the speed with which they're done.

When Rome, that glitt'ring, that immortal
name!

Aspir'd to rule, and panted after fame;
Age copying age, spun length of patient will,
And ek'd th' oft-breaking thread, with lab'ring skill.

Nor till sev'n hundred hard-press'd years were past,
The late propitious fortune smil'd at last.
Not such slow rise, O prince! thy Russia fears:
Thou dragg'st not glory from such depth of years.
At once resolv'd, at once the columns rise,
Which lift thy dreadful fabric to the skies.
Form and degrees, let bounded spirits need:
Thy soul, eccentric, moves with in-bred speed:
Makes nature shake, and raises in a day,
What with less ease in ages shall decay.

So, when young time its first great birth-day kept,
And huddled nature yet in chaos slept;
Th' eternal Word, to set distinction free,
But spoke th' almighty fiat—Let there be.
Millions of ways the starting atoms flew;
Like clung to like—and sudden order grew:
Struggling in clouds, a while confusion lay,
Then died at once and lost itself in day.

THE PICTURE OF LOVE.

Love is a passion by no rules confin'd,
The great first mover of the human mind:
Spring of our fate! it lifts the climbing will,
Or sinks the soften'd soul in seas of ill:
Science, truth, virtue, sweetness, glory, grace,
All are love's influence, and adorn his race;
Love, too gives fear, despair, grief, anger, strife,
And all th' unnumber'd woes which tempest life,

Fir'd with a daring wish, to paint him right,
What muse shall I invoke to lend me light?
Something divine there lives in love's soft flame,
Beyond our spirit's pow'r to give it name!
How shall I paint it then? or why reveal
A pleasure and a pain which all must feel?

Soul of thy sex's sweetness! aid my hope,
Pride of my reason, and my passion's scope!
Thou, whose least motion can delight inspire!
And whose sweet eye-beams shed celestial fire!
Thou, at whose heav'n-tun'd voice the dead might wake!

And from whose face we fatal learning take,
Teach me thy godlike pow'r the heart to move,
Smile on my verse and look the world to love!

Far, ye profane, from my chaste subject fly,
Nor stain its brightness with a tainted eye;
What if a thousand ills the wanton prove,
Whose earth-born heat usurps the name of love?
Lovers, indeed, are cast in no coarse mould,
How few have yet been form'd, though time's grown old!

No wild desire can this proud bliss bestow,
Souls must be match'd, in heav'n, though mix'd
below,

As fire, by nature, climbs direct and bright,
And beams in spotless rays, a shining light;
But if some gross obstruction stop its way,
Smokes in low curls and scents the sullied day:
So love itself, untainted and refin'd,
Borrows a tincture from the colour'd mind;
The great grow greater while its force they prove,
But little hearts want room and cripple love.

Cautious, ye fated, who frequent the fair!
Your breasts examine, nor too rashly dare,
Curb your untrusting hearts while yet they're free,
Love is resistless when you feel 'tis he. [dart,

Small is the soul's first wound, from beauty's
And scarce th' unheeded fever warms the heart.
Long we mistake it, under liking's name,
A soft indulgence that deserves no blame;
A pleasure we but take to do her right, [light;
Whose presence charms us, and whose words de-
Whose sweet remembrance broods upon our breast,
And whose dear friendship is with pride possess'd.

Excited thus the smother'd fire at length,
Bursts into blaze, and burns with open strength:
That image which before but sooth'd the mind,
Now lords it there, and rages unconfin'd.
Mixing with all our thoughts it wastes the day,
And when night comes, it dreams the soul away,
Pungent impatient tingles in each vein,
And the sick bosom throbs with aching pain,

Absent from her, in whom alone we live,
Life grows a bankrupt and no bliss can give;
Friends are importunate, and pleasure's lost,
What once most charm'd us now disgusts us most:
Fretful to silent solitude we run,
And men, and light, and noisy converse shun;
Pensive in woods, on river's sides we walk,
And to th' unlist'ning winds and waters talk;
How next we shall approach her pleas'd we weigh,
And think in transport all we mean to say:
Tenderly bowing, thus will we complain,
Thus court her pity, and thus plead our pain;
Thus sigh at fancy'd frowns, if frowns should rise,
And thus meet favours in her soft'ning eyes.

Restless on paper we our vows repeat,
And pour our souls out on the missive sheet:
Write, blot, restore—and, in lost pieces rend
The mute entreaters, yet too faint to send;
Unblest'd if no admission we procure,
'Tis heav'n at distance to behold her door!
Or to her window we by night repair,
And let loose fancy to be feasted there;
Watch her lov'd shadow as it glances by,
And to imagin'd motions chain our eye;
Has she some field, or grove, or garden blest'd?
Pleas'd we retread the paths her feet have press'd:
Near her, by chance, at visits or at plays,
Our rushing spirits crowd in speaking gaze;

Light on her varied airs our eye-balls ride,
Blind as the dead to the full world beside.

If blest'd by some kind letter from her hand,
The cherish'd flame is into madness fann'd;
Trembling we half devour the sacred prize,
And lend our thoughts and lips to aid our eyes;
No wild extravagance of joy's too much,
For aught once warm'd by her enlivening touch.

These are the sweet effusions of desire,
When absence wounds us, or when wishes fire;
But when in presence we our vows address,
Who can the tumults of the soul express?
Boundless desire, aw'd hope, and doubtful joy,
Stormy by turns the veering heart employ;
Sick'ning in fancy's sunshine, now we faint,
And licence wounds us deeper than restraint:
Fix'd in her opening door surpris'd we stay;
Dumb and depriv'd of all we meant to say:
Our eyes flash meanings but our rooted feet
Pause till due reverence faints the hallow'd heat:
Soft tremblings seize us and a gentle dread,
Speechless our thought, and all our courage fled.

Slowly reviving, we from love's short trance,
Softly with blushful tenderness advance;
Bowing we kneel, and her giv'n hand is prest,
With sweet compulsion to our bounding breast;
O'er it in ecstasy our lips bend low,
And tides of sighs 'twixt her grasp'd fingers flow:
High beats the hurried pulse at each forc'd kiss,
And ev'ry burning sinew aches with bliss:
Life in a souly deluge rushes o'er,
And the charm'd heart springs out at ev'ry pore.

The first fierce rapture of amazement past,
Confusion quits us, and desire grows fast;
We sit, and while her gaz'd-at beauties rise,
A humid brightness sparkles from our eyes:
Modest disquiet ev'ry action wears,
And each long look the mark of passion bears!
Disorder'd nature no cold medium keeps,
Transport now reigns, and dull reflection sleeps:
All that we feel, or wish, or act, or say,
Is above thought and out of reason's way;
Joy murmurs, anger laughs, and hope looks sad;
Rashness grows prudent and discretion mad:
Restless we feel our am'rous bosom burn,
Now this way look we, and now that way turn.
Now in sweet swell of thought our lifted eyes,
Lose their low languor and attempt to rise,
Now sinking suppliant seek the charmer's feet,
And court wish'd pity in their glanc'd retreat,
Oft, in fix'd gaze, they dwell upon her face,
Then start astonish'd from some dazzling grace;
Now in bold liberty fly out unbid,
Now aw'd, 'scape inward 'twixt the closing lid.

If we dare speak, and would our wish pursue,
The words fall feath'ry like descending dew;
The soft'ning accents ev'n in utterance die,
And the tongue's sweetness here out-charms the eye;

'Till mingled sighs the fainting voice confound,
But lover's meanings speak though robb'd of sound.

Is there no more? oh! yet the last remains!
Crown of our conquest! sweet'ner of our pains!
There is a time when love no wish denies,
And smiling nature throws off all disguise;

But who can words to speak those raptures find?
Vast sea of ecstasy that drowns the mind!
That fierce transfusion of exchanging hearts!
That gliding glimpse of heav'n in pulsive starts!
That veiny rush! that warm tumultuous roll!
That fire which kindles body into soul!
And on life's margin strains delight so high,
That sense breaks short, and while we taste we die.

By love's soft force, all nature is refin'd,
The dull made sprightly and the cruel kind:
Gently the stubborn passions learn to move,
And savage hearts are humaniz'd by love:
Love in a chain of converse bound mankind,
And polish'd and awak'd the rugged mind:
Justice, truth, pity, openness of heart,
Courage, politeness, eloquence and art,
That gen'rous fire with which ambition flames,
And all th' unsleeping soul's divinest aims,
Touch'd by the warmth of love burn up more bright,

Proud of the godlike pow'r to give delight.

Thus have I vainly strove, with strokes too faint
Love in his known and outward marks to paint;
Unmindful that of old they veil'd his face,
And wisely cover'd what they could not trace.
Lovely creator of my soul's soft pain,
Pity the pencil that aspir'd in vain:
Vers'd in love's pangs and taught his pow'r by you,

Skill'd, I presum'd that what I felt I drew;
But I have err'd; and with delirious aim,
Would picture motion and imprison flame.
He who can lightning's flash to colours bind,
May paint love's influence on the burning mind.
Then when we master him and give him law,
Then may we chain him and his image draw:
But who would bind this god must captive take
A power which all mankind can captive make:
I am too weak of heart, yet I can tell
Those who dare seize him, where he loves to dwell.
I see him now; in his own heaven he lies,
Close at sweet ambush in Miranda's eyes.

ADVICE TO THE POETS.

Too long provok'd, immortal muse, forgive;
Rouse a dead world, and teach my verse to live.
Not the low muse, who lends her feeble fire,
To flush pale spleen, or light up loose desire;
But that bright influence, that expansive glow,
Which first in angel's numbers learn'd to flow;
Ere time had struck eternity with shade,
Or day, or night, or space, or form, was made:
Tun'd the rais'd notes at which creation grew,
And worlds, and stars, and suns, and heav'ns, shot new.

She, she, the muse—Oh, ne'er to be defin'd;
Thou flame of purpose! and thou flow of mind!
Thou path of praise, by heav'n's first fav'rites trod!
Thou voice of prophets! and thou breath of God!

I feel her now—th' invader fires my breast;
And my soul swells, to suit th' heav'nly guest:
Hear her, O Pope! she sounds th' inspir'd decree,
Thou great archangel of wit's heav'n! for thee.

Let vulgar genii, sour'd by sharp disdain,
Piqu'd and malignant words, low war maintain,
While ev'ry meaner art exerts her aim,
O'er rival arts, to lift her question'd fame;
Let half-soul'd poets still on poets fall,
And teach the willing world to scorn them all.
But let no muse, pre-eminent as thine,
Of voice melodious, and of force divine,
Stung by wit's wasps, all rights of rank forego,
And turn, and snarl, and bite, at every foe.
No like thy own Ulysses, make no stay;
Shun monsters, and pursue thy streamy way.

Wing'd by the muse's god to rise sublime,
What has thy fame to fear from peevish rhyme?
Shalt thou, decreed till time's own death to live,
Yet want the noblest courage—to forgive?

Slander'd in vain, enjoy the spleen of foes;
Let these from envy hate; from int'rest those!
Guilt, like the first, your gratitude requires,
Since none can envy, till he first admires:
And nature tells the last his crime is none,
Who to your int'rest but prefers his own.

Disgrac'd by victory where we strike too low,
And meanly furious stretch the stooping blow,
Pride, that provokes revenge, misleads it too;
Return of slander is the weak man's view:
The wise expect it with a cold disdain;
And, while they not receive, retort the pain.

Should ev'n hot rashness erring javelins throw,
And strike our friendly breast, suppos'd a foe?
How nobler still to undeceive than blame!
And chasten insult with the blush of shame?
Never, ah, never shall that worth be found,
Which neither malice nor mistake can wound!

Thus far might ev'ry strength of heart extend;
Thus far can ethic springs our tempers bend:
Thus far the thoughts of saints or kings may rise,
And each known greatness of earth's usual size:
But far more tow'ring still the poet's fires!
Whose breast a ray from God's own heart inspires.

Heroes and saints rise rare—yet still they rise;
And time's full stream each common art supplies.
Philosophy's proud heights are hourly gain'd,
And painting's charms, and music's force attain'd;
But when the deathless poet is to shine,
Long-lab'ring ages swell the slow design.
At length he comes: the birth of time appears!
And heav'n smiles satisfy'd a thousand years.

Strange greatness this! with which compar'd,
priest, saint,
King, hero, and philosopher, sound faint!
He's none of these, whom time shall poet call,
But more than either, and creates them all.

Learn, poets, learn, th' importance of your
name;

And, conscious of your pow'r, exalt your aim.
Soul-shaking sov'reigns of the passions, you
Hold wider empire than the Cæsars knew.
While clam'rous rhet'ric but suspends the mind,
And whisp'ring morals sigh, unheard, behind;
While frail philosophy but starts designs,
And revelation's light to distant shines,
Ardent and close the muse maintains her sway,
And the consenting wishes make her way:
Ev'n pride's rash plunge, the poet's curb endures;
And ev'ry passage to the heart is yours.

Scorn, then, the servile imitator's name,
Nor humbly splendid were cast coats of fame:
Lean not sustain'd—a weight no muse allows!
Pill'ring the faded bays from classic brows;
Nor creep contented in the modern way;
A dry, dull, soft, low, languid, tiresome lay!
But, strongly sacred, and sublimely warm,
Strike the aw'd soul, and the touch'd passions
charm;

Till the stern cynic, soft'ning at your strain,
Feels himself mov'd, and hugs the pleasing pain.
While lazy lovers from their langour start,
And gain a conquest, though they lost a heart.

Such wond'rous change can harmony command!
For heav'n lent nature to the poet's hand;
Gave him the passion's boundless pow'r to know;
And, like a god, distribute joy and woe: [spring,
Taught the tun'd nerves at each known sound to
And bound obedient to the warbling string:
And the blood's current in compliance roll;
And the charm'd spirits rush in tides of soul. [lent,

Ye who feel strong this power that heav'n has
Be your rais'd hearts with equal ardour bent:
Dare to praise virtue, though unprais'd before;
Lance your keen satires at oppressive pow'r:
Be worth obscure by your bright genius sought,
And gild its paleness in your sun of thought:
Lift it to notice; give it strength to move,
And teach dull greatness how to know and love.
With nerves of thought invig'rate manly themes;
Nor idly sport in fancy's empty beams;
Let no base flatt'ry tempt your verse astray,
Nor a light laughter a low taste display.
In wit's cold shallows wade, for shame! no more,
Her soundless ocean tempts you from the shore:
Up her vast steep launch with intrepid climb,
And swim through ages down the stream of time.

Though faint, through modish mists religion
shines,

Oft let her sacred soarings lift your lines:
Oft let your thoughts take fire at that first flame,
From whose bright effluence inspiration came.
Th' Almighty God, who gave the sun to blaze,
Voic'd the great poet for his Maker's praise:
First, for his glory, form'd the world's extent;
Then form'd a language for that glory meant.
Hence have all tow'ry minds, sublimely fir'd,
With in-born strength to their own heav'n aspir'd;
While conscious pertness, for such heights unfit,
Safe to slight subjects pins its puny wit. [glows?

Lives there a man, whose breast with honour
Who, wrong'd by friends, forgives and pities foes;
Who, still deserving, never gains success,
But lives oppress'd, by shunning to oppress?
Who can all grief for his own woes restrain,
Yet melts in generous tears at other's pain?
Teach him, O muse! to wish no monarch's sway,
Greater in want, than in dominion they! [mind,
For, oh!—what diff'rence! 'twixt th' effulgent
That longs for light, lest others should be blind,
And him, who, wanting nothing, grasping all,
Seems great himself, because all round look small!

Or does a softer subject suit your mind?
Fond of the fair, and to their int'rest kind;
Pity some maid, whom modest wishes move,
Unless'd by fortune, yet inspir'd by love;

Fair without followers, without art sincere,
 Rais'd without hope, and without conquest dear :
 There let the muse the rights of beauty prove,
 For all are equal by the laws of love.

There let the muse persuade on virtue's side,
 And teach lame love to leap the bars of pride :
 The pains of passion let the muse impart,
 And to soft yieldings mould the stubborn heart.

Are there, whose rais'd distinction sweetly
 shines,

And whom high fortune fills with high designs ?
 Who greatly blessing all o'er whom they rise,
 Smile on th' inferior world with friendly eyes ?
 Or whom the love of useful arts inspires ?
 Or whom faith, gratitude, or friendship fires ?
 Or whom by charity's soft glowings warm'd ?
 All vice has fled from, and all virtue charm'd :
 These, and all these, deserve the muse's strain ;
 At once adorn, and are adorn'd again.

Shines there a captain, form'd for war's controul,
 Born with the seeds of conquest in his soul ?
 By envy driv'n to trust his in-bred store,
 And still the less supply'd renown'd the more ?
 'Gainst foes and friends, at once compell'd to guard,
 But hardest press'd by those for whom he warr'd ;
 Victor alike, supported or betray'd,
 And obstinate in his oppressor's aid ;
 Pointing superior from the heights he won,
 To teach his rash supplanters what to shun.
 Disclaiming vengeance, while secure of fame,
 And griev'd, not angry, at his country's shame :
 Fearless of flattery here, confess the great,
 And to wrong'd glory lend the muse's weight.
 To crowns and senates hold a daring light,
 And, 'spite of M——'s, do a M—— right.

Should wit's high guardians e'er their charge neglect,

Nor watch her waning, nor her growth protect,
 Cold and unmov'd see tragic warmth decay,
 And epic splendour fade, unfelt, away ;
 While in their place low tastes the land defame,
 Jest without words, and laughter without shame !
 Poets expell'd the stage, supremely theirs,
 And the bays with'ring round the heads of play'rs ;
 Then should the muse indignant wake the throne,
 And the whole thunder of her voice be shown.

O that all verse would senseless sound expel,
 And the big subject bid the numbers swell !
 But, ah, far short th' unsolid tinklers rise,
 Nor soar, but flutter, in the muse's skies !

Shame on your jingling, ye soft sons of rhyme !
 Tuneful consumers of your reader's time !

Fancy's light dwarfs ! whose feather-footed strains
 Dance in wild windings through a waste of brains !
 Your's is the guilt of all, who, judging wrong,
 Mistake tun'd nonsense for the poet's song.

Provoking dulness ! what a soul has he,
 Who fancies rhyme and measure poetry !
 He thinks profanely, that this gen'rous art
 Stops at the ear, with power to shake the heart.

For twice nine cent'ries, why has partial fame,
 O'er worthier Romans, swell'd th' Augustan name ?
 O'er Julius, nobler, and of mightier mind ?
 O'er ev'n Vespasian, darling of mankind ?
 What but the muse this lasting diff'rence made ?
 Pleas'd poets lent the world's great lord their aid :

And from their grateful praise consent first grew,
 That he, who rais'd the arts, surpass'd them too.

Think, ye vain statesmen ! whose self-pointed aims

Die with your dust, nor save your bury'd names,
 Think on the crowds of busy cyphers lost,
 Who once, like you, their sov'reign's smiles en-gross'd !

Cloudily bustling fill'd a realm alone, [throne :
 And, with state curtains, screen'd the darken'd
 'Twixt crowd and subject, stood an envy'd wall,
 Bought, built, clear'd, clouded, and decided all :
 Yet, dead for ever, in dumb graves are laid,
 And rest, forgotten, with the noise they made.

No Richelieu's they—nor knew the poet's pow'r,
 Nor, skill'd to plant, invok'd the genial show'r :
 Hence their dry names in happy haste decay,
 And ev'ry barren glory fades away.

In peace, such themes demand the poet's fire,
 Such subjects raise th' exalted art still higher :
 But, if provok'd too far, some wav'ring state,
 Push'd and insulted in perplex'd debate,
 Feels her slow patience blush—and, tir'd at length,
 Weighs her mean wrongs against her mighty strength ;

If then wish'd war th' exerted genius warms,
 And glowing verse would rouse a realm to arms,
 Then the joint muses animate the song,
 And the whole godhead pours the sound along :
 Then the big notes in tun'd excitement roll,
 Bid the blood boil, and wing the wafted soul :
 Courage impatient burns in ev'ry breath ;
 And a taught brav'ry leaps the lines of death.

These are the seasons, O, ye muse-inspir'd !
 When states unwarlike may to war be fir'd ;
 Then pow'ful verse should long-lost heroes raise,
 And kindle glory at the catching blaze :
 Arthur's great ghost unresting and asham'd,
 That William's brav'ry saw the brave defam'd,
 Shining, redeem'd in honour of our land,
 Would smile to 'scape the knighted tort'rer's hand,
 Then might our great third Edward's awful shade,
 Hem'd with ris'n standards dreadfully display'd,
 Pale from his tomb in epic strides advance,
 And shoot cold horror through the heart of France.
 Wide o'er the reading world extend alarms,
 And warn proud states to shun Britannia's arms.

Or, since the muses sons in courts are known,
 And pleas'd pay homage round a reigning throne,
 Why are they slow to sing the Saxon fame ?
 From whose long lineage sov'reign Brunswick came ?
 When their white courser, by brave Hengist born,
 Did first in Albion war's wav'd pomp adorn :
 While German aids thy cliffs, O Britain, scal'd
 To triumph, where ev'n Rome's great help had fail'd !

To save, and give forgetful England name ;
 To plant a race, that know not whence they came :
 To lend us language to express our fires,
 In grateful railings at our German fires.

Thus, O ye happy few ! for glory born,
 Whose starry wreathes your country's fame adorn,
 Waste not, on vulgar themes, your breathing fire,
 But tune, for gen'rous ends, your living lyre :
 Teach the mistaken world a juster rate,
 To court your praises, and to dread your hate.

Then, when kind heav'n inspires the vast sublime,
And your verse lives, and claims the stamp of time,
Hist'ry shall die, and scarce preserve a name;
While poets flourish in immortal fame

How have endanger'd balancers of state
Liv'd in light ign'rance of the muse's weight?
How might a guided stage men's wills prepare,
To brook tame peace, or wish reluctant war!
How might the subtle scene our passions wind!
And the watch'd arms of young sedition bind!
How timely might this pow'rful art persuade!
How make light lovelier, and illumine shade!
Ease statesmen's labours, animate their aims,
Adorn their actions, and embalm their names.

Should W——'s self, unconscious of the muse,
Provoke her vengeance, or her rev'rence lose,
In vain were votes! she could his pow'r defy,
And bid his blacken'd mem'ry never die:
Shade his best virtues, widen each mistake,
And his hop'd fame from unborn ages take.
Or she could force unwilling praise to climb,
And float him, topmost, on the tide of time;
Bid millions bless him ages after death,
And give new life in a charm'd people's breath:
When no skill'd antiquary finds his bust,
And his proud buildings shall be lost in dust.

Pardon, ye living lights! where'er you shine,
Ye blest elect! ye prophets of the nine!
Pardon that I, whom fainter flames inspire,
Have thus presum'd to point your heav'nly fire:
To make the great more great, requires your skill;
I want the pow'r, nor ev'n possess the will.
While to myself I live obscurely bless'd,
Look round the busy world, and hug my rest;
Plac'd below greatness, and above distress,
I pity pow'r, and hold fast happiness;
Pursue no int'rest, no mean prospect raise,
Reject no censure, and invite no praise.

THE IMPARTIAL.

ARE these the marks then of our promis'd shame?
Or did detraction steal the patriot's name?
Weak if we were, how rose we now so strong?
Or whence, if pow'rful, were we scorn'd so long?
Burn, footy slander, burn thy blotted scroll:
Greatness is greatness, 'spite of faction's foul.

I gaze, astonish'd kingdom, o'er thy face,
And each weigh'd wonder to its fountain trace.
Glory flows in where infamy was spread:
And long lost triumph lifts her tow'ring head.
Warm o'er the icy north thy influent awe
Bids hostile leagues dissolve in friendly thaw.
Up Rhine's strong stream Britannic thunders wind,
And Alpine mountains shake, and states, behind.
Austria's plum'd eagle beak'd, and wing'd oncemore,
Sees baffled Bourbon driv'n from shore to shore.
Sea-shook Aufonia red with warring hosts,
Starts from her Adrian to her Tyrrhene coasts.
Ev'n Rome's imperious mitre learns to bow,
And Spain's Thalestris is but woman now! [fear:

Whence this amazing change?—'twas late all
No warring god invok'd, inclin'd his ear.
Tyrants combin'd, found freedom's rights betray'd:
Faith fast expiring, saw the false invade,
Commerce cajol'd, reluctance brib'd, rage tame:
Ev'n empire trod on—yet uncouch'd by shame!

Then was the crisis; then fate's hand appear'd:
Then might the world be deaf, for Britain heard.
Wave-worshipp'd Britain! one to all oppos'd!
By friends deserted, and by foes inclos'd;
Fills the world's eye—dispels the doubter's care;
Bids the bold tremble, and the backward dare:
High to the nations points their guardian's throne,
And acts, and arbitrates, and shines alone.

And have such fires inflam'd a patient reign?
Immortal heav'n! and must we still complain?
Still must we rail, and blacken, and suspect?
At once curb vigilance and goad neglect?
Deep let my soul detest th' adhesive pride,
That changing sentiment unchanges side:
True to contempt of truth repents within,
Yet screens conviction, and strains hard to sin.

Shame on this craft to scare!—this toil to seem!
O heart indignant, fly th' unmanly scheme!
Blush for thy past injustice—shrink no more;
But wake, and wonder, thou wert dark before!
Learn from whose hand th' unlook'd-for effluence
came;

And, in the teeth of insult, sound his name.

What though some friend thou lov'st had narrower sight?

Truth knows no parties, and involves like light.
Shadows and names fright cowards—but the strong
Ne'er call that lightness, which is scorn of wrong.
Dare to be just, 'tis all that brav'ry means;
He stoops too basely, who to flattery leans:
But whom pale prejudice has taught his part,
Born for a slave, wears fetters on his heart;
Sees undiscerning; feels without his touch;
Judges too little, and decides too much.

Poets have nobler souls: fame's paths they show;
They glow themselves, and teach the world to glow.

Satire's whole pow'r their own—yet praise they choose,

Ev'n of unconscious kings, who flight the muse.
Proud of neglected force, each heav'n touch'd mind

Open to reason is, to int'rest blind.

Self, all unthought of, can for others think;
Swim till the state rides safe, then smile, and sink.
Lift ev'n the worth that hates him—love is shown;
And, for his country's joys, exclude his own;
This is to think like muses, act like man:
This princes ought to feel—and poets can.

Ye, once misguided! is retraction vain?
Trust the brave injur'd; nor persist to stain.
Why should suspicion penitence outlive?
None doubt forgiveness, but who ne'er forgive.
Heav'n has been wrong'd, yet still goes on to bless;
For sins of blindness err beneath distress.
So wrong'd, so pard'ning, Cart'ret heeds no foe;
But saves—unangry at the rage below.

Oft with these shackly quoils of twin'd intrigue,
These nets for liberty, these links of league.
Trite, venal cant! which envy's arts can teach,
To censure ev'ry pow'r we fail to reach.
No gen'rous heart, misdrawn to devious beat,
When truth's new lustre shines, disclaims its heat.
Charm'd and surpris'd, I hug my country's fame;
Compar'd, O heav'n! with years of length'ning
fame.

Ye sons, who love her, weigh the threat'ning
swell
Of Spain, France, faction, calumny, and hell!
Weigh with what speed, repell'd from mound to mound.

Subsiding danger sought her bidden bound!
Hail the white cliffs of Albion held serene,
While round her redd'ning rolls the bloody scene,
I hail it all;---and hail th' acknowledg'd cause;
Hail the mind's reach, that gives earth's uproar laws!

Safe mid surrounding menace, guards mankind;
Guides ev'ry council, busies ev'ry wind, [main,
Shakes the world's shakers, hears for land and
And binds fell tyrants, while they bite their chain.

Ye muse-made Mentors! rais'd on fancy's
wings,
To think for heroes, and to reign for kings;
When cou'd your sons of time's feign'd births do
more?

For ne'er true story reach'd these heights before.

Fav'rites have oft, in many a troubled state,
Poiz'd the king's love against the people's hate;
Oft the firm leader, in some patriot scheme,
Has, with bold steerage, stemm'd the royal stream:
And sometimes too---yet rare, too rare, that praise!
The safe at home, abroad, have gather'd bays;
But none, till Cart'ret rose, e'er hop'd to see
One mast'ring genius grasp th' unwilling three!
Prince half confiding---people all unjust---
Abroad all discord, and at home distrust---
Propp'd on himself, like the world's weight he lay,
And through contention's impulse shap'd his way;
Heard the clash'd elements, despis'd their brawl,
Roll'd on self-centred---and inorb'd 'em all.

THE LOVER'S COMPLAINT.

If on the tow'ring Alps' amazing height,
Whose clifly tops our climbling eyes affright,
And with chill horror strike the startled sight; }
If there, Celinda, thou had'st chanc'd to be
The piny product of some teeming tree;
Tasteless of human pity might'st thou grow, }
And forc'd to bend, when ruffling tempests
blow,
Nod angry at the plains that spread below. }
Ev'n pines and oaks can bend to stones, and be
More flexible, than thy strong hate to me!
The greedy ocean, whose insatiate waves
Flow to devour; whose smoothest smiles are graves;
Of all its monstrous forms, has none so cold,
Nor does one rock, in its vast bosom, hold,
That, had it sense, such cruelty would show,
To triumph in the shipwreck'd sailor's woe:
Nothing in nature does so fix'd remain, }
But love's soft fire can gradual entrance gain,
And all but thee, once lov'd, will love again.

THE STATESMAN.

See'st thou yon mountain, so immensely high,
Around whose sky-crown'd head raw tempests fly!
How low'ring darkly o'er the shadow'd plain,
It hangs the genuine seat of horror's reign!

Its craggy sides hold thin a sterile soil,
Which, promising no harvest, tempts no toil!
No grazing cattle crop subsistence there,
Nor flow'r-fed breezes feast the hungry air!
No soft meand'ring current glides along,
To court the meadows with its murm'ring song;
No lofty spires a wand'ring glance invite,
Nor wind-shook woods arrest the ravish'd sight!
All rough and wild, it rears its rocky head,
Severely awful, and unlovely spread:
From its cold top, soil-sweeping torrents flow,
Form'd by unfruitful floods of native snow!
Sorrow sits brooding on its furrow'd face,
And desolation covers all the place. [state 2
See'st thou all this, fond youth! so charm'd with Such is the envy'd bliss that gilds the great.
Such are the barren honours they enjoy;
For such distinction, they their cares employ.
They move our pity, while they tempt our fight;
High above all indeed, but fruitless in their height.

SOLITUDE.

WELCOME cool breeze, to fan my glowing mind,
Cinder'd with feverish cares and constant woe!
Welcome soft bliss, by gracious heav'n design'd,
The out-worn paths of ancient peace to show,
The road which wisdom loves to go,
And teach aspiring man true happiness to know,
In thy sweet shades uninterrupted reigns,
Free from care-toil'd nature's strains,
The downy god of ease!
In the innocent and life-bliss'd swains,
Unway'd, by low desire of worldly gains,
Their uncorrupted senses justly please,
Nor know the penetrating curse of pains,
But travel smoothly up to death, by mild and flow degrees.

On thy calm coasts no whirlwind doubts we find,
No terrifying blasts to break soft sleep,
No self-raisd tempests shake man's hurry'd mind,
For question'd riches which the wild winds sweep,
Along the furrow'd bosom of the deep;
And which, ev'n e'er we gain, we fear to lose.
No watchful guards in thee we need to keep,
But rest in peaceful slumbers duly find,
Nor feel the killing cares, which great men madly
choose.

Smoothly revolving years,
Unloaded with a needless weight of fears,
Slide unperceiv'd and steadily away;
Safe in the humble shelter of content,
Our apprehension, easy and unbent,
Sometimes but seldom looks abroad to know,
How things about us go.
Sometimes we upward deign to cast our eye,
And view, with curious scorn, the gath'ring clouds,
Which warring princes, plac'd for mischief high,
Supinely sit and bid against each other fly:
From coverts, where our choice our fortune shrouds.

We see all this, and hear the noise it makes;
As one well hous'd, sees the blue light'ning fly,
And hears the rolling thunder shake the sky;

While he, regardless where the tempest breaks,
Without the danger, the delight partakes;
Thus, while on earth, our bodies happy stay,
While here our joy-fin'd moments swim away.

Our elevated minds, above the spheres,
Forget their weak-built tenement of clay;
And by the trying fire of reason, grow
So pure, so free, from thought-disord'ring sin,
That when from life on their last call they go,
In large expanse of soul, they upwards flow,
And rather mix with heav'n, than dwell therein.

ON MR. COWLEY'S INTRODUCING PINDARIC VERSE.

SACRED soul, harmonious swan!
Whose sweetest notes long before death began;
And the long tuneful race unwearied ran,
Long before death began the song; and still the song improv'd, [mov'd!

And still new strings, and still new pleasure
How, mighty muse! didst thou, and thou alone,
(For the gigantic task was all thy own)

Find means to draw such unexhausted store,
From springs which were so poor?
From fountains chok'd with blood, and made by dust impure.

How, 'midst an iron age,
The dreadful and the over-acted stage,
Of undistinguish'd scenes of rage,
Where striving merit, struck by mis'ry, fell:
And all that learning then could teach, was how to suffer well.

How, in this toilsome age,
Didst thou, immortal man! when arts were over-
thrown,

When all the muses garden was o'ergrown,
And whole Parnassus tumbled down,
Stand on its ruins, and erect a new one of thy own.

Yet, as within the all-enlight'ning sun,
Some spots our glasses find, amidst the blaze;
Too small, tho' visible, to look on long,
Because encircled with eye-dazzling rays;
So thou, great king of fancy! led astray
By thy high melted muse, uncurb'd and gay,
And prancing proudly on, in wit's unmeasur'd
way!

Hast err'd in judgment, where thou didst design
Thy judgment most should shine! [vine.

But all that's human in thy verse, is lost in the di-
Immortal man! thou dost too rashly blame

The wasteful spirit of thy gloomy times,

Ev'n of that age of crimes,

Which gave the fate of suff'ring Charles to fame!

Short-sighted man, scarce ever aiming right,

Though eagle-ey'd, in mortal fight,

Oft thus mistakes, for chance, heav'n's well-re-
solv'd decree,

And does against it fight!

That which lights to shadows are,

Or peace to war;

Such was that age to thee!

Such contraries Almighty wisdom finds,

And stamps on human minds;

That virtue's visage, made thereby more bright,

May, when set opposite to sin's black night,

To strike all eyes that shall her lustre see;
Shine out with double force, and doubly charming be.

So fell the royal martyr, to convince
The wond'ring ages since,
How blest their fathers were, in such a prince;
Oh, wond'rous mystic, undiscover'd maze!
What man can search his God's untrodden ways?
Hence our slow learners late are taught, lost worth to idolize!

And hence our long posterity shall know,
(What heav'n thence meant to show)
How many curses three torn nations owe
To zeal's hot sons, who really had no eyes,
And pride, who saw truth plain, and seeing durst despise.

So, too immortal subject of my muse,
The fav'rite theme she loves to choose!
So, too, the sable ignorance of that age,
Like foils, which lustre can to diamonds give,
Inspir'd thy sacred muse with that just rage,
Which greatly handing up to fame,
Thine and thy sov'reign's rescu'd name,
Shall ev'n thy Pindar's praise, but in thy works,
outlive.

THE MIRACLE AT CANA.

Translated from Crasshaw.

WHEN Christ, at Cana's feast, by pow'r divine,
Inspir'd cold water with the warmth of wine,
See! cry'd they, while in redd'ning tide it gush'd,
The bashful stream hath seen its God and blush'd.

ARRIA AND PÆTUS, FROM MARTIAL.

WHEN, from her breast, chaste Arria dragg'd the sword,

And faintly reach'd it her expecting lord;
My wound, said she, but wastes unvalu'd breath,
'Tis thine, dear Pætus, gives the sting to death.

ON THE DEATH OF

PRINCE GEORGE OF DENMARK.

SINCE she by whom her people all live blest,
To sorrow's reign, has giv'n her ruling breast,
Grief should be loudly heard as well as seen,
To noise his death, and mourn our widow'd queen,
The friends of Anna must not silent weep;
Of streams, 'tis said, the gentlest are most deep!
But grief is passion; and where passion reigns,
Nature scorns decency, and breaks her chains:
Like some fierce wind-driv'n show'r true grief appears;

'Tis but a breeze that is allay'd by tears,
She does, indeed, with sighs and tears complain,
Like spring-born zephyrs, mix'd with sprinkling rain! [spread,

But we, the cloud with thunder charg'd, should
And gen'ral woe speak big, to suit the virtue dead,
Great as his mercy should our pity be:

Ah! who unmov'd, can yon fair sorrow see?

The royal Dane that treasure long possesst,
Dear to her soul, and faithful to her breast!

Free from ambition, innocently great,
 'Twixt faction's shoals he piloted the state!
 And temp'ring pow'r, though lord of sov'reign
 sway,
 Shone bright, yet scorch'd not like the sun in May.

THE DISCOVERY.

THIS comes to let Liberia know,
 That beauty is so much heav'n's care,
 That all fine women say or do,
 Is mark'd and treasur'd in the air.
 Hence I, a stranger to your sight,
 Whose hand perhaps you do not know,
 Learn all you do by day or night,
 As by these presents I shall show.
 Your memory cannot but retain
 Some hint of little Pope's bold muse,
 Who, made by lady's secrets vain,
 Did once a tell-tale subject choose.
 Have you not read him where he prates,
 Of Arabella's ravish'd hair;
 And stories of those sylphs relates,
 Whose sweet task is to guard the fair.
 I am that happy sylph assign'd,
 To screen Liberia's breast from harms;
 To flutter round her in the wind,
 And feast my fancy with her charms.
 I have you always in my view;
 And, t'other day employ'd my wit,
 With nameless lines to puzzle you,
 On the grief-wither'd sun-flow'r, writ
 I, at that time, in ambush plac'd,
 Snug, under Mopsy's left ear lay,
 And laugh'd to hear how wrong you guess'd,
 Who thought they came another way.
 'Twas I, your faithful sylph, 'twas I,
 That, ever studious of your ease,
 My skill in verse, resolv'd to try,
 In verse which most the fair can please.
 Perhaps, 'twill startle you to hear,
 How I your actions hourly watch:
 That though you see me not, I'm near;
 And fly each straggling sigh to catch!
 Sometimes in this shape, sometimes that,
 My various duties I perform;
 Sometimes astride your rambling cat,
 I hide in fur, and shade my form.
 But, when your stroking hand I feel,
 From the soft back I leap with joy;
 My fairy fabric still conceal,
 But Puss's active paws employ,
 And sportful, with your milky fingers toy.
 Oft as you sit to sip your tea,
 In a fly's shape, your charms to search,
 Seeking some place, where, best to see,
 I, on the lumps of sugar perch,
 There, while one day divinely pleas'd,
 I gaz'd in raptures on your face,

Your sugar tongs the Captain seiz'd,
 And me between two lumps he squeez'd,
 Half dead upon the place.

But I was even with him soon,
 For catching him all gay,
 At the Park door one afternoon,
 With hands too full of play:
 I took the figure of a gnat,
 And, midst his am'rous strains,
 Whisk'd from your bosom where I sat,
 And stung his fingers for his pains.

But, oh! I tremble to relate,
 How, by your smile-blest looks, bewitch'd,
 I lately 'scap'd a far worse fate;
 While you, with red and yellow mix'd,
 At work, on yonder threshold fix'd,
 Your silky mazes stitch'd.

There I again, a luckless fly,
 Not dreaming any danger near,
 Lay basking in your sunny eye,
 My little aching heart to cheer.

When, on a sudden, through and through,
 Your piercing needle careless pass'd,
 And the dragg'd silk, swift-following, too,
 Bound down my tiny body fast.

There, had I stay'd, transfix'd till now,
 Nor miss'd, nor mourn'd, perhaps by you!
 But that the stitch, the Lord knows how,
 You lik'd not, and, thank heav'n, withdrew.

When once with you your sister Celia stood,
 Celia! that sweet and lovely maid! [rude,
 Two thoughtless bold park-wond'ring fops were
 And you two charmers both afraid,
 Rush'd in, and fled dismay'd,

I, then, fair charge! unknown to you,
 By love, and vow'd revenge, inspir'd,
 Did, like a wasp, the fools pursue,
 And sily down their throats retir'd.

Then to their tongue's presumptuous root I flee,
 And both with tingling venom fir'd;
 Now learn, said I, when next you see
 Yon tempting pair adorn their gate,
 How sacred modest loveliness should be,
 And what the insolent profaner's fate!

Thus, all day long, is Seraphil
 Liberia's wakeful sylph employ'd;
 So rich a charge claims ten-fold skill,
 And care, so charm'd, can ne'er be cloy'd.

But, when at night the happy bed
 Receives her snowy limbs to rest,
 I sleep's soft mist about her spread;
 Then stretch me, blissful, on her breast.

There, till the full grown morning smiles,
 In downy heavings, lost, I lie,
 Or wander o'er those charms 'twixt whiles,
 For which a thousand lovers die.

At last, unwillingly I rise,
 And seizing fast her rubied lip,
 In a sharp-biting flea's disguise,
 I, from her breath the nectar sip.

And then, Liberia starting cries,
 Deuce take this ugly sharp-mouth'd flea!
 But, now I'm wak'd, I think I'll rise:
 So drestes—and ne'er dreams of me!
 Thus have I honestly at last confess'd,
 What sort of little scribbling thing I be:
 Left, growing curious, you might wrong have guess'd,
 And thought some other sent what came from me.

TO LIBERIA,

WITH A SQUIRREL.

THESE, my last lines, I write with bleeding heart,
 For, oh! Liberia and her sylph must part!
 I must no more engross that envy'd care,
 Which angels now in crowds have begg'd to share.
 Now, I no more must flutter in your sight,
 And, from your eye-beams, gild my wings with
 light:

No more in fields of air when sylphs rejoice,
 Dance to the soft tun'd music of your voice!
 Listen no more while in the Mall you walk,
 What the admiring crowds that meet you talk.
 On your right shoulder's tip no more shall blaze,
 Bright with the flash of eyes, which passing gaze!
 And when sometimes you're sad, no more shall I
 See myself weep, by peeping in your eye!
 These comforts past, and mention'd now in vain,
 Serve but to make remembrance ache with pain!
 Little, alas! I thought, when last I writ,
 That I, so soon my boasted charge must quit!
 But our great king, whom all we sylphs obey,
 Wretch that I am! commanded me away:
 Far off, to eastern shores I was to go;
 Where the proud Turk keeps love, and woman
 low:

Where full twelve hundred rival beauties strive,
 To keep one lover's lazy flame alive:
 Where female charms are taught the humble skill,
 To court the fancy, and not bow the will:
 To this new post preferred, I was to fly;
 And past before the haughty sultan's eye;
 There, in his glitt'ring palace, gay with state,
 On his new fav'rite sultane's to wait:
 But, ah, Liberia! by thy sweetness won,
 Thy doating sylph was doom'd to be undone;
 These proffer'd honours had no charm for me
 I cou'd not taste a joy, remote from thee!
 Thou art my pride, and, where thou art not seen,
 Sorrow would catch me, though I serv'd a queen!
 This, when I told our prince, he never weigh'd
 My grief's just cause, but thought I disobey'd,
 Swift he o'ertook me, with an angry vow,
 And chang'd me to the shape I come in now.
 Scarce had I time to write my wretched fate,
 And begg'd a friend to bring me to your gate;
 Helpless and dumb, ah! whither should I go,
 But to her breast, whose pitying soul I know?
 She who to Puss and Mopsy kind can be,
 Will sure, thought I, have some concern for me.
 Weak though I am, some gratitude is due;
 I claim your care, for my past care of you.
 Elsewhere I will not my new wants supply,
 And when you starve me 'twill be time to die.

I may hereafter some small service do;
 For yet my body's weak and form but new.
 If you shall please to help me through my youth,
 And with milk-soften'd biscuit save my tooth;
 Grateful when I grow up, I'll keep your's strong;
 And crack nuts for you, all the glad day long;
 If kindly, you shall bless me with your care,
 And shield me from the pinching wint'ry air,
 Close round your neck, like some warm tippet
 roll'd,

In frosty nights, I'll guard you from the cold;
 And while in your soft hand you let me play,
 I'll growl the Captain's rivals all away.
 Refuse not then, though chang'd, to keep me still,
 And oh! remember, Pug was Seraphil.

To my dear and ever honoured Mother, in answer to some Verses which she sent me about Spirits, from Malm'sbury Abbey.

MADAM, your lovely muse's late employ
 Was read with wonder, and a pride-mix'd joy:
 Fortune, in vain, her batt'ring engines bends,
 'Gainst souls, which such a wit-rais'd strength defends:

Secure within, you outward storms defy,
 And look serenely on a ruffled sky:
 So Philomel, by night, disdaining rest,
 Sings o'er the pointed thorn which galls her breast.

The busy ghosts your fancy seems to hear,
 Have no design to fright your list'ning ear:
 Nor springs their restlessness, from Rome's old
 pride,

Nor vain regret, that so long since they dy'd;
 A purer race these bustling spirits are,
 And a more noble aim inspires their care!
 Some beauteous band of nuns they seem to be:
 Stript to the naked soul, and so set free.
 Through death's dark shade your shining form they spy,

And trace your virtues, with a ravish'd eye!
 Hence ev'ry night allur'd by fresh desire,
 They press to view the charms they so admire.

A DIALOGUE

BETWEEN DAMON AND PHILEMON,

Concerning the Preference of a Town Life to a Country Life.

Philemon.

WHY does not Damon, un aspiring swain!
 Choose rather not to live, than live in vain?
 From bright examples thy ambition fire,
 Let others honours whet thy dull desire;
 Let rustic sports engage the lab'ring hind,
 And cultivated acres plough his mind;
 Let him to unfrequented woods repair,
 And snuff, unenvy'd, his lean mountain air;
 'Till death, unfought, o'ertakes his heavy pace,
 And unfam'd dust consumes his mould'ring race.
 Do thou to warmer joys thy wishes raise,
 And taste the pleasure of deserving praise!
 If sparkling genius does thy fancy fill,
 In muse-led stages, try thy journeying skill:

Or, if thy soul more roughly is possess'd,
And struggling valour swells thy glowing breast;
To war's red toils let glory call thee hence,
And draw thy untry'd sword, in Britain's just defence.

Damon.

And why, Philemon, to the vicious town,
Not that way lies the road to just renown;
No virtue prospers in that barren soil,
That nursery of unregarded toil:
There fools, and knaves, by purchas'd favour rise,
And shine beyond the valiant and the wise.
Shall hope allure me to the wretched state,
Of cringing at the levees of the great;
With servile awe to court a stately nod,
And treat some glorious folly like a god?
No! sooner I'll the clown's free labour's share,
And with their brutes a nobler burden bear!
The wars, I must allow, a gen'rous thought,
A glory by fame-thirsty spirits sought;
Who scorch'd within, by hot ambition's flood,
Quench passion's fever in a lake of blood!
'Tis great to see 'em march through cannon's roar,
While sweat-wash'd wounds all-gild their faces
o'er:

To brave the northern blasts, and with swollen veins,
Bear scorplings when the sultry dog-star reigns.
But will your unnerv'd youth encounter these?
Ah no! effeminate, they rust in ease!
And should our sinewy hinds forsake the field,
France will stand high when Britain learns to yield.

Philemon.

Can Damon whose bright genius strongly shines,
Through the soft beauties of his tuneful lines;
Can he defend, or muses bless the strife,
Th' unglorious preference of a country life?
'Tis not alone for honour or renown,
The seat of wit and pleasure is the town:
To her, ungrateful, all those darts you owe,
Which, now, against her battlements you throw.
For sure, no rural dictates could inspire,
The rapt'rous energy of Damon's fire!
The cot-bred soul with ignorance content,
Is meanly miserable by consent:

Proud in his native sloth he scorns to think,
And has no end in life, but meat and drink;
While the brave learn'd, whose knowledge bids him try,

The mystic gulf of deep philosophy,
Wades 'cross the narrow bounds to reason giv'n,
Spurns back the measur'd earth, and fathoms
heav'n!

Had glory's props in ages long since past,
In the rough mould of country life been cast;
A blind stupidity the world had sway'd,
And mother ignorance been still obey'd:
No deathless wit had crown'd the Grecian stage,
Nor skill-mix'd courage grac'd the Julian age!
No sun of thought had shin'd, with glorious
beams,

No seas of knowledge spread their silver streams;
Then Damon come, to courtly pleasures fly,
Nor thus th' attractive charms of wealth and pow'r deny.

Vol. VIII.

Damon.

Oh! would this tuneful youth whose numbers
flow,
Soft as the love-inspiring zephyrs blow;
Sweet as maids look, when first they own their
loves,

Smooth as the down which feathers Venus' doves.
Sweet as the dulcid streams, from Hybla run,
Or as the bloom, displaying to the sun!
Oh would he to our sylvan shades repair,
To taste our wholesome, our inspiring air!
Would he but leave that sable-clouded soil,
On which Aurora never seems to smile;
What bright, what glorious images would rise,
From all his thoughts to emulate the skies!
For if such charms, there, in his numbers shine,
Here, they would prove ecstatic and divine.
But why is Damon so ungrateful thought;
As if the town his humble fallies taught!
What muse could e'er endure your smoke and noise;
Your night alarms and your tumultuous joys?
No! 'tis the murmur'ing brook, the shad'wy grove,
And flow'r-dress'd valley, that invite their love!
Then haste, Philemon, to our blissful state,
And learn to live, before it grows too late.

Philemon.

If truth, dear swain! with freedom might advise,

Thou may'st be happy, for I know thee wise;
Quit for a trial once, this meagre air,
And all impartial to thy friend repair.
Then wilt thou ever fix'd with me remain,
And envious rustics tempt thee back in vain.
Thus some raw youth, on a domestic shore,
With terror hears th' encircling surges roar;
Trembling, he sees the threat'ning tempest roll,
And ev'ry rising billow lifts his soul:
But when a riper age has call'd him o'er,
To try the pleasures of some foreign shore,
Sad he returns, nor will at home remain,
But pants to taste abandon'd joys again.
Your muse, in vain, of boasted prospect sings;
Your flow'ry meadows, and your murmur'ing
springs:

Poor short-liv'd scenes of shadow-skimming joy,
Whose pride a change of season can destroy!
The rising floods your valleys over-flow,
And winter spreads your hills, with sheets of snow:
Autumnal winds strip bare your gawdy trees,
And cold December nights your purling currents
freeze.

But we, more happy, constant blessings share,
Nor hang our comforts in the changeful air:
Our diff'ring seasons have their different sport,
The park, the play, the tavern, and the court!
Our rolling hours can sweetly wear away,
The utmost moments of the longest day:
When tir'd with business, we would care decline,
We drown the weight of thought in gen'rous wine:
By that made sprightly, to the park repair,
And eloquently silent, court the fair:
Thence, to the theatre, inspir'd we move,
And feast at once, on mingled wit and love!
These and a thousand nameless new delights,
Make our days fruitful, and enrich our nights;

X x

While you, 'midst few repeated pastimes live,
Nor ever taste the joy which changing pleasures
give.

Damon.

'Tis true, Philemon, our autumnal storms
Disrobe our trees, and strip their quiv'ring forms:
'Tis true, our liveliest beauties are but short,
Short as the joys which recommend your court:
But these new charms, in following springs obtain,
While those, once set, shall never rise again,
In vain your plays allure; all there, that's fine,
Does faintly to our artless beauties shine.
Their scenes as grossly imitate our groves,
As their lewd actors our soft past'ral loves.
Frequent their comedies to please the town,
Descend to borrow, hence, some wit-grac'd clown.
The park, their folly's larger stage charms less;
An ill-mix'd scene of noise, grimace, and dress!
The court, 'tis true, shines out with tempting
state;
For ruin, angling there, to catch the great,
Hides the hook, wisely, with attractive bait!
The joy which wine can give, like smoky fires,
Obscure their sight whose fancy it inspires.
Thus, like old Sodom's fruit, that seat of sin,
Your pleasures, fair without, are worms and dust within.

Philemon.

Affist me, sacred sisters! aid my voice,
And guide lost Damon to a nobler choice!
The crowds of rustics, who to town repair,
And quit, for vulgar hopes, their native air,
Are gross-form'd vapours heavily exhal'd,
Where profit's sunny influence has prevail'd;
But those alone, my friend, are beams for me
Which draw such limpid innocence as thee!
What pleasures reap you from the unprun'd field,
Which cities cannot more completely yield?
If, to some peace-blest cot we would retire,
An hour's short journey crowns the soft desire:
There, strait we taste the sweets so prais'd by you,
And then return to those you never knew!
Ev'n heav'n approves not solitude, else why
Did his great will direct society?
Why did the ancients else to towns repair,
And quit, for houses, tents and open air?
Would the great Hebrew favourite of Heav'n,
To whom both pow'r and wisdom's charms were giv'n,
Would he on Sion's hills have fix'd his seat,
Had rural pleasures been, in truth, most sweet?

Damon.

While here the rosy-fronted morning's light
Shines o'er the hills, and charms the distant sight;
While heav'n's gay choristers in clouds arise,
And, with harmonious warblings, shake the skies;
While we our mirth with moderation crown,
And shun th' excesses of the dangerous town.
Why would Philemon, unadvis'd, obtrude
On us the unfeelt woes of solitude?
What though the Hebrew, whom you well call
great,
Made Sion, for her temple's sake, his seat?
What knowledge did his city life impart?
But that 'twas empty all, and vanity of heart!

Cowley, that shining bard, had try'd and known
The whole heap'd pleasure of your boasted town;
And, finding all its beauties false and base,
Retir'd, and ever after loath'd the place.
Great Dioclesian, when he reach'd the height
Of human glory, shook off cumb'rous state,
Wak'd into man, and shun'd th' alluring bait.
To rural peace, his search he next address'd,
And there his crown despising choice was blest.

Philemon.

Immortal Cowley's tuneful verse I own,
Spoke pow'rful arguments against the town;
So Æsop's fox in vain exerts his pow'r,
And then, like Cowley, cries—the grapes are sow'r,
Had court indulgence smil'd as he desir'd,
He never had to rural shades retir'd.
Your Dioclesian, from plebeian birth,
Rais'd to the rule of a dependant earth,
Stagger'd, with giddy steps, beneath the weight,
And, trembling at his danger, cast his state:
But, if examples can thy genius fire,
And move the rusty springs of dead desire;
Behold great Plato, whose acknowledg'd fame
Has, from his worth, immortaliz'd his name:
Big with town hopes to Dionysius fly,
And to ambition tune philosophy.
Far-fam'd Charibdis threaten'd him in vain,
Nor Scylla's terrors fright him back again.
Sicilian grandeur, like the golden fleece,
Drew all the men of excellence from Greece;
Pythagoras to town invites his friends,
And Socrates our city life defends.
But, lest you should the pow'r of truth deny,
And, in a cause so bad, unmov'd reply;
Know, though assembled nature's sweets combin'd,
And art the country's honour had design'd,
Their joint endeavours would allure in vain,
While heav'n-sought Anna does with us remain:
For as those parts where Phœbus fullest shines,
Though rough and wild, are stor'd with silver mines, [lands
Whose wealth, attractive, draws from lovelier
Advent'rous thousands to those barren strands:
So, though the city no delights possess,
Did Anna choose it for a place of rest,
Millions would hurry thither and be blest.

Damon.

Farewell, ye once belov'd, retir'd abodes!
Ye murmur'ing springs! and unfrequented woods!
Farewell, ye winged choirs that warble there,
And fill with melody the fluid air!
Ye soft amusements which indulge and please,
And life's bent springs relax with blissful ease!
Farewell, ye rural sports, the eager chase,
The mountain falcon, and the nimble race!
Philemon calls, the charming swain invites,
And wakes my drowsy soul to new delights.
Impregnated with fire, from his bright lines
My mind unfreezes, and my bosom shines.
We not to all our country pleasures owe
Such soft delights as in thy numbers flow.
Less bright the rosy blushes of the morn
Than those ideas which thy thoughts adorn.
Not tuneful Philomel, so musical,
Nor murmur'ing springs, with sweeter accents, fall!

The god of oracles inspires thy songs,
And all is truth which to that god belongs.
Let others then th' unequal strife maintain,
And, with Philemon's muse contend in vain:
I yield; and in his conquest take more pride,
Than if I'd conquer'd all the swains beside.
Farewell, ye once belov'd, retir'd abodes,
I'll to Augusta now, the darling of the gods!

Philemon.

Welcome, dear Damon! in a high degree;
Welcome, sweet swain! to London and to me.
To love the late shun'd field I now begin,
For, yielding thus, you more than conquest win.
Such tender warmth in thy soft soul I see,
That I could dwell in woods, to dwell with thee.
Secure of thee, I may with ease defy
Th' attempt of any future enemy.
Abandon'd nymphs will now forsake the plains,
And dew-drench'd valleys weep departed swains:
Envy shall leave the lonesome cottage free,
For wit and virtue both must follow thee.

A DIALOGUE

BETWEEN DAMON AND PHILEMON.

Concerning the preference of Riches to Poverty.

Damon.

ACCURSED gold! till thou begot'st offence,
All nature smil'd with artless innocence.
Men's days slid smoothly on in soft delights,
Nor fear'd they villains to disturb their nights:
No blooming virgins then were basely sold,
Slaves to the sordid tyranny of gold! [press'd,
But swains, with honest hearts, kind truths ex-
And nymphs, unblushing, their felt flames confess'd:
Astræa then, with unstain'd glory reign'd;
The judge's ear, by brib'ry yet ungain'd.
No avarice, with her foul train, was known,
But his was theirs, and ours was no man's own.
War had not yet, with stains of blood and rage,
Her mangled offspring brought upon the stage;
But all beneath the peaceful olive sat,
Fill'd and delighted with their blissful state.
But when thy birth, O gold! disturb'd the world,
Nature was into swift confusion hurl'd:
Her charms were lost, and her all-pleasing forms
O'erwhelm'd by tempests, or disguis'd by storms:
Noise and destruction, with gigantic strides,
And all their horrid children at their sides,
March'd round the frighted globe in search of thee,
And plow'd up murder, shame, and perjury!
Philemon then th' inglorious chase refrain,
Nor waste thy life in search of sordid gain.

Philemon.

Gold! thou gay quintessence of earth refin'd;
Which heav'n, to balance struggling pow'r, de-
sign'd.
Till thy decisive weight depress'd the scale,
Contenders did alternately prevail.
Now, reign'd as lord, some chance-ascending
swain;
Another conquers him, yet wins in vain;
A third dethrones 'em both, nor can his pow'r maintain.
Each would be chief, but all unhelpt by thee,
Stick in the mire of mean equality.

Gold first the famish'd mouth of learning fed,
And drew the curtain which dark ign'rance spread.
No lab'ring industry alarm'd the day,
For there was no reward such toil to pay.
None to the search of knowledge would aspire,
Since wit's increase could raise their wealth no higher.

Supine stupidity forbade all strife,
And sleep refresh'd not, but imprison'd life.
But, since thy worth, O gold! was greatly known,
Arts have sprung thick, and hope is wider grown.
Men, blest with thee, the murmur'ing world command,

And tread down discord in each rebel land:
In hopes of thee, the stupid aim to think,
And sin's broad eye, for profit, learns to wink.
The sea's vast depth, for thee, we boldly sound,
And sleep, undreading, upon hostile ground.
For thee, the hind with plenty-spreading hand,
Lifts lazy nature from his sluggish land:
Thou, gold! can'st melt the frosty-breasted fair,
And dry damp sorrows, and soul-drenching care:
In short, by gold alone we happy live;
O Damon! joys are goods which only gold can give.

Damon.

Thus does the glitt'ring fiend debauch our wills,
And smiles to see us stroke his sting-hid ills:
Base dirt! the fools who are enslav'd by thee,
Slaves to a slave confess themselves to be.
'Tis true thou art the origin and source,
Whence pow'r first rose, and which maintains her
course:
But, what is power, which wealth, not justice gives?
How ill-distinguish'd such a sov'reign lives.
Could men but read the Gallic monarch's breast,
And trace swift tumults through his broken rest,
How would they curse his shadow-circled state,
And laugh at envy, which maligns the great.
Sometimes, O shame! the fair thy pow'r adore,
And feign to love, where they disdain'd before.
But, ah! the tempters who this charm have try'd,
Gain'd not the woman, but the woman's pride.
Can then Philemon, whose alluring strains,
Lov'd by the nymphs, and envy'd by the swains,
Might reconcile antipathies, and move
The cruel hearts of savages to love.
Can he esteem that baneful ore divine?
Or kneel dishonour'd at blind fortune's shrine?
No—rather in her lowliest form, describe
That stain affixing foe to virtue's snow-wash'd tribe.

Philemon.

Damon, I love thee, and thy welfare seek;
Thence lend my truth the liberty to speak:
Just as I wish, my friendship would advise,
And have thee rich and mighty, as thou'rt wise:
Thy keen-wrought edge of satire cuts too deep,
Not always ills we from wealth's harvest reap.
Gold is the gift of heav'n; and heav'n is wise,
And knows the worth of virtue's far-wish'd prize.
The starts which shake the Gallic monarch's breast,
Those night-born tumults which distract his rest,
Spring not from gold, my Damon, but from pride,
Which swell'd ambition with too high a tide.

X z ij

Had he been pleas'd with glories gain'd before,
 Fate had not dash'd his hopes in search of more :
 Though gold the engine of man's fortune is,
 The pilot wisdom must direct the bliss :
 Calm moderation ought to measure choice,
 And high-flown wishes stoop at reason's voice.
 The sun, which at such distance paints the year,
 Would scorch it, Damon, if it came too near.
 You may, with ease, o'er shining millions reign,
 And never be a slave to flowing gain.
 But he whose birth directing stars decree,
 That he shall wear out life in poverty,
 Let him be cast in nature's choicest mould,
 And lord of every gift of heav'n but gold ;
 While that alone he wants, to crown the rest,
 Not all his other charms can make him blest.

Damon.

Philemon's lines do gold so far outshine,
 So far more radiant, dazzling, and divine,
 That ev'n the praise he gives it serves to show,
 What more to wisdom than to wealth we owe !
 But oh ! 'tis false that gold can give us friends,
 Flattery and friendship have wide-diff'ring ends :
 They who crowd round us while our hopes look

gay,

Will in the dusk of fortune shrink away.
 Timon, the brave ! the gen'rous ! and the great !
 Timon, the wise ! but wise, alas ! too late !
 Who dragg'd of wealth's proud dross a mighty load,
 And shed his blessings round him like a god !
 Timon who heal'd the woes of half mankind !
 What curs'd returns did wretched Timon find !
 Content is bliss, I'll with Philemon hold ;
 But that was never purchas'd yet by gold ;
 Our affluence but serves to spur desire,
 And dang'rous flights attain'd but tempt us higher.

Philemon.

Oh ! let me triumph in a golden fate !
 If I am rich I can be wisely great.
 With nice-tim'd aids can fainting worth assist,
 And make the wretched happy when I list :
 But if on fortune's barren strands I lie,
 My fruitless pity shall unpity'd die !
 You tell me, Damon, friends are bought and sold,
 And that assistance comes and goes with gold.
 If help in life affords the greatest bliss,
 Sure, that which buys that help the greatest comfort is.

Damon.

All your strong arguments no proof produce,
 Of gold's intrinsic value but its use !
 Your generous soul your friends would entertain,
 And general bliss with wide-spread aids maintain,
 Call forth dim virtue on the world to shine !
 'Tis great ! 'tis wond'rous great ! 'tis all divine !
 But still, Philemon, this sublime delight,
 Springs not from gold's access, but from its flight !
 You praise the use, yet cannot bear the sight. }
 Should villains aid me some worse foe to kill,
 I'd love the act, but hate the villain still ;
 I'd prize a truth sent in the devil's name,
 But still abhor that devil from whom it came.
 So gold, pernicious in its nature, may
 By souls like your's be bent a nobler way :
 Thus, as the needle, by magnetic force
 Once touch'd, still to the magnet guides its course.

Trembling, while wand'ring thence, and finds no rest,

'Till clasp'd and fasten'd to its darling breast.
 So though our thoughts on diff'rent points design,

Meeting at last we in one centre join, [thine.
 And in the union lose the terms of mine and

Philemon.

I praise, dear swain, the use of gold, 'tis true ;
 But use includes intrinsic value too ;
 Whence but from use does estimation rise ?
 And ev'ry thing is worth what ev'ry thing supplies.
 'Tis true, a diamond cannot keep out cold,
 Nor can we eat or drink our heaps of gold ;
 Yet blest'd with either, Damon, we can buy
 What neither in their nature can supply.
 And since for wealth the joys of life are sold,
 There's an intrinsic value sure in gold.
 I hold with Damon gold should be a slave,
 I treat as such the moderate sums I have.
 And as kind fortune shall increase my store,
 I'll make a slave of that and ten times more.
 Yet gold possesses every healing pow'r ;
 Not love alone falls in a golden show'r.
 Gold makes men wise as well as gives 'em rule ;
 For who e'er knew a wealthy man a fool ?
 Ev'n in the shades below the rich were blest,
 And born by Charon to the fields of rest.
 While the poor beggar, shiv'ring on the shore,
 Wanting his penny, found no passage o'er.
 So poverty with shame to death was hurl'd,
 And drew down scandal to the other world.
 But since, my Damon, whom the muses bless,
 Affects not gold and bids me love it less,
 I'll listen to his sweet bewitching voice,
 And guide my soul to meet him in his choice.
 Since then, nor you nor I can happy be,
 You with much gold, nor I with poverty,
 Let's bend our search to find some freer fate,
 And crown our wishes in the middle state.

TO A LADY,

Desiring to know what Love was like.

Love is a treacherous heat, a smothering spark,
 Blown up by children's breath who shun the dark.
 At first, the fire is innocently bright,
 Glows gently gay and scatters warm delight :
 But left neglected and unquench'd too long,
 The nourish'd flame grows terrible and strong ;
 Till blazing fierce, it spreads on every side,
 And burns its kindler with ungrateful pride.

PLAIN TRUTH.

CHLOE, you talk with joy of Celia's face,
 Admire her wit, and ape her fancy'd grace ;
 The praise you give is sure sincere respect,
 Your practice proves what airs your thoughts affect.
 But since you know that friendship should be free,
 Give her this hint, and say—it came from me.
 A face like her's, if manag'd well, might please,
 But no charm strikes that is not arm'd with ease.
 Striving too eagerly, she strives in vain ;
 These studied airs put beauty to the strain :

Would she wound sure and conquer with a grace,
Tell her, the careless runner wins the race.

CELINDA IN THE SNOW.

CELINDA riding in a snowy day,
The wind-driv'n flakes about her hov'ring flew,
Some to her tempting bosom made their way,
And melting, chill'd her beauties through and through.

Some aiming with less art her clothes beset,
And froze to little buttons as they fell;
Others, which could not such fair quarters get,
Flew by unblest and miss'd the shiv'ring belle.

Quite tir'd at last, and freezing as she rode,
Her ivory teeth all chattering in her head;
Was ever such a day? she cry'd, good God!
If it much longer snows I shall be dead.

Madam, said I, 'tis true, your lovely breast
Is far more us'd to give than suffer pain;
Yet of this accident to make the best,
'Tis better I should preach than you complain.

All nature's works in some degree alike,
Confess the wisdom of their Maker's will,
And bear hid meanings man's dark mind to strike
With mystic hints that try comparing skill.

Thus some with envy fill'd, envenom'd look, [see;
And gnaw themselves when happier men they
Some can success in others gladly brook,
Though they, perhaps, steep'd o'er in misery be.
Others, again, by outward winds unshook,
All chances but their own indifferent see.

So, my Celinda, 'tis with the sharp snow,
Those feath'ry flakes have each a sev'ral aim;
The envy-act'd see your bosom glow,
And rush, malicious, to assault the flame.

But shock'd to find themselves, when nested there,
So far exceeded in their boasted white;
With melting grief their humbled pride they bear,
And weep themselves to death to shun the light.

Others, of this white tribe that see and know,
With rev'rence shun that bliss-warm breast of thine,

But strive t' adorn thy dress with some new show,
And froze to glitt'ring gems about thee shine.

A third sort, unattracted ev'n by thee;
And cold indeed such snow we ought to call;
With dull indiff'rence all thy charms can see,
And, disregardful, round thee scattering fall.

Celinda list'ning, answer'd with a smile,
You poets keep your fancies always warm;
Could but this inward heat the frost beguile,
We need not stop at yonder smoky farm.

TO CELINDA,

In Excuse for looking on her at Church.

If fix'd on your's my eyes in pray'r you see,
You must not call my zeal idolatry;
For since our Maker's throne is plac'd so high,
That only in his works the God we spy:

And what's most bright, most gives him to our
view,
I look most near him when I look on you.

GOOD-FRIDAY.

Am I awake? or is my soul misled,
Through the bold tracks of mem'ry's mazy deep,
The empty realms of mimic sleep,
Horrors by wild imagination bred,
Skim shadowy, and about me circling spread,
Oh! who can tell the cause of these new fears?
Whence these loud groans which tortur'd fancy hears?

Whence this loud thund'ring in my ears?
Why seems the starting sun to hold back day?
Why does he leap at once out of his fire-pav'd way?
And half-extinguish'd upward fly,
To shroud his beams behind a sabbled sky? [hurl'd?
Why every way at once are these swift lightnings
Trembling nations to amaze,
And terribly adorn with quiv'ring blaze,
The horrors of a shade-benighted world?

Why breaks yon rising ocean o'er the lands?
Disdainful of its old appointed bounds: [lands,
Why does it open far behind its brine-delighted
And leaving dry its roomy bed,
Let loose at once, high lift its frightful head,
To seek forbidden grounds?

And hugely swelling from afar, with earth-assaulting roar, [the kingdoms o'er.
Rise o'er the swallow'd mountain tops, and sweep
Why does this circle-spreading earthquake swell,
Deep-flowing like a subterraneous tide?

Frighted fancy, canst thou tell,
Why this strong foe, assum'd, his face should hide?
'Tis not sure for want of pride,
He shakes down cities with his mildest shocks;
Plows in the hill he rolls beneath, and harrows up
the rocks!

Unseen, he dreadful does appear;
The marble-hearted mountains quake for fear:
And as they find the danger drawing near,
With huge unwieldy terror leap aside,
And, shook with agues, cast their snowy pride.

The dead themselves, by nature's charter blest,
With promis'd beds of lasting rest,
Are from their graves, their dark long houses thrown up and dispos'd.

See the pale ghosts of our forefathers rise!

Horribly serene they glide,
And snuff, with shadowy nostrils, scents of day,
Which fled so lately, all at once, away.

See how to earth they bend their beamless eyes,
And seem to wander, guideless, every way,
Unwilling through our hated world to stray,
In search of the forgotten graves where once their bodies lay.

Too conscious soul! I feel it now:
Well may the stubborn pride of nature bow.

Well may trembling nations moan,
And mem'ry, sick with consternation, groan,
God, who to man his ev'ry blessing gives,
From whom, ungrateful, he receiv'd his breath:

That God, by whom alone man lives,
That very God, this day, by man met death.

THE DISPARITY,

FROM A HINT OF SIR HENRY WOTTON.

Ye starry sparks, on which, by night, we gaze,
That meanly satisfy our distant eyes,
More by your number than your blaze,
Ye common people of the skies :
What are ye when the sun shall rise ?
Ye warbling rangers of the groves,
That sweetly strain your little throats :
And, perch'd on boughs, to sing your loves,
Charm the still forest with your notes ;
Who will admire your tuneful lays,
When Philomel her voice shall raise ?
Ye violets that in early spring appear,
And, cloth'd in purple, wait upon the sun,
Adorning earth's damp face, with blooming cheer,
And making ev'ry verdant bank your own,
What are ye when the rose is blown ?
So, when my charmer shall be seen,
Gaz'd on, and wonder'd at by all,
Beauty must own her rightful queen,
And ev'ry fair usurpers fall :
For she was sure by heav'n design'd,
Th' eclipse and glory of her kind.

BELINDA'S GRAVE.

HERE, woe-mark'd spot ! once dear Belinda lay ;
Here her cold bosom mix'd with colder clay ;
And here, despairing and afflicted I
Planted this tree, which now makes haste to die :
While this lov'd cypress a sad shelter made,
Oft would I lose myself beneath its shade ;
Guide, with a painful pleasure, each dear shoot,
And water with my tears the rich-fed root.
Sigh through the boughs, like some moist April
breeze,
And the grasp'd trunk in am'rous rapture squeeze.
And when some warbling songster, nested there,
Belinda's voice, methought, shook soft the air !
The murmur'ing branches, bending from the wind,
Breath'd a cool comfort o'er my love-shook mind.
Thus, seven long years, I learnt to hear and see
My lost Belinda, in her funeral tree.
But, mad at last, and all impatient grown,
To make my fruitless passion still more known :
Fatally fond, I put a cruel mark,
And carv'd my name upon the shrinking bark.
Wretch that I was ! the tree, from that curs'd day,
In sad resentment, pin'd itself away !
And that new life, which dead Belinda gave,
Wither'd with pain, crept downward to her grave.

THE ROYAL SEPULCHRE.

Is this the boastful pride of mortal state ?
Is it for this we covet to be great ?
What short-liv'd bliss from envy'd grandeur
springs,
When these poor relics once were mighty kings !
O frail uncertainty of earthly pow'r !
Where graves can majesty itself devour !

How naked now does royalty appear !
Alas, how vast, how sad a change is here !
Tell me, dumb dust, how wide was thy command ?
Where's now the sceptre that once fill'd this hand ?
Where are those brawny guards which aw'd thy state ? [wait ?
Where the gay crowds which once were proud to
Can narrow limits, dark like these, contain
The chang'd extent of thy contracted reign ?
Canst thou, at whose least frown a nation shook,
And, trembling, watch'd the light'nings of thy look :
Canst thou, at last grown humble, be content
To let bold search profane thy monument ?
And common men, grown rude and wanton too,
Thus poise your dusty bones, and wonder at the view.

MAY-DAY.

WELCOME, dear dawn of summer's rising sway,
Fair fav'rite of the year ! soul-soft'ning May !
Late I have learnt, by love's sweet queen inspir'd,
Why, from my youth, this day my bosom fir'd ;
'Twas for her birth that blooming nature sprung,
'Twas in her notes the sky's soft rangers sung.
The breeze blew soft, to sigh her soul's sweet
frame,
And the boughs bent in homage to her name.
Thick shot the meads, to paint her fruitful mind,
And flow'rs, that roll'd her breath, enrich'd the
wind ;
For her the sun wak'd out to bless our isle,
And lighted up half heav'n to paint her smile.
Oh ! we are lovers all ! our Celia reigns,
And the warm'd world is sick with my sweet
pains.

MOSES'S SONG OF THANKSGIVING,

On the overthrow of Pharaoh in the Red Sea,

FROM EXODUS, CHAP. XV.

The first Part only.

TEMPLES and altars let us raise,
Ours, and our father's God, provokes our praise.
God is our strength, God is our theme :
Where is Egypt's fall'n esteem ?
Pharaoh wakes from his proud dream ;
Wakes to feel a warrior's hand.
Lord of a pow'r more vast than his, that shakes
his wond'ring land !
Vainly the following foes our God defy'd,
Their rapid wheels in vain tore up the strand ;
In vain they mock'd the waving wand ;
Not all their noise could the loud sea withstand ;
The wat'ry world flow'd fearless o'er their pride,
A drowning army beat th' involving tide.
On wave-wash'd chariots, half sustain'd, the trembling captains ride.
Up-lifted hoofs paw'd loose the liquid way,
And round 'em, black'ning through the foam, the floating legions lay.
Down, down, th' ungrounded footsteps go ;
Strain'd to feel for sands below,
Sands where wat'ry mountains flow !

Sinking, like rocks, they clog the deep with prey,
High-cov'ring rose the briny flood, and swept their rage away.

Saving God! thy hand was here:
Thou protecting, who can fear?
Threat'ning aloud, the thund'ring legions rose,
And at thy chosen shock th' extended spear:
Behind, amaz'd, we saw th' o'ertaking foes,
Hearts anticipating blows.
But while thy blast, O base despair! blew keen,
Safely from heav'n shot down between!
Dreadful, in wrath, thy lifted arm but shone,
And all th' unnumber'd thousands melt away:
O'er stubbly fields, so wind-driv'n fire rolls on,
And sweeps the blazing breadth with crackly sway.
Th' Almighty's voice but spoke a loud command,
And strait th' unlinking surges backward rise.
High climbing waves in quiv'ring mountains stand,
And hang their billowy horrors in the skies.
In murmur'ing cleft th' obedient deep yawns wide,
And shad'wy glooms lour dark from either side.
Down through the horrid vale's moist concave led,
Safe and dry bold Israel tread;
Gay, 'twixt terrors, round her spread,
Her tearful eye now smil'd once more and hail'd her guardian God.

Hark! aloft the wond'ring foe!
Look! they cry'd, all pointing low,
Shall the cowards 'scape us so;
'Twixt the dividing waves they go!
Their forc'er cleaves the sea with magic skill:
Haste, prevent, o'ertake and kill.
They hear, they march—they dare the mad command;
The shouting squares invade the cover'd strand;
Chariots, impell'd on fiery wheels, gore wide th' incumber'd sand.
Mix'd horse and foot, in bann'ry pomp descend;
See, from each horn th' inclining length'ners bend,
Loose slides the weeping ooze to shun their weight,
And the deep murmur'ing mourns th' unusual state.
Hark! the bursting thunder speaks!
Waves your wat'ry ranks disband!
Oh! behold how vain, how weak
Strength that dares its God withstand!
Down at once from either hand,
Hoarse sounding hills, o'er hills let loose, devour
the vanish'd sand!
Helpless, ingulf'd, th' immersing squadrons roll:
Pharaoh, proud-sinking, drinks down brine that chills his fiery soul.
Mix'd on th' involving surge, a-while they strive,
Then, like sunk plumbets, to the bottom dive.
Of all the gods, no god like ours is found!
Join heav'n and earth, applause like his let men and angels sound.

DAVID'S ELEGY

For the Death of Saul and Jonathan.

2 KINGS, CHAP. I.

O ISRAEL! how does all thy beauty fade!
How are the mighty fall'n, the strong betray'd!
Ne'er may this woe in Gath's full streets be told;
Never let Ascalon our fate unfold.

Mountains of Gilboa! may ye drink no dew;
Let rain's mourn'd want turn red the verdant hue;
Let your vines wither, and your olives die,
And your parch'd fields no grainy wealth supply;
For there, abandon'd Saul, brave monarch, bled,
As if no awful oil had hemm'd his head.

Never in vain drew Jonathan his bow;
Never Saul's sword fell frustrate on a foe:
Lovely and loving, one dear life they led,
Nor parted dying, but together bled.
Swifter than eagles, to the fight they flew,
Stronger than lions, they could foes pursue.

Daughters of Israel! weep the loss of Saul:
In scarlet and in gold he cloth'd you all:
Peaceful, beneath his warlike shade, you smil'd;
And triumph'd, by their toil, whose hosts he spoil'd.

Thee, Jonathan, my brother! thee I mourn;
With grief still growing must thy loss be borne.
Soft and delightful partner of my soul:
Two halves divided made us one dear whole.
Vast was thy love, and wonderful to me;
And never woman lov'd as I lov'd thee.

TO A LADY,

ON CALLING ME JEALOUS.

He whose whole treasure one dear vessel bears,
Through seas on which destructive pirates
swarm,
Must be excus'd a thousand fears and cares,
And bend his soul to ev'ry strong alarm.
Ill do they love, and feel thee at their heart,
Who seem unmov'd, while others hope thee
theirs;
My kindling bosom burns with open smart,
For my proud soul her unveil'd meaning wears.
Nice as thy own, and all refin'd as thine,
My tow'ring passion climbs with gen'rous flame;
But, shrinking from neglect, in sad decline,
Burns downward, and forgoes a frustrate aim.
Tender as infant sighs, in slumb'ring ease,
My soft'ning soul admits and owns thy sway:
'Tis my life's sweetest care thy taste to please,
And in thy sunshine melt my griefs away.
Woes are too weak to wound me through thy smiles; [me;
The pole's fix'd frost were warm as heav'n to
I tread down malice through her mazy wiles,
And triumph over all things charming thee.
What task so dang'rous, or what toil so vast,
Would not thy love inspire me to defy:
Soul'd with immortal fire my flame must last,
And I should conquer worlds beneath thy eye.
O that my struggling thoughts which heave within,
Could borrow but a voice and speak my soul;
Then would this heart thy grateful passions win,
Till—oh, vast empire! I should claim the whole.
Yet as it is indulge my trembling fear,
And give thy lover's counsel leave to speak:
Fools are all false, nor long can hold thee dear,
For soon they find whatever they know to seek.

Boastful, ungenerous, vain, and grossly mean
 On all thy charms they only feed their sense;
 Thou art by them but as mere woman seen,
 Blind to thy heav'n of inward excellence.
 Sudden the wretches' smoky flames expire;
 Such earthy fuel must of course decay;
 But I, while adoration lifts desire,
 Light up a love that ne'er can burn away.

ALONE IN AN INN AT SOUTHAMPTON.

April. 25. 1737.

TWENTY lost years have stol'n their hours away,
 Since in this inn, ev'n in this room, I lay:
 How chang'd! what then, rapture, fire, and air,
 Seems now sad silence all and blank despair!
 Is it that youth paints every view too bright,
 And, life advancing, fancy fades her light?
 Ah, no!—nor yet is day so far declin'd,
 Nor can time's creeping coldness reach the mind.

'Tis that I miss th' inspirer of that youth;
 Her, whose soft smile was love, whose soul was truth.

Her, from whose pain I never wish'd relief,
 And for whose pleasure I could smile at grief.
 Prospects that view'd with her inspir'd before,
 Now seen without her can delight no more.
 Death snatch'd my joys, by cutting off her share,
 But left her griefs to multiply my care.

Pensive and cold this room in each chang'd part
 I view, and, shock'd from ev'ry object, start: [day,
 There hung the watch, that beating hours from Told its sweet owner's lessening life away.
 There her dear diamond taught the sash my name;
 'Tis gone! frail image of love, life, and fame.
 That glass, she dress'd at, keeps her form no more;
 Not one dear footstep tunes th' unconscious floor,
 There sat she—yet those chairs no sense retain,
 And busy recollection smarts in vain.
 Sullen and dim, what faded scenes are here!
 I wonder, and retract a starting tear,
 Gaze in attentive doubt—with anguish swell,
 And o'er and o'er on each weigh'd object dwell.
 Then to the window rush, gay views invite,
 And tempt idea to permit delight.
 But unimpressive, all in sorrow drown'd,
 One void forgetful desert glooms around.

Oh life!—deceitful lure of lost desires!
 How short thy period, yet how fierce thy fires!
 Scarce can a passion start (we change so fast),
 Ere new lights strike us, and the old are past.
 Schemes following schemes, so long life's taste explore,

That e'er we learn to live, we live no more.
 Who then can think—yet sigh, to part with breath?
 Or shun the healing hand of friendly death?
 Guilt, penitence, and wrongs, and pain, and strife,
 Form the whole heap'd amount, thou flatterer,
 life!

Is it for this, that toss'd 'twixt hope and fear,
 Peace, by new shipwrecks, numbers each new year?
 Oh take me, death! indulge desir'd repose,
 And draw thy silent curtain round my woes.

Yet hold—one tender pang revokes that pray'r,
 Still there remains one claim to tax my care.

Gone though she is, she left her soul behind,
 In four dear transcripts of her copy'd mind.
 They chain me down to life, new task supply,
 And leave me not at leisure yet to die!
 Busied for them I yet forego release,
 And teach my wearied heart to wait for peace.
 But when their day breaks broad, I welcome night,
 Smile at discharge from care, and shut out light.

THE SHIPWRECK.

'Twas on the day whose un auspicious fate,
 With dismal news alarm'd Britannia's state;
 And in our admiral's shipwreck let us see,
 That courage cannot stem mortality!
 The sea's grim sov'reign in a calmer place,
 Unbent the wrinkly terrors of his face:
 Where, stretch'd at ease, the wanton monarch lay,
 And, hemm'd with nereids, laugh'd the hours
 away;

Soft knots of uniform'd coral swell'd his bed,
 And oozy samphire crown'd his bushy head.
 A watchful guard the best arm'd fishes keep,
 And wind-rock'd billows lull'd their lord to sleep.
 While thus he lay, thick-gathering shouts were heard

From ev'ry part the scaly nation steer'd;
 With sudden force the swelling sea ran high,
 And moving mountains swept the darken'd sky.
 Disturb'd, the monarch rais'd his wond'ring head,
 And started, doubtful, from his briny bed:
 Angry, his awful trident thrice he shook,
 And swift possession of his chariot took:
 Fix'd in the stately seat, he drives, he raves!
 The frightened steeds divide the foamy waves;
 And plunging fiercely through retorted tides,
 Dash the drops both ways from their panting sides.

Soon he arriv'd, where shoals on shoals amaz'd,
 In gath'ring swarm, as on some wonder, gaz'd:
 Triumphant tumult spoke unusual joys,
 And growing numbers swell'd the savage noise.
 The god advanc'd; and, as he nearer drew,
 The shooting fishes fled his awful view!
 He came; and curious what the cause could be,
 That had at once alarm'd th' assembled sea!
 He saw—and, starting back, declin'd his head,
 The well-known Clou'sly, Britain's admiral,
 dead!

Stretch'd on the sands, the wave-swol'n warrior lay,
 To death's wide jaws an unexpected prey!
 Swift he descends, o'erjoy'd at what he found,
 And rais'd the body from th' unwilling ground;
 Invok'd the soul to re-inform his breast:

The late ejected spirit, greatly blest,
 Return'd, and joyful its own seat possess'd;
 The waking hero felt a strange surprise,
 And starting, open'd wide his sea-wash'd eyes:
 Look'd round, with curious horror all amaz'd,
 While thus the god bespoke him as he gaz'd.

Illustrious rival of my wat'ry throne!
 Welcome to regions more than half your own.
 Long have my seas been practis'd to your sway;
 Scarce would my doubtful slaves my laws obey,
 Unknowing, till surpris'd, they saw you die,
 Who was most god of oceans, you or I!

Live now confess'd, from this propitious hour,
Imperial partner of divided pow'r. [pride,

Grateful, the chief bow'd low, unmov'd with
And to the gen'rous offer thus reply'd:
You tempt me with a pow'r I would not lose,
Had I my queen's consent that pow'r to use,
She bid me rule the seas to my last breath,
But gave me no commission after death.

THE FRENCH PROPHETS.

PROPHECY, no—'tis luxury of soul!
No cataracts down religion's rivers roll! [clear,
Her streams, though deep, are ever smooth and
And from their bottoms all things plain appear.
On superstition's sea these vessels ride,
Foul with the dashings of her muddy tide.
What marks, what tokens, can they boast from heav'n?

Knowledge is still with inspiration giv'n!
While these the dusky paths of ignorance tread,
And impudently prophecy for bread!
With counterfeited shocks of soul they swell,
And in forc'd sweats, convulsive falsehoods tell.
To heights like this religion would not fly;
Ev'n zeal grows madness, when 'tis screw'd too
high.

Now law, methinks, most wholesomely severe,
Might truth's fair garden from this rubbish clear;
Which long despis'd, may strike too vig'rous root,
And into groves of godly error shoot!
'Twere easy, now, to sweep loose weeds away,
Which may destroy the flow'rs by short delay.

So, in the bottom of some goodly plain,
Flows a small rill, increas'd by casual rain;
Near which, with careful steps, and sounding hands,
Some cautious clown with needless terror stands;
Loth to attempt a nimble passage o'er,
While still the swelling stream increases more;
Till faint essays protracting time in vain,
The rising river drowns the cover'd plain.
Then staggr'ing with affright he gazes round,
And forc'd to pass at last mistakes his ground:
Till deeply wading toward the wide miss'd shore,
The current sweeps him, and he's seen no more.

CELIA TO AMINTOR.

SINCE God, whom we continually offend,
Is still so merciful, that he forgives,
Man sure a pitying ear may justly lend,
When woman penitent in sorrow lives.

The mournful dove, when absent from her mate,
Sits brooding melancholy all alone;
Pines and bemoans her separated state,
And all the groves can ne'er the loss atone.

So I, depriv'd of all I hold most dear,
My much-mourn'd lover, and my tend'rest
friend,

Hear reason whisper in my conscious ear,
That only your blest sight my grief can end.

Sure, if I see you not before I sleep,
A second Niobe I shall become;
Fly then, Amintor, give my woe relief;
Rather than vex you, I'll be always dumb.

AMINTOR'S ANSWER.

If you too frequently provoke your God,
That God, who merciful, forgives you still,
You must expect at last to feel his rod;
His rod, the fittest scourge of head-strong will.

But I, long vers'd in women's winding ways,
Unmov'd with patient phlegm their follies see;
And, like men tir'd with dirty wint'ry days, [be.
Would wish 'twere spring, but know it cannot

No longer then in spite of nature pine;
Those tiny eyes can spare no room for tears;
Your wand'ring dove has snatch'd the first glad sign,
And with the peaceful olive-branch appears.

For should your tuneful clack be stricken dumb,
More wonders would arise than you have shown;
Not Celia only statue would become,
But all th' astonish'd town would turn to stone.

TO MIRANDA, AFTER MARRIAGE;

WITH MR. LOCK'S TREATISE ON EDUCATION.

SINCE every day with new delight I see
These lively little images of thee,
I would their tender minds to virtue bow,
And have 'em never less belov'd than now.
Take then, thou gentle partner of my care,
A glass, to show thee what these infants are:
By this just light direct their opening way,
Lest road-met folly lead their steps astray: [owe,
First, teach 'em what to heav'n's high throne they Then—whence on earth the wise man's comforts
flow:

Teach 'em, while fortune smiles to use her right,
And nobly scorn her when she takes her flight.
The rare-sound charms of friendship let 'em know,
And learn, that love's soft dress is lin'd with woe.
Form with progressive care the wid'ning mind,
And, growing, bid 'em leave the world behind:
Till having learn'd whate'er becomes the free,
You lastly teach 'em, how to charm like thee.

EPITAPH

ON A YOUNG LADY, WHO DIED UNMARRIED.

RIPE in virtue, green in years,
Here a matchless maid lies low:
None could read, and spare their tears,
Did they but her sweetness know.

Humbly wise, and meekly good,
No earthly lover's arms she blest;
But full of grace, her Saviour woo'd,
And hides her blushes in his breast.

AUGUSTA'S COMPLAINT TO HER THAMES.

NEAR the soft solitudes of Hampton's plain,
Where the moist banks perpetual spring maintain;
The gentle Thames has form'd a deep'ning bay,
Where sportful streams in wanton whirlpools play.
In this sweet place the clouds no terrors wear;
Here no bold tempests discompose the air;

No ruffling billows here assault the shore,
Nor wint'ry floods with swell'd ambition roar;
But all, serene and calm, is form'd to please,
And the smooth stream reflects the bord'ring trees;

Hither no winds, but zephyrous breaths repair,
Soft as the sighs of love-sick virgins are!
Here safety reigns, and on the silent brink,
Cud-chewing cattle watch their fleeting drink:
While fishes, conscious of no foes to shun,
Turn up their scaly noses to the sun. [bred,

Here, sick with grief, which Anna's absence
Augusta's genius hid her mournful head;
And, with low accents, speaking inward pains,
Thus to the gliding river she complains:
When gentle stream to shun the briny tide,
Anon thy sea-met waves shall backward glide;
Then, gentle stream be kind, one moment stay,
And, on thy surface, bear my sighs away;
Tell the great mistress of this happy isle,
Augusta, stript of joy, forgets to smile. [state,

What though yon tow'ring spires have ris'n in
The city's genius feels an humbler fate.
Shou'd art and nature toil to make me fair,
Cou'd I taste glory, and my queen not there?
But, oh! too fondly I to thee complain;
Thou know'st, unkindly know'st, 'tis all in vain!
Thy streams their eye-bewitching pleasures join,
To raise thy Windsor's state to ruin mine!
Windsor has other boasts, but help'd by thee,
Grows proudly charming and out-rivals me.
But turn sweet current! bid thy waters stray,
And guide their mazy bends some other way.
Strip the gay cottage of its boastful pride,
Nor longer through th' imperious prospect glide.
So to thy care this glory shall remain,
T' have given Augusta back her queen again.

Grave Thamesis thrice shook his dripping head,
And slowly rising from his oozy bed, [ran,
While the hush'd stream with awful smoothness
He to the mournful genius thus began:

Yon queen of cities ought to learn content;
Her gratitude shou'd these complaints prevent.
Have I not rais'd her to an envy'd state?
Is she not rich, licentious, pow'rful, great?
And would she thus make every bliss her own?
And must our Anna live for her alone.
Do not yon sun-beams with unwearied race,
Whelm their enliv'ning light from place to place?
Why, then, must Britain's glory cease to move,
And bless her world with her divided love?
Go, go, retire! your tears with pain I see,
And this complaint renew'd shall dang'rous be!
He said, and gliding from her presence went,
And sad Augusta strove, but could not be content.

TO THE UNKNOWN AUTHOR

Of the beautiful new Piece, called Pamela.

BLEST be thy pow'rful pen, whoe'er thou art,
Thou skill'd great moulder of the master'd heart!
Where hast thou lain conceal'd? or why thought
At this dire period to unveil thy wit? [fit,
O! late befriended isle! had this broad blaze,
With earlier beamings bless'd our fathers days,

The pilot radiance pointing out the source,
Whence public wealth derives its vital course;
Each timely draught some healing pow'r had shown,

Ere general gangreen blacken'd to the bone.
But fest'ring now, beyond all sense of pain,
'Tis hopeless, and the helper's hand is vain.
Sweet Pamela! forever blooming maid!
Thou dear enliv'ning (yet immortal) shade!
Why are thy virtues scatter'd to the wind?
Why are thy beauties flash'd upon the blind?
What though thy flutt'ring sex might learn from
thee,

That merit forms a rank above degree?
That pride, too conscious, falls from ev'ry claim,
While humble sweetness climbs beyond its aim.
What though religion, smiling from thy eyes,
Shows her plain pow'r, and charms without disguise?

What though thy warmly-pleasing moral scheme,
Gives livelier rapture than the loose can dream?
What though thou build'st by thy persuasive life,
Maid, child, friend, mistress, mother, neighbour,
wife?

Though taste like thine each void of time can fill,
Unfunk by spleen, unquicken'd by quadrille?
What though 'tis thine, to bless the lengthen'd hour,

Give permanence to joy, and use to pow'r?
Lend late-felt blushes to the vain and smart,
And squeeze cramp'd pity from the miser's heart?
What though 'tis thine, to hush the marriage
breeze,

Teach liberty to tire, and chains to please?
Thine though from stiffness to divest restraint,
And to the charmer reconcile the saint.
Though smiles and tears obey thy moving skill,
And passion's ruffled empire waits thy will.
Though thine the fancy'd fields of flow'ry wit,
Thine art's whole pow'r in nature's language writ.

Thine to convey strong thought with modest ease,
And, copying converse, teach its style to please;
Though thine each virtue that a God could lend;
Thine every help that every heart can mend:
'Tis thine in vain, thou wak'st a dying land,
And lift'st departed hope with fruitless hand.
Death has no cure—thou hast mistim'd thy aim:
Rome had her Goths—and all beyond was shame.

ON CORINNA'S FIRST ATTEMPT IN POETRY.

WITH eyes unbrib'd, by your enchanting view,
I trac'd impartial your soft numbers through.
Your loose-dress'd fancy in each sparkling line,
Gilds the gay current of your deep design.
Your poem, strongly fine, and softly bold,
Is silkworm's labour spun with threads of gold.
Go on, bright maid! nor doubt the world's ap-
plause;

Wit arm'd with looks, like yours the critic awes.
Though years may knit and lengthen your success,
Think not your youth will your due praise op-
press:

Ev'n the broad sun, when first his glories rise,
With struggling tincture, streaks the eastern
skies;
But soon, through heav'n's enlighten'd orbs, the conquering lustre flies.

THE VALENTINE.

WHY, be it so! it matters not what name
You river bears, since still it flows the same.
Whate'er I call you, this I'm sure I feel,
No name can speak of you with half my zeal.
In vain, love's meaning, this or that we call,
The comprehensive lover takes in all!
Yet since to custom's bent we all incline,
You shall, to please you, be my valentine.
And since my charming trisler asks a gift,
The mystic value of this present list.
Accept these gloves, and if they worthless seem,
Learn, thus, what pleas they bring for your esteem.

Their spotless white preferr'd their choice to me,
As the best emblem of your chastity.
Their smoothness may almost the honour win,
To represent the velvet of your skin. [find,
Their suppleness, which join'd with strength, you
Is the just fabric of your well mix'd mind.
The kid, that wore 'em, had some faint pretence,
To be the type of your sweet innocence.
How then can I a fitter present choose?
Or you these emblematic gloves refuse.
One stronger reason, too, my fear has found;
Women, they say, oft slight the breast they wound.
And when dark absence shades us from their view,
They look not after us, but seek out new.
To shun this fate these gloves your lover sends,
That you may have him at your fingers ends.

THE REVENGE.

HIGH on the summit of a craggy rock,
Whose harden'd sides resist the billows shock;
Whose cliffy brow, mens eyes with horror view,
O'erlooking, proudly, land and ocean too:
There stands a roomy cave by nature made,
To knit, in just embraces, light and shade:
Its spacious mouth the sun's up-rising greets,
Admits his lustre, but repels his heats!
No glaring gold on this rough portal shines,
But creeping ivy round its entrance twines.
Wall-flow'rs, wild thyme, and juniper grow there,
And with their odorous influence feed the air.
Surrounding groves, at distance, graceful rise,
Shades for the little songsters of the skies.
And near the cave, a torrent gushing o'er,
Dashes the sea beneath with tributary roar.

Stretch'd on a bed of fresh-blown roses here,
Serene the region, and the prospect clear,
Rests, when grown weary by her summer toil,
The wakeful genius of our happy isle.
Hence, her unbounded sight can trace the shore,
And look high-posted the proud-ocean o'er.
And hence, while hostile winds grow hoarse in vain, [main.
Guide safe her wide-watch'd Britons 'cross the
'Twas here of late, on an ill-fated day,
The awful nymph, o'ercharg'd with business, lay;

Now swelling winds deficient sails to fill;
Now soft'ning tempests with reductive skill,
Now with wide blessings looks she through the isle,
And calls forth harvests with a fruitful smile.
Then t'wards Augusta's spires she loves to lean,
And guide stray'd comforts to Augusta's queen.
But, whether tir'd with her long line of care,
Or lull'd to rest by the unacted air,
A rising languor o'er her senses creeps,
And in a fatal hour the guardian sleeps.

Now was the time! the prompted Gallic foe
Call'd out to strike a chance-invited blow,
With shameful odds, in strength advanc'd to meet,
Th' unfearing convoys of a British fleet!
With deadly shock th' unequal squadrons join,
And death-wing'd fires fly swift from either line.
In jetty pomp black terrors force their way,
And sulph'rous smoke puts out the eye of day.

Just in the thunder of the growing fight,
The waking genius started at the sight!
In sad surprise she rolls her sparkling eyes,
Springs from her couch, and to the ocean flies!
Arriv'd, incumbent on the ruffled air,
She sees rude globes the floating forest tear:
Her sons o'ermatch'd, like men untaught to yield,
Scud, unresolv'd, about the watry field:
The spacious seas with scatter'd vessels charg'd,
To double length the breaking line enlarg'd.
Averse to fly, nor deaf to safety's call,
They hang, like scatt'ring clouds, about to fall.
But while the foe, encourag'd at his view,
Pressing triumphant on, would dare pursue;
Again united they the fight restore,
Again dart vengeance fiercer than before:
Again the big-mouth'd cannon rends the sky,
And the unconquer'd sufferers rush to die.

Thus, while the hunted panther spent with fight,
Looks round distressed, and meditates a flight;
If then prevented, he with sudden roar
Turns back, and dyes the field with hostile gore;
Disdaining life upon the spears he flies,
And heap'd on piles of victims proudly dies.
All this the trembling nymph with grief beheld;
At length her care the victor's force repell'd;
Then wastes no time the ruin'd to deplore,
But guides the rich remainder safe to shore:
Thence to the cave with threat'ning transport flew,
Revolving what her hop'd revenge should do!
There, while depress'd with melancholy thought,
Her working fancy diff'rent projects taught,
From heav'n's bright orb a youth divinely fair,
With wings extended, cleav'd th' enlighten'd air;
Just at the mourning charmer's feet he stay'd,
Look'd lovely on her, bow'd him low, and said:

Mourn not this little loss, nor blame thy fate;
Decreed revenge shall on thy wishes wait:
Look up, bright maid! read Ramilies writ there,
And pay thyself large int'rest for this care!
He said: and strait his wings their plumies advance,
And bear him glitt'ring through the wild expanse;
The ravish'd nymph beholds his starry flight,
And fill'd with promis'd glory blest the sight.

JOISTLING IN SNOWY WEATHER.

FORGIVE me, Chloris! nor my rudeness blame;
Strange as it is, this frost has bred a flame!

Driv'n from your breast, I glow with new desire;
 And melt like straggling snow that falls on fire.
 Had you been black you might have shunn'd this
 blow;
 For diff'rent colours would each other show;
 But, oh! you're fair, and cold, and soft, and every way like snow.

LIBERIA WATCH'D AT MIDNIGHT.

As from a window in the wane of night,
 With starry views I feasted wand'ring sight,
 I saw Liberia watch the rising day,
 Whose lustre was to light her friend away!
 That friend whose kindred passion serv'd to prove
 The promis'd ardour of her brother's love!
 That brother's love, which though it meets regard,
 Remains uncrown'd with the yet-hop'd reward!
 As in some overcast and dismal day,
 We start to see the sun at once break way;
 So, at that hour, to see such charms advance,
 When ghosts are said to rise, and fairies dance!
 With more than usual pleasure fill'd my sight,
 And mix'd some wonder with much more delight!
 While arm in arm they trac'd the garden walk,
 The love-hush'd air hung list'ning to their talk,
 The dancing breeze which had till then been gay,
 At their appearance sigh'd and dy'd away.
 As they drew near the moon more strongly shone,
 To view their brightness, not to boast her own.
 A gen'ral stillness seem'd to soothe their cares,
 And nature's face grew sad, to suit with theirs:
 Shrill-barking Mopsy smother'd her own joys,
 Fearing to drown her mistress' charming voice:
 Liberia spoke, but seem'd to speak in vain,
 As if unable to describe her pain!
 When grief is true, no words its force can paint;
 A silent sorrow far outspeaks complaint!
 A thousand leaves the destin'd sisters took;
 A thousand unspoke meanings fill'd each look:
 Oft they gaz'd upward to the dawning sky,
 And curs'd th' expected hour for drawing nigh:
 If now, thought I, some gentle zephyr blew,
 Thus should it whisper as it round her flew:
 Think, since your pitying soul does absence hate,
 Absence from you must sharper pangs create!
 Think, if to lose the sister gives you woes;
 What losing you the brother undergoes!
 Who every night from your lov'd presence sent,
 Does long repeated absences lament!
 And if this parting does yourself displease,
 Be taught by sympathy to give him ease.

TO LORD GEORGE GRAHAM;

On his Action near Ostend, on the 24th of June 1745.

'Twas finely tim'd! third Edward's brightest days
 Had from such captains claim'd increase of praise,
 But now, 'tis tenfold greatness thus to rise,
 Where sense of vict'ry, lost in purse-craft lies!
 Where war but pilfers, and but bags contest;
 And public honour is the public jest.
 At such a time, to dare the sneerer's joke;
 To rush on danger when but foes provoke;
 Unbrib'd by profit's impulse, fight for bays,
 And court no premium but his country's praise,

'Tis prodigy! 'tis out of nature's road;
 'Tis scorn of prudence, and offence to mode.

Shake, Dunkirk! and retract thy bold extent,
 Doom'd to due dust, stands each proud battlement:
 Swell high, propitious surge, hide Tournay's stains,
 And wash off insult, from our cow'rd campaigns.
 Lookup, ye sea-driv'n ghosts! whom pleas'd Toulon
 Saw sink in fruitless fight, forgot too soon!
 O'er the salt wave triumphant thunders hear,
 Hail the wish'd vengeance that at last draws near!
 While France starts wide, and wonders whence it
 came,

Pale to her trembling genius point a Graham!
 Tell her, 'tis his to feel his country's fire,
 Hold her past fame in view to urge it higher:
 Tell her, reawaking glory waits his call,
 To pour atonement o'er the pride of Gaul;
 Reclaim asserted ocean's question'd sway,
 And teach the doubtful nations to obey.

Say, pitying Heav'n, that sav'st a blund'ring state,
 Whom hast thou late inspir'd to lend us weight?
 Blow, ye broad winds, expand his op'ning light,
 Tell us, whence rose he? Do his country right;
 Born on thy bleaks, Albania! nurse of kings!
 From gen'rous stock this gen'rous scion springs.
 Son of thy soul, Montrose! There, known, too well!
 Prop of a crown when three lost kingdoms fell!
 Far be the omen from thy filial fire,
 In every wreath but death's transcend thy fire,
 Far from thy great forefather's suff'rings rais'd,
 For more than all his virtues lov'd and prais'd;
 Down through time's tide transmit his length'ning
 fame:

O born above his fate to lift his name.

Oh, Mallet this was he—sweet heav'n-fac'd boy!
 Thy friend congratulates thy conscious joy:
 Pride of thy care, thou led'st his earliest youth,
 To court plain glory, white as robeless truth;
 To scorn dark lifts, which men distinction call,
 And climb, self-sinew'd—or not rise at all.
 Courage by nature his—thou taught'st him taste,
 And innate warmth with polish'd brightness grac'd.
 Breath'd o'er his list'ning heart reflection's breeze,
 Gave him desire to know, with pow'r to please:
 Thine, half the triumphs of his rising fame!
 And Britain's future flag shall bless thy name.

IN A BLANK LEAF OF A BOOK

SENT TO MIRANDA.

Go, happy book,—

Who, void of life, art from life's cares so free,
 Thou canst before my lovely charmer lie,
 Unscorch'd by all the lightnings of her eye.
 'Midst her inspiring touch thou canst remain,
 Tasteless of pleasure, and secure from pain:
 While absent beauty breaks thy author's rest,
 And hope and fear by turns distract his breast.
 My angel mistress must henceforth be thine,
 And I devote thy offerings to her shrine:
 On varied themes divert her wand'ring eye,
 As o'er thy honour'd leaves her glances fly:
 But when her thoughts on softer subjects rove,
 And lead her where thy pages talk of love;
 Oh! then, so mindful of thy author be,
 To bid her in a whisper think on me.

THE PROGRESS OF WIT;

A CAVEAT.

TUNEFUL Alexis, on the Thames' fair side,
The ladies play-thing and the muses pride;
With merit popular, with wit polite,
Easy though vain; and elegant though light:
Desiring, and deserving others praise,
Poorly accepts a fame he ne'er repays;
Unborn to cherish, sneakingly approves,
And wants the soul to spread the worth he loves.
This to the juniors of his tribe gave pain,
For mean minds praise but to be prais'd again;
Henceforth renouncing an ungracious Baal,
His altars smoke not, and their off'rings fail:
The heat his scorn had rais'd, his pride inflam'd;
Till what they worship'd first they next defam'd;
Depos'd at length, from Pindus' top he roll'd,
While insect witlings pleas'd, his fall behold,
And each cold-croaking Heliconian frog
Leaps scornful, and bestrides th' unreigning log.

Far-fall'n Alexis, who so ill aspir'd,
Sick of successful war, from wounds retir'd,
Where, while in sleep, his sorrows ebb'd away,
And hush'd in darkness, indignation lay;
Fancy, fair mistress of the poet's mind,
For ever changing, yet for ever kind;
Soft o'er his dreams her formful radiance shed,
And his rapt soul through heav'n's thin purlicus
led;

Seated beside the star-invading dame, [flame.
Whose steeds, wind-footed, paw'd the lambent
High as a widow'd lover's grief can climb,
Her air-built chariot rose, and hung sublime.

Unveiling, thence, the world's bleak wastes below,

They saw the stream of life beneath 'em flow;
Dim from the fable sea of birth it rose,
In a slow, silent, sullen, dread repose:
For, round th' emerging source that glimmer'd pale,

Mountains of midnight darkness roll'd a veil:
But, as the evolving surge swell'd into day,
Quick'ning it mov'd, and roar'd, and rush'd away.

Broad on the left from low oblivion's shore,
Quickfands and rocks reach'd half the current o'er:
Lucid, like truth, the treach'rous water shone,
And o'er gay gilded shoals ran tuneful on;
Pebbles of gem-like hue, with painted pride,
Glow'd through the wave, and burnt amid the tide;
Wantonly kind, the sun's enliv'ning beams
Shower'd in light spangles on the dancing streams,
While insect nations, gnats, and wasps, and flies,
Ting'd in the rainbow's ever-changing dyes,
Sheathing their stings, and smiling like the fair,
Peopled the sunshine, and adorn'd the air.

Less lively, on the right the streams deep flow,
There no false colours mix'd their varied glow;
No gawdy bottom catch'd the downcast eye:
Above no flutt'ring insect wing'd the sky:
Serenely solemn all—One equal whole
Flash'd not upon the sense, but touch'd the soul:
Instead of rocks green islands flourish'd here,
Silent and fruitful as the full-grown year;

In place of flies, grave swans of snow-like hue,
Sweetly majestic in flow circles flew;
But though these isles the distant prospect cheer'd,
No bay, no port, no landing-place appear'd;
Kind birds alone gave entrance o'er the mound,
Nor from the stream below was inlet found.

Then fancy thus—Fame's future regions these,
Where nothing surfeits, yet where all things please;
Here memory stands fix'd while time runs on,
And worth blooms fresh when life itself is gone;
Danger keeps distance, soften'd spleen grows kind,
Ambition temperate, and love refin'd:
Nor pride nor jealousy can here annoy,
Nothing is ecstasy, though all is joy:
Peace without languor, labour void of pain,
Glory unenvied, and unslander'd gain.

Though diff'ring thus the streams unsocial sides,
Yet one broad gulf absorb'd the double tides;
From birth devolving, death's blind sea below,
Boundless, and formless, snatch'd the mingled flow;
Both rounding oceans backward seem'd to tend,
And vast beneath their fable surges blend:
But far more frightful this!—whose dark pro-
found,

A depth eternal! life wants line to found:
Unbottom'd shade roll'd loose, o'er swallowed
light—

Fancy grew giddy, nor sustain'd the sight:
But starting into fear, transpos'd remark,
And sought the source less dreadful, though as dark.

Thick on the rising stream's emitted tide,
Millions of shapeless bodies seem'd to glide;
Whose breathing bulks to life and motion blown,
Shot into human forms completely grown;
Mix'd rank and sex sprung through the liquid jet,
But pouring outward, clear distinction met;
Some wading naked, trode the slipp'ry plain,
Some cut the fluent wave—some tir'd with pain,
Failing to float, or wade, neglected fell,
And sunk un snatch'd at in the troubled swell:
To others, rising happier and serene,
Fortune, dark bustling pow'r, obscurely seen,
Reach'd with blind bounty, and with hasty hand,
Thin boats—and buoy'd 'em o'er the shining sand:
Of diff'rent form these boats—a single oar Distinguish'd some—some wing'd their sides with
more:

Others, with oars and sails conjoin'd, made way,
And mow'd the murmur'ing surge with sweepy
sway:

While some slow pole-men, o'er their toil reclin'd,
Push'd their check'd barks, and lab'ring, lagg'd behind.

While some essay'd to cross, and veering wide,
Would with strong stem the stubborn stream
divide,

And slowly slanting, fought the silent side;
Swift to the shelvy shore light gallies flew,
As the fierce channel's rapid current drew,
'Twixt rocks, and whirlpools, driv'n obliquely gay,
And through the shoaly sunshine danc'd away.

Caught by a gulfy void that gloom'd below,
These from the current's fair descending flow,
In-drawn at once by darkness swallow'd o'er,
Sunk from their sunny scene and rose no more:

Still gap'd th' unclosing deep, o'er millions gone,
Yet still insatiate, hourly swallow'd on !
Titles, distinctions, forms, rush mingled down,
Not levity itself wants weight to drown ;
Gamesters, beaux, casuists, jinglers, jesters, drinkers,
Fox-hunters, politicians, and free-thinkers,
Prudes, devotees, coquets, grave, light, young, old,
In one mix'd night, the covering waves infold :
Swept from the noise they sought, to rest they shun'd,

They plunge for ever into death's profound ;
While abler pilots, who resolv'd, stood o'er,
And edging broad, gain'd slow the safer shore :
Snatch'd from their sinking seats, were borne to land,

By watchful swans, whose wings the surface fann'd :
There, on green islands reign'd, escap'd from cares,
Lords of a blooming world, for ever theirs.

Wide o'er the scene, Alexis winds his eye,
Swift as the progress of the gliders by ;
A strange confusion rose---of all who past,
With earnest emptiness and barren haste,
Few cross the flood, repugnant strove to steer,
Fewer had strength of oars to hold them near !
Tir'd by the current's ill-resisted force,
Or bulg'd by envious prows which cross'd their
course,

The boldest keels, pursuing, or pursu'd,
Entangling and perplex'd, were lost in feud :
While others, heedless of their sleeping oars,
Drove in light negligence, nor shun'd the shores ;
But pendant o'er the helm each shoal explor'd,
And snatch'd in transport, shells and stones on board :

Or leaping wanton, catch'd the glittering prey,
That buzz'd and gambol'd in their sportive way.

Mean while, most mournful of the motley scene,
O'erish'd effect of pride, and food of spleen !
Boat over boat destructive passage made,
And weeping pity mourn'd defective aid :
Sailing presumers, pressing proudly on,
Bore down each envied rower who nearest shone,
The oar-wing'd vessel eye'd, with dumb disdain,
The creeping pole-man's slow-availing pain,
And lordly wanton, with invasive beak,
Sunk the faint struggler, criminally weak !
He too, in concert with superior hate,
Loth to exert less guilt than match'd his state,
Triumphant, in his turn, sought equal prey,
And, o'er the naked wader forc'd his way.

Alexis pondering in suspended thought,
What meaning all these mazy mixtures taught,
Sudden a shout, from every distant side,
Eddied the air, and broke the back'ning tide ;
Acclamatory thousands rose alarm'd,
All eyes attracted, and each hearing charm'd ;
Pointing in transport, all their helms forsook,
And on one object hung their length'ning look.

Down from the gloomy source in side-long float,
Proudly descending, mov'd a glitt'ring boat :
Her silken sails a colour'd radiance threw,
And ting'd the sunny beams through which they
flew ;

While oars of silver dash'd the wat'ry spray,
That rain'd in gemmy show'rs, and dazzled day :

High on the painted stern a youth appear'd,
Who rather happily than strongly steer'd ;
Faint and unstriking was his anguish'd mien,
Sadden'd by sickness, and o'ercast with spleen ;
Yet, from his eyes, there beam'd a living light,
Keen and intent as a fir'd eagle's sight :
And from his voice, (for as he sail'd he sung)
Such magic sounds of melting music sprung,
That the hush'd heav'n all downward seem'd to bend,

And, against nature, the charm'd earth ascend.

Careless he look'd, yet heedful of his way,
Broke the kind current's unobstructing sway,
That kiss'd his oars, and hasten'd to obey :
Scarce was his course oblique, for each glad boat,
That envious stem'd all other's rival float,
Fix'd and enchanted, when this youth drew nigh,
Hung on his passing notes, and help'd him by :
The muses row'd him, and the graces care
Trim'd his light sails, and spread them to the air ;
In his boat's bottom, green-ey'd envy lay,
And serv'd as ballast, while she clogg'd his way ;
Down from her chariot, light-wing'd fancy flew,
And o'er him, loose, her starry mantle threw ;
Pleasure, praise, beauty, 'twixt his shrouds trod
gay,

And danc'd the measur'd moments soft away ;
Sportful as zephyrs, in his smiles they strove,
And the young loves forsook their mother's grove.

Thus fortunate, thus favour'd, and thus bright,
Luckily negligent, and aptly light ;
He touch'd no shoal, safe rounded every rock,
Despis'd all danger, and sustain'd no shock ;
Till to that calmer coast approaching nigh,
And gliding 'twixt green islands safely high,
Circles of hov'ring swans with joyful note,
Clapp'd their broad wings in triumph o'er his boat,
Charm'd, that so soon, he reach'd their solemn side,
Ere yet one third of the stream's length was try'd.

Steering from isle to isle, with joyless awe,
Thim o'er each height, their white rob'd lords he saw,

Pleas'd, without transport, how the palms they bore,
To hail his passage near their silent shore :
Cold and uncharm'd, he sought his fav'rite crowd,
Immensely distant now, though late so loud :
All was serene, the air was hush'd around,
The waters calm !—Lost ev'n his music's sound !
Back to the life, impatient looks he cast,
And long'd for ev'ry shining insect past ;
Distant he saw them, wings o'er wings display,
And in light chafes thread the colour'd ray :
Eager for these, contending pilots strove,
And catch'd them, careless how their vessels drove ;
Then with their trophies dress'd each gaudy sail,
While humming drones, in swarms, their fortune
hail ;

Record past leaps, foretell their next essays,
And buz, melodious, in the fly-men's praise.

Warm'd and misled, by this false fire of fame,
His beaming eyes with emulation flame ;
And have I, recreant, thus renounc'd a field,
Where baffled danger can such glory yield ?
Lives there a catch-fly of yon vent'rous preys,
More brave than I am ? or, who fears them less ?

Show me the warring wasp, whose threat'ning wing

I dare not strike at, and provoke his sting!
Swans give me way! your shoreless islands keep,
Too safe your clime is, and too calm your deep;
I choose a rapid glory, not a flow,
Shoals are sought harbours, where these jewels grow.

He said, and rising, push'd with liquid sweep
Th' inverted helm, and goar'd the groaning deep:
Flaming erect, re-fought the surgy side,
And bounded, threat'ning, o'er the foaming tide;
Sailing athwart the swarms, and skipping high,
He snatch'd, triumphant, every tempting fly:
Gave his loose rudder to the current's claim,
And drove, disdainful, through his rival's game;
Press'd by invaded wasps excited stings,
He warr'd, revengeful, on the falling wings:
'Through dust of slaughter'd gnats, he fought in shade,

[made;

And squeez'd them, deathful, on the wounds they Fleets of cold opposites from all sides join,
And wedg'd against this general foe combine;
Vainly indignant they resist his sway,
Yet block his passage and obstruct his way:
Still though he stagnates he the fight maintains,
While drones, applaudive, with their ductile strains,
Homage the rising hero's new renown.
And prince of fly-catchers the champion crown.

The swans, mean while, which from the calmer side,

Forfaken, saw him trust the fatal tide;
Mournful, with pendent wing, his triumph griev'd,
And wish'd his wasted vigour less deceiv'd:
Trembling they mark'd his vessel downward bent,
Hang o'er th' engulfing oceans's dark descent,
While he, regardless still, new trophies won,
And bent to conquer, saw not what to shun.

Fancy still busied, still enamour'd, staid,
And still concurring, lent his rashness aid;
To her far distant, touch'd Alexis cry'd,
And with strain'd voice, to reach her notice try'd:
"O! save him, warn him, bid him turn and think,
"Let not his bark in yon black ocean sink!
"Teach me to call him by his pow'rful name,
"Point out his danger, quench his devious flame;
"Rash spleen of heart, that could such war advise!

"Blind rage! to lose himself and catch but flies!
"Oh teach my tongue his name:"—Then fancy heard,

And smiling, at her chariot's side appear'd:

"Why dost thou ask, she cry'd, what nations know,

"Even all whom wit or worth inspire below?

"His is a name that dwells on ev'ry mind,

"Tunes every tongue, and sails with every wind!

"Not surer is that river life's extent,

"Or by those oceans birth, and death,

"Not surer fortune, is that dark pow'r's name,

"That left oblivion, and that right side fame.

"Than that, no son of wit dares justly hope,

"Fame dwell in folly's paths, but thou, O POPE!

Alexis starting, heard his own lov'd name,

Felt his pride shrink, and blush'd with conscious shame!

Pitch'd from the chariot, lost to fancy's call,
And had not waiting judgment broke the fall,
Contempt's cold vale had caught him wak'd and stunn'd,
And deep intomb'd him in his own profound.

THE ART OF ACTING.

DEDICATED TO THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD.

Why sleep the silent pow'rs that guard the stage,
While yawning opiates lull the tasteless age?
Shall trite cold themes catch fire from wit's essays,
Yet, hov'ring chillness damp theatric blaze?

Mourn it, ye sons of spleen, whose hands (mis-taught)

Tore up this seed of sense, this plant of thought:
Whence reasoning shoots might bloom life's garden o'er,

And weedy wildness choke her walks no more.—
Horror (at alien woes) by genius mov'd,
To sense of home-felt bliss, be there improv'd:
Wits ent'ring hand dissect sedition's breast,
Show the malignant springs and call forth rest.

There the touch'd heart, in secret silence chid,
Might learn to hate the guilt it once but hid:
There, scorn from note of pity's praise—catch grace,

Start and pause conscious—in pride's slack'ning race.

There heedless beauty, warn'd of man's false fire,
Might chain down wav'ring love, and edge desire:
Each maid's mild eye correct her heart's warm trust,

Dull perts grow pensive, and false thinkers just.
There (now) sits mummery, thron'd on passion's urn!

There noisier fires than wit's (unbright'ning) burn:
There vice with laughter shares divided rule,
And only serious purpose marks the fool!

Vain the lost pray'r that courts a muse's aid,
By foes untasted, and by friends betray'd:
Patrons immers'd 'twixt faction's rapid tides!
Poets in flattery's, pow'r absorb'd in pride's!
Gone is the learned leisure once rever'd,
And the still voice of genius sighs unheard.

Happier lerne! mourn our drains no more;
Richly reveng'd, thou drain'st a nobler store.
Poor in our turn, see wit's lost channel dry,
Robb'd of her fountain—for thy full supply.

Yet, while home ruin wrings the heart distress,
'Tis recompence to fall for others blest:
Less thy doom'd distance (soul of absent joys)
Pains the shook realm, whose hope it half destroys;
Conscious thou go'st to warm one sister's fears
To transports, lasting as the others tears.

Long in sad silence on the willows hung,
Now she resumes her harp, for praise new strung:
Tires her tun'd hand to pour her grateful soul,
Wide as her chief can charm, from pole to pole.
Genius, from ages hers, 'midst want and wrongs,
How will she now transcend past poets songs!
At once of every nations grace made free,
By every added muse, bestow'd with thee!
There, 'midst the toils of empire's manag'd weight,
Law's lights extended, and embellish'd state;

Find a calm hour to lend the stage thy care,
And times unborn shall feel a Stanhope there.

Dark'ning mean while, our muse's lamps expire,
Blank is their prospect, and unfann'd their fire:
Friendless, neglected, laugh'd at, and unfelt,
No now-crown'd conq'rour cares where Homer dwelt.

Banish'd from court, from senate, city, scene,
Wit's sons, all tongue-tied! mute, even Harlequin!

Yet, let the thinker scorn such dumb suspense,
Nor (flattering custom) sneak his aid from sense:
Wing'd for the future o'er the present rise,
Spurn the times cloud, and strike benigner skies.
Not always shall ambition's muddied brain
Work to persuade—yet hold example vain!
Bribe to each further'd interest's venal cue,
Yet dream diversion all the stage's view.

The time shall come (indulge it soon flow fate!)
When power shall taste that wit can think with weight:

The time shall come (not far the destin'd day)
When soul-touch'd actors shall do more than play:
When passion, flaming from the asserted stage,
Shall to taught greatness fire a feeling age:
Tides of strong sentiment sublimely roll,
Deep'ning the dry disgraces of the soul:
Pity, fear, sorrow, wash'd from folly's foam,
Knock at man's breast, and find his heart at home.
Then plaintful grief shall drop her whiney drawl,
And heart-felt anger nerve the insensate bawl;
Then shall the moving art old powers possess;
Wake valour, call forth joys, and stamp distress.
Then shall the player take pains in pleasure's right,
Sweat for his praise, and labour to delight:
Then shall he thank the hand (in death long cold)
That fir'd his languor, and his fame foretold.

Tasteful ev'n now, there want not some choice few [view:
Whose hope-warm'd hearts can hail the distant
Hearts that the subject's lov'd importance know,
And feel the fire they bear with conscious glow.

Why was the actor stain'd by law's decree?
Lost time's recoverer! truth's awak'ner be!
Passion's refiner! life's shoal coast survey'd—
The wise man's pleaser, and the good man's aid.
Precept and practice in one teacher join'd,
Bodied resemblance of the copied mind!
Nature confirms, art dignifies his claim,
And only cant's low crawl defiles his name.

If but by comprehension we possess,
And every greater circles hold the less,
No rank's high claim can make the player's small,
Since, acting each, he comprehends them all.

Off to due distance half ye stalking train!
Blots of a title your low tastes profane!
No dull cold moulder shares the actor's plea,
Rightly to seem is transiently to be.

How shall this goal be reach'd, that, seen most nigh,
Still glides more distant from th' advancing eye?
Like the sky's sea-dipt arch, heaven's fancied
bound,

For ever sail'd to, and yet never found.
How shall trac'd practice hit th' untrodden way,
Where life is travell'd out, in arts to stray?

Arduous the task, and asks a climbing brain,
A head for judgment, and a heart for pain,
E'er sense, impress'd, reflects adopted forms,
And changeful nature shakes with borrow'd storms;
E'er ductile genius turns as passions wind,
And bends to fancy's curve the pliant mind.

Mark when th' expanding seed from earth's moist bed,

Starting at nature's call, prepares to spread; [cend
First, the prone root breaks downward, thence as-
Shot stems, whose joints collateral boughs extend:
Twigs from those boughs lend leaves—each leaf contains

Side-less'ning stalks, transvers'd by fibry veins.
So, from injected thought, shoots passion's growth;
No sprout spontaneous, no chance child of sloth:
Idea lends it root—firm on touch'd minds,
Fancy (swift planter!) first th' impression binds;
Shap'd in conception's mould, nature's prompt skill
Bids subject nerves obey th' inspiring will:
Strung to obsequious bend the musc'ly frame
Stamps the shown image. Pleasure, pity, shame,
Anger, grief, terror, catch the adaptive spring,
While the eye darts it, and the accents ring.

See art's short path!—'tis easy to be found,
Winding delightful through the mazy round!
Tempt the try'd skill, to no sole proof confin'd;
Shift the short shadowings o'er your figur'd mind.

Mournful, recal some friend's lamented fate;
Sad on each feature hangs the mind's felt weight.
Seek you strong sense of joy? looks first impart,
Then the nerve stricture bounds it from the heart:
Does rage inflame? no visage can conceal
What the mark'd muscle bids the spirit feel:
Still as the nerves constrain the looks obey,
And what the look enjoins the nerves display:
Mutual their aid, reciprocal their strain,
Will but commanding, face and nerves explain.
Light'ning and thunder, so concurring, strike;
One their joint origin, though form'd unlike:
So to the look th' attentive nerves reply,
As from the flash succeeding thunders fly.

'Tis cause and consequence; nor flows more grace
From beauty's smile than the touch'd actor's face:
Poise the rule's practice; turn it o'er and o'er;
Nor think it tedious, though conceiv'd before:
'Tis but to look and will. Th' imprinted eye
Moves the struck muscles, and the limbs comply:
Gesture is meaning's ape—grave, furious, gay,
Changeful as cloud-form'd shapes when winds
make way;

Imag'd conception first, but face inflames,
Then the mein paints it, and the tone proclaims.

Is there who doubts an art thus briefly shown?
Call out proof's pow'r, and make that art his own:
Bid him, with mournful brow, swell sounds of joy,
Half the mock'd sense th' unbracing nerves destroy:

Tun'd to the tearful ey's retentive woe,
Rapture's check'd phrase shall quench its fiery
glow:

Painfully plaintful, each flat note shall die,
And his look's anguish give his words the lie.
Next while soft smiles restrain his voic'd essay,
Bid angry sounds give rage its thund'ring way;

Vainly mouth'd menace swells th' attempted storm,
Kind as consent th' unfright'ning accents form :
While his look frown'd not, sense could sound but sweet ;

No nerve concurring help'd th' unfinew'd heat.
But had his eyes th' impatient fire display'd,
Each note had snatch'd it, and each stop convey'd :
Thus one plain practice paints whole nature right,
And all her changeful pictures move delight.

Is there who loves not joy?—There then begin,
Search the soul-pleasing passion's pow'r within ;
Find your smile's force before some faithful glass,
Heedful to let no faint impression pass : [train,
There to touch'd gladness thought-form'd features
'Till each crisp'd fibre feels th' enrapt'ring strain ;
Then (stretch'd) behold your op'ning forehead
Back'ning in boastful sense of sparkling eyes. [rise,
Broadly majestic your breast expands,
Brac'd your press'd joints—neck, knee, feet, shoulders, hands,

Treading on air, each step new soul displays,
Your limbs all lighten, and your looks all blaze :
Then speak,—joy answers ; every sound its own ;
Music and rapture mix'd in transport's tone !

Fall from this height (ah ! 'tis but fortune's road !)

Down to deep sense of sorrow's pungent goad ;
Damp your loose feature's into thought's distress,
Fade fancy's gloss to dim-ey'd wretchedness :
The sad look sick'ning, straight the spirits break,
Unbending nerves grief's lax impression take :
Faint hangs the clouded eye, short steps drag slow,
And every heedless gesture bends with woe :
Now to the heart-touch'd sense the voice com-
plains,

And sighing pityers catch th' infectious pains.

Say, should some slack'ner of the passion's care,
Form'd for gay flights, and struggling from despair,

Bow'd from his native bent to doubt's new part,
Find fear's cold cast assign'd a fearless heart ?
What could he do ? where house th' intrusive
guest ?

Let his eye lodge him—'twill prepare his breast.
From the soul's optic shoots th' admitted shape,
Nor let one tim'rous wavering state escape.
Fear is elusive sorrow, shunning pain ;
Active, yet stopp'd, it dims the doubtful brain ;
Spirit snatch'd inward, stagnating by dread, [lead :
Slow through the limbs crawls cold the living
Form'd to the look that moulds th' assumer's face,
His joints catch tremblings, life's moist strings un-
brace ;

This road and that th' alarmful passion tries,
Halts in the motion, flutters in the eyes ;
Checks the clipt accent's hesitative way,
And on th' evasive muscles hangs delay.

Anger is pride provok'd (so felt, so known),
Strange ! its stage influence is so faintly shown !
Yet, with what absent sense of all its flame
See we rage meek, fire cold, and fury tame !
Bid the face redd'ning warm'd idea take,
Straight the soul's wildfires all obstruction break :
Stung by inflicted thought's imagin'd pain,
Hard heave the muscles, rolling eye-balls strain :

VOL. VIII,

Twixt the clos'd teeth, indignantly suppress,
Or storm-like loud out pours th' unguarded breast :
Slack'ning exclaiming, swift, slow restless change,
Wings the voic'd tempest in its whirlwind range ;
Quick turns and startings face and air deform,
And thick short breathings paint the infelt storm.

Nor sea, nor life, eternal tempest sweeps,
Hush'd calms succeed it, and the thunder sleeps :
Such the soft silent tide, that floods the mind,
To mov'd compassion's pain-touch'd warmth in-clin'd :

Aidful idea springs to pitied woe,
Thence every quiv'ring finew learns to glow :
Back from the panting bosom to the eye,
Kind sigh-wing'd dews in soft sensation fly :
So from earth's op'ning breasts, in flow'r-dress'd
May,

Steam the slyt fragrance to the sun's felt ray ;
Lightly sustain'd, to morn's faint clasp it clings,
Yet oft (let go) falls back, oft upward springs :
So learn to steal soft pity's copied grace ; [face ;
Languor's moist cloud marks first the mournful
Then hope's kind tension warms the muscly mein,
Dragg'd diff'rent ways contending contrasts lean ;
Clash'd looks 'gainst movements paint internal fight,

'Twixt the heart's anguish and the help's delight :
Then touch'd attention's hark'ning hush creeps
round,

And breathless mouths devour th' expected sound.

Nature loses change—Cold night succeeds to
And pity's dark'ning opposite is scorn : [morn,
Far be this brow-stretch'd arrogance of air
From misery's doomful claim, its sons of care.

Ah ! minds (too apt) turn but the look within,
We find pride's image there as sure as sin !

Yet with such bias rolls man's will from right,
That search first misses what is most in sight :
Else how unneedful to describe a rage

No player wants power to feel—but on the stage.

Cautious (life's speaking picture) wear that stain,

Rightly to show be thine, but not retain !

Scorn is calm careless anger flagg'd of wing,
Brush'd sense of harmless wrong, too weak to sting :
Safe in suspended power, eas'd warmth disclaims
Exertion, and with slack remissness flames :

Now smiles, now frowns, yet both with eye serene,
While half-strung nerves play springs of painless
spleen.

Close-following scorn, amazement ought to rise ;
Angels feel wonder, men should dare despise !

Born to mistakes, and erring out life's span,
Man, as if heaven were his, looks down on man.
Say then what wonder is—trace its taught cause,
Mark its true features, and make known its laws.

Wonder is curious doubt—will's check'd retreat,
Shrinking from danger it prepares to meet ;
'Tis fear's half-brother, of resembling face,

But fix'd, unwavering, and bound down to place :
Earnest, alarmful gaze, intently keen,

Notes the weigh'd object, yet distrusts it seen ;
As in pale churchyards, gleam'd by silent night,

Should some cross'd spectre shade the moon's dim
light,

Y Y

Shudd'ry, the back'ning blood, revolving swift,
Clogs the press'd heart—stretch'd fibres fail to lift:

Loft in doubt's hard'ning frost, stopt motion lies,
While sense climbs gradual to the straining eyes.

Hatred is fullen fury long retain'd;
'Tis willing mischief warily restrain'd;
'Tis thought's corrosion acridly perplex'd;
'Tis self in pain, lest others live unvex'd.
This to touch vivid—(pencil! pleas'd and free,
Paint the coil'd serpent thou abhorr'st to see.)
Veil the malignant leer that burns with spite,
Bid the brow's lour o'erhang the sick'ning sight;
Swell the blown cheek, th' unopening lip restrain;
Stretch'd the wide nostril marks th' impatient
pain.

Ardent, yet heedless, half th' averted eye
Skims the loath'd object, and disdains it nigh.
Hard back-brac'd nerves in sett'ry fervour toil,
And the curv'd system heaves in check'd recoil.
Hast from taught pain—shun hatred's baneful
shade,

And to love's sunshine lend the muse's aid.

Love is intense desire, by rev'rence check'd;
'Tis hope's hot transport, streak'd with fear's respect;
'Tis passion's every soul-felt power disjoin'd;
'Tis all th' assembled train's whole force combin'd.
'Tis like soft air, through which admitted light
Peoples pleas'd fancy, and lends shape to sight:
Yet, like that air disturb'd, man's quiet breaks,
Tempests his reason, and his triumph shakes.

You who infuse this pow'r must first have felt;
No heart, unmov'd itself, bids others melt:
Yet, would chalk'd outline sketch th' imagin'd
grace?

Dumb earnest gaze tongues o'er th' unvocal face:
Soft'ning in apprehension's awe-check'd air,
Each limb beseeches, each slow step's a prayer:
While high-brac'd raptures imag'd pride confess,
Meekness sits guardian o'er the mild address:
Doubt dissipating hope, to blanch desire,
Hangs the mind's curb upon the body's fire.

Snatch'd from the scene, claim this the box's
care;

It paints and warns for every beauty there:
But there love's shafts (of late) all pointless lie,
Blunt from bold meip, and dead'ning in the eye:
Naked of heart, and hateful of delay,
Erring time-short'ner! meeting with half way!
Woman, outstriding art's old luresful skill,
Mann'd o'er with invitation, drives back will;
Falls her past price, owns patient hope buys dear,
Hawks for quick market, and hawls chapmen near;
Talks loud, struts, elbows, calls a grace a fool;
Dress'd like a scarecrow, manner'd like a mule:
Pall'd, the press'd cheap'ner dreads th' out-bluf-
tring air,

Eyes the braw'd swaggerer, and rejects her ware.

Turn, coarse conceiver! all unsex'd by mode,
Maid that trot st uglying in the monster's road!
Proud, yet immodest! light, rude, wileless, pert,
Bold, jostling, hoid'ning, bluntness, pow'rless flirt!
Emptier than air thy coloury gewgaws play,
While every hour's new forms push old away:

Trifler! for cards and contradictions born!
Panting for conquest, yet compelling scorn!
Lab'ring from nature to grow loath'd by art,
And for man's manners forfeiting his heart! [just;

But hold—contempt wrong plac'd becomes un-
Perhaps stage whiners gave love's friends disgust:
For (goblin-like) there lovers walk unshown,
Talk'd of in every play, yet seen in none:
Loft in unfeeling cold affected drawl,
They touch no tenderness, attempting all.
Lump'd lazy lifeless indolence one cause,
And one th' admiring fool's misjudg'd applause.
Why should pain sweat for praise, proud ease can win,

By the rais'd footstep and exalted chin?
By the heav'd halt, that swings its load along,
Clumsily solemn, and serenely wrong?
By the big, broad, round, mellow, trounding troll,
That means no passion, and conveys no soul:
Half swells, then sinks, like sails of ships becalm'd,
A dry dead sweat, man's mummied voice em-
balm'd.

Shame on the whineling, sleep-inductive tone!
Not by such glow-worm glimse love's fires are shown:

Heart, voice, mein, visage, all pay love their aid,
Cupid exacts more strict alliance made; [he
'Twixt the mind's states than once 'twixt Europe's,
Who bound all princes, yet left none unfree.
Not such loose treaties please th' all-buckling god,
Punctual he yokes tun'd sounds to meaning's nod:
Pardons no void vain voluble harangue,
And hates to hear the unaiming bowstring twang.

Say, female shades of love, who haunt the stage,
What fiend, close-treading, tags desire with rage?
If in your hospitable bosoms bred,
Th' unresting fury thrives, by beauty fed,
Tell the dire name—But if you silent feel
Th' impressiv tooth, and no gnaw'd thought reveal, [bite,

Speak, tell-tale muse. Thou shar'st th' envenom'd
For jealousy ne'er sleeps when poets write.

The Janus jealousy two faces wears,
Each diff'ring, apt as form'd by diff'rent cares;
While infant-wing'd the callow harpy lies,
Too dim for daylight, too unfledg'd to rise:
'Tis doubt-mix'd anger, struggling to confide,
Floating half-sunk on pity's pleading tide:
Here hope-fed softness soothes the affiant heart,
There rage vindictive bids the spirit smart:
'Twixt the two wav'ring scales, by turns deprest,
The eye's short wand'rings mark the mind di-
strest;

Languidly strung, flow-nerv'd, half-finewy strain,
Paints an unsettled, half-determin'd pain:
Whence rous'd resentment, catching hasty flame,
Cool'd by met pity, blushes into shame:
But does weigh'd proof confirm th' ideal wrong,
Then the eye lightens, and the brace binds strong;
Not vengeance burns more turbulently stern,
Though (through it) pain'd affection sighs concern.

Thus has the muse, in passion's changeful dress,
Led ent'ring art through nature's dark recess;
Fair to her eye one source of action shown,
Whence every branch'd meander flows her own:

Brief let precision's scale contract the view;
 Then grasp it mem'ry, and remit the clue.
 Previous to art's first act (till then all vain)
 Print the ideal pathos on the brain;
 Feel the thought's image on the eyeball roll;
 Behind that window sits th' attentive soul:
 Wing'd at her beck th' obedient muscles fly,
 Bent or relaxing to the varied eye:
 Press'd, moderate, lenient, voice's organ'd sound
 To each felt impulse tones the tuneful round:
 Form'd to the nerves, concurring mein partakes,
 So the mov'd actor moves, and passion shakes.

THE DEDICATION OF THE BEECH-TREE,

Occasioned by the late Discovery of making Oil from the Fruit of that Tree.

HIGH in thy starry orb,
 Great ruling planet of our brighten'd sphere,
 The muse invokes thee, and demands thy ear!
 Her Harley's ear! O yet confess the name!
 Thy titles borrow lustre from thy fame.

Fearless to fall, my rein-loos'd fancy soars
 High as thy deeds, nor common aid implores.
 Let conscious fawners blow their smoky fire,
 And vainly bid th' unlist'ning gods inspire,
 My muse, disdainful of their sullied wings,
 Views the vast height, and dauntless upward
 springs,

Inspir'd like angels by the worth she sings.

Yet, Oh! mistake not my aspiring lays;
 They would but speak my duty, not your praise;
 Praises like yours, who lives and does not know;
 The poorest debtors count the sums they owe;
 But I, impatient of the growing score,
 Would pay you something ere I owe you more.

Accept, great guider of the stormy state,
 An off'ring worthy of the brave and great:
 Accept what heav'n, propitious for your sake,
 Smiles on this peace-blest land, and bids her take:

This art of old had been some altars due,
 Now, fir'd with purer zeal, she kneels to you,
 That awful pow'r who guards our Anna's throne,
 And to that Anna made your virtues known,
 To place such worth above all wish'd controul,
 Blest'd the long labours of your peaceful soul.
 But one thing wanted,—fam'd Minerva's tree,
 The gift of peace from gods to men like thee;
 That oleous plant, the pride of sunnier climes,
 Chief in the poets songs of ancient times;
 Too long profan'd for thy chaste brow to wear,
 Fled the cool influence of the northern bear.
 Heaven's voice was heard, deficient nature groan'd,
 Felt his new will, and the correction own'd.
 The humblest forest of our favour'd land
 Grew proud beneath this bounty of his hand;
 Confess'd the secret he vouchsaf'd to teach,
 Disdain'd the olive, and enthron'd the beech.

Hail, happy tree! wou'd after-ages know,
 To whom their sons thy oily harvests owe,
 Oxford's lov'd name, deep on thy bosom grave,
 Who from his country did his country save;
 Who gave our harass'd land its long-wish'd rest,
 And forc'd unwilling nations to be blest;

Whose known esteem of arts gave birth to thee,
 Omen of greater, which e'er long shall be.

Thy pious hand, which made war's thunder
 cease,

Shall cultivate the nobler arts of peace;
 Till murmur'ing faction owns, with thankless joy,
 'Tis far more great, to build than to destroy.

Nor shall thy rising country's sons alone,
 Thy wiser care of their lost int'rest own,
 The boundless blessings of thy lib'ral hand,
 Shall shed their influence on our fruitful land:
 The long-mourn'd absence of th' inspiring plant,
 Whose pow'rful juice ungrinds the edge of want,
 Whose sov'reign strength makes glad the lab'ers
 toil,

Shall now no more reproach our injur'd soil;
 Our teeming glebe, if I a right divine,
 E'er long shall swell with floods of gen'rous wine,
 France shall no more her courted vineyards boast;
 But look with envy on our northern coast,
 Which now enrich'd, with matchless oil and corn,
 Unequal'd vintages shall soon adorn.

Nor this alone! on, on, prophetic fire!
 Though boundless is the flight, disdain to tire;
 Unwearied all his glorious aims pursue,
 'Till sick'ning envy dies to shun the view,

Fir'd with the sure preface, methinks I see
 The struggling east resign her morian tree;
 The roughest Dryads of our oaken isle,
 Charm'd with the gentle stranger, learn to smile;
 The dancing boughs their breezy homage pay,
 The oak nods welcome, and the beech gives way.
 And now, glad spring, by rising warmth renew'd,
 The various insect seeks its leafy food,
 Spins out its little life's industrious thread,
 In grateful toil, to find its feeder's bread.
 Dies a rich recompense of female care,
 And leaves its silken treasures to the fair;
 The fair, long mindful, whence th' advantage
 came,

Shall teach their sons to speak, by lisping Har-
 ley's name. [join'd,

From views, like thine, with thy vast knowledge,
 What blessings may not happy Britain find?
 Fierce emulation shall new pow'rs impart,
 Till ev'ry wish grows possible to art;
 Rivers shall roll, where now huge mountains grow,
 And tides, new channel'd, wonder how they flow.
 For thee, proud Thames his wealthy arms shall
 spread,

And take the swift Sabrina to his bed.
 Enamour'd Trent shall love-sick Avon meet,
 And distant seas in mix'd alliance meet.

Dear, to thy care, ev'n th' unhoping Scot
 Shall bless the union, and hold fast the knot;
 Britain no longer shall explore from far,
 The costly magazines of naval war;
 High on the mountains of her northern shore,
 The gummy pine shall shed her pitchy store;
 Tall firs, which useless, have long ages grown,
 Shall fright the seas, and visit worlds unknown;
 Till the check'd sons of Norway's timber'd state,
 Learn love by force, while we disarm their hate.

And here rejoice, ye Caledonian shores,
 Whose empty strands my friendly muse deploras;

Shortly, strong fleets shall plow your stormy seas,
And wealth's warm breath your icy ports un-
freeze!

The Belgic spoiler shall no more pursue [you;
Those finny shoals which court your guides and Summon'd to greatness, worthy of your fame,
Nor ill-supported in the gen'rous aim,
Approaching time shall see you, justly brave,
Assert the right which God and nature gave.
Then shall that fire which now your bosom fills,
With virtues useless on your barren hills,
New-nerve the grasp of application's hand,
And rouse the latent glories of your land.

Wide lies a tract beneath the sunny line,
Where rays direct with burning lustre shine;
Where ribs of silver bind the sea-wash'd plains,
And virgin wealth unmix'd with av'rice, reigns.
This the proud Spaniard never yet possess'd,
So much has heav'n the happy natives bless'd;
Reserv'd for British rule, their isthmus free,
Divides the northern from the southern sea.

Nor this, the hapless tract, the direful spot,
Dear to the brave, the unpermitted Scot.
North of that sad, that ill-remember'd shore,
A happier work does happier hands implore.

Here shall the sons of our advent'rous land,
Through unborn ages stretch decreed command;
Here shall they draw both oceans to their sway,
And through repugnant mountains cut their way:
'Tis done! methinks I hear their cannons roar,
Hostile repiners shun the envied shore,

And round vast capes a tedious course pursue;
While we, and only we, possess the new.
Hence shall the shorten'd distance guard our health,
Secure our traffic and increase our wealth:
The western bullion to our merchants sold,
Shall send us weight for weight in eastern gold.
Nor then shall Asia's aromatic store
Pile the proud markets of a neighb'ring shore;
All shall be ours, and while we all maintain,
No bloody war shall the chaste vict'ry stain.

O blind profaners of obtruded bliss!
Who wanting soul to fathom depth like this,
Instead of owning debts, you cannot pay,
Strike at the friendly hand which points the way.

Forgive, thou great inspirer of my song,
If ending here, thy wider views I wrong;
If arts more wish'd, or worlds less known there were,

Thy ne plus ultra had not rested there.

HOR. LIB. I. ODE V.

Quis multa gracilis.

Cool, within the grotto toying,
Soft on scatter'd roses laid,
What young bud art thou destroying;
Why to-day those charms display'd?

Trifly plain in subtle sweetness,
What fond heart is here beset?
Why, with negligent completeness,
Loosely curis that tressy net?

Soon by sufferings taught to know thee,
O! ye changeful gods! he cries,

Too, too light, thy falsehoods show thee,
Late the fond believer's wife:

Then with foolish wonder starting,
He compares thy sunshine past,
With those storms of spleen's preparing,
Which thy present looks o'ercast!

Silly truster! vain supposer!
In his am'rous empty mind,
Soft he forms thee joy's disposer:
Ever grateful, hush'd and kind.

But alas! and shame upon thee!
Little dreams he what a sky,
Heaping clouds in whirlwinds on thee,
Soon shall dim thy future eye.

Pity, gods! those faithful creatures,
Yet unbroke to woman's arts:
Fondly trusting lovely features,
And for smiles exchanging hearts.

As for me, by heaven befriended,
Long ago I 'scap'd the storm:
Safe with all my sails extended,
Flying from that fraudulent form:

Broad my pictur'd story flaming,
Now shall love's gay temple grace:
From some pillar's height proclaiming
Warnings, to the rising race.

VERSES

ON THE DEATH OF MR. DENNIS.

ADIEU! unsocial excellence! at last
Thy foes are vanquish'd, and thy fears are past;
Want, the grim recompence of truth like thine,
Shall now no longer dim thy destin'd shine.

Th' impatient envy, the disdainful air!
The front malignant, and the capitious stare!
The furious petulance, the jealous start,
The mist of frailties that obscur'd thy heart,
Veil'd in thy grave shall unremember'd lie,
For these were parts of Dennis, born to die!

But, there's a nobler Seity behind,
His reason dies not—and has friends to find!
Though here, revenge and pride withheld his praise, [days:

No wrongs shall reach him through his future
The rising ages shall redeem his name,
And nations read him into lasting fame!
In his defects untaught! his labour'd page,
Shall the slow gratitude of time engage.

Perhaps some story of his pitied woe,
Mix'd in faint shades may with his memory go,
To touch futurity with gen'rous shame,
And backward cast an unavailing blame,
On times too cold to taste his strength of art:
Yet warm contemners of too weak a heart!

Rest in thy dust, contented with thy lot,
Thy good remember'd, and thy bad forgot:
'Tis more than Cæsar and his world cou'd give!
Spread o'er his virtues his few errors live:
Till reasoning brutes, whose speck of soul wants room,

To lodge the just conception of his doom,

Dare with lewd license noise his question'd fame,
And blot the sacred rev'rence of his name.

WRIT ON A WINDOW,

In the Highlands of Scotland.

SCOTLAND! thy weather's like a modish wife!
Thy winds and rains forever are at strife:
So termagant a-while her thunder tries,
And, when she can no longer scold—she cries.

VERSES

Made for Mr. Savage; and sent to my Lady Macclesfield, his Mother.

HOPELESS, abandon'd, aimless, and oppress'd,
Lost to delight, and every way distress'd:
Cross his cold bed, in wild disorder thrown,
Thus sigh'd Alexis, friendless, and alone.

Why do I breathe? what joy can being give,
When she who gave me life forgets I live!
Feels not these wint'ry blasts—nor heeds my smart;
But shuts me from the shelter of her heart?
Saw me expos'd to want! to shame! to scorn!
To ills!—which make it misery to be born!
Cast me, regardless, on the world's bleak wild,
And bad me be a wretch while yet a child!

Where can he hope for pity, peace or rest,
Who moves no softness—in a mother's breast?
Custom, law, reason, all! my cause forsake;
And nature sleeps, to keep my woes awake!
Crimes, which the cruel scarce believe can be,
The kind are guilty of, to ruin me!

Even she who bore me blasts me with her hate,
And, meant my fortune, makes herself my fate!

Yet has this sweet neglecter of my woes
The softest, tend'rest breast, that pity knows!
Her eyes shed mercy where'er they shine,
And her soul melts at every woe—but mine.
Sure, then, some secret fate for guilt unwill'd,
Some sentence pre-ordain'd to be fulfill'd,
Plung'd me thus deep in sorrow's searching flood,
And wash'd me from the mem'ry of her blood.

But, oh! whatever cause has mov'd her hate,
Let me but sigh in silence at my fate;
The God within, perhaps, may touch her breast;
And when she pities, who can be distress'd?

ON LADY MARY WORTLEY MONTAGUE'S BRING-ING WITH HER, OUT OF TURKEY, THE ART OF INOCULATING THE SMALL-POX.

WHEN Greece reviving into short delight,
Felt pride and comfort at our muse's sight,
The rival'd nine no sooner saw her face,
But ev'n their envy gave their wonder place.
Charm'd into love of what eclips'd their fame,
They wak'd Apollo with her powerful name.

See, god of Grecian wit! Urania cries,
How sweet a muse the western world supplies:
Say, should she ask some favour from your throne,
What could you bid her take, that's not her own?
Sparkling in charms, the heavenly stranger view,
So grac'd, she scarce can owe a beam to you.
Beauty with love her power to your's prefers;
And wit and learning are already her's.

Rous'd at her name, receding from her eyes,
The gazing god rose slow in soft surprise!
Fair miracle! (he said)—and paus'd a while:
Then thus—sweet glory of your envy'd isle!
Charm'd and oblig'd lest we ungrateful seem,
Bear hence at least one mark of our esteem.
One of my three great claims your wish may fit;
Whose voice is music, and whose thoughts are wit.
Physic alone remains to grant you here—
A skill! your godlike pity will endear. [cure,
Form'd to give wounds, which must no ease pro-
Atone your influence by new arts to cure.
Beauty's chief foe, a fear'd and fierce disease!
Bows at my beck, and knows its god's decrees.
Breath'd in this kiss, take power to tame its rage,
And from its rancour free the rescued age:
High o'er each sex in double empire sit;
Protecting beauty, and inspiring wit.

TO CLELIA, IN THE COUNTRY.

ON THE PULLING DOWN ST. MARTIN'S CHURCH.

WHILE from the noisy crowd you lean retir'd,
In silent shades by love of thought inspir'd,
I, vex'd by various cares, to business chain'd,
Mourn'd your lost converse, and in town remain'd:
Dark as the midnight world, your sunshine gone,
Guideless in sullen gloom, I wander'd on:
Passion's wild influence ebb'd and flow'd my mind,
As seas drive diff'rent with the changing wind:
But to what point so'er my will was bound,
In vain I turn'd th' unresting compass round:
Doubtful a while th' wav'ring needle hung,
Then, trembling, backward to your image sprung.

Pensive I view'd a sacred pile of late,
Which falls, like man, to rise in nobler state;
The doors thrown wide, it seem'd unveil'd to lie,
And reverend ruin struck my startled eye.
Ent'ring amidst the busy hammer's sound,
I saw time's dusty trophies scatter'd round:
Each violated pillar stood bedew'd;
And wept in solemn grief a fate so rude.
From tombs, by force disjoin'd, reluctant stones
Roll'd, mix'd with clouds of dust, and human bones;
From faithless walls defac'd inscriptions fled,
And to long night consign'd the nameless dead:
The pew's pale squares, in their whole lengthen'd row,

Gave way, and open'd a sad scene below!
Beauty, youth, wealth, and power, reduc'd to clay,
Larded with bones, yet moist, unshelter'd lay:
Remnants of eyeless skulls, with hollow stare,
Mock'd the proud looks which living charmers
wear:

Coffins rose broke, unfaithful to their trust,
And flesh flew round me in unjointed dust.
Scarce a short span beneath that opening floor,
Where kneeling charmers pray'd the week before;
Where forms like yours rejoic'd th' admiring eye,
Forms once like yours, in naked atoms lie.
O fate of failing life! O flatt'ring dream!
What wint'ry sunshine is thy shadowy gleam!

Thus while I mus'd, thy soul approach'd my ear;
Thy soft-wing'd soul, that always hovers near.
See'st thou, it sigh'd—how these sad relics lie;
And dost thou fear that Clelia thus can die?

No—she's all mind; and her immortal name,
Eluding death's short reach shall tread on fame.
Tongues yet unthought of, Clelia shall adorn,
And charm adoring nations---yet unborn.
Heroes, at whose resolves the world will shake,
Shall treat thy sex with reverence for thy sake;
And each fair tyrant who would empress be,
Form but one wish---to think and look like thee.

ANSWER TO THE RESOLVE.

WHILST empty coxcombs blast a woman's fame,
In ev'ry state and ev'ry age the same:
With their own folly pleas'd, each fair they toast,
And where they least are happy, swear they're most;
No diff'rence marking 'twixt the gay and lewd,
But dreaming all who fly would be pursued:
While thus they vainly think, and vainly live,
Lost to that reverence love's soft lessons give;
Let this great maxim be my passion's guide;
May I ne'er hope where I am ne'er deny'd,
Nor gain a woman willing to be try'd.

ANSWER TO A SCURRILOUS OBSCENE POEM,
Intituled, An Epistle from Mrs. Robinson to Senesino.

FROM thy loose lines I turn my eyes away,
Nor know, o'erspread with blushes, what to say:
The modest muses, wounded by thy strain,
For me, and for themselves, do thus complain.
O thou, our country's folly and expence!
Dull foe to tragedy and godlike sense;
Too long, mean mercenary shade, too long,
Has't thou these isles enchanted with thy-song.
Music's soft god unbinds the charm he rais'd,
He blest thy tongue, and while he blest we prais'd:
By thee polluted, he disclaims his choice,
And will no longer warble in thy voice.
His trembling notes where melting softness hung,
And every grace will seek a chaster tongue.
No more the lover shall thy song repeat,
No more the fair one sigh---'tis wond'rous sweet!
Oh, guilty Senesino! thou no more
Shalt bravo! bravo! hear---or loud encore.
The loose and dull shall all thy audience be;
The chaste and witty shall resent for me.
All unattended shall thy awkward form,
To sad uncrowded scenes, or whine, or storm.
Thy wretched ha! shall unapplauded grow,
And ill-plac'd bays fall with'ring from thy brow.
Know, Songster, Julius, God-like chief, disdains
Thy shrill, unnatural, ungraceful strains:
With rage redoubled, Pompey's ghost must burn,
To find such tears profane his sacred urn.
Remember, echo, soon thou'lt know the time,
Strip'd of thy robes, thy legions, and thy rhyme;
Thou poor machine of mean delusive sound,
When I shall see thy temples all unbound,
And those who heroes act, like heroes crown'd.
Thou to thy famish'd Italy shalt go,
And rival Faustus in the shades below.

THE CHOICE, TO A FRIEND.

Oh greatly blest'd! who can, as fate requires,
By ductile wisdom temper your desires!

Balance'd within, you look abroad serene,
And marking both extremes pass clear between;
Oh, could your lov'd example teach your skill!
And as it moves my wonder, mend my will!
Calm would my passions grow, my lot might
 please,

And my sick soul should think itself to ease,
But to the future while I strain my eye,
Each present good slips undistinguish'd by.
Still what I would, contends with what I can;
And my wild wishes leap the bounds of man.

If in my power it lies to limit hope,
And my unchain'd desires can fix a scope; [poor,
This were my choice---oh! friend, pronounce me
For I have wants which wealth can never cure.
Mean is that soul which its own good can fill;
A prosp'rous world alone could feast my will.
He's poor at best who others misery sees,
And wants the wish'd-for power to give it ease.
He's rich who sole supreme and unconfin'd,
Can with unbounded influence bless mankind.
A glory this, unreach'd!--but on a throne!
All were enough---but less than all is none.
This my first wish---but since 'twere wild and vain,
To grasp at glitt'ring clouds with fruitless pain,
More safely low let my next prospect be;
And life's mild evening this fair sun-set see.
Far from a lord's loath'd neighbourhood---a state,
Whose little greatness is a pride I hate! [plac'd,
On some lone wild should my strong house be
Surrounded by a vast and healthy waste:
Sterile and coarse the untry'd soil should be;
But forc'd to flourish, and subdued by me.
Seas, woods, meads, mountains, gardens, streams,
 and skies,
Should with a changeful grandeur charm my eyes,
Still where I mov'd, new marks of my past pains
Should plume the mountain tops, and paint the plains:

Greatly obscure, and shunning courts, or name
Widely befriended, but escaping fame.
Peaceful in studious quiet would I live;
Lie hid for leisure, and grow rich to give.

TO THE EDITOR OF CLARISSA.

PAINTERS to poets owe their noblest praise;
Mute are their tints, till voic'd by living lays:
Passive the semblant forms but seem to breathe;
Delusive surface holds no depth beneath.
Far other lines Clarissa's painter drew;
Far other force his pensive colours knew:
There in round fulness active pictures glow,
Turgid with speaking life, and thinking woe.
His the soul's pencil, whose warm strokes impart
Mind to the form, and passion to the heart.
A delegate creator, calm he lies,
And sees the worlds he calls for round him rise.
Oh, might he live till his Clarissa's death!
But life immortal suits not mortal breath.
Let him but live till all who read are taught,
What aided influence beauty draws from thought.
Then would his length'ning years all bounds defy,
And nature and her friend together die.
So would he charm whole time---yet vainly too,
Reach every conscious heart---to change---how few!

Let him not hope too much---nor heaven nor he Set human minds from human frailties free :
 Though each can own where all the rest are hit,
 And every flaw, remote from self, admit :
 Though marks external catch the visual ray,
 All in-shut objects shun the search of day.
 Each ugliest likeness for another shown,
 Strikes all ; but none find eyes to note their own.
 Yet his---whate'er stage, press, or pulpit can ;
 Whate'er the heart's touch'd feelings lend to man :
 All that from all is learn'd, one genius gives,
 And in collective right of virtue lives. [ply'd,

Whence was his more than magic power sup-
 So skill'd to start life's game on every side ?
 Where could his line th' unmeasur'd vastness find,
 To fathom all the depths of all mankind ?
 Piercing as light from heaven, to earth he flows,
 And every stain and every beauty shows.

The three great powers that shake the human heart,

Are music, eloquence, and paintive art :
 Picture and eloquence already charm,
 In every tearful page divinely warm.
 Oh, let tun'd numbers fill th' illustrious trine !
 In some new work let added music shine ;
 Let his next wreath the poet's ivy claim,
 And his own verse immortalize his name.
 Verse so inspir'd, inspiring, and combin'd,
 Would pour th' enrapt'ring virtues o'er the mind ;
 Rouse from their roots in earth, hearts hard as
 steel,
 And teach once more the trees and beasts to feel !

TO THE

TWO GENEROUS MASTERS ST. QUINTIN,

On their tender Affection to each other, in their Progress through, and Recovery from the Small-Pox.

SEXES are needless aids in love's pure claim,
 Since souls (not bodies) light our social flame.
 Lamps of imprison'd life misplac'd we shine,
 Leap, lean our lengthening points---and long to join.

So long'd your brother minds to mix embrace,
 As light meets light, and space is lost in space.
 Death, with suspended hand, beheld your strife,
 Call'd off disease's rage, and set free life.
 Why should they die, the ghastly pauser cry'd,
 Whom names but separate, and but forms divide ?
 See with what spring th' elastic strugglers flew ;
 Clung to their fate, and to death's horrors grew !
 In vain eruptive fires their faces screen ;
 Fever's hot anguish vainly burnt between.
 Wolves that behind some thicket scent their prey,
 Not with more fierce delight o'er thorns make
 way,

Than, lur'd by danger, one with rapture fought
 Th' infectious grasp that his best half had caught.
 There smil'd their twisted souls, farewell all fear ;
 We rise together to a heaven not here.

No---let 'em stay, to earth's dim dust confin'd,
 Cross'd in their clouded way t'ward realms of mind.

'Twas not death's drift to strike for---added bliss,
 In next world angels---You're but men in this.

SENT TO A LADY

WITH A POCKET LOOKING-GLASS.

SEE, my soul's serene invader,
 See the face I first ador'd :
 Heaven for love and pity made her,
 And with angel's graces stor'd.

Mark her forehead's awful rising,
 See her soul-subduing eyes,
 Every look and air surprising,
 Modest, lively, soft, and wise.

Next to you I own I love her ;
 But your sweet discerning eye,
 Must not now be jealous of her :
 She's ne'er seen but you are by.

TO DAVID MALLET, ESQ.

On a mistaken supposition that I had forgot him.

WIT like yours---and yet forgot ?
 Dreamy doubt ? believe it not.
 Faith in silence loves to dwell,
 Fill'd with sense it shuns to tell.
 Shoaly waters loudest dash ;
 Distant light'nings longest flash :
 Spare pretence's empty drum,
 Deepest joys are oft'nest dumb :
 Bodies part---but mutual mind
 Stretch'd immense, contiguous join'd,
 Ever tangent, always seen,
 Souls embrace, with worlds between.
 Pride, indeed, avows it fit,
 Men forgotten should forget :
 Reason more to justice owes ;
 Reason loves---because it knows.
 Debt can ne'er for traffic stay ;
 Unreceiving it must pay :
 Taste of other's worth---should none
 Lend a weight to aid our own---
 Dou't, howe'er, the balance fail,
 Toss in self to turn the scale.

THE ACTOR'S EPITOME.

If comprehension best can pow'r express,
 And that's still greatest which contains the less ;
 No rank's high claim can make the player's small,
 Since acting each he comprehends them all.

Off, to due distance, half the stalking train !
 Blots of a title your low tastes prophane :
 No dull cold mouther shares the actor's plea,
 Rightly to seem is transiently to be.

Arduous the task, and asks a climbing brain ;
 A head for judgment, and a heart for pain :
 E'er sense impress'd reflects adopted forms,
 A changeful nature shakes with borrow'd storms.
 Then strong-mark'd passions signs external bear,
 And stamp assum'd distinctions on the player ;
 Joy, grief, fear, anger, pity, scorn, and hate,
 Wonder, shame, jealousy, and love's soft weight.

These, when he paints, did he but first conceive,
 Each on his fancy would its image leave ;
 Thence ductile fibres catch the expressive spring,
 And the eyes dart it, and the accents ring.

Y y iij

You who would joy's triumphant pride express,
What most you wish, imagine you possess.
Strait flames th' idea to the kindling eye,
And every nerve in concord braces high:
Treading on air, each joint a soul displays;
The looks all lighten---and the limbs all blaze.

But you who act unhoping grief's distress,
Touch fancy with some home-felt wretchedness.
Then slack'ning nerves the loose impression take;
Each sad look sickens: the shock'd spirits break:
Dim falls the faded eye;---the steps drag flow,
And ev'ry heedless gesture heaves with woe.

Fear is but active grief, avoiding pain,
Yet flies too faintly, and avoids in vain:
While stagnate spirits, thick'ning as they spread,
O'er the cold heart, crawls slow, the living lead.
What though the eye's prompt ray keen light'ning
dart;

'Tis fruitless:---loos'ning fibres lame the heart.

Anger is pride provok'd beyond controul,
When some felt insult fires the smarting soul:
Then the will's warmth, repelling fancy'd shame,
Strings the nerves hard, and bids the eye-balls
flame;

Then marks of menace, air, and face deform;
And short thick breathings paint the infelt storm.

Pity is active sense of alien grief;
Think some dear dying suff'rer begs relief:
Aidful idea springs to succour woe,
And ev'ry quivering sinew learns to glow,
While mild as sighing saints, the sadd'ning face
Clouds into anguish with relenting grace.

Scorn is cold anger, careless and at ease,
Calm sense of wrongs too harmless to displease;
Bold in undoubted safety, 'twould disclaim
Defiance---and with proud remissness flame.
Now smiles, now frowns,---yet both with eye
serene;

And lets the nerves play loose with painless spleen.

Hatred is sullen fury long retain'd;
'Tis willing mischief warily restrain'd:
This to paint strong the back-brac'd nerves should toil

In fetter'd strain, and heave in curv'd recoil;
While, with impatient frown, th' averted eye
Shuns the loath'd object it disdains too nigh.

Pain-seeking jealousy feels doubtful rage,
Which trustful pity struggles to assuage;
Thence frets uncertain pain, with pensive glow,
And look and action share divided woe.

Sad in the face the heart's felt softness reigns,
While each tugg'd sinew angry vengeance strains.

Wonder is curious fear---Suppose by night,
Some pale met spectre cross'd the moon's dim
light.

Sudden the back'ning blood, retreating swift,
Swells the press'd heart:---each fibre fails to lift;
Lost in short pause arrested motion lies,
And sense climbs doubtful to the straining eyes.

Love is at once intense and slack desire;
There hope inflames, while reverence cools the fire.
Fear of repulse, bold sense of joy withdraws;
Sighs in each accent; every movement awes.
Soft, earnest looks blush o'er th' inclining face,
And sinewy transport borrows shade from grace.

THE LORD'S PRAYER IN VERSE.

ALMIGHTY Father! of high heaven posses'd:
Be thy name holy, and thy power confess'd.
Teach us, on earth, to know and do thy will;
As heaven's bright train thy great commands fulfil.
Gracious our daily bread of life bestow;
And show us mercy, as we mercy show:
Guard us from strong temptation's powerful call;
Nor, when we meet with evil, let us fall.

AN ADDRESS

FROM THE STATUES AT STOWE,

To Lord Cobham, on his return to his Garden.

FROM every muse and every art thy own;
Thy bowers our theatres, thy mind our throne:
Hail to thy virtues, manumiz'd from state;
Hail to thy leisure, to be wisely great.
Fetter'd by duties, and to forms enslav'd,
How timely has thy life a remnant sav'd!
To taste that freedom which thy sword maintain'd;
And lead, in letter'd ease, a life unpain'd:
So Scipio, Carthage fall'n, resign'd his plume,
And smil'd at the forgetfulness of Rome.

O, greatly blest! whose evening sweetliest
shines,

And in unclouded slowness calm declines:
Now free reflection, with reverted eye,
Wan'd from hot noon-tide, and a troubled sky,
Divides life well---the largest part long known
Thy country's claim---the last and best thy own.

Go, like the masters of the world, go shine;
Be Charles' life, and Dioclesian's thine:
Form thy own power, dependent peace create,
And shade distinction from the storms of state:
With pray'rs and praise, thy toil (like heaven's)
be paid, [made.

And guard the growing world thy hands have
There, while detach'd, thy self-supported soul
Resumes dominion, and escapes controul;
Moves with a grandeur monarchs seek in vain,
Above all forms, all dangers, and all pain:
The muse shall find thee in thy blest retreat,
And breathe this honest wish at Cobham's feet:
Fresh as thy lakes, may all thy pleasures flow;
And breezy, like thy groves, thy passions blow;
Wide as thy fancy be thy spreading praise;
And long and lovely as thy walks---thy days.

TO LADY W---,

On seeing her in the Park, after her recovery from a long Illness.

PLEAS'D at your wish'd return, to cheer the shade,
For your long life, a pensive neighbour pray'd;
Shock'd and disgusted at the modern fair,
Vacant of thought and turbulent of air;
He hail'd your health, restor'd who live to prove,
How women once compell'd the wise to love.
How unaffected ease in motion charms!
How knowledge holds the heart that sweetness warms!
How thinking spirit quickens every grace,
Till the soul lightens through the meaning face!

Griev'd to observe what now the sex employs,
 Whose wit is laughter, and whose converse noise.
 Who loudly ignorant, and coarsely light,
 Repel men's reason, and offend their sight;
 Make youth distasteful, dignity despis'd,
 And every claim of beauty pass unpriz'd:
 Charm'd, he beheld once more your air sublime,
 In all but wisdom, still unchang'd by time.
 Patterns, like you, may teach the faithless eye,
 What, in your absence, wou'd be judg'd a lie;
 Shou'd it be told these quenchers of love's fire,
 That woman once was soft and mov'd desire;
 By modest tenderness compell'd respect,
 And, arm'd with influ'nce, never fear'd neglect.
 That friend, and lover both, she cou'd impart
 Peace to the mind, and passion to the heart,
 'Twould now be thought a dream—but that in you
 They see such proof, that they must own 'tis true.
 Live then a lengthening age of painless hours,
 Your sex's envy—and the wish of ours.

TO MR. GARRICK,

On his united Ideas of Actor and Writer.

Form'd for each other's aid, these powers but meet,
 As nature's self shows light combin'd with heat:
 Oh! born to grace their union, let 'em share
 Thy thoughts exertion, and reward thy care.
 The willing arts bid all their praise be thine,
 For thee, tun'd discords into music join;
 What others, lab'ring hopeless, hardly gain,
 'Twas thine at once to start for and obtain.
 To instant growth without gradation drawn,
 High-noon leapt backward to embrace the dawn;
 Time and experience sunk to speed thy way,
 And genius crasp'd creation in a day.
 Nor let malignant envy blast thy claim,
 Since wit and virtue triumph in thy fame.
 Oh! let no rogue of damn'd Iago's race,
 To wile-try'd torture rack that honest face:
 Seem what thou art, brave, faithful, amorous, gay;
 The noblest passions please the noblest way.
 Heart humaniz'd, head clear, hands clean, soul
 great,
 Sharp sense, mild manners, ease, adorning weight,
 Sun of our stage shine on: we feel thy light:
 Thy warmth how fruitful, and thy beam how bright!
 Each guilt thou paint'st by borrow'd art is shown;
 But every goodness native, and thy own.

ON SIR ISAAC NEWTON.

O'er nature's laws God cast the veil of night,
 Out-blaz'd a Newton's soul—and all was light.

TO CLIO,

On her praising Mr. Dyer, and showing me some of his Verses.

MATCHLESS inspirer of my muse and me,
 Thou heaven of blended smiles and majesty!
 Thou, by whose light all others worth is shown,
 While thou art dark as midnight to thy own.

Praising desert, like his, you charm me too,
 And for your blessing him my thanks are due.
 Mean are the minds, who but their own possess,
 And reap no joy from other's happiness.
 I groan beneath their pains, whom sorrow wrings,
 And when their hope is rising, mine has wings.
 O Clio! to deserve such praise from thee,
 Points out thy friend, a bosom one for me;
 My sympathetic soul reveres his name,
 And my warm heart beats anxious for his fame.
 Sweet are his thoughts, and soft as evening air;
 Joy gilds his smiles—his sighs invite despair:
 Strong is his sense, and his reflection deep,
 Wide as his prospects—as his mountains steep:
 Oh, may he still be blest with thy esteem!
 Oh, may thy charms for ever be his theme!
 Vast is my wonder at his fancy's flight,
 Till I remember whence his store was drawn;
 Clio, the inspirer Clio! lent him light,
 And spread soft influence o'er his wid'ning dawn.
 Warm'd by the enliv'ning lustre of her beams,
 His rip'ning reason burnt with conscious glow;
 Blaz'd in the radiant charmer's starry streams,
 And shed diffusive heav'n on all below.
 Oh! thou soft sun of wit, and love's gay clime,
 Point but one ray of thy broad shine on me;
 Then shall my kindl'd soul flame out sublime,
 And glitter proudly with thy friend and thee.

ON TWO LOVELY AND LOVING SISTERS.

WHEN equal charms, in different colours dress'd,
 Have two sweet sisters, rival persons, blest'd:
 How kind is heaven, their minds with love to strike,
 And teach 'em both to look and think alike.

TO THE EDITOR OF ALBANIA.

A POEM.

Addressed to the Genius of Scotland, and dedicated to General Wade.

KNOWN, though unnam'd, since shunning vulgar phrase,
 Thy muse would shine, and yet conceal her rays;
 Think thyself hid, and hope in vain to be
 Unseen, like light, that shows us all we see.
 But while thy readers are deny'd thy name,
 They feel thy genius, and attest thy flame.
 They pity too, in death, thy noteless friend,
 Poor by the generous aid thy wealth wou'd lend,
 Prefac'd by thee, his feeble lights expire;
 Ev'n in producing, thou obscur'st his fire.
 Not but the muse had warm'd his youthful song!
 Bold were his notes, and his ideas strong;
 But where domestic dearnefs warp'd his lays,
 And partial birth mist the patriot praise;
 Wilt thou not join to blame the bounded zeal,
 That bids us only for our country feel?
 Yes—thou wilt censure this too scanty care,
 That shuts out pity, and appropriates prayer.
 Thou wilt enlarge affection, till it fees
 Beyond itself, and pants for public ease.

Stretch liberty to disengage mankind,
And ev'n from nature's biases free the mind.

What though (we know not why) soft inbred
pride, [guide;
Makes home seem sweetest, and can choice mis-
Till native darkness erring taste constrains,
And Lapland deserts rival Persia's plains.
Let the soul's reach the heart's restraint reprove,
And widen to the world our country's love.

Base are these local limits to men's hearts,
That canton out humanity in parts.
Truth has no districts to divide her toil;
And virtue is at home in every soil.
Since, on one common globe, we neighb'ring
dwell,

What narrower line shou'd man from man expel.
Each born alike, and sons of nature all,
Human can ne'er from care of human fall.

But passion's rapine, nature's union breaks,
Not soil but int'rest all this difference makes:
Born brothers, each from each wou'd something
draw,

Till ravag'd equity is shrunk to law.
Blindly forgetful, that the whole is dust,
We hate for parts, nor feel ourselves unjust:
Confine repute to place, and praise or rail,
As self or stranger turns the varied scale;
Till sense grown harden'd in her partial plea,
Justice is crippled into bribery.

Thou!—son of liberty!—can'st shun this self;
Loos'ning reflection, and out-launching self:
Can'st burst the chain of custom round the heart,
And from worst slavery—(that of reason)—start.
Thou, on thy country's hills, can'st praise bestow,
Yet stoop not the encomium to her snow!
So wants confess'd, but strengthen merit's claim,
And right from wrong distinguish'd fixes fame.

When rock-fenc'd Scotland boasts her hardy
race,
Or English beauty claims but matchless grace;
When France the praise of sprightliest wits assumes,

And German plainness spreads its honest plumes;
Concurring plaudits grant unquestion'd dues,
And truth and reason sanctify the muse.

But shou'd Teutonic heaviness aspire,
From French vivacity to ravish fire,
Or Caledonia's manlike virgins vie,
With the soft sunshine of an English eye,
Justice wou'd blush at nature's erring pride,
And each forc'd trophy be by truth deny'd.

More just thy mind, more gen'rous is thy muse!
Albanian born, this English theme to choose:
No partial flattery need thy verse invade,
That in the ear of Scotland sounds a Wade.

Such as thy muse, such is thy patron's aim;
Nor north nor south can bound his spirit's claim.
Warm'd from within, he burns with Roman fires;
Shines for the world, and for mankind aspires;
Adorning power, he beautifies a state;
Endears dominion, and absolves the great.
Kind by his care, rapacious licence grows,
And polish'd jealousy no hatred knows:
Felt in their hearts, to love of faith he charms,
And softly conqu'ring, needs no aid of arms.

When (ages hence) his last line's lengthen'd
dies,

And his lost dust reveals not where it lies;
Still shall his living greatness guard his name,
And his works lift him to immortal fame.
Then shall astonish'd armies, marching high,
O'er causeway'd mountains that invade the sky,
Climb the rais'd arch, that sweeps its distant throw,
Cross tumbling floods, which roar unheard below,
Gaze, from the cliff's cut edge, through midway
air,

And, trembling, wonder at their safety there!
Pierce fenny deeps with firm unsinking tread,
And o'er drain'd deserts wholesome empire spread.

While charm'd, the soldier dwells on wonders
pass'd, [last,
Some chief, more knowing and more touch'd—at
Shall, (pointing) to the attentive files, explain,
How (many a cent'ry since)—in George's reign,
Wade's working soul, that grac'd his prince's throne,
Built these vast monuments—and spar'd his own.

VERSES WRITTEN ON WINDOWS,

In several Parts of the Kingdom, in a Journey to Scotland.

LETTERS from absent friends extinguish fear,
Unite division, and draw distance near:
Their magic force each silent wish conveys,
And wafts embody'd thought a thousand ways:
Could souls to bodies write, death's power were mean,
For minds could then meet minds, with heaven between.

ORDER! thou eye of action! wanting thee,
Wisdom works hoodwink'd in perplexity;
Entangled reason trips at every pace,
And truth bespotted, puts on error's face.

TENER-HANDED stroke a nettle,
And it stings you for your pains;
Grasp it like a man of mettle,
And it soft as silk remains.

'Tis the same with common natures,
Use 'em kindly they rebel:
But be rough as nutmeg-graters,
And the rogues obey you well,

How is the world deceiv'd by noise and show!
Alas! how diff'rent to pretend and know!
Like a poor high way brook, pretence runs loud
Bustling, but shallow, dirty, weak, and proud:
While, like some nobler stream, true knowledge
glides,
Silently strong, and its deep bottom hides.

WHIG and Torry scratch and bite,
Just as hungry dogs we see:
Toss a bone 'twixt two they fight,
Throw a couple they agree.

WOMEN talk of love for fashion,
 So they do of spirits walking :
 But no more they feel the passion,
 Than they see the ghost of which they're talking.

HAVE a care, gay, young, and wanton,
 Give no ground for love to plant on ;
 Guard against the fair deceiver,
 See and hear, but don't believe her :
 Or if nothing seems unjust,er,
 Than to love, and yet distrust her :
 On your side to turn the laughter,
 Try her first, and trust her after.

HERE in wet and windy weather,
 Muse and I two mopes together,
 Far from friends, and short of pleasure,
 Wanting every thing but leisure :
 Scarce content in any one sense,
 Tell the showers, and scribble nonsense.

WHERE'ER the diamond's busy point could pass,
 See what deep wounds have pierc'd the middle glass !
 While partial and untouching all the rest,
 Highest and lowest panes shine unimpres'd !
 No wonder this !—For e'en in life 'tis so ;
 High fortunes stand unreach'd—unseen the low,
 But middle states are marks for every blow.

As in a journey just begun,
 We think the distance vast,
 Yet while we travel gaily on,
 Insensibly 'tis past.

So in our youth we measure flow,
 Long views of promis'd breath :
 'Till like a shadow out we go,
 And vanish into death.

WERE women wise, their names on glass,
 Light froth of empty fashion !
 Would to their lovers sorrow pass,
 For proofs of brittle passion.
 Love should in secret, like the sun,
 Burn though a world should shade it ;
 But shows its source of heat to none,
 Except that God who made it.

THE DISTINCTION OF AGES.

THE seven first years of life, (man's break of day)
 Gleams of short sense, a dawn of thought display ;
 When fourteen springs have bloom'd his downy cheek,
 His soft and blushful meanings learn to speak ;
 From twenty-one proud manhood takes its date,
 Yet is not strength complete 'till twenty eight ;
 Thence to his five-and-thirtieth, life's gay fire
 Sparkles, burns loud, and flames in fierce desire :
 At forty-two, his eyes grave wisdom wear,
 And the dark future dims him o'er with care ;
 On to the nine-and-fortieth, toils increase,
 And busy hopes and fears disturb his peace ;
 At fifty-six, cool reason reigns entire,
 Then life burns steady, and with temp'rate fire ;

But sixty-three unbinds the body's strength,
 E'er th' unwearied mind has run her length ;
 And when from seventy, age surveys her last,
 Tir'd she stops short—and wishes all were past.

THE MUSE TO THE WRITER.

A TRANSLATION FROM THE FRENCH OF DUBARTAS.

SCARCE was the April of my life begun,
 When anxious to immortalize my name,
 Pleasure and soft repose I learn'd to shun,
 And lab'ring upward, sought the mounts of fame.
 But as a traveller, in viewless plains,
 Stops amid crossing roads, and doubts his way ;
 Pensively searchful, and unsure remains,
 Eager to journey on, yet loth to stray.
 So stop'd, and so unfix'd, I mark'd around,
 The flow'ry paths that led to groves of bays ;
 But pausing, doubtful, long confusion found,
 Which best to choose of all those tempting ways.
 One while my genius plann'd the glowing scene,
 And from the Grecian source example drew ;
 Taught pride to pity, ignorance to mean,
 And form'd the many, by the suffering few.
 Anon domestic discord snatch'd my pen,
 My country's woes I now aspir'd to feel ;
 Historic truths, and wrongs of injur'd men,
 Impell'd my justice, and inflam'd my zeal.
 Then sinking sudden, from the glorious height,
 Low mercenary praises quench'd my fire ;
 Poorly a flatt'rer, I for profit write,
 And to my fortune tune my tortur'd lyre.
 At length grown lazy, I by love was caught,
 And finding age, and taste, and will to fit,
 In warm light sallies, wanton lessons taught,
 And to the size of Cupid crop'd my wit.
 While roving thus uncenter'd and unstead,
 I lik'd by turns, and did by turns refuse ;
 Sudden before me a descending maid,
 Confess'd the shape of a celestial muse.
 All that we dream of angels form'd her air ;
 Sweet was her gesture and her step divine :
 But when she spoke, she would have charm'd despair,
 And taught the gloom of wither'd age to shine.
 High from her head, aspir'd a starry crown,
 Immensely beaming its effulgence round ;
 An azure mantle flow'd obliquely down,
 And bright with lamps of silver swept the
 ground.
 Mortal ! she cry'd, Urania's face behold !
 Urania—muse of all the heavenly nine ;
 Best skill'd the paths of glory to unfold,
 And make the poet (like his art) divine.
 I through the dancing numbers breathe a soul,
 And to the sound of reason tune mankind ;
 I teach true pleasures, false ones to controul,
 And warm the yielding heart, to stamp the
 mind.

Mark me, and keep my image long in sight,
And when departed to my starry sphere,
Strike this new harp, and from it draw delight,
By sounds that list'ning angels love to hear.

Long have I mourn'd my sister's fully'd fame,
By friendless mirth or cheerless malice stain'd;
Cramp'd by cold flatteries that blight their name,
Or by wild warmth of loose desire profan'd.

But most I grieve that rebel waste of wit,
Which boldly pushing its infernal claim,
With darkness for such blind presumption fit,
Turns its own arms on heaven with impious aim.

Learnt are the vulgar arts—but poets draw, [fire :
From heaven alone the gift that wings their
Not the best lights that ever learning saw,
Could living verse by study'd strength inspire.

Thence 'tis that Homer, powerless, poor, and blind,
Beggar, himself has taught e'en kings to shine :
Buoy'd sinking heroes by fresh floods of mind,
And stretch'd the human grasp with reach divine.

Thence 'tis that Ovid could not speak in prose,
But wept in measure, and expir'd in verse :
Thence the Jessian lyre to music rose,
Which seraphs in their Maker's ear rehearse.

Read, meditate, reflect, grow wise—in vain;
Try every help; force fire from every spark;
Yet, shall you ne'er the poet's power attain,
If heav'n ne'er stamp'd you with the muses mark.

Man must be out of man sublimely swell'd,
Whose wreckless verse would swim the storms
of time,
By force, not fury, meaningly impell'd,
To scorn the puny prostitutes of rhyme.

The warmth of fury but compassion moves,
And less than man makes man to man appear :
But warmth of genius, man from man removes,
And lifts his wid'ning soul to Heaven's high sphere.

Mark this soft flute—when void of vocal wind,
In tuneless silence rests the sleeping sound :
Yet, when thus breath'd in, hark! what power
'twill find,
To waft the modulated raptures round!

So, till the whisp'ring Godhead bids—begin,
The poet's silent spirit stands unbent :
But when he feels th' inspiring power within,
Tuneful he spreads the transports heaven has lent.

Since, therefore, all that makes his genius shine,
Is heaven's own gift,—how dares he subjects
choose,
Base and unworthy of that warmth divine,
And poorly noxious to the passive muse?

Why is his pen employ'd on idle themes?
Why is his fancy light? his purpose low?
Why does he waste his fire in fruitless dreams?
And with a tide of wanton wishes flow?

Why does he stoop to praise unletter'd pride?
Why celebrate defects in those who rule?
Why does his wit soft am'rous trains provide,
And bid love's wild-fire catch from fool to fool?

Ah! 'tis too much that he himself has crimes,
Which, unrepented, ne'er unpunish'd go :
Why would he lend his guilt to distant times,
And teach an unborn race to merit woe?

As on the yielding wax the seal we find,
Left in strong likeness with imprinted glow :
So does the reader steal the poet's mind,
And to the bias lent inclining go.

Shame on your pens, ye flexible of heart!
Whose poorness does not hurt yourselves alone,
But teaches blockheads to despise your art;
Judg'd by false patterns you have lightly shown.

Conscious of this, would you but turn at last,
And bid true genius with true lustre shine ;
All would, admiring, lose th' impression past,
And feel and own you of a stamp divine.

Then as my Moses his Jehovah sung,
And Israel wafted by the guardian rod :
Poets from every kindling country sprung,
Shall in a thousand tongues uncover God.

O you, who would the deathless laurel win,
No king's vile badge, but time's all-rev'rend
crown!

High as the fountain of your verse begin,
And with the god you write for, share renown.

This is a subject, that outstretching thought,
Through depths unfounded, wit's long plummet draws :

There by immense effects immensely taught,
Pour out your straining souls, and claim applause.

There, and there only, find the road to fame ;
The hardest themes the noblest glory yield :
On low light subjects scorn to build a name ;
But ent'ring boldly, plough th' untrodden field.

Vainly shall envy blast your budding praise ;
Malice and hatred vainly press you down :
Slow shall you rise, indeed, but sure to blaze,
And hourly broad'ning reach decreed renown.

Envy's a cur, that at all strangers barks ;
But on the known and licens'd creeps to fawn :
Its hov'ring smoke hangs hard on kindling sparks,
But when the fire burns up 'tis strait withdrawn.

On then, be mine—Urania hears your pray'r ;
Glow in your breast and fans it gen'rous flame :
Write to be read—be times to come your care,
And bloom for ever fragrant still the same.

She said : and breath'd ambrosial o'er my face :
The circling sweetness swell'd my ravish'd mind ;
She rose, and left me in an empty space ;
But left her pow'rful influence still behind.

AN ODE TO ASTRÆ :

FROM THE FRENCH OF DUBARTAS.

FAIREST pattern from above,
Though I only live for love,
'Tis not for those sparkling eyes;
Though the stars that gild the skies,
When the twinklers shine most bright,
So compar'd have lost their light.
Though the sun in all his blaze,
Sees that smile, and hides his rays.

'Tis not that my fancy dips,
In the rainbow's red thy lips,
'Tis not ev'n thy lips that please:
Though the happiest Hybla bees,
When they rob the flow'ry spring,
Never ply'd the busy wing,
Charg'd with honey half so sweet,
As it would be those lips to meet.

'Tis not your neglect of air,
Far outcharming others care;
Nor those locks that fall resign'd,
Catch'd and courted by the wind:
Though the drifts of glitt'ring sand,
Strow'd o'er Afric's yellow strand,
Ne'er to charm ambition, roll'd
Half such tempting veins of gold.

'Tis not to those polish'd rows,
'Twixt whose openings music flows,
That I find my offerings due,
Vows so tender and so true!
Though the pearl-producing east
Ne'er did Europe's wonder feast,
Spite of all its toothy store,
With such ivory before.

'Tis not that declining waist,
Nor that neck so sweetly grac'd;
Nor the pantings of that breast,
(Soft as pity, and as blest!)
I could even that breast defy:
Though were Læda's swan but nigh,
All its down would fail to show,
Half so white and soft a snow.

When that forehead I behold,
(Smooth as flatt'ry and as cold!)
'Tis not its majestic frown
Throws my heart's defences down:
Though the silver moon at height,
Shines less awful through the night,
Than the meanings of that brow
Shoot correction at me now.

'Tis not that this azure vein
Marks your arm with heav'n's own stain,
While along the white it flows,
Swell'd with triumph as it goes;
'Tis not this engaging hand,
Holds my heart in soft command;
Though to hear it touch the lute,
Rocks would speak—and birds grow mute.

Teach me, then, mysterious fair,
What your power to charm, and where?
If this flame of my desire,
Did not at your eyes catch fire:
If those lips (how sweet they be!)
Have not thus entangled me;
Tell me what my heart could move?
Teach me whence arose my love?

If those ringlets of your hair
Did not string this amorous snare;
If that beauteous mouth has fail'd,
Nor those ivory teeth prevail'd?
Tell me what resistless cause,
Felt unknown my fancy draws?

Still unpleas'd but where you are,
Still untaught what pleases there!

Since those breasts—(how soft they rise!)
Reach no farther than my eyes;
Since I count a thousand charms,
None of which my heart disarms:
Let your still-uncounted store
Guide my search to find out more,
Till the cause I learn to know,
Pleasing cause! that charms me so.

Ah! 'tis found—delightful truth!
Sense with beauty, temp'ring youth.—
'Tis that peerless soul of thine,
Breaks like day-light into mine;
Charg'd with heav'n's ethereal flame!
Full of charms without a name!
'Tis thy converse turn'd to move,
Claims respect and forces love.

EPIGRAM,

On giving the Name of Georgia to a Part of Carolina.

WHILE rip'ning flow the future purpose lay,
And conscious silence plann'd the op'ning way;
Kind o'er the rising scheme an angel hung,
And dropt this counsel from his guardian tongue:
Wish you this way the royal pair inclin'd?
To Carolina be a Georgia join'd—
Then shall both colonies sure progress make,
Endear'd to either for the other's sake:
Georgia shall Carolina's favour move;
And Carolina bloom by George's love.

A LETTER

From a departed Spirit to the Author (Mr. Pope), of a Lady's Character, lately published in a Thursday's Journal.

STIRT to the naked soul, escap'd from clay,
From doubts unfetter'd, and dissolv'd in day;
Unwarm'd by vanity, unreach'd by strife,
And all my hopes and fears thrown off with life:
Why am I charm'd by friendship's fond essays,
And though unbody'd conscious of thy praise?
Has pride a portion in the parted soul?
Does passion still the formless mind controul?
Can gratitude out-pant the silent breath?
Or a friend's sorrow pierce the glooms of death?
No—'tis a spirit's nobler taste of bliss!
That feels the worth it left in proofs like this:
That not its own applause, but thine approves,
Whose practice praises, and whose virtue loves!
Who liv'st to crown departed friends with fame,
Then dying late, shall all thou gav'st reclaim.

THE CIV. PSALM.

LET my exalted harp be doubly strung!
High-tune thy praise, my soul! and let thy God
be sung!
See! how around his throne the conscious rays
Shoot quiv'ring, with continuous curve, and tremble in their blaze! [displays!
See! what soul-shaking majesty, effulgent he

Cloth'd with embodied light, see! where he stands!
 Pointing wide his dread commands!
 As earth's dim flames, o'erwhelm'd by streaming day,
 Beneath the sun-beams die away;
 The sun full met, with cover'd face, retires,
 Burns inward and rolls back his frightened fires!
 Gracious, th' unequal eye of man to screen!
 See! where the maker kindly shades the too resplendent scene!
 And like a curtain widely drawn, spreads out whole heaven between.
 Look! now, amazing! where he glides!
 Look! where yon gathering host of clouds he dreadfully bestrides!
 And, awful on those self-roll'd chariots rides!
 He moves! he walks upon the swift-wing'd wind!
 He steps, from world to world at once, and leaves even thought behind!
 Myriads of hovering angels crowd the God-grac'd scene to fill!
 Angels! fit heralds for th' Almighty's will!
 Ten thousand firey light'nings sweep his way!
 Nimble couriers of his sway!
 And round his temples, hissing swift, in blue meanders play
 The firm-fix'd balance of the self pois'd globe,
 To neither bias partial sway'd, [obey'd!
 Became thus just, at his great word, and lastingly
 At his command the covering deep, drew off the world's wet robe;
 Gave back, and fill'd the channels he had made!
 But peeping o'er the hills reluctant staid;
 Displeas'd with its new bounds, but more afraid,
 Its old to re-invade!
 E'en yet the stubborn-hearted flood, no more High-licens'd as before,
 Disdains to give its proud repinings o'er:
 Oft, with bold murmurs, it alarms the shore,
 And, now and then, with rebel rage breaks out in general roar!
 But when presumptuous billows swell too high,
 And sprinkle heaven's eternal eye:
 Straight all the thunders of God's voice in loud resentment rise;
 The starting flood hears, shakes, and flies!
 Down sinks the quash'd aspirer from the skies,
 And hush'd in humble flatness lies!
 Yet if the Sovereign will but nods, black oceans quit their bed!
 Foamy they lash each other on, with high discovering head,
 And curling climb the steepy hills, and o'er drown'd mountains spread;
 Thence call'd again, again they rush, confessing God's controul!
 Again let loose, re-seek their sandy beds,
 Tumble for haste o'er one another's heads!
 And, sweeping with resistless breadth, o'er delug'd kingdoms roll!
 Fierce as they are, they're subject to his check!
 They know th' appointed bounds, and watch th' imperious beck!

From the huge treas'ry of the briny deep,
 Through thousand earth-form'd lab'rins taught to slide,
 In search of springs the salt-stript waters creep,
 And trickling thence into sweet rivers glide.
 Smooth-travelling to seek their mazy way,
 And devious 'twixt th' enamour'd hills, slowly delightful stray;
 These God appointed thus to flow, exhaustless stores of drink,
 Where every beast may quench his thirst, that seeks the smiling brink!
 And in the shady groves, which on their borders rise,
 He hous'd the warbling songsters of the skies!
 The pride-swolln mountains, which ambitious grow, [below;
 And neighb'ring heaven disdain the world
 Nor will to humble brooks refreshment owe,
 He waters with th' ætherial seas or coronets of snow!
 Amazing goodness! where's the smallest space,
 That does not feel and boast his grace?
 For cattle's food green flourishes the flow'r-embroider'd mead;
 For man's free use is every fruit decreed:
 For him th' inspiring grape was taught to bleed;
 Bread-bearing corn makes glad the labourer's toil; [oil.
 And his rough skin grows supple, smooth'd with
 When, at fix'd times, up rolls the changeful moon,
 God shoots her shadowy gleam through night's black noon!
 Rapid as is the ever-wheeling sun,
 He dares not measure heaven one thought too soon?
 Yet at God's word the flag of day is furl'd,
 And licens'd darkness rises o'er the world:
 Then does the gloomy forest quake,
 And all th' assembled savage kind their holiday then make:
 Leaf-trembling trees in silent horror shake,
 And panting herds creep terrified away,
 While the stern lion, hungry, roars and stalks abroad for prey.
 God suffers him the needful prey to take,
 And then new-wakes the day:
 Out breaks the sun, and to their dens the beasts fly swift away. [found!
 Almighty Power! how dost thou thought conceal?
 What human search can trace thy mazy round?
 How wisely, and how vastly, Lord! are all thy wonders done:
 Not earth alone does with thy wealth abound,
 But all above, and all beneath the sun.
 The sea's wild herds, as well as those on land,
 Rough-moulded sons too of thy formal hand,
 All live and move by thy command. [ing eye;
 The horrid wonders of that scene fatigue the ach-
 There wave-toss'd ships the op'ning depths defy;
 And circling through th' imprison'd winds their different courses ply:
 There does Leviathan wide-wallowing lie;

And while his broad unwieldy sports the scaly
people fly, [at the sky.
He, dreadful monster! sucks in seas and spouts 'em
On thee, obedient, all thy creatures wait;
And, in due season, all by thee are fed:
Thy single bounty does their bliss create;
They gather what thy op'ning hand has spread;
If thou but hid'st thy face they fall away:
Thou tak'st their breath and they decay;
At once return to uniform'd dust and old paternal
clay.

Again thou dost but speak thy potent will,
And life, rekindling, glows within 'em still!
For ever shall thy glorious power endure:
The pillars of thy majesty stand stedfastly and sure:
Approach'd by thee, the conscious mountains smoke,
And earth dissolv'd, flows loose beneath thy stroke!

TO HIS MUSE.

THY country! blast it, if it once disdains
To prop thy virtues, or reward thy pains:
If there I prosper, here was only born
That claims my duty: this deserves my scorn.
O muse! 'tis mean to stoop to helpless moan;
Try if no clime is gentler than thy own:
Offer, on distant shores, a faithful hand;
In vain, not useless, in thy mother land.
When fortune frowns, and care's black harvest
springs,

A change of place, a change of prospect brings:
Far off thy reason's force uncurb'd may reign;
But even the prophets preach'd at home in vain.

Yet hold; and e'er it quite determin'd grows,
Let me some sudden starts of hope disclose:
E'er, widely wand'ring, led by false distrust,
From my wing'd feet I shake their native dust.
Perhaps my doubt clouds some domestic ray,
And hides a prospect bordering on my way:
Though men of title seem exempt from thought,
And pride's assistance is but vainly sought;
Though truth, oft try'd, this known advice im-
parts,

That noble blood may warm ignoble hearts:
Hid in a cloud of pomp which hems the throne,
There may be greatness, to my hopes unknown;
How'er unfought, how'er unseen by me,
There may some soul-distinguish'd nature be:
Some gen'rous breast, whose mind, divinely warm,
Has taught him how uncourted favours charm.

If such there be, so rich, so strong a mind,
And thou, blest muse, shall his bright bosom find,
Whisper, in gentle notes, thy master's pray'r,
And in soft accents this sad truth declare:

There lives, O brightest gem of honour's crown,
Thou angel-act'd theme of just renown!
There lives, who, skill'd in fortune's wanton sports,
Hopes, with such faintness, for regard from courts,
That, though not blind to worth, which all men
see,

He sends me, half despairing, even to thee.
No gain-polluted aim inspires his views;
He seeks not office, nor reward pursues: [sign,
More nobly fir'd, his thoughts high schemes de-
To stretch dominion, and make empire shine.

Oh! were his wishes blest, and thy kind ear
Would once, impartial, his conceptions hear;
Th' important moment might resolves produce,
And clothe ideas with substantial use.

Stop there, O muse! 'twere needless more to say;
And with unwilling slowness glide away:
If mov'd, he calls thee back, regardful, go;
If not, return ungriev'd; all vain complaint is low!

THE TEARS OF THE MUSES.

A POEM.

GERMANICUS, for love and empire born,
At once to govern kingdoms, and adorn;
Too good for greatness, but that kings can bless;
Too firm for fear, but of his friend's distress.
Fore-temp'ring pow'r, by reason's generous plan,
To task the monarch, meditates the man.

In a town grove, whence Driad's noise exclude,
And hush loud streets to sylvan solitude,
Veil'd by a verdant skreen's encircling shade,
Whose angly sides eight arching lights pervade;
Friend to mankind their pensive fav'rite stood,
Revolving previous plans of purpos'd good.

Soft to his sight a female suppliant press'd,
In all the speaking marks of mis'ry dress'd;
Down-look'd, relax'd of mien, oft bending low,
Now stopping short, now re-advancing flow:
Pardon, she cry'd, th' intruding sighs of grief
Hope is the friendless wretch's last relief.

Germanicus, who, when distress draws nigh,
Catches quick sorrow from the suff'rer's eye;
With gentle waft invites her back'ning fears,
And smiles the warmth of pity on her tears.
Her, while advancing, heedful he survey'd,
Chance stretch'd his eye to the remoter shade;
Where, dimly obvious, from the bord'ring wood,
Dark'ning the arches, eight new phantoms stood,
All like the first, thin forms of shiv'ring woe,
Wept all—in dumb, sad, solemn, circl'y show.

Think, cry'd th' approacher, prostrate at his feet,
How sharp is insult, and relief how sweet:
Pity a wretched sisterhood of tears,
Nine friendless mourners, whom no comfort cheers.
All arts were ours, that polish'd life could gain;
But arts, and polish'd life, were ours in vain.
See what reward wish'd knowledge could impart,
Where fool is fashion, ignorance is art.
Urg'd by derision, and escaping hate,
We sad, slow exiles, seek some gentler fate.
To the bleak north's new-rising coasts we go,
Less cold than these, amidst eternal snow.
Glory's gay beams, to whose felt warmth we run,
More than supply the absence of their sun.
There mourning merit cannot miss relief,
Where watchful pow'r supplants prevented grief.
Fam'd for munificence, thy princely hand
Singly absolves an unbestowing land.
Ah! save the friendless—help the wrong'd away;
Too poor to go, yet too unlov'd to stay.
Pay but wish'd passage from this cruel shore,
And never, never will we trust it more.

Scarce had th' imploring accents voic'd her
pray'r,
When the known sounds and recollected air

Through the false semblance, natively convey'd
To the charm'd prince, a speaking muse betray'd.
Round, while uncrediting the storied woe,
His curious eyes discov'ring glances throw.
Th' examin'd umbrage, as he turn'd, reveal'd
Each muse that ev'ry distant arch conceal'd.
Waiting impatient for the finish'd tale,
Quit your vain hope, he cry'd, by want's thin veil
Unhid, to 'scape the rev'rence of my zeal,
Who all your power through all your changes feel.
Joyful he snatch'd th' implorer from the ground,
Then, turning graceful, bow'd progressive round;
Press'd their joint access, undisguis'd and gay,
And shone receptive of each effluent ray.

Seated and circled by the beamy train,
Their shapes resuming, and themselves again;
Tell me, said he, ye soul-inspiring nine!
Ye living fires that give the great to shine,
Who, quick'ning regal courage into flame,
Guide it, by justice, to immortal fame.
Why would ye leave a land distinguish'd long
For love of valour, and for hate of wrong;
Where freedom unrestrain'd her empire holds,
And legal monarchy new bloom unfolds?

He paus'd—and Clio answering, thus began:
Perish pale malice!—It oblit'rates man.
Where envy blasts, the muse inspires in vain;
No human culture there extends its reign.
Lost in malignity by civil hate,
Virtues that clash with virtues, curse a state.
Stifled in faction, arts unfriended sink,
Or pigmy'd into partial flatt'ry shrink.
Hist'ry must blush the wiles of spleen to pen,
And grace the bloodless broils of angry men.

Smother'd in self there breathes no public soul,
Where sep'rate strugglings general strength controul;

There policy's old gen'rous straitness bends;
And shifting medium crawls to sidelong ends:
There fraud triumphant, tempts the just to fall;
And every one man's gain is loss to all:
There love internal, checking sighs that roam,
Begins and ends all charity—at home.
Each pray'r appropriates one man's modest aim,
And humbly trusts to God, the common claim.
Crush'd by contempt of praise exertion dies,
And public spirit, laugh'd at, shuns to rise.

Thither when hope misleads th' historic muse,
Swift let her seek some scene of nobler views;
Where guileless pow'r no praise to craft ascribes,
Where courage scorns deceit and duty—bribes;
Where nervous meaning dares directly speak,
And crooked windings teach no truth to sneak.

'Tis found—for see—the icy pole dissolves;
Honour's new warmth with sunny force involves.
There glows event, there more than Roman arms
Clash their prophetic thunder's fear'd alarms:
There the puls'd public beats in ev'ry vein;
Strong to one purpose, lifts with equal strain.
No vile pretension there at titles aims;
No pride-swoln lumber lazy lordship shames:
There shines the sword in honour's guarded track;
No knight-hood blushes on a miser's back;
No bought emblaz'nings eminence efface;
No dirty dignity sublimed disgrace:

There heroes multiply; and labouring fame
Grows busy—to record each sparkling name.

She ceased—the prince, his patriot eyes with-drew;

[true;
Weigh'd the long charge, and wish'd it half un-
Sigh'd at the waste domestic discord made,
And mourn'd unfriended arts by spleen betray'd:
Then view'd the sisters, re-prepar'd to hear,
While Erato, soft sighing, charm'd his ear.

Lur'd, said the am'rous muse, from realms above,

Pleas'd I descended on this land of love:
Look'd and approv'd; and form'd aerial schemes
Of heart-felt ties, and hope's elusive dreams;
Vainly propos'd—each sex by each to mend,
And smooth the rugged paths of life with friend.
Snatch'd at one sweet example new to fame,
Urg'd its dear pow'r th' unhappier to reclaim.
Misguided millions hail'd th' acknowledg'd charms,
And lov'd perfection when it bless'd thy arms.
But ah! too lost at length themselves were gone;
They worshipp'd and confess'd—but still sinn'd on.
Yet I, vain hop'er, still new helps apply;
And, ever failing, would for ever try.

To slighted beauty would new powers impart,
And stretch the aided empire of the heart.
Teach man that woman's strength in softness lies;
Teach woman why the modest charm the wise.

Useless to either I from both remove;
Money's th' inspiring muse of modish love:
O'er truth and passion avarice prevails,
All vows are venal, and all sighs are sales.

Int'rest and vanity, and self, disarm
Mutual esteem, till neither sex can charm:
The blank unnat'ral whims pervert desire,
Attraction failing they exchange attire.

Then man's lac'd lightness apes the lady's air;
And bluff big boldness masculates the fair.
With changing sexes, love's lost motives change,
From wish to wish, the short-liv'd passions range;
Recorded constancy becomes romance,
And, among millions, two may love—by chance!

Why should I then supporting present scorn,
Stretch my too patient hope to times unborn?
When to the north, where nature shines unstain'd,
Confiding sexes love with faith unfeign'd,
Their native beauties, in no clime excell'd,
To rising force by conscious worth impell'd;
While through the sparkling eye taught spirit breaks,

And the felt lustre of their fame partakes.

The lover prince unwillingly believ'd,
Faults which his nobler nature scarce conceiv'd;
Touch'd for the honour of the human heart,
His own glow'd painful with ideal smart:
When loftier accents from Urania broke,
And snatch'd his list'ning soul, while science spoke.

From heav'n's unsounded depth, she cry'd, I stole
Angelic fire, and form'd a Newton's soul;
Taught him the secret walks of God to tread,
And 'twixt the starry worlds his spirit led.
All æther op'ning to a mortal's eyes,
Till earth sent colonies, and held the skies,
What king for this magnificently just,
Bless'd him in life, or dignified his dust?

What voted honours mark the aspirer's race?
 What thinking statues emulate his face?
 He who immortaliz'd his country's name,
 Beyond ten thousand conqu'rors bounded fame,
 He, who to lift mankind, new heav'ns display'd,
 And every human breather nobler made;
 Did he to public fame all nature raise?
 And is he poorly left to private praise?
 In such a land, ah! what can arts expect,
 What claim has hopeless science, but neglect.

O fate of wint'ry worth, by climate cross'd!
 Budding untimely to be nip'd in frost!
 Newton has multiplied the suns!—yet pours
 In vain the light of all their orbs on ours,
 When will the incurious courts for which he found
 New worlds, find will to trace an old one round?
 What promis'd pension ships th' unshaken soul,
 To dare discov'ry and ungloom the pole?
 What coasting keel indenting southern strands,
 Starts the long shores of cloud-benighted lands?
 No annual bounty persevering kind,
 Draws the dark veil that covers half mankind.
 What regal influ'nce easing learning's birth,
 Now adds new stars to heav'n, or arts to earth?
 Who sows munificence to root up sloth,
 And call forth harvests of eternal growth?

Hail to the land where war makes science room!
 Where realms from deserts rise, and ruins bloom!
 Where conquest spreading to embrace distress,
 Lets loose ambition, not to waste, but bless:
 There pow'r inverts destruction into birth,
 And the prolific sword empeoples earth!
 There desolation, fruitful in decay,
 Fades into opulence, and strengthens sway.
 There ports (unnative) indrawn seas confine,
 And climbing streams o'er channel'd mountains
 shine;

There public splendor swallows private pride,
 And claims which all men share in all men guide;
 There art rewarded strains excited skill,
 Till dazzling wonders wid'ning empire fill:
 The fierce free Tartar, sees the Tartar taught,
 Grins at advancing rule, and pants for thought;
 Then in long link, new nations forward draw,
 And the drain'd wilds of nature crowd to law.
 Hail promis'd land!—All now that seems severe,
 Is—that removing hence we leave you here.

Urania stopp'd and bow'd.—The prince whose heart

Inly confess'd the pow'r of cherish'd art,
 Nobly approving praise so justly warm,
 Smil'd conscious of his inborn right to charm.

Next rose Terpsichore,—melodious muse!
 Soft her first accents like descending dews;
 Sweet, and slow swelling, till in livelier sound,
 Gay to the ravish'd ear quick transports bound.
 Tim'd to the tuneful voice each trembling tree
 Strain'd its tugg'd roots, and labour'd to be free:
 Warm'd through the wak'ning stone the sculptur'd ear

Of every starting statue seem'd to hear;
 Air catch'd, and length'ning back the mazy notes,
 Curls, while the undulating music floats.
 Earth list'ning to inhale harmonious pain,
 Sigh'd it in soft vibration back again.

VOL. VIII.

Pardon a mourning muse that leaves with tears,
 The land that lov'd Germanicus endears;
 But ah, what toils! what anguish shalt thou bear!
 What endless labour must o'erload thy care!
 Ere thy last views a taste like thine inspire,
 And sparkling kingdoms catch thy manly fire!

Near operas fribling fugues what muse can stay,
 Where wordless warblings winnow thought away;
 Music when purpose points her not the road,
 Charms to betray, and softens to corrode:
 Empty of sense, the soul-seducing art
 Thrills a slow poison to the sick'ning heart:
 Soft sinks idea dissolute in ease,
 And all life's feeble lesson is to please.
 Spirit, and taste, and generous toil, take flight,
 And lazy love, and indolent delight,
 And low luxurious weariness of pain,
 Lull the lost mind,—and all its powers are vain.

Hence to the realms of fame ye muses fly,
 There to the drum's big beat the heart leaps
 high;

There fighting flutes but temp'ring martial heat,
 Teach distant pity and revenge to meet;
 The manly pipe there scorns th' expanded shakes,
 That wind wav'd nothings, till attention akes;
 There now concurring keys and chords increase,
 The heart's soft social ties, and cherish peace;
 Then trumpets answ'ring trumpets shrill and far,
 Swell to the sounding wind th' inspiring war;
 There the rous'd soul in exercise grows strong,
 Nor pools to puddly foulness stopp'd too long:
 Strength'ning and strengthened by the poet's fire,
 There music's meaning voice exalts desire;
 There harmony not drowns but quickens thought,
 And fools unfeeling words by notes are caught.

Soft sigh'd the prince, for suff'ring music pain'd,
 And Polyhymnia rising warm complain'd:
 Deign to be told impartial, gen'rous, wise,
 Why fruitless eloquence indignant flies;
 Gall'd at lost time in cases vainly clear'd,
 At truths untouching, and at sounds unheard;
 Blushing, while oratory's lab'ring strains
 On pre-decision waste derided pains;
 And flourish'd periods to no purpose fine,
 Like suns in deserts, without notice shine;
 Hating grave insult, I disdain to stay,
 Where talk but trifles, and where tropes but play:
 If serious rhet'ric sweats where sneering mutes
 Hast'ning the hurried question, crop disputes;
 If law sells argument, yet forms must reign,
 And custom pleading, equity is vain;
 If the dark pulpit's short mysterious art,
 Lifts faith to heav'n, and damns the moral heart;
 Bear me, dishonour'd God! to some plain state,
 Where truth, in spite of aye and no, is weight;
 Where pleas of right a reas'ning bench persuade,
 And justice scorns in precedent to trade;
 Where no bold blasphemy would faith enslave,
 But humble, honest, doubting works, can save.

Euterpe, watchful of her sister's close,
 Snatch'd her sunk cadence, and impatient rose:
 Pleasure, she cry'd, is mine, mine the gay skill,
 To paint the fancy, and adorn the will.
 But where dry avarice has taste betray'd,
 Pleasure is robbery in masquerade;

Contending sexes push one common aim,
And youth, and wit, and beauty, meet to game;
At cards to conquer, or at dice to sweep,
Is all the humble joy the polish'd reap.

Or, if aspiring to robust praise,
Some livelier genius warmth more active sways;
'Then frock'd in gloomy fleckness, tight and smart,
The pert cap'd racer dares the jockey's art;
At stake and plate his skill profoundly shown,
He from his horse's worth presumes his own.

Or, nobly stung by John the coachman's claim,
Climbing th' advent'rous box, disputes his fame;
Scatt'ring malignant dust, cracks voice and thong,
Glow for a livery's right, and burns along:
Proudly display'd, looks back, and shouts to find
Poor conscious John, less glorious, hang behind.

Not so th' Olympian rivals charm'd of old,
When fiery youths in whirling chariots roll'd;
'Then the watch'd signal bade the rank disjoin,
And rushing wheels dissolv'd the breaking line:
Strain'd to th' expanded whip's impulsive sound,
Light leap'd th' exulting axles o'er the ground,
'Twixt crowding nations, partial, panting, gay,
The prais'd, plum'd hero skim'd the less'ning way,
'The smoking steeds obey'd the watchful rein,
And winding warlike, swept the shouting plain.
Now graceful rais'd, now pendent in career,
High and far-glitt'ring, shone the charioteer,
Firm in his seat, superior in his mien,
Flew o'er the course, and flam'd along the green;
Martial in gesture, eminent in grace,
His birth and grandeur light'ning from his face.

Or, if to sweeter contest match'd he mov'd,
And in some ball, led the kind hand he lov'd,
The modest fair, flow through the mazy dance,
Swam to the love-sick soul in soft advance;
No light coarse frikking kick'd off woman's air,
No strong stretch'd limb out-trod attraction there,
Decent their pleasures, and discreetly weigh'd,
Active the youth, and delicate the maid:
Honour by elegance its right maintain'd,
And thought correcting rapture, prudence reign'd.

Mournful Melpomene, with tragic frown,
Spoke next; and thus deplor'd a tasteless town.
Why strove the scenic muse to shine in vain,
Where wit is levity, and art is gain?
Where law's blind hope would curb corruption's
rage,

Yet left undue contempt to taint the stage?
Hence theatres neglected into shame,
Catching at concourse, purity disclaim.
By pow'r deserted, make their humbler court
To rake and rancour, or to fool and sport:
Piqu'd to reprisal, unconfes'd rate wit,
Noting the popular, evades the fit.
'Then the play plots on state-craft, laughs at truth,
Misguides allegiance, or unfinews youth;
Thither crowds faction to be taught complaint,
Where pow'r, the martyr, might have reign'd the faint.

There wisdom bleeds, by pleasure's feath'ry dart,
And love's loose hand unstrings the slacken'd heart;
There discontent first tries her tim'rous force,
Hints and finds help and dares her dang'rous
course;

There froth, farce, flatt'ry, chance, sedition, rule;
And virtue scarce finds place in virtue's school.

Farewell, forsaken stage—when courts refuse
To urge wit's wand'ring rein, she shames a muse;
Hail, from afar! thou fate-foretelling light!
Beaming prognostic through the eye of night!
Kindling a hundred realms, th' enliv'ning flame
Wings the wak'd energy of courted fame.

There empire flashing into glory's blaze,
Conscious intention blushes not at praise;
There spurring virtue, wit has leave to mean,
And pow'r exciting passion prompts the scene.

So must it be ere tragic fire is felt, [pelt,
But where grave thoughts are marks for fools to
Where tir'd illit'rate viewless yawning pride
Must hear unlist'ning, and untaught decide,
There let lost sentiment mispoint no beam,
To hope were blindness, and to wish a dream.

Up leap'd Thalia, glowing red with rage,
Fir'd and indignant at a farceful age;
Shall comedy's insulted muse, she cry'd,
Hold hoops to tumblers——

She paus'd—unable to proceed;—sigh'd strong:
Repell'd the big disdain—and trac'd her wrong.

Shall comedy for sworded harlequin
Split lathes, and arm him for the mimic scene?
While he, proud impotence, with modish strut,
Cocks bluff, diffusive of his wooden cut:
Must she swing gypsies o'er the winnow'd pit,
Mounting posteriors in defect of wit;
Or clap some human whirlwind's blust'ring rage,
That o'er twelve heads descending shakes the stage.
Stare while th' unmanly reptile's wriggling twist
Threads the starv'd ladder, and descends unhiss'd?
Or, for the rope-aspirer's jirkful tread,
Shall she poise right their emblematic lead?
No—let implor'd expulsion wing me hence!
Far let me fly to some fair seat of sense; [grace,
Where life's stoll'n humour glows with mirthful
And comic picture copies nature's face;
Where imag'd passion, dear to the polite,
Leaves low buffoon'ry to the rabble's right.
Tir'd, yet untask'd, let me no longer wait,
Laughing unheeded—at the laughing great;
While with the roar of boys to tricks they run,
Which mobs should shout at, and the wise should shun.

Gravely, good souls! reserving solid scorn, [born.
For thoughts to feel whose force themselves were

Warm'd in wit's cause, lamenting genius lost,
Nor tasting ecstasy at judgment's cost,
List'ning Germanicus, with pensive grace,
Revolv'd wish'd soft'nings for a pitied race;
When like a trumpet pouring music's flood,
Speaking Calliope thrill'd through his blood.

There was a prince! ah, bid me add, ere long
There is!—impulsive of the epic song.
Flame of imperial prominence he shin'd;
Terror at once, and charm of human kind!
All the soft praise of social life his due:
All the rais'd pow'rs of arms and arts he knew;
Fearless, impell'd his father's fortune on;
And in youth's dawn a dazzling victor shone;
In force resistless, yet undaring wrong;
Honest in vengeance, and in pity strong.

Without dwelt war, in all her thund'ring din;
 While peace in all her stillness wept within.
 Form'd for a lover, for a thinker taught;
 Bloodless reflective eminence he sought:
 Born to be greatest, chose but to be best;
 But heav'n that knew his use, forbad his rest:
 'Then from the calms of conqu'ring thought he rose,
 Glow'd in tempestuous war, and scorn'd repose.
 Uncrown'd, gave crowns at will, their thorns un-
 try'd;

And more than reigning, without reigning died.
 Such, though the land I leave could show me still,

Calm seasons call not for a pilot's skill.
 Peace is the blessing commerce loves to choose;
 But war and glory task the epic muse.
 Farewell, sure subject of my future song.
 When rising shameful at a people's wrong,
 In times yet distant, thy rememb'ring hand
 Lets loose correction at some foreign land.
 Then loud as thy applause, reclaim us all;
 And every muse of nine shall wait thy call.

Speaking, she rose; and with her rising flow,
 Her eight sad sisters, sighing, turn'd to go.
 Lively, upstarting from his shadow'd seat,
 Stay (cry'd the prince alarm'd)—suspend retreat.
 Just though your anger, yet revenge forbear;
 Lest taught by muses, man forgets to spare.
 Too soon degen'rate nature warps awry,
 The bad to copy, and the good to fly.
 Have you beheld wit's stream discolour'd glide,
 And pour'd lost azure on th' unconscious tide?
 Think the blame yours, who heav'n's best tincture
 bring,

To stain the current, yet neglect the spring.
 Would you at once Cœrulean depth renew?
 And gayly bright'ning flush th' improvement
 through?

High at the source th' infusive tinge bestow;
 And ev'ry downward drop shall tinctur'd flow.

But while a vagrant inspiration strays,
 And here and there unlicens'd pow'r displays;
 Though sep'rate individual strollers share
 Some uncollective scatt'rings of your care;
 This way and that though some faint hint of light
 Gleams like a meteor, and shrinks back in night,
 Or, ming'ling beams to form some deathless blaze,
 Once in an age you Popes or Thomsons raise:
 All the lost labour serves but to express
 How wide our wants! how thinly we possess!
 Till the day breaks expect no gen'ral glow;
 For the sky darken'd keeps all dark below.

Here for wit's fountain dream not of a court,
 False and injurious flight th' unweigh'd report.
 Meant for a clime where thrones appropriate
 pow'r,

And one man's passions all mens rights devour.
 But in free states where liberty may choose,
 Taste knows no monarch, and obeys no muse.
 Senates their muses, property their aim;
 Their boast but safety—and their plaything fame.

No—would your willing culture waste no toil?
 Would your bays thrive in a reluctant soil?
 Ductile of form, and changing shapes at will,
 Assume new sex, new names, new views, new skill.

Safe in sage politics conceal your wit;
 Then by my bounty qualify'd to sit,
 Nine Cornish boroughs might assign you place,
 Where mix'd unthought of you may shun disgrace.
 There, breathing unsuspected influence lurk,
 Till patient progress crowns your arduous work.
 Thence shall descending radiance taste convey;
 And willing kingdoms make the muses way.
 Till time flow fav'ring you may quit disguise,
 And wear wit plain among th' unlaughing wife.

Pausing, he smil'd humanity so kind, [mind:
 That ev'ry muse was touch'd, and chang'd her
 All bow'd consent to his grave purpose wrought;
 And thus Urania voic'd her sister's thought.

Born to a people's hearts, their darling shine;
 Let ev'ry wish, and hope, and joy, be thine.
 Mov'd by the magic mercy of thy view,
 We feel good counsel, and embrace it too.

One sole condition grant, and we obey;
 No dang'rous notice must detect our stay.
 Hid in thy grove, each menial muse shall claim
 Domestic shelter from reproach and shame;
 Till by thy scheme their yet unrivall'd friend,
 Their influence widens, and their suff'rings end.
 Then shown the world, and privileg'd to please,
 And gath'ring face and fashion by degrees,
 Seen at assemblies belles may jokes forbear;
 Nor shocking modest strangers turn and stare!

Thus, in his shade from public pain exempt,
 Sleeping, the visionary poet dreamt. [there;
 Then wak'd, and found his sparkling prince was
 But ev'ry empty muse was lost in air.

CAMILLUS: A POEM.

Humbly inscribed to the Right Honourable Charles Earl of Peterborough and Monmouth. Written in the year 1707.

WHEN injur'd heroes suffer in their fame,
 Justice unsummon'd should their wrongs proclaim:
 But Phœbus' son should raise resentment higher,
 And light up vengeance with poetic fire.
 For where injustice clouds a noble name,
 The patron's scandal is the poet's shame.

Permit, great Sir, my humble muse to raise
 A private monument of public praise:
 Unbend your mighty soul, and stoop to fame,
 Whose voice shall sound to heaven your glorious
 name.

Minds that are great like yours disdain applause,
 Their inborn virtue gives their reason laws:
 Above the reach of malice blest they live,
 Proud to be envy'd, and like heaven forgive.
 What depth of line must my rais'd fancy find,
 To found th' unfathom'd ocean of thy mind!
 Or through the lab'rinth of thy wonders wind!
 How dares my untry'd pen attempt a verse,
 Worthy thy godlike actions to rehearse?
 How dares my flutt'ring muse invade that sky,
 Where Virgil, eagle-wing'd, would fail to fly?
 Dark in my breast tumultuous terrors roll,
 And rising passions shake my lab'ring soul:
 Encount'ring reasons through my judgment shine,
 Some urge and some forbid the vast design;

Here justice summons---there my youth denies;
Duty to this, to that my will replies.

Resolv'd at last you safe return to greet,
I throw my worthless numbers at your feet;
Assur'd the generous goodness of your eye
Will see my zeal, and pass my errors by.

But if my feeble genius chance to fail,
Nor ardent pray'rs can with the nine prevail;
Think, Sir, how various your great acts appear!
There war and glory---wit and honour here:
One glitt'ring moment spreads your wond'rous
fame,

Battles and bloodshed celebrate your name.
Now the great hero in a purple flood
Plunges through stormy seas of hostile blood.
Now strides with skilful courage from afar,
To stop some gap of unsuccessful war:
Another moment smoothly gilds his face
With lovely sweetness and delightful grace:
Calmly he tunes his mind to softer sports,
And lives the matchless paragon of courts.

No wonder then if my presumptuous eye,
Viewing thy sun of excellence too nigh,
Dazzled with light, is forc'd to look awry!
A traveller, who thus without a guide,
O'er some unmeasur'd tract attempts to ride;
Where thousand paths of equal breath appear,
And each fair course seems safe alike to steer,
May spite of strictest caution lose his way,
And scarce be justly said to go astray.

In peace the fam'd Hispania long had slept,
And free possession of her Indies kept:
Made poor by plenty, dull content she knew,
Her strength declining as her riches grew;
Till forc'd to valour she begins too late,
And climbs unwilling but to pull down fate.

Their second Charles resign'd his princely breath,
And swift-wing'd fame proclaim'd th' expected
death:

Sudden the trumpet echoes from afar,
And friendly nations rise to furious war:
The hardy veterans their arms prepare,
And waving banners fan the heated air:
The sprightly steeds with lofty bounds advance,
And curb'd by skillful riders proudly prance:
A wild confusion o'er the globe is hurl'd,
And warlike earthquakes shake the Christian world.
The Austrian prince, heir in affirm'd descent,
To grasp the crown his strong endeavours bent:
Bourbon oppos'd, and in the vacant throne
Would place a royal offspring of his own.
Doubtful the right---but pow'r which all obey,
Appear'd to justify the second's sway:
The arms of France allure the voice of Spain,
And Anjou seated will his post maintain.

Sighing the young prevented Austrian stands,
And lifts to gracious heaven his eyes and hands;
Implores swift justice to an injur'd man;
And heaven directs his prayers to heaven's vicegerent Anne.

Thither they fly whom pow'rful wrongs oppress,
And find a certain shelter from distress:
By her the proud aspirer daily bleeds,
And bias'd monarchs wait her dreaded deeds.
Aw'd though displeas'd, to her decrees they stand,
And own the fate of Europe in her hand.

Thither with tow'ring hopes and longing eyes,
The young excluded monarch swiftly flies;
Whispers in Anna's ear his weighty grief,
And from her pitying soul extracts relief.
At her command th' intrepid Britons fly,
Exert their inborn worth, and proudly die:
Pleas'd with their fate they dearly sell their breath,
And smile amidst the raging pangs of death.
A chosen band of these who all things dare,
For distant war their mighty souls prepare:
Through ev'ry ear their glorious cause they ring
To curb proud France, and right an injur'd king.

O'er these a chief by art and nature grac'd,
Renown'd in war and policy was plac'd;
Beyond mankind his judgment could discern,
And much improve what others could not learn:
He ow'd no virtue to a dread of shame,
No seeming honesty to promis'd fame:
On its own base in him true honour stood,
Wash'd by a generous tide of noble blood.
Him the great Anna chose---Camillus go
Revenge my brother on his haughty foe;
Guard him to Spain---there let my will be known,
And seat the monarch in his ravish'd throne.

The valiant chief without ambition brave,
Humbly receiv'd the weighty charge she gave:
Destin'd in spite of malice to be great,
His daring soul contemns the tricks of state:
Swiftly he bids his glad commanders meet,
And lead their army to the waiting fleet.
Their swelling hopes the swelling gales invite,
And heaven and they propitiously unite;
In loud salutes the deep-mouth'd cannons roar,
Answer'd by zealous wishes from the shore:
Whence mingled crowds their hearty prayers repeat,

Till rising waves obscure the sailing fleet.

On the extremest limits of that land,
Through which the Tagus rich in golden sand,
His rapid course in depths of waters bends,
And twice two hundred miles his stream extends;
Old Barcelona strong by nature stands,
And rules a vast extent of fertile lands:
With rocky mountains half environ'd round,
The other half by bogs and marshy ground:
Beneath her walls surrounding trenches lie,
Beyond those depths rise bulwarks vastly high:
Walls within walls the solid place defend,
Where watchful centinels their charge attend:
Whence trains of hollow brass with fiery breath,
Vomit black sulph'rous messages of death;
Ramm'd with destruction, burst with horrid roar,
And scatter'd terrors round the trembling shore.

Hither with crowded sails the Britons bent,
Big with the message their great mistress sent,
Their warlike souls to emulation rise,
And breathe out pious wishes to the skies;
And now those powers which brave designs attend,

Had brought their voyage to a happy end.
From Barcelona's tow'rs with wild affright,
The trembling foe beholds th' unwelcome sight;
A mighty fleet approaching by degrees,
In graceful order ploughs the smiling seas;
Harmonious music spreads the joy they bring,
And clam'rous shouts proclaim the coming king:

The sounding trumpets his intent declare,
And waving streamers flourish in the air :
Arriv'd at length the cannons loudly roar,
And shake with panic fright the wond'ring shore.

Mean while the Spaniards all their force prepare,
And arm confus'dly for defensive war :
Blind with amazement and ignoble fear,
They double all the Britons that appear :
All think with horror England now had bent
Her utmost force, to form one grand descent.

But when they saw so small a number land,
And boldly tread the surface of their sand,
The paler marks of fear forsook their face,
And wonder far more great supplies the place.
An equal force within their walls they found,
Yet fear'd to meet their foes on equal ground :
They saw, with wonder at an act so vain,
Th' undaunted Britons win the neighb'ring plain,
Where soon their squadrons form'd a camp, and then [men.

They thought or dreaded they were more than

Thus had the great Camillus forc'd his way,
And void of fear in midst of dangers lay :
Impatient of delays, the Austrian youth,
Deep-touch'd with sorrow, listen'd to the truth ;
He saw the weakness of his daring few,
And with concern his foe's advantage knew :
The brazen tubes of death were mounted high,
And clouds of rolling smoke obscur'd the sky ;
All this and more from his small camp was seen,
And death disguis'd with horror stalk'd between.

The aged chiefs in cautious war grown old,
Would rather be too backward than too bold :
Therefore advis'd the prince to haste away,
Since 'twas scarce possible to live and stay.
The prince with melancholy thoughts oppress'd,
Came to Camillus and unlock'd his breast ;
Told him the pangs of sorrow, shame, and rage,
Which shook the blooming comforts of his age :
Told him the flames in which his soul would burn,
Should he thus unsuccessfully return.

With grief the gen'rous Briton heard him tell
The deep misfortunes he but knew too well :
He rolls his eyes, accuses partial fate,
And tells the Austrian that he should be great.
Resolv'd to act, the council speak in vain,
And by debates protract the fall of Spain :
Camillus had a soul whose heavenly fire
Could compass all things, and to all aspire.
Himself alone could with himself debate,
And mov'd obscurely like the hand of fate.

Hard by the towers of Barcelona stands,
High on the rocks o'erlooking neighb'ring lands,
A strong-built castle, whose extended sway
Obliges ev'n the city to obey.
Five hundred men the solid ramparts keep,
On rocks beyond imagination steep :
Whence rolling stones invading foes can chase,
When with an aching eye they climb the dreadful
place.

This was the source whence victories must flow,
Hither the British chief resolv'd to go :
Unus'd to fear, and more unus'd to boast,
With temp'rate words he cheer'd his wond'ring
host ;

Strove not to hide the hazard of the task,
Nor cover danger with a gilded mask :
He bid each soldier like himself perform,
And by example wins 'em to the storm.

The rosy morning usher'd in the sun,
Which was to see a bloody business done ;
His beams shone bright to guide the battle well,
And drank their blood in pity as it fell :
Eight hundred Britons on this glorious day,
O'er pathless forests force their oblique way ;
In tedious march o'er high ascents they pass,
And won the dangerous precipice at last.

With strange surprise the Spaniards rush to
arms,

And bells rung backward in confus'd alarms :
The summon'd soldiers hurry'd to their post,
And pour whole volleys on the climbing host :
Repeated charges from the cannons fly,
Like fiery meteors blazing through the sky :
The shatter'd limbs of men who nobly dare,
Are borne on bullets through the flaming air :
The dismal prospect shocks the bravest hearts,
And adds new motion to disjointed parts ;
The brave Camillus with a fierce delight,
Drives on the headlong fury of the fight ;
Urges his bleeding troops still higher and higher,
And scatters death for death, and fire for fire.

Thus, when of old the mighty giants strove
To check the boundless power of angry Jove ;
With force like this, but in a cause less good,
The huge Briareus, their great leader, stood ;
The solid centre shakes beneath his weight,
Who, all-unknowing, or unfearing fate,
Kicks at the thunder which with horror flies ;
And while swift lightning flashes in his eyes,
Tears up a hundred rocks and hurls 'em at the skies.

But now aloft the mingled war grows high,
On heaps promiscuous numbers fall and die ;
Rivers of blood from the mix'd battle flow,
Till death scarce sees to guide a destin'd blow.

The walls are won, the Spaniards lose the day,
And crowding Britons win the cover'd way :
While some on high the conquer'd pass defend,
Others below by mutual help ascend :
No more the driven foes their fortune try,
But quit their bloody battlements and fly :
Despair and horror fill the dismal place,
And terror sits enthron'd on every face.
Destructive fate grows cruel to excess,
And rages blindly in her blackest dress :
Matrons and virgins weep with bitter cries,
And noisy sorrows pierce the distant skies.

But cease, mistaken wretches ! cease your moan,
Proud of your conqu'ror your conquest own ;
Your friends victorious might tyrannic be,
Your foes but conquer you to set you free.
No base design distains a Briton's cause,
But pity guides the sword which justice draws.

With such success was that great day begun,
Which not the army but their general won :
While he impatient his great task to end,
Which heaven appear'd so early to befriend,
Cheers his glad soldiers with divided gain,
And leads 'em down undreading to the plain

Ranges 'em widely near the city's bound,
Resolv'd to force a place they scarce surround.

Thus moves he brightly like some wand'ring star,
And scorns the heavy arts of common war:
In their own fire his matchless actions blaze;
He needs no counsel, and he seeks no praise:
While other generals tedious projects form,
He thinks and acts, and wins applause by storm;
With furious courage stands and tempts his fate,
But heaven still spares the man to bless the state.

With threat'ning look each ready Briton stands,
And sharp-edg'd weapons grace their warlike hands;
Obsequious silence waits the general's nod,
As ancient Grecians watch'd the Delphian god.

Mean while, each trembling tow'r with horrid
dread,

Loosen'd its walls and shook its batter'd head;
The lofty works which should the town defend,
The shocks of hostile thunder widely rend;
Amidst these crowds of terror and despair,
The Britons for a sharp assault prepare;
The Spaniards see and shun the luring fates,
And widely open their submissive gates.

And now the mighty deed is greatly done;
A king reliev'd, and kingdoms bravely won.
The warlike chief, with glory fir'd his breast,
Forgot his pleasures and forsook his rest;
The Austrian fix'd—He bravely onward bent,
And conquer'd rebel countries as he went:
The stubborn Catalans unus'd to bow,
Gladly submit to firm subjection now.
With joyful shouts their happy monarch greet,
And leave their mountains for the regal seat;
That strong-built fort whose state the rest excell'd,
And thrice ten thousand Gallic foes repell'd,
Afraid to strive, her iron gates unlock'd,
And gladly open'd when Camillus knock'd.
To his successful arms whole nations yield,
And freely give him up an untry'd field.
At his bless'd feet the rich Tortosa lay,
And matchless conduct gain'd him Lerida.
Valencia's kingdom gloriously he won,
And triumph'd o'er the prostrate Arragon.

But hold, unwary muse! no higher soar;
He who did this, alas, must do no more!
Oh that thy numbers could but reach my aim,
How would I celebrate his glorious name!
How would I paint the battles he has won,
And all the noble actions he has done!
How would I paint him spilling gen'rous blood,
And tempting death for his dear country's good!
How would I drag his two illustrious sons,
Proud of their mangled flesh and shatter'd bones!
How would I tune my elevated song,
And shame the men who do Camillus wrong!

But since his works through clouds are forc'd
to shine,
How could I hope success from such as mine?
Let virtue be rewarded if it can,
When gratitude forgets so great a man.

FREE THOUGHTS UPON FAITH:

OR, THE RELIGION OF REASON.

Oh Thou! who'er, whate'er, where'er thou art,
Sole—or associated—conceiveless power!

In search of whom o'erstretch'd idea bursts;
And sense rolls back on darkness—cause uncaus'd?
Progressive unbeginner—without end!
Giver of thought, oh guide it.—Arm a mind,
Tremblingly struck,—to stem but one short glimpse,
One distant, transient, momentary flash
Of thy keen light—and live!—oh, far from dream
To draw th' Almighty's deign'd approach too near—

All that my soul's touch'd sense aspires to tell
Is, that she dares not view thee, thou who know'st
The muse's conscious rev'rence, aid her song.

Awfully shrinking from th' assumer's hand,
That points me to thy place, thy power, thy will,
Astonish'd at his pride! I start—and fly.
O pitier of presumption! whence aspires
Awak'ning dust's brief glance of shadowy life,
To launch its little plummet—into depths
Profounder than Eternity!—how dare
O'erweening, mole-blind furrowers of dark earth
Engross to their low selves, their Gods whole care?
Slight nobler orbs, as skirts to this dim ball,
That day by day rolls round its eyeless bulk,
To beg light's needful alms from one kind sun,
While tracts superior to conception's bound,
See suns in millions o'er new worlds pour blaze,
Yet reach but confines of new suns, and die.

Require not these vast works of God, God's grace

Proportion'd to their vastness?—how then dares
Conceit's proud pre'fence of its own clay'd cott
O'erleap those azure voids, where thought, and space,

And number, and immensity, are lost,
And comprehension aches to scale repulse!
Whence had man's insect arrogance of guess
Such impotent outstarting, to presume
His momentary nothingness of grasp
Could know, task, limit, and describe his God?

Say, bigot boaster of unmanner'd zeal,
Thou that art impudently sure of heaven!
And, cov'ring blasphemy behind faith's name,
Sinn'st deepest where most sanctified!—weigh,
pause,

Think—answer not from custom's light assent,
But the try'd soul's true test unwarp'd within.
Is it in revelation's awful claim [will
That dust should dare misplead th' Almighty's
For insult on his justice? Dare men pass
For intimates of heaven, who thus degrade
Th' all-gladd'ning Lord of all those wid'ning worlds

To one poor partial care of one poor part
Of one poor corner of one world's poor clan?

Out with this av'rice of fanatic scrape!
That, pinching to itself God's nibbled grants
Hedg'd in th' Eternal's common! Greedily
Forestall'd all power of op'ning mystery's gate
For its own pick-lock tribe, unkey'd by heaven.
Why, if enlighten'd most, should will most dark
Bid these few fav'rite hand-led spies of grace
Conceal from modest doubt their arts to know?
Why, if possess'd of some educative clue,
That shews lost diffidence truth's lucid ray,
Claim they consent implicit? Why submits
Belief to bold assumption?—Tasteless faith

Dishonours where it worships. Heaven disdains
Obedience from the blind : and every sect
Were orthodox, if to believe is proof.

To me---nor let the reverence of my pause
Offend the power that caus'd it ! it should seem
More impious to decide of God than doubt.

Oft when I pant for aid to shake distrust,
Humbling imperious reason ; while I bend
With meek attention to the calls of faith,
Where pious fury leads the pastor gall ;
And what falls short in proof o'erflows in rage.
While revelation, thund'ring on my ear, [ven !
Low-rates my heart's admission, help me, Hea-
To check th' impassive struggler's infelt hint,
That asks how God's almighty ? if his will
Who made this captious world whereon we crawl
Could to the worm call'd man be shown in vain.
If 'twas the Maker's law to man proclaim'd,
By man's resistless God, my trembling soul
Whispers in shiv'ring horror ! Oh 'tis strange !
God will'd---God spoke that will---yet man--- proud dirt !

Divides, disputes, examines, disobeys !
Had Heav'n requir'd, could Heav'n want force to cause ?

Or, not requiring, why was Heav'n profan'd ?

Hum from thy dusky hive, unreasoning drone,
Stretch thy tame wings, heave thy dull search along, [wide.

Leave thy cav'd home behind, and look more
Seest thou not every where earth's emmet swarms,
Scheming their busy mount's loose crumbling hope
For the next cataract shower, that sweeps down all.

Such are the toils of Muftis, Popes, Pauwas,
Lhamas and Rabbis, Morabuhts, Bonzees,
All the long-labouring props of faith's lost boast,
Fabrics of tow'ry air, that fright and die.

O'er worships thus distinct have sep'rate gods
Presided ? or beneath but sep'rate names
Did one sole power inspire divided prayers,
And smilingly accept 'em ? Nature feels
This question ; and methinks I hear her voice
Bid reason thus reply---If but one light
Insur'd salvation's course, unsocketed,
Unlantern'd, it had known no curtail'd shine.
All dark had been illumin'd :---ne'er with-held
Just Heaven, from more than half th' extended globe, [caus'd.

All glimpse of dawn, yet curs'd the gloom he

Or, grant some race indulg'd with kinder smile,
Why partial to the proud, sin's haughtiest sons ?
Yet heedless of unfolded flocks, more meek,
More aw'd, more simply serious, in faith's field,
Anxious in adoration's twilight gleam,
And prostrate, though neglected. Why again
In truth's appropriate and selected seats
Shoots Eden's heaven-watch'd tree, for ever prun'd,
For ever fruitless, into monstrous growths
Of thorn-branch'd opposition ? If to doubt
Religion's lifeless form were to destroy
The essence of her purpose, why o'er lands
That boast high claims to systems heav'n inspir'd,
Spread schemes of diff'rent texture ? Each avow'd
God's own enjoin'd sole path reveal'd to save,

Alas ! 'tis man's proud heart, that, idly fill'd
With self-paid reverence for desert misclaim'd,
Grown impious in imagin'd rectitude,
Hugs his own day-dreams, idoliz'd within,
And styles 'em revelation ! Hence the buz
Of honeyless and stingful wasps of zeal,
Alike on all sides heard, and felt on all ! [hell !
Each charg'd in heaven's pretence with menac'd
Jews, Tartars, Bramins, bord'ring Ganges flood,
Swift hoards of hot Arabia's swarthy sons,
Far China's dateless race, long Nile's old claim
To superstition's childhood. Each heav'n's choice,
Yet each from each distinct, all spurn'd by all,
Split revelation into canton'd snarls,
And murder to show mercy ; damn to save !

Ev'n these divisions, subdividing on, [points,
Break from their centre like the wind's wide
Yet every radius right, and every wrong ;
All err---but each---peace be to that alone ;
The rest let war involve, and curse their creeds.

Where art thou found, fair charity ? sweet
power
That stills the stormy soul ! soft cherub's eye !
That weep'st at all this mischief---seest man's pride

Mistaken for his virtue ; arguing low
In the calm voice of pity's whisp'ring God,
The od'rous breathings of thy balmy hush
Fly scatter'd on the winds of keen debate.

Lost and benighted in this warring wild,
How shall a lightless wand'rer find which front
Bears heav'n's commission'd stamp ? and which bold brow,

Fright'ning credulity, miscals it faith ?
Bid miracles decide contested claim.
Where are they ? call aloud ; they shun to hear.
Prudent restraint forbids expectant prayer
To court renewal of old eye-sight proofs, [dumb.
Which deign'd in days long past to strike doubt
Dead time's departed ghost recorded holds
Millions of wonders done---Faith's grey supports
---But millions of pretences too diffus'd
O'er earth's contentious face, each unlike each,
As night's dim veil compar'd with sun-gilt day.
Match miracles 'gainst miracles array'd,
And push back ev'ry angel's vain descent
Who comes on errands hostile to their own.
Where miracles try truth no faith is false.
What nameless corner of the world, untouch'd
By trade's far-furrowing keel, even safely new
To the unquenchable and sacred thirst
Of missionary rapine's holy ken,
But boast believ'd descent of some kind God
That chose their lov'd forefathers, blest their race,
And taught 'em for his glory ? Fill'd with trust
In their transmitted tale, th' invited guests
Take place at heaven's high table, upmost all.
The white-fac'd, olive-hu'd, the sably jet,
The grease-anointed, woolly-headed, shorn, [elect,
Long-hair'd and short-hair'd, curl'd and cropt
All sagely satisfied, all else must err---
Swol'n with inflative zeal, catch martyrs flame,
And die, to live again in scorn of pain.

Since then th' extremest polar tracts of faith,
Where reason's one eye winks unbeam'd for day,

Plead miracles in proof which none can try,
Because but heard, not seen, let learning shun
Such hoary feebleness of palsied plea,
Which error must assert, or truth disclaim.

But off! stand wide, make room, ye coarse profane!

Ye vulgar of religion's suburb world!
Ye goats unshepherded! unfish'd-for shoals!
Unmelch'd by mystics union's indragg'd net
Of never-erring sweep, deduc'd from heaven!
Room for the papal pontiff's triple crown!

Now, heretic presumer! bow, convinc'd
Infallibility unwinds her scroll:
Saints, martyrs, angels, seventeen cent'ries down
Link power to power, and, length'ning truth's old rod,

Lend faith tradition's line to hook mankind.

Hail, venerable weakness! awful dream!
Shade of a shadow! thou that blindly hop'st,
By twice nine age's loud-concurring noise,
To drown soft reason's evidence, yet shun'st
To recollect how thrice ten cent'ries join'd
Their vain support, yet saw Jove's fabric fall.

Plead'st thou duration? plead'st thou breadth of space?

What art thou but an infant's tott'ring step,
Compar'd to mightier growths now found no
more?

Where are the deities of muse-tongu'd Greece?
Greece, from whose hundred states strong science
flow'd;

And arms and arts in one mix'd blaze of power
Held out high freedom's torch to half mankind!
Where is her Phœbus? where her Neptune now?

Turn thy sight eastward o'er the time-bush'd plains, [o'er

Now graves of vanish'd empire, once gleam'd
From flames on hallow'd altars, hail'd by hymns
Of seers, awakers of the worship'd sun.

Ask silent Tigris---bid Euphrates tell [frown

Where is the grove-crown'd Baal, to whose stern
Bow'd haughty Babylon? Chaldea, fam'd
For star-taught sages; hard Phœnicia's sons,
Fierce, fear-surmounting, curbers of the deep,
Who stretch'd a floating sceptre o'er the seas,
And made mankind one empire? Where is now
Egypt's wide-homag'd Isis? where the Mars
That shook the shakers of the Roman world?

Where the Teutonic Woden?---in his name
Alone still reverenc'd each revolving week
Even in fair Albion's isles.---If age bore proof,
Why have these sunk? why all the lifeless gods,
Lost demi-gods, long, nameless, countless, powers
That fill'd th' adoring world with fabled fame?
Are they not dead? whelm'd o'er in time's black tide?

And known but by contempt to mem'ry's claim?

How was this possible, had noise been proof
Of faith's extent in space, with realms for guard,
Mellow'd mistake to equity? Far short
Of heaven falls time's perspective---vainly climbs
Guile-founded god-craft. Let proud fortune spread
The lie-tipt pyramid's broad covering base,
Till earth groans wounded at th' oppressive weight,
Still but the wider ruins mark its fall.

Let him who boasts blind multitudes convinc'd,
Or builds on time for truth's imagin'd test,
Ask his unjudging rashness what rent heart
Of Celtic druid but had shook more bow'd [shade
Than his storm-lab'ring oak, could some pale
That scann'd futurity, pointing through fate,
Have shown him his insulted Godhead's doom?

Nor let vain preference of our own touch'd
sense,

Our own seen surer light, our own safe trust,
Degrading ancient stubbornness in faith, [strong.
O'er-rate attachment's warmth, as now most
What aw'd allegiance, what more firm belief,
What haughtier sureness more imprints the soul,
By modern truth's new cast of thought inspir'd,
Than sway'd the solemn Pagan's breast, of old,
When bow'd before his idols?---Idols, (now)---
But (then)---vindictive gods, who shook mankind.

Where are faith's certainties---if time's best boasts,

Sacred to arts, arms, numbers, learning---all!--
All fam'd beyond fate's dread, found all unsure?

Whence then the imperious positive disdain,
That spurns back modest doubt---and damns debate?

Where the foundation of that holy scorn,
Which lifts the bigot's brow, to scowl reproach?
To pity sects that hurl his pity back,
And hate him---for his hatred?---If nor time,
Nor numbers who sustain'd the attested cause,
Nor miracles renown'd in reverend hords,
So awful that no sacrilegious mouse
Dare satiate hunger on the dust-veil'd roll,
But dies to leave untouch'd the dry record---
If evidence like these falls short of proof,
Where in what dark domain, of thought's deep maze, [drawn,
Shall reason---through doubt's crooked windings
Find truth's white face unspotted?---think, and tell.

What if we seek her in man's moral walks?
Judge her by life's try'd practice!--what more just,

Than to conclude, the saint's uncensur'd deeds
Lend sanction, to his doctrine?---here, methinks,
Truth loves to choose her test. Yet here (again)
We wander-- into new defect of plea, [life
That proves too much---or nothing.---Cou'd loose
Infer false faith,---how stain'd even Christian zeal!
Where avarice and revenge, and pride's big bloat,
Taught guilt's blood-colour'd hat to hint church
spleen:

Whence murders, robb'ries, treach'ries, perj'ries,
Like taints effluent from infectious sens,
Dispeopling in their progress!--unaton'd,
Till death-bed sanctity absolves remorse,
By scar'd conformity to faith's flat modes---
To mock'ries of belief---and rites of prayer.

Since then bad life must leave no stain on faith,
Try if life's purity refines coarse creeds?
Try if the good man's virtues church his claim?
No---if they cou'd---then pole from pole but bounds

Th' extensive true-nam'd church's general pale.
Dreadful indeed were (then) th' excluder's power!

Then--excommunication's reachful hand
Had push'd off exiles to new worlds--ere dead!
For this had all been church--one truth's known
claim :

[mopes,
Turks, Jews, wild Afra's wood-men--India's
Who pine in pangful abstinence from sin,
And shudder but to crush the trodden fly :
Australia's art untasting solitudes,
Where all ambition's wealth is ease from care ;
And hope's consumptive diet starves desire :
Columbia's many peopled bow'ry groves,
Fanning in seath'ry pomp her tawny tribes,
From the sun's down-driven ray :--cold Zembla's cots,

Of fish-fed slav'ers furr'd in shaggy mail,
Trampling the ice-bound ocean whiten'd o'er
With endless snows, to spoil the spoilful bear :
All among these who love not vice, draw claim
From lives of simplest sanctity--to heaven :
And multiply th' elect--were virtue faith.

Pause here encompass'd soul. Look round, reflect.

Engulf'd and central to this whirl of tides,
With each proud vortex threat'ning--all to shun
Seems safer than trust either. Hark! they roar.
Look with what rage they whiten!--All foam
sure :

All climb to drown each other. None recede :
None conquer. Universal uproar reigns--
And faith's a fighting chaos--is this truth ?
This revelation's word disclos'd by heaven ?
Boldly refuse consent--it cannot be.

What then must be believ'd?--believe God
kind--

To fear, were to offend him. Fill thy heart
With his felt laws : and act the good he loves.
Rev'ence his power. Judge him but by his works :
Know him but in his mercies. Rev'ence too,
The most mistaken schemes that mean his praise.
Rev'ence his priests--for every priest is his--
Who finds him in his conscience--by what name
So-e'er distinguish'd--howsoe'er withdrawn,
They deviously believe--what though they preach
Perdition to the mod'rate! truth dares owe
Respect to error : if its end is grace,
And aims at reformation. Mindful yet,
Men are but men. Where most thou trust'st beware.

Stretch not esteem to homage : be nor slave,
Nor censurer : but hear strong reason's voice,
Tongu'd by the power who loves it. And since that

Cries liberty too loud for law to drown,
Free thy chain'd thought from fears unworthy
God,

And know him for himself--were one prim form,
One forc'd identity the maker's wish,
Ne'er had that wish prov'd frustrate. Dare not doubt

[pels,
But he, whose will was power--whose wish com-
Had moulded all to that one form he lov'd.

Loves he not unity? he does.--But know,
The unity God loves, is lodg'd in mind.

'Tis the heart's conscious glow--that beats to thank,

Not scrutinize his bounty. 'Tis the chain,
That links intention--in one warmth of will :
Not binds to one forc'd act, of outward form.

Thus thinking--thou wilt feel the Godhead
right :

Unclosing in a house of jointed stone,
Him in whose temple twenty thousand suns
Serve but as lamps--and all their spangly worlds
Form footsteps to his altar--this believe :
And dread no vengeance on mistaken man,
Unadequate to man's brief power in sin,
Offending grain of animated dust ! [fire!

'Gainst him, beneath whose smile the stars catch
Fill'd with ideas thus becoming Heaven,
Pity the hag-ridd'n quiv'rer who contracts
To superstition's gloom religion's joy,
And humbles adoration into dread.

Who ekeing his inch'd measure from within,
Peeps through his narrow soul's dim loop-hole
wink,

And insolently by his own scale takes
The altitude of heaven. But, if compell'd
To lend thy patient ear,--and press'd too hard,
By self-sufficiency of teasing faith,
--That--nothing knowing,--will be sure of all--
Hear, with dumb smile : and ask'd why reason's range

Acquits dissention--teach thy judging eye
To read God's answer in his works for man :
Where do they tell thee, sameness was his choice ?
How various are his creatures! various all,
His animal, his vegetable tribes :
Earth's, air's, wide ocean's products--all unlike.
In qualities, forms, colours, diff'rent all. [fields,
--Tread but th' enamell'd mead--or o'er yon
'Twixt the wind-waving corn indent thy way.
Or partial to the garden's painted proofs,
Lend there thy first pleas'd nothing--snuff this air :
How numberless the scents, yet each distinct,
Of every tree's known bloom--lean o'er these flow'rs--

Lowliest, yet loveliest! excellence deprec'd!
Worth trod on by despisers! short-liv'd sweets!
How oppositely soft the streak-touch'd shades,
That tinge their fragrant families!--turn short,
From pity due, to life so lov'd, so brief!
Wish'd long, by ev'ry short'ner!--now look out,
On yon fair op'ning plain--there herb meets herb,
All green--yet none resembling! shades less deep,
Touch lights more soft'ning : feastful to the eye,
That dwells on their distinctions!--still new glows

Diversify the verdure's fluid surge :
And dance delightful to the breezy bend!

Next, up this steepy shelve ascending flow,
Win we the Down's high top--whose carpet
mound

Ends at the jutting cliff, that shades the shore,
Hence to the wing-divided air extend
Survey's charm'd outlet--o'er this upper sea,
Where meditation founders,--flights immense
Cross-cut the winnow'd æther. Black, white, gray,

Red, blue, brown, golden, verdant, motley-stain'd :
Distant in size as colours!--'mongst 'em all,

None looks nor calls like other. No sweet bird,
That beats the pathless void, but pours new notes,
Distinct from every plummy rival's song.

Stop thy endanger'd foot. Recal the range
Of thy recovering eye--bend o'er the brow
Of this touch'd precipice: and hence look down,
Where the broad sea scarce heard, rolls murmuring in.

Ponder the deep's dumb legions--infinite
Their numbers! still more infinite their shapes,
Bulks, movements!--swift, slow, timid, fierce,
horn'd, barb'd,

Coatless, fin'd, scaly, shell'd, wing'd, motionless:
All diff'ring--till immensity grows tir'd
To note their changeful natures!--can it be,
That he who fill'd each crowded element,
With unressembling sons of endless change--
Peopled each puny drop with varied states--
Each leaf, with new-shap'd nations, too minute
To dread ambition's ravage--veil'd each path
To heaven's blue lawns with clouds that shift each hour.

Form, texture, hue--to suit their painted glow
To man's undazzled gaze--attemp'ring lights,
That teach the sun's too fervid beam to break
In coloury rays and touch the sight more safe!
--Can it be possible that he,--pleas'd power!
Who o'er creation's glebe sow'd seeds of change,
Should but from unity, bald harvest reap!
And burn--for tares--those beauteous growths he rais'd,

To smile such lov'd variety!--'Twere sin--
'Twere blasphemously blind--to dream such wrong.

No, let me fill'd with awe think fear a fault.
Fear but affronts the God, I'm born to love.
I am, but by his pity: and want weight
To justify his anger.--If I err
'Gainst in-lodg'd impulse, by his goodness lent,
To guide man's choice to virtue some sure fate,
From suff'rings adequate must punish guilt.
But what, where, how--he who decreed can tell.
--If, by mistake, on life's blind rocks I split,
By no safe pilot pointed out to shun,
There--erring weakness meets avoidless sin:
And needs no pardon: for it meant no wrong.

Doubt all faiths boldly then, undoubting God,
Appendant to no pride, mis-rob'd like zeal,
Hope all men bless'd alike--and injure none.
Grateful, I'll trace the fainter lights I find,
Un-envying other's blazing:--humbly own
My aw'd conviction of man's reachless power
To pierce omnipotence--and know it near.
Let me, with distant rev'rence, pond'ring, dumb,
Dread arrogant decision; persecute
No fancied heresy--but closing calm,
Opinion's dazzled eye, bow darkly down,
And hail th' unfathom'd vastness! through the dusk

Thought fails to penetrate, revere what is-- Undaring to describe it. Let no pomp
Of positive presumption swell my soul,
To self-preferring scorn of alien creeds,
Uncertain in my own: yet--sure of this,
That virtue cannot err, but judgment may.
Peacefully patient let me travel out

Life's unoffending journey. Mark, well-pleas'd,
New prospects, manners, tastes, beliefs, chang'd modes,

New systems--every view that sides my way,
Unprejudic'd to any: till--at last
Death opening truth's barr'd gate, 'tis time to see
God's meanings--in the light his presence lends.

THE JUDGMENT-DAY.

A POEM.

HOVER no more, my muse! o'er idle themes;

Sliding shadows, flipp'ry dreams!

By heaven's high call, from human bias freed,
Imagination climbs with dreadful speed.

Unfetter'd from earth's humble heights I rise,
And stretch sublime a dang'rous flight, which none untrembling tries.

Tremendous Maker! arm my aching eyes;
Aid and support, O God! my failing power;
Teach my bold thought to wing the blazing
skies!

Fearless to stem destruction's driving shower,
And safe 'twixt burning worlds ambitious tower,
O! let my hot, my struggling bosom glow,
Swol'n by a bursting flood of bright desire,
'Till the astonish'd soul is taught with starting
dread to know,

How groaning nature shall dissolv'd expire,
And tumbling orbs, with orbs involv'd, flow
loose in seas of fire. [frame,

How this blue void's immense, and concave
Spangled with starry worlds, to pieces broke,
Shall feel heaven round it shrivel from the flame,
And melted suns, from distant spheres, pour liquid through the smoke.

Now, now on fancy's fairy wings I rise, [air,
Aw'd and confounded, through deep wilds of Millions of opening wonders strike my eyes,
And reason's finite view is dazzled here!

Globes behind globes unnumber'd hence appear! [note,

The twinkling stars, that from yon earth re-seem heaven-set gems, and scatter'd seeds of
day;

Here wid'ning into flaming worlds, 'midst seas
of æther float,

And o'er blue kingdoms hold a fiery sway.
In distant orbits, round each reigning star,
Huge earths and moons their circling homage
pay;

Millions of countless miles are lost between,
And sick'ning thought grows tir'd to stretch
so far. [seen,

How vast the concave spheres, which hence are
Th' enormous vaults with wheeling worlds
glow round:

Rolling sublime they slide oblique, yet none their paths confound!

A thousand bright cross-currents cause no jars,
Nor one the others progress bars;

Wide round their central worlds of fire their various tours they make;

Yet no proud planet dares his line forsake;
Partial, an intercepted ray to break.

They take and lend by turns the streaming
light,
And silent form in solemn round, alternate day
and night;
Yet beauteous as this heavenly fabric shines,
An hour shall come when it must all decay;
When starting man from midnight sleep shall see
th' incumbent signs,
That time is sick, and nature melts away.

Hark! the dissolving trumpet roars! thunders o'er thunders roll!
A trembling angel sounds th' eternal call!
The unbounded notes whirl higher and higher,
and rend my shiv'ring soul!
Echoing from world to world they burst o'er all;
And gathering horrors, cold as death, in show'ry
shadows fall;
The conscious planets start to hear the sound,
And from their orbits bound;
Now void of motion, and depriv'd of force,
Th' arrested systems stop at once their course.
The languid orbs, grown dim, their shine with-
hold,
And night creeps o'er them in a deadly cold.
The guardian angels hear the alarming blast,
And from their several stations wing their way;
Upward, in glittering crowds, they tower in haste,
And, looking back, sigh sad and feel the day.
Thin troops of naked ghosts, long stript of clay,
That, wand'ring 'twixt the spheres, admiring
gaz'd,
Start in loose shoals, and glide like mists away;
Gathering above, expecting and amaz'd!
Again th' intollerable sound I hear!
The dreadful summons tears my deafen'd ear.
The trembling air unbracing lets me fall;
O, save me heaven! I sink apace to yon benighted ball.

Hail, doom'd dominions! hail, my native
clay!
O, what a blessing here were vanish'd day!
Again, what rumbling horror bursts its way?
Save me, my God!--a flood of flashing light
Gleams its red lustre through the depth of night.
The poles start sudden from the frightful burst,
And earth's snap'd axis groaning quits its trust.
No more th' ungravitated globe goes round,
Inward convulsions power and form confound,
Wan desolation fades her cind'ry crust, [dust.
And active life creeps through the quick'ning
Vales aw'd beneath me at th' impending doom,
In billowy heaving, roll upright along th' incumbent gloom.
Torn from their roots, the groaning forests lie,
And hills leap headlong and invade the sky:
Mankind now, first united, join in prayer,
Shrieks from a thousand kingdoms rend the air,
And ghastly horror stalks o'er all, and leads on pale despair.

See, how destructive flashes wind their way!
And point the following thunder where to rend.
Mark! how the spouted rivers upward stray,
And hiss against the light'nings which descend.

Heaven! how the falling cities buried lie,
Entomb'd in their proud palaces earth's humbled monarchs die. [give,

See! through the flash'd distinction, fires can
Naked crowds who wish to live.
Mix'd in confusion, to the mountains run;
Mountains which more afraid than they have their own flight begun,
And rolling o'er the swallow'd tribe bring on the fate they shun.

On every side, from every part,
Disjointed realms asunder start;
Wide gaping clefts earth's inmost entrails
show, [below,
And from th' uprooted mountain's chasms
Unprison'd seas in roaring torrents flow.
Commission'd ocean, breaking loose, disdains his crumbling bounds,
And hoarsely climbing o'er the rocky mounds,
Swallows Pyrene's snowy top, and Alpine barriers drowns.

Now all is ocean! and a dreadful blast
Bursts from beneath and swells it to the sky!
Torn from their seats, the sea-toss'd hills are
'gainst each other dash'd,
And bulging on the foaming surface lie.
On floating oaks the wond'ring lion rides,
And clings majestic to th' unstable seat;
The elephant bears up his buoyant sides,
And paws the groaning waves with his broad feet.

Th' assembled birds in clouds skim low in air,
Wind-shaken, scorched, and wash'd by driving rains;
In circling flight shrill screams their woe declare,
To find no remnant of their sheltry plains.
Deep-swallow'd earth, meanwhile, still loos'n-
ing more,
Lets in old ocean to her central fires;
Th' astonish'd deluge, ne'er so check'd before,
Shrinks from the pain, and in loud roar retires.
Close in pursuit, the bursting flame breaks through
th' unusual vent,
O'ertakes the rolling floods flow flight, and climbs
th' immense extent.

On all sides now the fire-assaulted waves
Feel themselves boil, and curl to shun the heat;
A night of steam climbs, dark and broad, from their voracious graves; [meet,
And plunging whales, which no cool comfort
Spout the hot flood to heaven in rage, and the froath'd billows beat.

Melting within earth's sulph'ry solids flow,
Pierc'd by the force of her expanding flame;
Metals, dissolv'd in blazing lakes below,
With liquid burnings dash her concave frame.
Victor at length outbursts the flooding fire,
And rolls triumphant o'er the bellow'ing sea!
Rivers of flaming gold in spouts aspire,
And struggling through repugnant storms a la-
b'ring passage free.

As when from furnaces thick smoke expires,
And towers in inky volumes to the sky; [spires,
The warring wind beat down th' unyielding
And spreads the sable eddies broad and high,

So rising hills of liquid flame, by cov'ring waves
oppress'd, [ocean's breast;
In glowing whirlpools, driving round, torment the Furious the batt'ling element engage,
And twisting hostile hiss with mutual rage;
Coated with fire in strong and rampant tides,
Reluctant ocean less'ning fast subsides;
Mix'd with the melted world it flames all round,
And seas that drown'd the earth themselves are
drown'd.

How low proud earth are all thy honours laid!
Where are thy late contested empires found?
Where the big boasts of arts and arms display'd?
Where are the dreadful pomps which hemm'd thee round? [mains?
What difference now 'twixt rich and poor re-
The ruler's sceptre and the captive's chains?
Where lie the properties of boastful wealth?
Distinction and degrees now clash no more;
Pale sickness here flows mix'd with ruddy health, [before.
And scorn and pity now unite, which never join'd
Melting like wax thy kindled rocks in tow'ry flames aspire,

And liquid kingdoms undulate in fire.
From the sad sight tir'd fancy turn thy eye,
See what amazing changes blot the sky!
Longer and louder the last trumpet's sound
Rolls its encreasing clangor to the sun;
The starting fires convolve, and backward run,
Struck to the heart he darkens and decays, [blaze;
And strongly trembles through his breadth of
As when in living man, some swift surprise
Chills the warm region of his beating breast,
The failing members feel th' oppression rise,
And hang of force and motion dispossess'd:
So when the sov'reign sun forgets his care,
Dependant worlds in sympathetic woe,
Halt in their course, and sick'ning with despair
Their vast etherial rounds forego,
And rolls in devious mischief down the air.
Yon wat'ry moon, dissolving broad, now seems a
dusky flood,
And now at once, O horrid change, she reddens into blood!

Wide from its centre, see th' escaping sun,
With random dread revolves his loos'ning spires;
Cold orbs which plac'd remote his influence
shun,
Now feel th' attraction of his bordering fires.
Suck'd to his burning breast averse they flow,
And icy regions roar to meet his glow.
Plung'd in embracing frost unquench'd he lies;
And the thaw'd clime round his hot convex fries.
Worlds by his absence from dependance freed,
Scud in loose liberty along the sky;
Wild and licentious drive with headlong speed,
Till 'gainst some shoaly comet bulg'd they lie:
So rebel kingdoms struggling to be free,
Shun regal power and split on anarchy.
See, see where blazing orbs in spheres remote,
Wrecks of lost worlds through storms of æther float. [high,
With spiry climb, vast tongues of fire stretch'd
In dreadful cones to sweep each other try,

While skies between shrink up and warp their
frame,
As crackling bay-leaves curl in circling flame.

Involv'd at length, th' attracted planets throng,
And burn confounded with their central suns;
Tumbling from every part they strike, and thun-
d'ring rend along!
Th' unhinging shock the list'ning angels stuns.
Worlds against worlds, with clashing horror
driv'n,
Dash their broad ruins to the throne of heav'n!
Through flaming regions of the burning air,
Down rain distilling suns in liquid rills,
Mix'd with red mountains of unmelted fire!
Hissing, perplex'd, with showers of icy hills, [er;
And cat'ract seas that roar from worlds still high-
Mingled, like driving hail they pour along,
And thund'ring on our ruin'd system fall;
Flames grappling flames combine to grow more
strong,
And in wild blaze sweep boundless over all;
One fiery deluge, wasteful, boils below,
And crumbled worlds in liquid millions flow.

Th' accomplish'd ruin sleeps, creation dies!
And untask'd angels rove o'er empty skies!
The soft'ning trumpet breathes harsh strains no more; [roar.
But in sunk sounds grows sweet and falls its Celestial voices swell 'twixt warbling notes,
And thrilling joy on circling rapture floats!
O'er the vast void melodious praises flow,
And list'ning fiends from the red lake below,
Hush, for a while, the creeping flames and half suspend their wo!
But while in deep and fix'd attention charm'd,
Their hungry souls devour the blissful sound,
By sudden silence struck, they start alarm'd,
And mark a sad, an awful stillness round!
Conscious of coming judgment, down they sink,
Diving by thousands through the burning lake;
Calm with incumbent dread from brink to brink,
Th' unheaving ocean scarce is seen to quake,
Nor swells one daring billow up in fiery foam to break!

From shore to shore, wide round the laky flame,
High-arching heav'n contracts its springy frame.
Broad as the ruin spreads, the unmeasur'd dome
Tow'rs in full compass o'er the waste below!
Assembling angels now no longer roam,
But in throng'd radiance gild the roofy bow;
A solemn black does the vast concave line,
Where streaky waves of rubied redness glow;
'Twixt their loose curls, white beams of silv'ry
shine,
Involv'd with rolling tides of azure flow!
Currents of mingled black, red, gold, and blue,
In glitt'ring chafes sport, perplex'd and wind un-
ceasing through. [darts,
Stream'd through the whole a quiv'ring lustre
Which, as bright groups of angels interpose,
A twinkling change of coloury rays imparts,
And, from their wings a show'ry light'ning throws!

Far above all through the dome's op'ning crown,
Broad as a world, th' Almighty's eye looks
down;

Clouds of deep glory shadowing round his keen
refulgence hide,
And dazzled angels turn their eyes aside.

Hark! what transporting majesty of sound,
In solemn sweetness rolls its force along?
Soft and yet loud it leads its thunder round,
And strikes chill rev'rence through th' angelic throng! [waken death!]

'Tis the Eternal's pow'rful voice that calls to
And resurrection waits th' Omnific breath!
The lake groans deep! the labour will begin!
O'er its broad face life-heaving billows curl;
And burning bowels sep'rate flow within,
And smoky clouds expire in pitchy whirl!
Bodies of men in ages long since past, [forms
Whose wand'ring dust has chang'd a thousand
Purg'd by the boiling fires evaporate fast,
And steaming upward rise in misty swarms!
Sexes conjoin'd in shoaly atoms swim,
And fallying loose, the fiery surface skim!
Kings, slaves, and patriots undistinguish'd flow,
And mount entangled from the gulf below!
In the mid air dispers'd unnumber'd ways,
Each in his fellow's search instinctive strays!
Circling like flaky show'rs of driving snow,
Which whirlwinds into mazy wav'rings blow.
In endless intricacies winding through,
Atoms join atoms and lost forms renew.
With sympathetic cling together fly,
And limb'd for life in cumb'rous millions lie!

Once more sublime th' enliv'ning voice I hear!

"Souls, descend! your bodies join."

Sudden thin clouds of hov'ring lives appear,
And leaning anxious in soft squadrons shine!
Loos'd at th' Almighty's word distinct they fly,
Swift as the light-beams of a human eye!
Ardent with longing shoot each strikes his own,
And smiles to fill his long-lost home again;
Bodies supine by ent'ring breath new-blown,
Flash sudden into life and start up men!
They wake! they pant! they try their limbs!
they gaze!

Lost in short horror and severe amaze!

Armies unnumber'd throng th' etherial space,
Paternal Adam views at once his whole collected
race,

And with big tears for conscious woe bedews his reverend face:

Parents meet children, and transported, cling,
Long-parted friends in mutual raptures greet,
Th' obliger and th' oblig'd together spring,
And trembling traitors injur'd sov'reigns meet!
Cæsar on Brutus looks serenely down,
And cloudy Cato stalks with fullen will,
Glares on him envious with inferior frown,
And wonders that in spite of death he feels him
conqu'ror still!

Majestic in the solemn front of Stuart's injur'd race,
The kingly martyr rears his awful brow!
Pierc'd by the force of his forgiving face,

A gloomy host of back'ning rebels bow!
And fear too late that sovereign pow'r they never own'd till now!

Decrepit age, to more than youth restor'd,
And pining sickness freed from aching pain,
Exert the vigour their new limbs afford,
And move transported at th' apparent gain
Pale murd'ers meet alive whom once they kill'd,
And rush through crowds th' alarming sight to
shun;

Usurpers fly from kings whose thrones they fill'd;
And loaded with their guilt unwieldy run.

Fancy, thou fail'st me here! I feel the weak!
I feel thee sink beneath th' o'erpow'ring weight!
Aid me, O Saviour! teach my soul to speak;
Thron'd on thy Father's red right hand in all thy dreadful state!

Thou seest the humbl'd pride of nature wait,
Mankind collected into life, the lowly and the great:
And thus th' eternal doom thou speak'st, the sentence of their fate:

"Come, my blest remnant, ye selected few!

"Who practis'd but the obvious good ye knew;

"Who, safely pointed by the guide within,

"Struggled to virtue and resisted sin;

"Who, or by prophets or by conscience taught,

"Have or discover'd truth, or humbly sought;

"Who from the guilt of choice have still liv'd
free,

"Or done or suffer'd for my name and me!

"Who by no conscious weight depress'd of un-
repented sin,

"Feel yourselves light and uncondemn'd within,

"Rais'd from yon dark and sinking crowd, to heav'n's high thrones aspire!

"Enter with me to joys which drown desire;

"And leave th' accurs'd to prove by pain eternity in fire!"

'Tis spoke: and lo! th' unroofing arch rends
wide;

Swift descends a radiant tide!

An opening breadth rolls down of sparkling day;
And like a scroll unfolds huge length of more than milky way!

They go! th' admitted saints tread light as air,
They mount with more than human eyes, and stem
the streamy glare!

Bright as they move th' encircling angels throng;

Heard hallelujahs shake th' inferior sky!

In distant thrills expiring notes prolong,

And with transporting fall of sound in gradual soft'nings die.

See! through the portal, how attracted day,
Like a swift current's spiral ebb glides after 'em
away!

Now all is dark and dismal as yon scene;

Ah! why does closing heaven so soon th' entrancing prospect screen.

What does beyond those glitt'ring confines lie!

And why no room till death makes way for such a wretch as I?

But murmur not, proud thought! if here delay'd

A wand'ring pilgrim through this life's cold
shade,

I must not yet with heav'nly choirs rejoice;
 O! be the will of God, not mine, obey'd!
 Wait, my impatient soul, his wiser choice!
 Trust the strong hand by which those worlds
 were made,
 And to his pleasure tune thy willing voice!
 If I not yet shake off this earthly load,
 Sure there is bus'ness worth my life's best aim;
 He who submits to tire upon the road,
 Is faintly soul'd or travels not for fame;
 For me, suffice it to have taught my muse
 The tuneful triflings of our tribe to shun,
 And rais'd her warmth such heav'nly themes
 to choose,
 As in past ages her best garlands won,
 He who beyond the pow'r of man could write,
 Would still fall short of him who acted well;
 To flow in sound or turn a period right,
 Is but in fairy tow'rs of praise to dwell!
 To pardon wrongs and benefits requite,
 Is in substantial meaning to excel!
 Why are my wishes bent beyond my power,
 But to provoke my speed to reach that goal,
 Whence on the afflicted I may comforts show'r,
 And with eas'd pity feast my hungry soul!
 Be action, then, henceforth my life's wide
 sphere,
 A thousand glorious things I wish to do;
 All has been said that's worth a wise man's ear,
 But much may be perform'd that's greatly new.

CLEON TO LYCIDAS.

A TIME-PIECE.

The Date not marked by the Painter.

FAITH and the muse have err'd. 'Twas just advice,
 Skill'd Lycidas! that check'd too hasty praise.
 I should have cool'd pre-currence into pause,
 And weigh'd the public voice oppos'd to mine:
 Then had I found the future in the past;
 Nor falsely charg'd contractions puny grasp
 With compass it conceiv'd not. Share, my friend,
 In pity share the pain my soul sustains,
 To find such hope so faded. Hope too rais'd
 To stoop at humble self: Hope wing'd for all.
 All was my blasted prospect. Fond surmise
 O'er-rated and out-stretch'd a people's bliss.
 Bid throb the muse's pulse—for thy sweet call,
 What muse uncharm'd can hear?—Bid burn the brow
 Vindictive and appeal due satire's frown.
 Due to the stagg'ers that made drunk by pow'r,
 Forget past thirst's dry promise; and presume,
 Dark dreamers! that the world forgets it too.
 Bid the priest poet consecrate the rage
 Of a wrong'd nation's curses. Rage at zeal
 From ranc'rous gall, hot envy's acrid hell!
 Long under cloak of patriot semblance hid,
 Guileful to lurk in wait, till av'rice snapt
 Corruption's watch'd-for lure: then, off at once
 Flew wide th' obstructive virtue. Veil'd no more,
 Scramblers in broad exposure's blushless brawn,
 Light from the dust, lick'd prone th' admittive
 gold,

Deep-stain'd with cank'ry ordure. Lament slaves!
 Fiend-cloven tongues! grac'd once to shame belief:

And make distrust seem virtue!—yet, vain truth!
 No sooner hears the muse her poet's call,
 Than venal calumny whets every sting,
 To wound his honest purpose. Public sense
 With her is private feeling: Satire's frown Mean warmth from disappointment. Spurn the hag:

Or let her err neglected. Perish warmth,
 That acts, or wills, or thinks from partial pique,
 Unfaithful to its seemings! Self avaunt!
 Self is beneath resentment; nor descends
 The muse to note such waste of wild impute.

Unpersonal the cheeks indignant glow,
 That blushes but for others. Fall disgrace
 On ears of dastard start that dare not hear:
 Or tongues that dare not own truth's boldest call!
 Fall even contempt on worth, where sac'd for scorn,

Tort of revulsive brow bids pride with-hold
 Thy smile, cheap gratitude! which craft's low guile
 Oft lends the beggar'd heart that wants within.
 Shame on the painful stretch that racks the great!
 Needleless extension! dignity like light,
 Dwells in itself, displayer, undisplay'd.
 How have I seen the native courtier shine!
 Warp'd to no four sublime, enchant men's eyes;
 Charm dress'd in easy honour's effluent air,
 Fill out distinction's voids without pomp's aid,
 Strike in descending; and attract supreme!

Oh thou! to whom lost Anna's evening ray
 Ow'd love's allegiant lustre: flame of joy,
 Wit, genius, tide of art, whence letter'd hope
 Drew depth to sail ungrounded. Soul of taste!
 Shade without chill! soft'ning superior height
 With access and urbanity!—what need
 Thy name here added? Day's meridian blaze
 Marks the known hour untold.—O say, best judge,
 Thou, who so nobly trod'st th' illustrious steep,
 Oft clouded since thou left'st it!—Teach th' un-
 taught,

Why are the rais'd look'd up to?—'Tis to try
 Their claim to sit so mounted. 'Tis to task
 Their strength to lift low climbers. Down proud snails [expose!

That crawl'd too high, your slime track'd shells
 Out with these snuffs in blaze that shine to stink!
 What have the lame to do with wrestler's toils?
 'Tis impudence that prompts deformity
 To prink itself like beauty. Want of light
 Were flatt'ry to the ugly. Drag 'em out,
 And leave 'em in the eye of scorn impall'd.

These are the minds that disavow the muse!
 Dead to the formful glow that figures thought,
 Blots low sensation from the wid'ning heart;
 Lends an elastic nerve to every sense;
 Pushes exerted virtue into act;
 Feels for a world embrac'd, and warms mankind.
 —Nothing of this, poor souls, disturbs their calm.
 Closing their tortois'd lump of cold content;
 Distant, perhaps, they hear the poet's name;
 Less probably, sometimes perhaps, half deign
 To turn th' untasted page; there, lumb'ring on,

Find nothing in the noblest verse but rhyme :
And equal Dursley's frost to Dryden's fire !
Sleep, genius sleep—the times invite repose.
No source of all Britannia's silv'ry streams,
Shall feed hope's with'ring root, where hearts
thus dry,

Have drunk like sponges fortune's ponded swell;
And o'er th' unmoisten'd virtues shake no drop.

O Lycidas ! how climbing zeal will lie !
Come help me to deplore those blust'ring gales,
Whose ventilative heave puff'd out their void,
With shows of airy ardour. Till up-driv'n
O'er skreenful clouds, there burst the bubbly
forms !

There shrunk their satiate bulk to trackless hush !
Speak ye forgotten graces, if unsworn
To hold dumb distance, round the seats of power,
And rev'rence unapproaching step more near :
Untarnish those bald stars ; tell 'em, their lights
Were lent to be reflected. Every muse,
By ev'ry art attended, sighing, prone,
Complains of interception. Each in vain
Invokes one beam ; but pines in shiv'ring shade.

Why, Lycidas, were ends and means misjoin'd ?
Why am I born to pain for pity will'd ? [heart,
Why choose the God, that charm'd thy widening
To curb thy shorten'd hand, and press down fire ?
What shall we say, to touch these sons of noise
With sense, how boldly death dissects their name ?
What shall we do to break th' imperious blinds,
That rise 'twixt power and taste, to pierce their mist ? [form ?

And teach th' incumbent reeks, what clouds they
How shall a noteless, nameless, silent, friend,
To thought's obscure retreats, unnerv'd like me,
By dignity's bold brace, or fame's felt spring,
Shake those close groves of state, whence kings
catch gloom ? [wish'd,

Oh, were their reach but thine ! or lot more
Happier and safer, most remote from thrones !
O, were thy will but theirs !—Then, Lycidas,
No self-exposing halt, in place possess'd,
Wou'd shame remember'd sweep to distant hope,
Corrective care wou'd change what once it charg'd.
Watchful discernment seize unshould'ring worth,
That crowds not into notice. Taste wou'd dare
Feel uninfus'd distinction ; take no cue
From int'rests venal nod—less wait for prayer,
From virtue's bashful pang, or art's dumb claim.
For excellence hugs close her modest veil,
But (actively inquisitive for woe,
For wit's guess'd wants, for sorrow's cover'd tear,
For pains, wrongs, penury of every good,
With-held by every evil) drag back weight,
That holds down worth depress'd,—and bid it spring.

So cou'd my verse, ah ! fruitless dream, inspire
Then shou'd I feel I breathe, nor life's dim track
Touch'd languid, lose each footstep's feeble mark,
And leave no streak on time to note my name.
—But hush, vain struggler, bid thy breast contract,
And satisfy with will thy pow'rless soul.

How shou'd such lot be mine, who drink wit's dregs

In deserts, where seduction's drowth has chok'd,

With venal dust, Castalia's dwindled rill !
How shall I raise my voice till greatness hears ?

Write, says the whisp'ring impulse, that assumes
Ambition's airiest hope, yet hates her name.

Write, but be read. Write rugged truth, untun'd
To flatt'ry's dulcid lentor, roughly loud,
As when the last heard call shall wake the dead.
Court some kind angel's aid to voice thy theme.
Alas ! no angel dwells where avarice reigns.—
Oh ! for some hoarse Teutonic note more stern
Than Runic bard, o'er hostile scalp e'er sung,
When Woden's hall resounded to his clang.
Then should satiric fervor, sharply strong,
Roar like the muses's bull, till the wak'd nine
Concurr'd in frightful consort ; while intense,
Up the steep cliffs of Pindus' pathless brow,
Rumbling, I roll'd my tumbril theme along.

Wrong not by numbers tun'd to concord's shell,
The brawl-devoted taste that tans thy times.
Softness be opera's claim : be sharpness thine.
Softness in satire asks good sense in guilt :
'Twere lost on power's blind puddlers. Wit's light gnat,

Humming its courteous buz, is brush'd from note.
Her wasp, close-fast'ning, bids th' unlist'ner feel.
Sting then, and force from pain what pride withholds.

So shall thy verse at least out-soar contempt ;
And lend distaste discernment.—Touch no praise.
'Tis idol sacrifice to gods of stone. [friend.
Praise has but one pleas'd reader, scarce one
Satire can squeeze kind looks from bitt'rest gall.

Loosen the reins to spleen, cries angry truth ;
Where phlegmful fogs distil their lazy damp
'Tis wholesome to be mad. Nor pause for thought ;
Who that but sees or hears needs think for fame.
Born to no past'ral plain's romantic range,
Calm and cool-fann'd by reason's temperate gale,
Feel that thou breath'st in passion's haziest fen,
Contagious air by sensual fumes inflam'd ;
Where carnate emulation, stript of mind,
Glow's muscularly strong : where license reigns
Uncurb'd by law's restraint ; where youth's fed fire
Bids bashful diffidence of self be bold.

Where not to rev'rence is to know mankind :
Where disrespect is ease, noise taste in life,
And modesty low breeding : where descent
Drives literally downward ; till, behold !
Yon coachman's copy'd soul propels the peer,
And dim-star slouchers shine by glare of shame,
Downcast decorum swells the public laugh.
Judgments and views run backward. Nature nods.
Ends but succeed as means prepost'rous err.
Malice grows fast, water'd by pity's tear ;
And factions but contend for rank in wrong.

Up from rhyme's popy'd vale, ascend fame's hill :

Soft to the soft, thy theme be tempest—on.
Write with a whirlwind's fury. Snatch the God,
That thunders in blank verse to ride thy storm.
So may they hear though cricket stakes were pitch'd ;

Though the won plate's broad triumph shook the field ; [rings ;

Though cock's hard-conqu'ring crow to shouting

Or Briton's coarse debates out-quarrel Rome's.
—Muse, I begin! Assist with all your sail
Ye prose-inflating hawks of Helicon?
Lend me your wing's wide stretch to aid my sweep?

Come, let the soul of freedom's reinless power,
Vast and unconscious of constraint inspire!
Wild let her lift me from the lawns of song,
Music's hedg'd boundlets, mem'ry's measur'd
meads,

Where rhyme-trac'd cadence in harmonious close,
Rivets recorded sense, and pins down thought.
Light and disrob'd of softness let her drive,
Loose to the voids of fancy's viewless scope;
Vague and unshap'd, and pathless as the air.

What shall be sung, ye sons of vastness say?
What subject, sadly soundful like the rush [roar?
Of hoarse broad cat'raets, shall blank numbers

Shall it be sorrow's energetic plaint,
That groans away the sun, and lends new gloom
To midnight's mournful umbrage? Tim'd too well,

Too lately Albion's boreal wastes had wept
The suited theme; when tears from rash revolt
Wash'd ruthless prisons; when th' accessless wilds
Of bleak brow'd mountains shriek'd with vocal
woe;

Mothers and orphan's cries! whom famine found,
Where only famine cou'd. Despair's pale tribe,
Weeping in death's chill grasp, their own unfelt,
Some past or future fate of friend more dear.
Why shou'd the gen'rous muse insult the fall'n?
Why not deplore the pangs of hostile pain?
Just if they thought their cause their crime seem'd faith.

Guiltless in will by taste involv'd in wrong,
From educative custom's devious warp,
Spare the persisting blind; unhoping grace;
Trustless of regal virtues; erring on
From doubt of mercy. For, alas! no voice
Of truth in deserts heard had taught 'em kings,
Who last can fear offence, can first forgive.
Paint then their pity'd anguish: nobly feel,
To make sublimely felt this brave man's test:
That hearts, unshaken by resist'rs rage,
Are conquer'd by their sorrow.—Vain attempt!
Spread the sonorous wing for flights of joy.
Sorrow renounces latitude of range: [chain'd,
Dwells in confinement's cave; where thought sits
Muses are shunn'd; and horror's winking lamp,
Ghastly night's ebon eye, sees woes on woes,
Tear following tear, sigh echoing sigh combin'd,
Move in close consonance of fift'ring sound.

Shall it be love, soft whisp'ring out the soul
From its own mansion, tenderly exhal'd
To reach some sweeter self? No: dare not touch
That theme, 'tis sacred to the rights of rhyme,
Union will ne'er by dissonance be sung.
Love's links are married couplets: hand in hand
The willing yoke-mates share confederate fall:
Soft as the zephyr skims the dew-drop'd rose.
—But even had rhyme conspir'd to tempt—forbear.

Awful resign a wreath more nobly won,
Saint John, his country's boast, his country's crime,
When courts at leisure left his youth to love.

Saint John, the muse's lord, this theme once sung:
Sung it in verse more soft than beauty's eye:
More strong than her attraction! Almahide,
Immortal Almahide! by Saint John lives.

Who shall attempt to touch the theme he chose?
He who was voic'd by music; mien'd by love:
He who by turns has every muse possess'd,
And every art protected: Every grace
Through every fortune led—Supreme in all.

St. John! whom woman wish'd, man envied;
realms [hate!
Made war on; yet whom none found power to Nor grief thy theme nor love. What choice remains?

Shall it be death's grim waste, war's field of fire?
Aptlier the subject would have warm'd our isle,
When England's sun shot wide th' irradiate flame
Of her fam'd Edward's day-dawn.—Yet who knows,
But at some far thrown moment, whit'ning broad,
Some light new rising may (perhaps) once more
Off-roll the sullen shade that glooms our fame.
Rekindling sense of martial fire may glow,
Till the rous'd nation blazes. Then the sons
Of fires unskill'd to think defeat no shame,
Starting to destin'd vengeance, the struck drum
No more shall bid the form-dress'd soldier sleep:
But roll its deep'ning bals to wake due death;
Then too, no more the trumpets clang'ry shrill,
Fright'ning the opera dame, shall to her ear
Call her affected hand, and shut out claim
To promise of a son like him she loves.

Hail the wish'd wonder: give him birth, O time!
And into fame's rough ocean launch his name.
But when he rises bid him hate no muse.
Fan his impatient blaze to letter'd love.
Pour the enthusiast fervour through his ear,
That fir'd the conqu'ring Ammon's thirsty soul—
Born for the poet's praise, teach him to know,
That war's wing'd bolt by love of verse impell'd,
Bursts every bar to glory. Verse to war
Lends ardour: war to verse new warmth imparts.
So join'd that never hero reach renown,
Or reach'd, ne'er held; who wrong'd the muses
claim.

Oh what ye Gothic renders of the ear!
Ye blank verse bursters of Pierian bars!
Strong beyond chaining comet; swerves of thought!
Giant surmounters of wit's loftiest Alps!
Ye hurlers of prose rocks at music's heaven!
What shall deserve the dread your thunder bears?

Faction deserves and claims it: cries a howl,
That paints th' attentive soul—Come learn her laws.
Give to the deity that shakes down thrones,
Th' allegiance of thy muse. Blank verse be mine.
Guideless and boundless in aspiring grasp,
And frownful in majestic fullness,
Her music dwells in murmur. Let her growl
For faction: taste her lust of loud complaint,
And hang on empire's wheels the drag of hate.
Range safe beneath her standard: mark its sweep!
Unfurling into length, the dreadful wave [shade!
Sees earth's chill'd kingdoms shake beneath its
Kneel and be her's: enroll thy name—and rail.

Thou start'st:—alas, for verse that dares not rail!

What canst thou hope from praise? it wounds no name.

Art thou to learn thou liv'st where greatness
Regard, to bribe repugnance? o'er assur'd,
And cheaply negligent of zeal inclin'd.
So must it be where party's billowy surge
Bids wave push wave from power. There science sleeps.

Uproar and contest reign. Deep to the root,
Pain-trod Parnassus shakes; and each sap'd sprig
That green'd the muse's grove finds dry decay.
While pelted into fright, or laugh'd to spleen,
Deaf ministerial ears absorb'd in fret;
Or dirtily engross'd by craft's low buzz,
Taste not the calm surveys of leisure's range:
Share no delight in song; nor woo nor weigh
The power that dwells in gen'rous praise, to guide
A nation's doubtful heart to find her friend.

Waste not the warmth of verse on things like these,

Or stain their mem'ry with effaceless gall.
Yet since sometimes in power's obscurest night,
Through sably jet pale threads of white may part,
Should vice shame one, to virtue lend him light.
Faction, that loves no truth, must own this one,
That never friend to verse malign'd the just.
Virtues, however thankless, forc'd or few,
Compel the poet's praise—But would thy song
Wake these sublime insolvents into sense
Of what they owe attachment? Let it rail.
Rail horrible: in accents like their own
When envy's acrimonious rage impells
Detraction's venal insult. Nerve in sounds
Like thunder's gath'ring menace, the rais'd arm
Of opposition's onset. Tell the press
Where public plunder bawds for private thrift;
Where grandeur holds a stalking horse to shame,
And screens guilt's aim at honesty. Why laws
Bent and rebent like wire, crack short, start wide,
And with two ends bind nothing. Tell whose thirst

By taste unguided soaps at bubbly froth,
And leaves the sapid depth untouch'd below:
Teach where bought strength was weakness, wisdom craft,

And infamy long due where chance gave joy.
Begin, describe, discolour. Spread abroad
Sedition's fluid taints, and stain a state.
So shall attracted notice deign regard,
And slander snatch the perquisite of praise.
Such are the tastes of office! such the souls
That actuate half the mighty! Note it, you
Who reverence high distinction. This unmark'd,
Hope's empty swell plumes broad her feathery crest:

But bald in disappointment, frights belief,
Court crocodiles are scal'd: they feel no tweak.
He who would wake must wound: seen danger strikes

More forcibly than all thy pathos, wit!

Say, Tacitus,—thy skill the secret found:
In what state-scale five hundred insults pois'd,
Weigh'd down five hundred thanks in grateful gold.

Dream not thy Roman's genius mov'd such boon:

VOL. VIII.

Not his fam'd father's vict'ries ten times won,
And to thy claim transferr'd had there so charm'd.
Oh power of prompt reproach to rasp reward;
And flash conception's fire from flint most cold!
Call it not bounty: blast it angry muse;
And from the fame of Albion blot that tale.
Th' embitter'd hand of calumny bows down
The heart; its gall corrodes, to smile through wrongs,

And pay compell'd respect to dreaded scorn:
While on the candid courtship of the kind,
No fust'ring glance descends!—untott'ring power
Takes compliment as tribute. Over-cramm'd
With self, and surfeiting on brief success,
The narrow-compass'd heart wants room for taste.
—Or grant some glimm'ry ray give light to guests
Th' effect of skill'd applause: what thence results
But insolent contempt of aid unsought?
The busy breast that pants in post hard held,
Wants leisure to be grateful: 'Tis the task
Of grandeur in disgrace to thank a friend.

So spoke th' inurbane voice. The muse sigh'd sad:
Paus'd long, withheld consent; and thus reply'd:

Faction is fam'd for falsehood—If she now
Hints truth, 'tis infamy too poor for verse:
Leave it to prose-tongu'd party's cool display—
Nor love the measures; nor malign the men.
Grant imag'd worth by erring fancy form'd,
Ideal as the dreamer's empty grasp,
Who suffers but the shown? unmask'd and sound!
What has mistaken candour lost but faith?

When miscomputing their unfounded swell,
Deep'ning proud shallows thou o'er-rat'st design,
And wrong'st the guiltless by respect undue,
Blush and be dumb: repent; and sin no more.
Where, arrogant in virtue, conscious claim
Looks cold on praise consign'd to length'ning
time,

Or uninspir'd to judge, reads flat: nor finds
Distinction 'twixt the bellman's power and thine,
Smile and forgive the blind: but still be just.

Still be the worth thy theme: the taste thy scorn,
And thou, fled soul of Pope! disrob'd from dust,
And in that dust deposing each faint stain
That speck'd, while here, thy part divine with man!
If from that source of truth where now thou shin'st,
Spirits like thine look down and love it still;
Hear and attest. Sarcastic as thou wast,
All scorn of flatt'ry sleeps not in thy grave.
There lives who dares assert the poet's fire,
Undimm'd by venal smoke. Who boast no muse:
Yet owns the rights of all; and loves their fame.
Who from retreat's safe depth feels virtue's wounds;
Adopts th' inappropriate pang, and flies from rest.
Who from the summit point of fortune's spire
There could his fate stand rais'd, would, touch'd
as now,

Bow prostrate as the worm to hail the wrong'd;
Then greatest when most less'n'd by false fears,
From envy's misereant arts, and stripp'd of name!

And you, whoe'er you are, where'er you pine,
Who glow perhaps unmark'd, perhaps o'erlook'd,
Perhaps untasted by sublime defect
Of dignity in sense; which kings may want,
But none 'midst all his titles can bestow:

Grieve not to seem too little to the great.
 What lose the gen'rous, who profusely waste
 On high-plac'd weakness all the muse's strength?
 Shines the sun faintlier for those beams he pours,
 Vain and unthank'd to warm th' insensate rock?
 Tell the big blanks, that he who courts neglect,
 And loves to praise unpaid, is paid within.
 Is greater than the great: pities their scorn;
 And bids their merit live by verse they wrong'd.

THE EXCURSION OF FANCY:

A PINDARIC ODE.

AND why ye empty names of things unfound!
 Ye almost shadows e'en of sound!
 Fame, glory, fortune, fate, and all the fairy fancy
 round:
 Or rather would ye but vouchsafe to tell
 The cause of ills, ye know too well;
 Say, ye proud tracers of disdainful state;
 Who buy distinction at the world's low rate!
 Ye mean aspirers to be great,
 By aims which earth-born hopes, not heavenly truths, create!
 Why must the sacred spring of honour's flood,
 Be us'd to rinse the dusty robes of pride,
 With blood and purple doubly dy'd?
 Why foully trampled in by wealth's bold feet?
 Why there must lep'rous vices meet?
 And why must poverty, however sweet,
 And naked innocence unstain'd and neat,
 Be rudely driv'n away: or terribly withstood,
 By giant forms! chimeras stain'd with blood!
 Who dreadful stalk about, within--and raise th'
 uncleanly mud?
 Say, coward learning! long, too long mislaid!
 If yet thou dar'st erect thy dizzy head!
 And art not yet heart-conquer'd quite,
 By power fight! and custom join'd; too, too unequal
 If yet once more thou dar'st assert thy eyes,
 Once more undazzled view truth's beamy skies;
 And can'st with strong unstaggr'ring sight,
 Firm-fix'd in steady gaze take in the o'erwhelm-
 ing light!
 Say, nor fear th' oppressive hate,
 Which truth told plainly must create!
 The foes of truth, in bulk though great,
 Lifted boldly want in weight!
 Say to what sad cause we owe,
 That naked virtue must regardless go!
 Or, shiv'ring stand in fortune's snow:
 Till chance does some gay mantle o'er her
 throw,
 And notice does not from her worth, but her adornments flow?
 Immortal heav'n! if man may dare
 Climb thither to refresh his care!
 What means our God! when he requires,
 That man in virtue's rugged paths shou'd
 tread,
 If to blessings he aspires?

And yet, strange paradox! permits to virtue's foes,
 The mounts of power, from whence to aim
 their blows,
 And hurl red ruin down in surer throws,
 With levell'd malice nicely pois'd to hit the climbing head,
 While they sit safe, and laugh above to see th'
 aspirer dead!

Why? If reasons may be giv'n
 To earth for laws which pass in heav'n!
 Why am I doom'd to toil with vain desire?
 Be ever climbing and yet never higher?
 Why am I curs'd with scenes of helpless woe,
 Which since to cure I must not reach the pow'r,
 Why am I not permitted—not to know?
 Why feels not yon proud lord his share,
 Of my heart-piercing care,
 For suff'rings I can neither help, nor which my bus'ness are?
 Why sleep princes void of pain,
 For those sad thousands who complain;
 And wash with tears their deep-dy'd grief
 in vain?
 These men could lend compassion hands to reach
 The sinking mis'ries which their help beseech!
 I, who my own misfortunes cannot cure,
 With barren sorrow other men's endure!
 While they whose smiles might heal and voice
 might cheer,
 Have eyes, and cannot see!—have ears, and will not hear?
 'Tis wond'rous strange all this!—but man should never gaze,
 With search too curious on the mystic ways,
 Which form the soul-bewild'ring maze!
 It is enough for us that there must be
 Ends in this we cannot see!
 And since 'tis vain to tug at fate,
 With unavailing human weight,
 Let us throw down this load of doubt with which no race is won:
 And swift to easier conquests lighter run,
 The way which reason is not bid to shun!
 Let us with never-yielding courage strive,
 In spite of villany to thrive;
 And from our resolution's spring long streams of bliss derive!
 Like the gay ball struck down still higher let us rise,
 And obstinate dispute th' unwilling prize!
 Rebound with ten fold vigour at each blow!
 And that to wounds we may a victory owe,
 Antæus like spring fresh from ev'ry throw:
 Till short-breath'd fortune tir'd and sick with our unthought defence,
 At once, permits us to enjoy both her and innocence.
 Well then! resolve we!—be it so:
 Further thought we shall not need:
 That we set forward stands decreed!
 But hold! what journey shall we choose to go?

I will embark me, on yon boundless sea!
 The sea of knowledge! proud! imperious
 store! [shore,
 Of heaven-assaulting waves which gnaw the
 On ev'ry side with hungry roar!
 Yet always gaping always swallowing more,
 Still flows forever, and will flow—voracious as before!
 Well! I am fail'd!—I plow the foamy deep,
 And now my climbing vessel mounts on high,
 And now I sweep the starry sky!
 And now! stand firm my brain! rush down
 the wat'ry steep! [try!
 Ah me! half-founder'd now, in vain all arts I
 This way and that, immortal heaven I drive!
 Currents encount'ring currents, strive!
 The fruitless rudder ill-obey'd in vain,
 Struggles oppress'd against the madding main,
 Eddies cross eddies whirl—and whelm it back
 again!
 Hold! I am sick, I'll sail no more:
 Pilot give thy labours o'er!
 Put in and seek repose on yonder peaceful shore.
 Where am I now?—'Tis wond'rous dark all
 round!
 What means this shadow-cover'd ground!
 This is the land of ignorance wild and rude!
 Bleak comfortless and bare:
 A dreary soil! an empty air!
 By shadowy nothings I am here pursued;
 A gape, and yawn, and tire in sleepy solitude!
 Let me turn which way I will,
 Sight has narrow quarters still!
 Scarce can I see above a fathom round;
 I tread on soft and sandy ground!
 At ev'ry step I take, my feet sink in;
 Already I to fear I know not what begin!
 Hark! what strange noise is that which whistles round my head?
 Ghosts and goblins this way tread!
 Astonish'd eyes! what scenes about me draw!
 Now stagg'ring reason, where's thy law?
 My soul grows weak with childish awe:
 Fancy has courage captive led;
 Empty somethings still I dread!
 Ha! see—at once what objects rise!—How horribly they spread!
 I trod too loud, and with the noise have wak'd the silent dead.
 Fly, fly, night-wand'ring feet! explore lost day.
 If this the land of ignorance be,
 I'll drive again on learning's sea!
 Here I dare no longer stay!
 And yet I see not how to get away!
 What's this?—methinks I see the rushy brink
 Of some deep current in my way!
 Help, help me, fortune, or I sink!
 Now I am in, whelm'd o'er amidst the flood!
 Ha! though the chance was bad th' effect is good!
 It is not water this, but fluid mud.
 Stagnate and thick the sleepy depth I tread with unhop'd ease!
 And now I see the land again; and now
 The liquid field I up before me plough:

Wade out and climb the bank by flow degrees!
 I've 'scap'd the lake, thank heav'n! but all this while
 I wander guideless in the same dark isle.
 What's this which would be thought a wind?
 Which heaves by sluggish fits the drowsy air?
 Which creeps in broken murmurs far behind,
 And idly seems to slumber in its care?—[assuage;
 Now swells in sudden gusts, now does at once
 Like drunken men who strive to talk, but sleep
 amidst their rage?
 Curse on his soul-condensing solitude!
 This land of ignorance appears as rude;
 And far more dangerous these unactive ills,
 Than all the busy frightfulness which fills
 Yon sea, where storms my devious bark pursued!
 Tell me then, directive star,
 Thou that guid'st me from afar,
 If learning's voyage is not safe to take,
 And ign'rance, dreadful shore, I now forsake,
 What more inviting land my next look-out shall make?
 I see, methinks, far off a sudden glare!
 Ha! look—a mountain rises to the sea!
 From which ten thousand flames shot through the air,
 Spread circling brightness wide to such degree,
 That a kind trail of light darts outward ev'n to me!
 Bless'd with this glorious unexpected guide,
 I look about me now with pride!
 And lo! a narrow causeway thither leads:
 Narrow indeed it is, and seems to show,
 That few should hence to yon gay mountain go!
 Care and diligence there needs;
 For ev'ry tott'ring step I stumble so,
 That scarce I 'scape the waves which foam and break below!
 Would I had never landed on this shore;
 This causeway is a dangerous passage o'er;
 And I was nearer to the mount before, [roar!
 When my bark miss'd its sight amidst the ocean's
 Courage, my soul, I shall anon be there!
 I know the country now as I draw near:
 It is the far-fam'd realm of war!
 How red the skies about it are!
 Oh, let me climb the cliffy steep, and strike yon
 topmost star!
 Thank heaven! my aching foot has reach'd the strand:
 What's this? the earth is iron; and sulphur all the sand.
 Instead of air, here's smoke;—but flame does light supply!
 And from within where strongly fed they lie,
 Torrents of fiery day break up and streak the sooty
 sky!
 Hark! as up the hill I go, [roar,
 From the wide top huge full-mouth'd thunders
 While far within and more below,
 Hoarse infant noises faintly blow;
 And, slowly rising, more and more,
 Grumble, in horrid notes, their new-taught lessons
 o'er:
 Some the shrill trumpet imitate, and some
 Buffet, unskill'd, the sullen drum.

Through my astonish'd ear, harsh-mingling pass
The sound of bells, clash'd swords, and clatt'ring
brass.
Loud-neighing horses, storms of vollied shot,
Shouts, groans, and words confounded all, heard,
but distinguish'd not.
Well, I am up at last; and now I'm here,
Let me look round and see how things appear.
Oh! my glad soul---what prospects open there,
My hope-enlivening heart to cheer?
Now I am in my wish'd, my proper sphere;
What is there in yon fair-ken'd world which hence
we may not share?
Oh, Heaven! what false appearance dwells below;
How is man deceiv'd by show!
Yon Viceroy (as they would be thought) of fate;
Yon poppet managers of state;
Those things which bid life-wasting followers wait
For bubbles, which at jewel's price they rate;
And puff and swell with empty pride---and call themselves the great.
Ye stars!--How humbly they all look this way,
As who would seem to say,---
Great Sirs! permit us still to cheat the fools with whom we play;
They turn to us the cringing side, and strut the other way.

Soul recline and take thy ease;
Look about thee by degrees;
The prospect's wide enough to please.
Since the commanding top is thus attain'd,
Use with care th' advantage gain'd.
What wilt thou do that thus I feel thee swell?
In struggling silence loves design to dwell.
Or are thy views too vast to tell? [well.
Go on, form boldly, swift resolve---and execute it
Send out fancy, she can fly;
Nimbly wing'd, her own best spy;
Every danger, ere drawn nigh,
Th' air-footed Amazon discerns, and scatters with her eye.
Fancy then, proud goddess! rise;
From earth extend thy stretching size,
And push thy active head through the discover'd
skies.
Stamp, ambitious, with thy foot,
And bid the threaten'd world look to't;
For thou hast mighty work to do, and power enough to do't.
Grasp yon'escaping earthquake, 'twould depart;
Blow new vigour to its heart.
Take it and give the lazy globe a shake;
And when scar'd nature's broad awake,
All her coy aid demand and take.
Break open ev'ry inmost part;
Through all the gloomy chasms of matter dart;
Let in light to find out art;
And smile to see the blaze-shot nymph with sudden wonder start.
Seize her quickly, bind her fast,
Distant else behind her cast; [pass.
A thousand mazy turnings first must tediously be Doubly arm'd, and seated thus,
Who is now a match for us?

Begin, begin the glorious task!
Descend at once and strip yon kings of power's ill painted mask!
Tell 'em they the nymph disgrace;
Power should wear a lovely face;
And hideously to hide her charms is horrible and base. [for place,
Bid 'em, in empire's masquerade, elbow no more
But bravely dare put on plain truth, and scorn a borrow'd face.
Are they disturb'd?---Is all the hive in arms?
See they buz in hostile swarms!
But 'tis no matter, let 'em bring
Hoarded malice in their sting;
They cannot pierce, much less displume, the pi-
nions of thy wing.
What is that they seek to know?
What commission we can show.
Tell me, Fancy, was it so?
Commissions say are sometimes forms which men
to custom owe;
A shape of power which tyrants steal, and having stol'n, bestow.
Yet, to please 'em, be they told,
From higher hands than theirs we hold!
From justice, truth, and reason say,
That great triumvirate of power!--which they
Pretend, and but pretend t' obey!
This our authority; and if these not suffice,
We can show 'em large supplies
Of vengeance, force, and stubborn will; our sworn auxiliaries.
Now they tremble, now they mourn,
Now with helpless rage they burn!
Well may they rave indeed to see their friends against 'em turn.
Stay! and e'er we farther go,
Let our great meaning be aloud proclaim'd:
Our deeds shall be as just as fam'd.
Friends and enemies shall know
Why we make war, and what we mean to do.
Herald vengeance! swift arise!
Shall with steel thy flinty heart!
And since by nature blind thou art,
Bury thy lifted hand in yonder skies,
And pluck two comets down to serve for eyes.
Dawb thy dismal face with blood!
And with extensive stride, crossing the trembling
flood [shook robe,
Of fire-embroider'd smoke, throw on a wind-
And shoot thy shadow over half the globe.
In thy right hand lift quiv'ring light'nings high!
Hardly held, and mad to fly!
From thy rais'd left let heaven's loud bolt be hurl'd;
And roll th' alarming thunder round the world.
When wak'd attention pricks her frightened ear,
And stalking apprehension pants with fear;
When all the starting nations upward look,
By convulsive horror shook,
Borrow the northern wind's big voice, and then
Three times pronounce O yes! and thus address
the sons of men:
Hear, ye people! far and wide;
Reason's force will now be try'd;

Tremble, ye tyrants! at the near defence
Of long oppress'd and helpless innocence.
Where is the wretch, who, deep entrench'd in state,
Impiously defies his fate;
And dares be wicked without bounds because immensely great?
Him let injur'd virtue show,
And we proclaim ourselves his foe.
Fortunate usurpers quake! [take,
Let the forc'd thrones, whose seats uncall'd ye
Beneath your pond'rous ruin shake;
Or let 'em swell to throw you out; or with your fortunes break [wealth.
Rapine disguis'd in law, oppression arm'd with Rock-hearted cruelty, and scornful pride,
Hear and tremble when ye know,
We the great healers bring th' unhappy—health,
And draw the thorn from virtue's bleeding side.
Ye sap-engrossing weeds which but for mischief
grow;
Pay plunder'd excellence, ye slaves! the vast arrears you owe,
Or we pronounce ourselves your mortal foe.
Wisdom, knowledge, justice, art,
Peace, meekness, truth, and sanctity of heart;
Discourag'd industry, unfriended grief,
Charity, gentleness, and to be brief,
Each weeping virtue that deserves and has not found relief,
March and join us; we are friends.
What though your numbers are but few?
Our muster's well-weigh'd strength attends;
Where show is wanting substance makes amends,
We, your allies, can lend you arms—and give you courage too.
They come from ev'ry part, they, gathering, fly;
But, trembling, backward cast a doubtful eye,
Astonish'd at the hostile swarms which round 'em
shad'wing lie!
Safety from silent caves arise:
Yon crystal pillar from heaven's palace break,
And cope it down to our allies,
'Twill a glitt'ring causeway make.
So they are past, encamp 'em on th' ascent;
Stretch out the bright divisions line by line;
Unfold our milky ensigns to the wind;
Draw the battalions down in just extent;
And bid the iron face of battle shine.
What's this! the rash audacious foe,
Far from fear, and mad with pride,
Scorns to wait a threaten'd blow,
And this way turns invasion's tide:
They will not stay it seems to be a second time
defy'd. [part,
They weigh, they fail, they spread from ev'ry
Numbers following numbers start.
Their navies hide the sea through which they sweep;
And th' o'er-labour'd wind grown sick at heart,
After the flagging canvass seems to creep;
And groans behind, oppress'd with weight so
strong,
And puffing storms, with cheeks half-burst, scarce push it slow along.

'Tis worth our wonder, Fancy, since we are
Possess'd at once of the whole realm of war,
Whence those prodigious magazines should spring, [bring,
Which nations, ill-ally'd, do thus against us
At times exported hence, at first they went Like naval stores from Christendom, to Barbary rovers sent;
And hoarded long, to be at last ill spent,
Come now against their mother's bosom bent.
Since it is thus we'll diff'rent arms prepare!
Our terrors shall new unknown habits wear;
And like our cause, our weapons too shall huge advantage bear!
Nature our confederate found,
And Proteus' art our captive bound;
What force can earth against us bring which these shall not confound!
Hear, thou tall forest, from thy loos'ning root
Hither thy piny offspring shoot:
And thou, proud host of gloom-arresting oak,
Through whose close ranks the day's light horse
ne'er broke,
With reverend awe confess the mighty call!
Nod consent—and groaning fall! [join
Now swift together rush again, once more closer
With animated, sympathetic twine!
Embrace at once, and new in form with concave beauty shine!
Descend complete, and plough the flood in naval-bodied line!
Scorn the help of canvass wings!
Art shall lend self-moving springs!
Your active forms shall never need attend the humorous wind;
Self-oar'd with spoky fins your furrowing keels
Shall dash the billows back with living wheels;
And striking swiftly every mark design'd,
Sweep on through winds and tides averse, and leave the gales behind.
Mountain, open thy hot breast, thy iron sinews
strain!
Bleed at every nit'rous vein!
Yawn horrible, and with convulsive pains
Burst thy flame-lab'ring head, and shoot thy mineral brains
Take 'em, art, and mix 'em well!
Thou canst the dark proportions tell!
Let death the bitter kernel be, and sorge thou thick the shell!
Kindle a fire like light'ning blue!
And that its dreadful work it may unerring do,
Breathe a living spirit through,
And give the deadly compound sight, and force
and swiftness too!
Take this new gigantic mould;
And by it form such tubes as may besit
The mafs which their impregnate wombs must hold!
Ram their greedy throats with it;
And teach new thunders to out-mouth the old!
Hold, it not suffices yet!
Not one advantage shall the proud foe boast;
'Tis not enough that victory we get,
Unless the gain is ours with nothing lost!

Bid yon ærial substance shed its down;
 Spin it thick, and weave it strong!
 Draw out the force-repelling texture long!
 And with it fence each vessel round, like some well bulwark'd town;
 Now we are proof against their gather'd pride,
 Be all their batteries on us hourly try'd!
 Breathless and dead their fruitless force shall kiss our soft'ned side.
 Embark, ye well-appointed few, embark!
 Put out, and meet the number-trusting foe!
 Their circling fleet has made the day look dark, [blow!
 And seems in sable dress'd to mourn the coming
 Rush against 'em—gore 'em through!
 Bear 'em down beneath the sea!
 As weeds before the furrowing plough torn up and buried be!
 If while onward ye pursue,
 On either side they flank ye too; [throats,
 At once clear all your thunder's dreadful
 And roar destruction out in passant notes!
 'Tis done; and gloriously the banish'd day,
 Which late their gloomy squadrons chas'd
 away,
 Restor'd triumphant shines with ten-fold light:
 Their curling ruin shines to heaven, and makes the sun more bright!
 See, see, mark well this scene-recording fame!
 The hissing ocean toils with vain desire,
 To quench with spouting waves the batt'ling
 flame;
 But scorch'd with clinging heat, and mad
 with shame,
 Does every way at once in blazing tides retire,
 And flying frights th' astonish'd world with floods
 of liquid fire. [feels;
 Pride-swoll'n oppression now hot vengeance
 Their falling flags blush deep in blood!
 And hide their shame within the flood!
 Their masts turn downward, and th' uplifted keels
 Float reverse with wave-wash'd reels! [gay,
 And all th' extended strength but now so proudly
 Like snow-top'd fields o'er-run by fire, melts all at once away.
 Whither shall we now proceed?
 Turn your heads to yon white shore;
 Follow fortune still with speed,
 Ye who would engage her more!
 It matters nothing what we now have done;
 Or vict'ry must be well pursued, or she is never won.
 Ha! what means yon op'ning scene?
 The warlike land is gilded o'er
 With glitt'ring arms in distant marches seen,

And graceful troops that edge the guarded shore!
 And from behind to close us up between,
 A huge half moon of naval strength,
 Stretch'd in gay and pompous length,
 Advances on us slow and well assur'd:
 These cannot of the number be, who late such loss
 endur'd!
 Mark the impatient haste of those behind!
 As if o'erjoy'd an enemy to find;
 Their wanton streamers lash the lazy wind,
 And like their genius hov'ring in the air!
 See that glorious something there!
 Which does a form unusual seem to bear;
 Moving awful; looking kind;
 Now glides before to light 'em on; now cheers
 'em up behind.
 In shape a lion fierce, and strong it seems,
 But like some figure fancy-form'd that fills mens active dreams;
 An eagle's talons and keen bill it dreadful seems to bear;
 An eagle's broad and shad'wy wings direct it through the air!
 Observe what's he, who solemnly severe,
 With grave and awful sense of majesty,
 Hemm'd with reverence does appear!
 Whose eye so piercing seems to be!
 Whose forehead wears beneficence to temper dignity!
 Who marches stately down yon hill to see;
 But not to see with fear!
 To look and judge what we may be!
 Ye powers, where are we?—How did fancy steer?
 I know the hero; now he draws more near!
 How came we blindly thus to touch a shore?
 Thus hostilely a land explore,
 Where heaven does only blessings store?
 Where wailing sorrow shall be heard no more,
 Nor virtue e'er in vain the help of power im-
 plore!
 Away! heave anchor! we've no business here!
 Yet stay! divinely led, I err th' unmeant good to blame!
 Inspir'd at once I see and own 'twas heaven's un-
 erring aim!
 Hail, immortal son of fame!
 Take these legions, they are thine!
 With theirs thy navy shall resistless join;
 And virtue's squadrons led by thee, o'er earth's whole surface shine.
 Root out oppression where'er she grows,
 Let stubborn tyranny fall dead beneath thy pond'-
 rous blows!
 And over all the wide-watch'd world leave innocence no foes.

Even I, the meanest of the muses train,
Inflam'd by thee, attempt a nobler strain;
Advent'rous waken the Mæolian lyre,
Tun'd by your hand, and sing as you inspire;
So arm'd by great Achilles for the fight,

THE LIFE OF BROOME.

WILLIAM BROOME was born in Cheshire, as is said, of very mean parents. Of the time and place of his birth, or the early part of his life, no intelligence is to be found. He was educated upon the foundation at Eton, and had the misfortune of being captain of the school for one whole year, 1707, without any vacancy, by which he might have obtained a scholarship in King's College, Oxford.

Being by this delay, such as has happened but four times in 160 years, in 1619, 1653, 1707, and 1756, superannuated, his friends sent him to St. John's College, where, by their assistance, and a small exhibition, he was maintained till he entered into orders.

At his college he had the reputation of being an excellent Greek scholar and a skilful versifier, but he is described, as being a contracted scholar, and a mere versifier, unacquainted with life, and unskilful in conversation. He was so much addicted to versifying, that his companions familiarly called him Poet. When he had opportunities of mingling with mankind, he cleared himself, it is said, from great part of his scholastic rust.

He appeared early in the world as a translator of the "Iliad" into prose, in conjunction with Ozell and Oldisworth; but his share in that version, which is now neglected, is not known. He was introduced to Pope, who was then upon a visit to Sir John Cotton at Madingley near Cambridge, and gained so much of his esteem, that he was employed with Jortin to make extracts from Eustathius for the notes to the translation of the "Iliad;" and in the second volume of "Miscellaneous Poems, Translations, and Imitations," published by Lintot, commonly called "Pope's Miscellanies," twelve of his early pieces were inserted. That he furnished "the greater part of the Remarks from Eustathius," together with several excellent observations, is acknowledged by Pope; who, it has been said, promised him a handsome gratuity for his trouble; and, when the work was finished, quarrelled with him, and disappointed him of the promised reward. It is certain that Broome thus represented the story to his friends; yet, in a letter to Lord Hervey from Pope, who had been charged with "selling Broome's works, printed with Pope's name," he tells his Lordship he printed not his name before a line of the person's his Lordship mentions; besides, my Lord, when you said I sold another man's works, you ought in justice to have added that I bought them, which very much alters the case. What I gave was 500 l.; his receipt can be produced to your Lordship."

Ruffhead relates that Broome, in conjunction with Fenton, had formed a design of translating the Odyssy, while Pope was employed upon the "Iliad," and went through several books of the Odyssy, which they desired him to peruse; and having made a considerable progress in the translation himself, adopted what he found thus ready for the advancement of his work.

It is some confirmation of what is thus related, that among the poems in "Pope's Miscellany" there is one To a Gentleman who corrected some of my Verses, the title of which he afterwards thus changed, To Mr. A. Pope, who corrected my Verses.

That the version of the Odyssy was not wholly Pope's was always known. He had mentioned the assistance of two friends in his proposals; and at the end of the work some account is given by Broome of their different parts, which, however, mentions only five books as written by the coadjutors; the fourth and twentieth by Fenton, the sixth, the eleventh, and eighteenth, by himself; though Pope, in an advertisement prefixed afterwards to a new volume of his works, claimed only twelve.

The books allotted to Fenton were the first, the fourth, the nineteenth, and the twentieth; to the lot of Broome fell the second, sixth, eighth, eleventh, twelfth, sixteenth, eighteenth, and twenty-third, with all the notes.

The price at which Pope purchased this assistance was 300 l. to Fenton, and 500 l. to Broome, with as many copies to his friends as made one hundred more. The payment made to Fenton is not certainly known. Lord Orrery says "it was an errant trifle:" Broome's is very distinctly told by Pope in the notes to the "Dunciad."

It is evident, that, according to Pope's own estimate, Broome was unkindly treated. If four books could merit 300 l. eight and all the notes, equivalent at least to four, had certainly a right to more than six.

Broome, probably finding that Pope got more than either of them expected, was desirous of a share; but though Pope was not generous on this occasion, if Broome received what they agreed for, there seems no just ground of complaint.

There was for some time, from whatever cause, more than coldness between Broome and his employer. He always spoke of Pope, as did his friend Fenton, as too much a lover of money, and Pope pursued him with avowed hostility; for he not only named him disrespectfully in the "Dunciad," but quoted him more than once in the "Bathos" as a proficient in the "Art of Sinking;" and in his enumeration of the different kinds of poets distinguished for the profound, he reckons Broome among "the parrots who repeat another's words in such a hoarse odd tone as makes them seem their own."

It appears by a letter from Pope to Broome, in 1730, in which he communicated to him an account of the death of Fenton, which is noticed in the life of that amiable and elegant poet, that they were afterwards reconciled, but their peace was probably without friendship.

In 1727, he published his Poems on Several Occasions, with a dedication to Lord Townshend, dated Jan. 16 1726; being at that time rector of Sturston in Suffolk, and chaplain to Charles Lord (afterward Earl) Cornwallis.

At Sturston he married a widow lady who had a good fortune, which enabled him to take the degree of Doctor of Laws, when the king went to Cambridge, April 25. 1728.

Upon his resignation of the living of Sturston, he was presented by the Crown to the rectory of Pulham in Norfolk, in August 1733, which he held with Oakley Magna in Suffolk, given him by Lord Cornwallis, who added the vicarage of Eye in Suffolk; he then resigned Pulham, and retained the other two till his death.

Towards the latter end of his life, he amused himself with translating Odes of Anacreon, which he published in the "Gentleman's Magazine," under the signature of Chester.

He died at Bath, November 16. 1745, and was buried in the Abbey Church, by Dr Gooch bishop of Norwich. He left an only son, Charles, who died of the small-pox in 1747, an under graduate of St. John's College, Cambridge.

His Poems on Several Occasions were reprinted in 1739, and again in 1750, with several additions and variations, which are retained in the present edition.

The character of Broome, though he never rose to a very high dignity in the church, seems to have been amiable and respectable. At college he was universally beloved; and in more advanced life he was distinguished by his exemplary observance of the social and domestic duties, and his piety and diligence in the exercise of his pastoral function. He is mentioned by Shuckford (Sacred and Profane History Connected, vol. iii. p. 60.) under the title of "the ingenious Annotator on the English Homer, whose real worth, as well as learning, makes it a pleasure to me to say, that I have a friend fl 1 \ 1"

As a poet, his compositions are characterised by correctness of judgment, elegance of diction, and harmony of numbers, rather than by force of genius, or grace of fancy; neither of which, however, are wanting. To examine his performances one by one, would be tedious. One of his pieces is intitled, Melancholy; an Ode, occasioned by the Death of a beloved Daughter, 1723; but it is not quite certain that it was written on a daughter of his own. His Verses on the Death of a Friend, which were printed in 1727, were afterwards very happily enlarged, and applied to Fenton, who died in 1730. His Verses to Mrs. Elizabeth Townshend, on her Picture at Rainham, are elegant and poetical in a high degree. Of his Paraphrases from Scripture, nothing very favourable can be said; yet the third chapter of Habakkuk, and the Paraphrases from Job and Ecclesiastius, have merit; the language not being deficient either in strength or melody. His Translations are smooth, classical, and spirited; and most of his original pieces have something to be praised, either in the thought or the expression. Dr. Warton thinks the books he translated for Pope, in the Odyssey, are inferior to Fenton's; but it is no small honour to him, that the readers of poetry have never been able to distinguish his books from those of Fenton and Pope.

"Of Broome," says Dr. Johnson, "though it cannot be said that he was a great poet, it would be unjust to deny that he was an excellent versifier; his lines are smooth and sonorous, and his diction is select and elegant. His rhymes are sometimes unsuitable. In his Melancholy he makes breath rhyme to birth in one place, and to earth in another. Those faults occur but seldom; and he had such power of words and numbers, as fitted him for translation; but in his original works, recollection seems to have been his business more than invention. His imitations are so apparent, that it is part of his reader's employment to recal the verses of some former poet. Sometimes he copies the most popular writers; for he seems scarcely to endeavour at concealment; and sometimes picks up fragments in obscure corners." His lines to Fenton,

Serene the sting of pain thy thoughts beguile,
And make afflictions objects of a smile,

brought to my mind some lines on the death of Queen Mary, written by Barnes, of whom I should not have expected to find an imitation.

But thou, O muse! whose sweet Nepenthean tongue
Can charm the pangs of death with deathless song;
Can stinging plagues with easy thoughts beguile;
Make pains and tortures objects of a smile.

"To detect his imitations, were tedious and useless. What he takes he seldom makes worse; and he cannot be thought a mean man, whom Pope chose for an associate; and whose co-operation was considered by Pope's enemies as so important, that he was attacked by Henley with this ludicrous distich."

Pope came off clean with Homer; but they say,
Broome went before, and kindly swept the way.

DEDICATION.

To the Right Honourable

CHARLES LORD VISCOUNT TOWNSHEND;

Late one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, and Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, &c.

MY LORD,

I BEG leave to publish the following poems under your patronage: a present, I confess, unworthy of it, and of little value, excepting what gratitude gives it: but, I fear, it may be esteemed a boast rather than an acknowledgment, or at best an ostentatious kind of gratitude, to tell the world that I have received the highest obligations from the Lord Townshend: it is an honour to be regarded by a person of so distinguished a character: I am proud of it, and, not being of a nature to be content with a silent gratitude, am not deterred from owning it, though it be liable to be miscalled vanity.

You have, my Lord, the happiness to enjoy what that great statesman Walsingham, who held the same office which you fill with so much honour, frequently wished, but never obtained: a retirement from business in the declension of life, to enjoy age in peace and tranquillity: this last action speaks you truly great; for that person who by a voluntary retreat, could industriously renounce all the grandeur of the world, must evidently have a soul above it.

Tully in his Tusculum was never more happy, than the Lord Townshend in his Rainham:

" —Where majestically plain
" Pure nature reigns, where varied views from

" Diffusive prospects yield*: here shagg'd with
" Here rich with harvest, and there white with " flocks,
" And all the gay horizon smiles around
" Full of thy genius! Lo! between yon groves
" The dome with easy grandeur, like the soul
" Of its great master, rising overlooks
" The subject regions, and commands the charms
" Of many a pleasing landscape, to the eye
" Delightful change! here groves of loftiest shade
" Wave their proud tops, and form of stateliest view
" A sylvan theatre! while nature's hand [lawn,
" Pours forth profuse, o'er hill, o'er vale, o'er
" Her choicest blessings: see! where yonder lake

This, my Lord, is but a faint picture of the place of your retirement, which no one ever enjoyed more elegantly: no part of your life lies heavy upon you; there is no uneasy vacancy in it; it is all filled up with study, exercise, or polite amusement: here you shine in the most agreeable, though not most strong and dazzling light: in your public station you commanded admiration and honour; in your private, you attract love and esteem: the nobler parts of your life will be the subject of the historian; and the actions of the great statesman and patriot will adorn many pages of our future annals: but the affectionate father, the indulgent master, the condescending and benevolent friend, patron, and companion, can only be described by those who have the pleasure and happiness to see you act in all those relations: I could with delight enlarge upon this amiable part of your character; but am sensible that no portion of your time is so ill spent as in reading what I write. I will therefore only beg the honour to subscribe myself,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obliged,
And most obedient servant,

WILLIAM BROOME.

Pulham in Norfolk, 1739.

P R E F A C E.

I AM very sensible that many hard circumstances attend all authors: if they write ill, they are sure to be used with contempt; if well, too often with envy. Some men, even while they improve themselves with the sentiments of others, rail at their benefactors, and while they gather the fruit, tear the tree that bore it. I must confess, that mere idleness induced me to write; and the hopes of entertaining a few idle men to publish. I am not so vain as not to think there are many faults in the ensuing poems; all human works must fall short of perfection; and therefore to acknowledge it, is no humility: however, I am not like those authors, who, out of a false modesty, complain of the imperfections of their own works, yet would take it very ill if the world should believe them: I will not add hypocrisy to my other faults, or act so absurdly as to invite the reader to an entertainment, and then tell him that there is nothing worth his eating; I have furnished out the table according to my best abilities, if not with a splendid elegance, yet at least with an innocent variety.

But since this is the last time that I shall ever, perhaps, trouble the world in this kind, I will beg leave to speak something not as a poet, but a critic; that if my credit should fail as a poet, I may have recourse to my remarks upon Homer, and be pardoned for my industry as the annotator in part upon the Iliad, and entirely upon the Odyssey.

I will therefore offer a few things upon criticism in general, a study very necessary, but fallen into contempt through the abuse of it. At the restoration of learning, it was particularly necessary; authors had been long buried in obscurity, and consequently had contracted some rust through the ignorance and barbarism of preceding ages: it was therefore very requisite that they should be polished by a critical hand, and restored to their original purity: in this consists the office of critics; but, instead of making copies agreeable to the manuscripts, they have long inserted their own conjectures; and from this license arise most of the various readings, the burdens of modern editions; whereas books are like pictures, they may be new varnished, but not a feature is to be altered; and every stroke that is thus added, destroys in some degree the resemblance; and the original is no longer an Homer or a Virgil, but a mere ideal person, the creature of the editor's fancy. Whoever deviates from this rule, does not correct, but corrupt his author: and therefore, since most books worth reading have now good impressions, it is a folly to devote too much time to this branch of criticism; it is ridiculous to make it the supreme business of life to repair the ruins of a decayed word, to trouble the world with vain niceties about a letter, or a syllable, or the transposition of a phrase, when the present reading is sufficiently intelligible. These learned triflers are mere weeders of an author; they collect the weeds for their own use, and permit others to gather the herbs and flowers: it would be of more advantage to mankind, when once an author is faithfully published, to turn our thoughts from the words to the sentiments, and make them more easy and intelligible. A skill in verbal criticism is in reality but a skill in guessing, and consequently he is the best critic who guesses best: a mighty attainment! and yet with what pomp is a trivial alteration ushered into the world! such writers are like Caligula, who raised a mighty army, and alarmed the whole world, and then led it to gather cockle-shells. In short, the question is not what the author might have said, but what he has actually said; it is not whether a different word will agree with the sense, and turn of the period, but whether it was used by the author; if it was, it has a good title still to maintain its post, and the authority of the manuscript ought to be followed rather than the fancy of the editor: for can a modern be a better judge of the language of the purest of the ancients, than those ancients who wrote it in the greatest purity? or if he could, was ever any author so happy, as always to choose the most proper word? experience shows the impossibility. Besides, of what use is verbal criticism when once we have a faithful edition? it embarrasses the reader instead of giving new light and hinders his proficiency by engrossing his time, and calling off the attention from the author to the editor; it increases the expence of books, and makes us pay an high price for trifles, and often for absurdities. I will only add, with Sir Henry Saville, that various lections are now grown so voluminous, that we begin to value the first editions of books as most correct, because least corrected.

There are other critics who think themselves obliged to see no imperfections in their author: from the moment they undertake his cause, they look upon him as a lover upon his mistress; he has no faults, or his very faults improve into beauties: this, indeed, is a well-natured error, but still blameable, because it misguides the judgment. Such critics act no less erroneously, than a judge who should resolve to acquit a person, whether innocent or guilty, who comes before him upon his trial. It is frequent for the partial critic to praise the work as he likes the author; he admires a book as an antiquary a medal, solely from the impression of the name, and not from the intrinsic value: the copper of a favourite writer shall be more esteemed than the finest gold of a less acceptable author: for this reason many persons have chosen to publish their works without a name, and by this method, like Apelles, who stood unseen behind his own Venus, have received a praise, which perhaps might have been denied if the author had been visible.

But there are other critics who act a contrary part, and condemn all as criminals whom they try: they dwell only on the faults of an author, and endeavour to raise a reputation by dispraising every thing that other men praise; they have an antipathy to a shining character, like some animals, that hate the sun only because of its brightness: it is a crime with them to excel: they are a kind of Tartars in learning, who, seeing a person of distinguished qualifications, immediately endeavour to kill him, in hopes to attain just so much merit as they destroy in their adversary. I never look into one of these critics but he puts me in mind of a giant in romance: the glory of the giant consists in the number of the limbs of men whom he has destroyed; that of the critic in viewing

“ ——— Disjecti membra Poetæ.” HOR.

If ever he accidentally deviates into praise, he does it that his ensuing blame may fall with the greater weight; he adorns an author with a few flowers, as the ancients those victims which they were ready to sacrifice: he studies criticism as if it extended only to dispraise; a practice, which, when most successful, is least desirable. A painter might justly be thought to have a perverse imagination, who should delight only to draw the deformities and distortions of human nature, which, when executed by the most masterly hand, strike the beholder with most horror. It is usual with envious critics to attack the writings of others, because they are good; they constantly prey upon the fairest fruits, and hope to spread their own works by uniting them to those of their adversary. But this is like Mezentius in Virgil, to join a dead carcass to a living body; and the only effect of it, to fill every well-natured mind with detestation: their malice becomes impotent, and, contrary to their design, they give a testimony of their enemy's merit, and show him to be an hero by turning all their weapons against him: such critics are like dead coals; they may blacken, but cannot burn. These writers bring to my memory a passage in the Iliad, where all the inferior powers, the Plebs Superum, or rabble of the sky, are fancied to unite their endeavours to pull Jupiter down to the earth: but by the attempt they only betray their own inability; Jupiter is still Jupiter, and by their unavailing efforts they manifest his superiority.

Modesty is essential to true criticism: no man has a title to be a dictator in knowledge, and the sense of our own infirmities ought to teach us to treat others with humanity. The envious critic ought to consider, that if the authors be dead whom he censures, it is inhumanity to trample upon their ashes with insolence; that it is cruelty to summon, implead, and condemn them with rigour and animosity, when they are not in a capacity to answer his unjust allegations: If the authors be alive, the common laws of society oblige us not to commit any outrage against another's reputation; we ought modestly to convince, not injuriously insult; and contend for truth, not victory: and yet the envious critic is like the tyrants of old, who thought it not enough to conquer, unless their enemies were made a public spectacle, and dragged in triumph at their chariot-wheels: but what is such a triumph but a barbarous insult over the calamities of their fellow-creatures? the noise of a day, purchased with the misery of nations? However, I would not be thought to be pleading for an exemption from criticism; I would only have it circumscribed within the rules of candour and humanity: writers may be told of their errors, provided it be with the decency and tenderness of a friend, not the malice and passion of an enemy; boys may be whipped into sense, but men are to be guided with reason.

If we grant the malicious critic all that he claims, and allow him to have proved his adversary's dulness, and his own acuteness, yet, as long as there is virtue in the world, modest dulness will be preferable to learned arrogance: Dulness may be a misfortune, but arrogance is a crime; and where is the mighty advantage, if, while he discovers more learning, he is found to have less virtue than his adversary? and, though he be a better critic, yet proves himself to be a worse man? Besides, no one is to be envied the skill in finding such faults as others are so dull as to mistake for beauties. What advantage is such a quicksightedness even to the possessors of it? It makes them difficult to be pleased, and gives them pain, while others receive a pleasure: they resemble the second-sighted people in Scotland, who are fabled to see more than other persons; but all the benefit they reap from this privilege, is to discover objects of horror, ghosts, and apparitions.

But it is time to end, though I have too much reason to enlarge the argument for candour in criticism, through a consciousness of my own deficiency: I have in reality been pleading my own cause, that if I appear too guilty to obtain a pardon, I may find so much mercy from my judges, as to be condemned to suffer without inhumanity: But whatever be the fate of these works, they have proved of use to me, and been an agreeable amusement in a constant solitude. Providence has been pleased to lead me out of the great roads of life, into a private path; where, though we have leisure to choose the smoothest way, yet we are all sure to meet many obstacles in the journey: I have found poetry an innocent companion, and support from the fatigues of it; how long, or how short, the future stages of it are to be, as it is uncertain, so it is a folly to be over-solicitous about it; he that lives the longest, has but the small privilege of creeping more leisurely than others to his grave; what we call living, is in reality but a longer time of dying: and if these verses prove as short-lived as their author, it is a loss not worth regretting; they only die, as they were born, in obscurity.

STAT.

HABBAKKUK, CHAP. III. PARAPHRASED.

AN ODE,

Written in 1710, as an Exercise.

WHEN, in a glorious terrible array,
From Paran's towering height th' Almighty took his way;

Borne on a cherub's wings he rode,
Intolerable day proclaim'd the God;

No earthly cloud
Could his effulgent brightness shroud:
Glory, and majesty, and power,
March'd in a dreadful pomp before;

Behind, a grim and meagre train,
Pining sickness, frantic pain,
Stalk'd widely on! with all the dismal band,
Which heaven in anger sends to scourge a guilty
land.

With terror cloth'd, he downward flew,
And wither'd half the nations with a view;
Through half the nations of th' astonish'd earth
He scatter'd war, and plagues, and dearth!

And when he spoke,
The everlasting hills from their foundations shook;
The trembling mountains, by a lowly nod,

With reverence struck, confess'd the God:

On Sion's holy hill he took his stand,

Grasping omnipotence in his right hand;

Then mighty earthquakes rock'd the ground,

And the sun darken'd as he frown'd:

He dealt affliction from his van,

And wild confusion from his rear;

They through the tents of Cushan ran,

The tents of Cushan quak'd with fear,

And Midian trembled with despair.

* I see! his sword wave naked in the air;
It sheds around a baleful ray,

VARIATION.

* I see his sword wave with redoubled ire,
Ah! has it set the very clouds on fire?
The clouds burst down in deluges of showers;
Fierce lightning flames, vindictive thunder roars.

The rains pour down, the lightnings play,
And on their wings vindictive thunders bear.

When through the mighty flood

He led the murmuring crowd,

What ail'd the rivers that they backward fled?

Why was the mighty flood afraid?

March'd he against the rivers? or was he,

Thou mighty flood! displeas'd at thee?

The flood beheld from far

The Deity in all his equipage of war;

And lo! at once it bursts! in diverse falls

On either hand! it swells in crystal walls!

Th' eternal rocks disclose! the tossing waves

Rush in loud thunder from a thousand caves!

Why tremble ye, O faithless! to behold

The opening deeps their gulfs unfold?

Enter the dreadful chasms! 'tis God, who guides

Your wond'rous way! the God who rules the tides!

And lo! they march amid the deafening roar

Of tumbling seas! they mount the adverse shore!

Advance, ye chosen tribes!—Arabia's sands

Lonely, uncomfortable lands!

Void of fountain, void of rain,

Oppose their burning coasts in vain!

See! the great prophet stand,

Waving his wonder-working wand!

He strikes the stubborn rock, and lo!

The stubborn rock feels the Almighty blow!

His stony entrails burst, and rushing torrents flow.

* Then did the sun his fiery couriers stay,

And backward held the falling day;

VARIATION.

* Ah, what new scenes unfold, what voice I hear!

Sun, stand thou still; thou moon, thy course forbear:

Ah, . . . sun, thy wheels obedient stay,

Doubling the splendours of the wondrous day.

The nimble-footed minutes cease to run

And urge the lazy hours on.

Time hangs his unexpanded wings,

And all the secret springs

That carry on the year

Stop in their full career;

The nimble-footed minutes ceas'd to run,
 And urge the lazy hours on.
 Time hung his unexpanded wings,
 And all the secret springs
 That carry on the year,
 Stopp'd in their full career :
 Then the astonish'd moon
 Forgot her going down ;
 And paler grew,
 The dismal scene to view,
 How through the trembling Pagan nation,
 Th' Almighty ruin dealt, and ghastly desolation.

But why, ah ! why, O Sion, reigns
 Wide wasting havock o'er thy plains ?
 Ah, me ! destruction is abroad !
 Vengeance is loose, and wrath from God !
 See ! hosts of spoilers seize their prey !
 See ! slaughter marks in blood his way !
 See ! how embattled Babylon
 Like an unruly deluge rushes on !
 Lo ! the field with millions swarms !
 I hear their shouts ! their clashing arms !
 Now the conflicting hosts engage,
 With more than mortal rage !——
 Oh ! heaven ! I faint——I die !——
 The yielding powers of Israel fly !——
 Now banner'd hosts surround the walls
 Of Sion ! now she sinks, she falls !——
 Ah ! Sion, how for thee I mourn !
 What pangs for thee I feel !
 Ah ! how art thou become the Pagans' scorn,
 Lovely, unhappy Israel !
 A shivering damp invades my heart,
 A trembling horror shoots through every part ;
 My nodding frame can scarce sustain
 Th' oppressive load I undergo :
 Speechless I sigh ! the envious woe
 Forbids the very pleasure to complain :
 Forbids my faltering tongue to tell
 What pangs for thee I feel,
 Lovely, unhappy Israel !

Yet though the fig-tree should no burthen bear,
 Though vines delude the promise of the year ;
 Yet though the olive should not yield her oil,
 Nor the parch'd glebe reward the peasant's toil ;
 Though the tir'd ox beneath his labours fall,
 And herds in millions perish from the stall ;
 Yet shall my grateful strings
 For ever praise thy name,
 For ever thee proclaim,
 Thee everlasting God, the mighty King of Kings.

TO BELINDA,

ON HER SICKNESS AND RECOVERY.

SURE never pain such beauty wore,
 Or look'd so amiable before !

VARIATION.

At once th' astonish'd moon
 Forgets her going down,
 And paler grows,
 To view th' amazing train of woes ;
 While through the trembling Pagan nation
 Th' Almighty ruin deals, and ghastly desolation.
 VOL. VIII.

You graces give to a disease,
 Adorn the pain, and make it please :
 Thus burning incense sheds perfumes,
 Still fragrant as it still consumes.

Nor can even sickness, which disarms
 All other nymphs, destroy your charms ;
 A thousand beauties you can spare,
 And still be fairest of the fair.

But see ! the pain begins to fly ;
 Though Venus bled, she could not die :
 See ! the new phoenix point her eyes,
 And lovelier from her ashes rise :
 Thus roses, when the storm is o'er,
 Draw beauties from th' inclement shower.

Welcome, ye hours ! which thus repay
 What envious sickness stole away !
 Welcome as those which kindly bring,
 And usher in the joyous spring ;
 That to the smiling earth restore
 The beauteous herb, and blooming flower,
 And give her all the charms she lost
 By wintry storms, and hoary frost !

And yet how well did she sustain,
 And greatly triumph o'er her pain !
 So flowers, when blasting winds invade,
 Breathe sweet, and beautifully fade.

Now in her cheeks, and radiant eyes,
 New blushes glow, new lightnings rise ;
 Behold a thousand charms succeed,
 For which a thousand hearts must bleed !
 Brighter from her disease she shines,
 As fire the precious gold refines.

Thus when the silent grave becomes
 Pregnant with life, as fruitful wombs ;
 When the wide seas, and spacious earth,
 Resign us to our second birth ;
 Our mould'ring frame rebuilt assumes
 New beauty, and for ever blooms ;
 And, crown'd with youth's immortal pride,
 We angels rise, who mortals dy'd.

TO BELINDA,

ON HER APRON EMBROIDERED WITH ARMS
 AND FLOWERS.

* THE listening trees Amphion drew
 To dance from hills, where once they grew :
 But you express a power more great ;
 The flowers you draw not, but create.

Behold your own creation rise,
 And smile beneath your radiant eyes !
 'Tis beauteous all ! and yet receives
 From you more graces than it gives.

But say, amid the softer charms
 Of blooming flowers, what mean these arms ?

VARIATION.

* The lovely Flora paints the earth,
 And calls the morning flowers to birth ;
 But you display a power more great ;
 She calls forth flowers, but you create.

So round the fragrance of the rose,
The pointed thorn, to guard it, grows.

But cruel you, who thus employ
Both arms and beauty to destroy!
So Venus marches to the fray
In armour, formidably gay.

It is a dreadful pleasing sight!
The flowers attract, the arms affright;
The flowers with lively beauty bloom,
The arms denounce an instant doom.

Thus, when the Britons in array
Their ensigns to the sun display,
In the same flag are lilies shown,
And angry lions sternly frown;
On high the glittering standard flies,
And conquers all things—like your eyes.

PART OF THE XXXVIII. AND XXXIX.
CHAPTERS OF JOB.

A PARAPHRASE.

Now from the splendors of his bright abode
On wings of all the winds th' Almighty rode,
And the loud voice of thunder spoke the God. }
Cherubs and seraphs from celestial bowers,
Ten thousand thousand! bright ethereal powers!
Ministrant round, their radiant files unfold,
Arm'd in eternal adamant and gold!
Whirlwinds and thundrous storms his chariot drew
'Tween worlds and worlds, triumphant as it flew:
He stretch'd his dark pavilion o'er the floods,
Bade hills subside, and rein'd th' obedient clouds;
Then from his awful gloom the Godhead spoke,
And at his voice affrighted nature shook.

Vain man! who boldly with dim reason's ray
Vies with his God, and rivals his full day!

* But tell me now, say how this beauteous frame
Of all things, from the womb of nothing came;
When nature's Lord, with one almighty call,
From nowhere rais'd the world's capacious ball?
Say if thy hand directs the various rounds
Of the vast earth, and circumscribes the bounds?
How orbs oppos'd to orbs amid the sky,
In concert move, and dance in harmony?
What wondrous pillars their foundations bear
When hung self-balanc'd in the fluid air?
Why the vast tides sometimes with wanton play
In shining mazes gently glide away;
Anon, why swelling with impetuous stores
Tumultuous tumbling, thunder to the shores?
By thy command does fair Aurora rise,
And gild with purple beams the blushing skies;
The warbling lark salutes her cheerful ray,
And welcomes with his song the rising day;
The rising day ambrosial dew distills,
Th' ambrosial dew with balmy odour fills
The flowers, the flowers rejoice, and nature } smiles.

VARIATION.

* But tell me, mortal, when th' Almighty said,
Be made, ye worlds! how worlds at once were
made;
When hosts of angels, wrapt in wonder, sung
His praise, as order from disorder sprung?

Why night, in sable rob'd, as daylight fades,
O'er half the nations draws her awful shades?
Now peaceful nature lies diffus'd in ease;
A solemn stillness reigns o'er land and seas.
* Sleep sheds o'er all his balm! to sleep resign'd,
Birds, beasts lie hush'd, and busy human-kind.
No air of breath disturbs the drowsy woods,
No whispers murmur from the silent floods!
The moon sheds down a silver-streaming light,
And glads the melancholic face of night:
Now clouds swift-skimming veil her sullied ray,
† Now bright she blazes with a fuller day:
The stars in order twinkle in the skies,
And fall in silence, and in silence rise:
Till, as a giant strong, a bridegroom gay,
The sun springs dancing through the gates of day:
He shakes his dewy locks, and hurls his beams
O'er the proud hills, and down the glowing streams:
His fiery couriers bound above the main,
And whirl the car along th' ethereal plain:
The fiery couriers and the car display
A stream of glory, and a flood of day.
Did e'er thy eye descend into the deep
Or hast thou seen where infant tempests sleep?
Was e'er the grave, or regions of the night,
Yet trod by thee, or open'd to thy sight?
Has death disclos'd to thee her gloomy state,
The ghastly forms, the various woes that wait }
In terrible array before her awful gate?
Know'st thou where darkness bears eternal sway,
Or where the source of everlasting day?
Say, why the thriving hail with rushing sound
Pours from on high, and rattles on the ground?
Why hover snows, down-wavering by degrees,
Shine from the hills, or glitter from the trees?
Say, why in lucid drops the balmy rain
With sparkling gems impearls the spangled plain?
Or, gathering in the vale, a current flows,
And on each flower a sudden spring bestows?
Say, why with gentle sighs the evening breeze
Salutes the flowers, or murmurs through the trees?
Or why loud winds in storms of vengeance fly,
Howl o'er the main, and thunder in the sky?
Say, to what wondrous magazines repair
The viewless beings, when serene the air?
Till, from their dungeons loos'd, they roar aloud,
Upturn whole oceans, and toss cloud on cloud,
While waves encountering waves, in mountains driven,
Swell to the starry vault, and dash the heaven.
Know'st thou, why comets threaten in the air, }
Heralds of woe, destruction, and despair,
The plague, the sword, and all the forms of war?
On ruddy wings why forked light'ning flies,
And rolling thunder grumbles in the skies?

VARIATIONS.

* No more the monsters of the desert roar,
Doubling the terrors of the midnight hour.
The fowl, the fishes, to repose resign'd,
All, all lie hush'd, and busy human-kind.
The fainting murmur dies upon the floods,
And sighing breezes lull the drowsy woods.

† Now bright she blazes, and supplies the day.

Say, can thy voice, when sultry Sirius reigns,
 And suns intensely glowing cleave the plains,
 Th' exhausted urns of thirsty springs supply,
 And mitigate the fever of thy sky? [clouds,
 Or, when the heavens are charg'd with gloomy
 And half the skies precipitate in floods,
 Chase the dark horror of the storm away,
 Restrain the deluge, and restore the day?
 By thee does summer deck herself with charms,
 Or hoary winter lock his frozen arms?
 Say, if thy hand instruct the rose to glow,
 Or to the lily give un sullied snow?
 Teach fruits to knit from blossoms by degrees,
 Swell into orbs, and load the bending trees,
 Whose various kinds a various hue unfold,
 With crimson blush, or burnish into gold?
 Say, why the sun arrays with shining dyes
 The gaudy bow that gilds the gloomy skies?
 He from his urn pours forth his golden streams,
 And humid clouds imbibe the glittering beams;
 Sweetly the varying colours fade or rise,
 And the vast arch embraces half the skies.
 Say, didst thou give the mighty seas their bars,
 Fill air with fowl, or light up heaven with stars,
 Whose thousand times ten thousand lamps display
 A friendly radiance, mingling ray with ray?
 Say, canst thou rule the couriers of the sun,
 Or lash the lazy sign, Boötes, on?
 Dost thou instruct the eagle how to fly,
 'To mount the viewless winds, and tower the sky?
 On sounding pinions borne, he soars, and shrouds
 His proud aspiring head among the clouds;
 Strong-pounc'd, and fierce, he darts upon his
 prey,
 He sails in triumph through th' ethereal way,
 Bears on the sun, and basks in open day.
 Does the dread king, and terror of the wood,
 The lion, from thy hand expect his food?
 Stung with keen hunger from his den he comes,
 Ranges the plains, and o'er the forest roams:
 • He snuffs the track of beasts, he fiercely roars,
 Doubling the horrors of the midnight hours:
 With fullen majesty he stalks away,
 And the rocks tremble while he seeks his prey:
 Dreadful he grins, he rends the savage brood
 With unsheath'd paws, and churns the spouting
 blood.
 Dost thou with thunder arm the generous horse,
 Add nervous limbs, or swiftness for the course?
 Fleet as the wind, he shoots along the plain,
 And knows no check, nor hears the curbing rein;
 His fiery eye-balls, formidably bright,
 Dart a fierce glory, and a dreadful light:
 Pleas'd with the clank of arms, and trumpets' sound,
 He bounds, and prancing paws the trembling
 ground;
 He snuffs the promis'd battle from afar, [war:
 Neighs at the captains, shouts, and thunder of the Rous'd with the noble din and martial fight,
 He pants with tumults of severe delight:

VARIATION.

• He mocks the beating storms and wintery showers,
 Making night hideous as he sternly roars.

His sprightly blood an even course disdains,
 Pours from his heart, and charges in his veins;
 He braves the spear, and mocks the twanging bow,
 Demands the fight, and rushes on the foe.

MELANCHOLY:

AN ODE.

Occasioned by the Death of a beloved Daughter. 1723.

ADIEU vain mirth, and noisy joys!
 Ye gay desires, deluding toys!
 Thou, thoughtful melancholy, deign
 To hide me in thy pensive train!
 If by the fall or murmuring floods,
 Where awful shades embrown the woods,
 Or if, where winds in caverns groan,
 Thou wanderest silent and alone;
 Come, blissful mourner, wisely sad,
 In sorrow's garb, in sable clad,
 Henceforth, thou care, my hours employ!
 Sorrow, be thou henceforth my joy!
 By tombs where fullen spirits stalk,
 Familiar with the dead I walk;
 While to my sighs and groans by turns,
 From graves the midnight echo mourns.
 Open thy marble jaws, O tomb,
 Though earth conceal me in thy womb!
 And you, ye worms, this frame confound,
 Ye brother reptiles of the ground!
 O life, frail offspring of a day!
 'Tis puff'd with one short gasp away!
 Swift as the short-liv'd flower it flies,
 It springs, it blooms, it fades, it dies.
 With cries we usher in our birth,
 With groans resign our transient breath;
 While round, stern ministers of fate,
 Pain, and disease, and sorrow wait.
 While childhood reigns, the sportive boy
 Learns only prettily to toy;
 And while he roves from play to play
 The wanton trifles life away.
 When to the noon of life we rise,
 The man grows elegant in vice;
 To glorious guilt in courts he climbs,
 Vilely judicious in his crimes.
 When youth and strength in age are lost,
 Man seems already half a ghost;
 Wither'd and wan to earth he bows,
 A walking hospital of woes.
 Oh happiness, thou empty name!
 Say, art thou bought by gold or fame?
 What art thou, gold, but shining earth?
 Thou, common fame, but common breath?
 If virtue contradict the voice
 Of public fame, applause is noise;
 Ev'n victors are by conquest curst,
 The bravest warrior is the worst.
 Look round on all that man below
 Idly calls great, and all is show!
 All, to the coffin from our birth,
 In this vast toy-shop of the earth.

Come then, O friend of virtuous woe,
With solemn pace, demure, and flow :
Lo ! sad and serious, I pursue
Thy steps—adieu, vain world, adieu !

DAPHNIS AND LYCIDAS :

A PASTORAL.

[They sing the different success and absence of their loves.]

To the Right Honourable the Lord Viscount Townshend, of Rainham in Norfolk.

—“Sylvæ sunt Consule dignæ.”—VIRG.

Daphnis.

How calm the evening ! see the falling day
Gilds every mountain with a ruddy ray !
In gentle sighs the softly whispering breeze
Salutes the flowers, and waves the trembling trees ;
Hark ! the night-warbler, from yon vocal boughs,
Glad every valley with melodious woes !
Swift through the air her rounds the swallow takes,
Or sportive skips the level of the lakes.
The timorous deer, swift-starting as they graze,
Bound off in crowds, then turn again, and gaze.
See ! how yon swans, with snowy pride elate,
Arch their high necks, and sail along in state !
Thy frisking flocks safe-wandering crop the plain,
And the glad season claims a glad some strain.
Begin—Ye echoes listen to the song,
And with its sweetness pleas'd, each note prolong !

Lycidas.

Sing, muse—and oh ! my Townshend deign to view
What the muse sings, to Townshend this is due !
Who carrying with him all the world admires,
From all the world illustriously retires ;
And calmly wandering in his Rainham, roves
By lake, or spring, by thicket, lawn, or groves ;
Where verdant hills or vales, where fountains stray,
Charm every thought of idle pomp away ;
Unenvy'd views the splendid toils of state,
In private happy, as in public great.

Thus godlike Scipio, on whose cares reclin'd
The burden and repose of half mankind,
Left to the vain their pomp, and calmly stray'd,
The world forgot, beneath the laurel shade ;
Nor longer would be great, but void of strife,
Clos'd in soft peace his eve of glorious life.

Feed round, my goats ; ye sheep, in safety graze ;
Ye winds, breathe gently while I tune my lays.

The joyous spring draws nigh ; ambrosial showers
Unbind the earth, the earth unbinds the flowers ;
The flowers blow sweet, the daffodils unfold
The spreading glories of their blooming gold.

Daphnis.

As the gay hours advance, the blossoms shoot,
The knitting blossoms harden into fruit ;
And as the autumn by degrees ensues,
The mellowing fruits display their streaky hues.

Lycidas.

When the winds whistle, and the tempest roars,
When foaming billows lash the founding shores,
The bloomy beauties of the pastures die,
And in gay heaps of fragrant ruin lie.

Daphnis.

Severe the storms ! when shuddering winter binds
The earth ! but winter yields to vernal winds.
Oh Love ! thy rigour my whole life deforms,
More cold than winter, more severe than storms !

Lycidas.

Sweet is the spring, and gay the summer hours,
When balmy odours breathe from painted flowers ;
But neither sweet the spring, nor summer gay,
When she I love, my charmer, is away.

Daphnis.

To savage rocks, through bleak inclement skies,
Deaf as those rocks, from me my fair one flies :
Oh virgin, cease to fly : th' inclement air [spare !
May hurt thy charms !—but thou hast charms to

Lycidas.

I love, and ever shall my love remain,
The fairest, kindest virgin of the plain ;
With equal passion her soft bosom glows,
Feels the sweet pains, and shares the heavenly woes.

Daphnis.

With a feign'd passion, she I love beguiles,
And gayly false the dear dissembler smiles ;
But let her still those blest deceits employ,
Still may she feign, and cheat me into joy !

Lycidas.

On yonder bank the yielding nymph reclin'd,
Gods ! how transported I, and she how kind !
There rise, ye flowers, and there your pride display,
There shed your odours where the fair-one lay !

Daphnis.

Once, as my fair-one in the rosy bower
In gentle slumbers pass'd the noon-tide hour,
Soft I approach'd, and raptur'd with the bliss,
At leisure gaz'd, then stole a silent kiss :
She wak'd ; when conscious smiles, but ill repress'd
Spoke no disdain.—Was ever swain so blest ?

Lycidas.

With fragrant apples from the bending bough
In sport my charmer gave her swain a blow :
The fair offender, of my wrath afraid,
Fled, till I seiz'd and kiss'd the blooming maid :
She smil'd, and vow'd if thus her crimes I pay,
She would offend a thousand times a day !

Daphnis.

O'er the steep mountains, and the pathless mead,
From my embrace the lovely scorner fled ;
But stumbling in the flight, by chance she fell :
I saw—but what—her lover will not tell.

Lycidas.

From me my fair-one fled, dissembling play,
And in the dark conceal'd the wanton lay ;
But laugh'd, and show'd by the directing sound
She only hid, in secret to be found.

Daphnis.

Far hence to happier climes Belinda strays,
But in my breast her lovely image stays ;
Oh ! to these plains again, bright nymph, repair,
Or from my breast far hence thy image bear !

Lycidas.

Come, Delia, come ! till Delia bless these seats,
Hide me, ye groves, within your dark retreats !
In hollow groans, ye winds, around me blow !
Ye bubbling fountains, murmur to my woe !

Daphnis.

Where'er Belinda roves, ye zephyrs, play!
 Where'er she treads, ye flowers, adorn the way!
 From sultry suns, ye groves, my charmer keep!
 Ye bubbling fountains, murmur to her sleep!

Lycidas.

If streams smooth-wandering, Delia, yield delight;
 If the gay rose, or lily, please thy sight;
 Smooth streams here wander, here the roses glow,
 Here the proud lilies rise to shade thy brow!

Daphnis.

Aid me, ye muses, while I loud proclaim
 What love inspires, and sing Belinda's name:
 Waft it, ye breezes, to the hills around;
 And sport, ye echoes, with the favourite sound.

Lycidas.

Thy name, my Delia, shall improve my song,
 The pleasing labour of my ravish'd tongue:
 Her name to heaven propitious zephyrs bear,
 And breathe it to her kindred angels there!

Daphnis.

But see! the night displays her starry train,
 Soft silver dews impearl the glittering plain;
 An awful horror fills the gloomy woods,
 And bluish mists rise from the smoking floods:
 * Haste, Daphnis, haste to fold thy woolly care,
 The deepening shades imbrown th' unwholesome
 air.

THE FIRST ODE OF HORACE,

TRANSLATED.

MÆCENAS, whose high lineage springs
 From a long race of ancient kings,
 Patron and friend! thy honour'd name
 At once is my defence and fame.

There are, who with fond transport praise
 The chariot thundering in the race;
 Where conquest won, and palms bestow'd,
 Lift the proud mortal to a god.

The man who courts the people's voice,
 And doats on offices and noise;
 Or they who till the peaceful fields,
 And reap what bounteous nature yields,
 Unmov'd, the merchant's wealth behold,
 Nor hazard happiness for gold;
 Untempted by whole worlds of gain
 To stem the billows of the main.

The merchant, when the storm invades,
 Envy the quiet of the shades;
 But soon relaunches from the shore,
 Dreading the crime of being poor.

Some careless waste the mirthful day
 With generous wines, and wanton play,
 Indulgent of the genial hour,
 By spring, or rill, or shade, or bower.

Some hear with joy the clanging jar
 Of trumpets, that alarm to war;
 While matrons tremble at the breath
 That calls their sons to arms and death.

VARIATION.

* Haste, Lycidas, to fold, &c.

The sportsman, train'd in storms, defies
 The chilling blast, and freezing skies:
 Unmindful of his bride, in vain
 Soft beauty pleads! along the plain
 The stag he chases, or beguiles
 The furious boar into his toils.

For you the blooming ivy grows,
 Proud to adorn your learned brows;
 Patron of letters you arise,
 Grow to a god, and mount the skies.

Humbly in breezy shades I stray
 Where sylvens dance, and satyrs play;
 Contented to advance my claim,
 Only o'er men without a name;
 Transcribing what the muses sing
 Harmonious to the pipe or string.

But if indulgently you deign
 To rank me with the lyric train,
 Aloft the towering muse shall rise
 On bolder wings, and gain the skies.

AN EPISTLE

To my Friend Mr. Elijah Fenton, Author of Mariamne, a Tragedy. 1726.

Why art thou slow to strike th' harmonious shell,
 Averse to sing, who know'st to sing so well?
 If thy proud muse the tragic buskin wears,
 Great Sophocles revives and re-appears;
 While, regularly bold, she nobly sings
 Strains worthy to detain the ears of kings:
 If by thy hand th' Homeric lyre be strung,
 The lyre returns such sounds as Homer sung.
 The kind compulsion of a friend obey,
 And, though reluctant, swell the lofty lay;
 Then listening groves once more shall catch the sound,

While Grecian muses sing on British ground.

Thus calm and silent thy own Proteus roves
 Through pearly mazes, and through coral groves;
 But when, emerging from the azure main,
 Coercive bands th' unwilling God constrain,
 Then heaves his bosom with prophetic fires,
 And his tongue speaks sublime, what heaven inspires.

Envy, 'tis true, with barbarous rage invades
 What ev'n fierce lightning spares, the laurel shades;
 And critics, bias'd by mistaken rules,
 Like Turkish zealots, reverence none but fools.
 But praise from such injurious tongues is shame;
 They rail the happy author into fame:
 Thus Phœbus through the zodiac takes his way,
 And rises amid monsters into day.

Oh vileness of mankind! when writing well
 Becomes a crime, and danger to excel!
 While noble scorn, my friend, such insult sees,
 And flies from towns to wilds, from men to trees.

Free from the lust of wealth, and glittering snares,

That make th' unhappy great in love with cares,
 Me humble joys in calm retirement please,
 A silent happiness and learned ease.

Deny me grandeur, heaven, but goodness grant!
 A king is less illustrious than a saint:

Hail, holy virtue! come, thou heavenly guest,
Come, fix thy pleasing empire in my breast!
* Thou know'st her influence, friend! thy cheerful mien

Proclaims the innocence and peace within;
Such joys as none but sons of virtue know,
Shine in thy face, and in thy bosom glow.

So when the holy mount the prophet trod,
And talk'd familiar as a friend with God,
Celestial radiance every feature shed,
And ambient glories dawn'd around his head.

Sure what th' unthinking great mistaken call
Their happiness, is folly, folly all!
Like lofty mountains in the clouds they hide
Their haughty heads, but swell with barren pride;
And while low vales in useful beauty lie,
Heave their proud naked summits to the sky.
In honour, as in place, ye great, transcend!
An angel fall'n, degenerates to a fiend:
Th' all-cheering sun is honour'd with his shrines;
Not that he moves aloft, but that he shines.
Why flames the star on Walpole's generous breast?

Not that he's highest, but because he's best;
Fond to oblige; in blessing others, blest.

How wondrous few, by avarice uncontrol'd,
Have virtue to subdue the thirst of gold!
The shining dirt the sordid wretch ensnares
To buy, with mighty treasures, mighty cares;
Blindly he courts, misguided by the will,
A spacious good, and meets a real ill:
So when Ulysses plough'd the furgy main;
When now in view appear'd his native reign,
His wayward mates th' Æolian bag unbind,
Expecting treasures, but out-rush'd a wind;
The sudden hurricane in thunder roars,
Buffets the bark, and whirls it from the shores.

O heaven! by what vain passions man is sway'd,
Proud of his reason, by his will betray'd!
Blindly he wanders in pursuit of vice,
And hates confinement, though in paradise;
Doom'd, when enlarg'd, instead of Eden's bowers,
To rove in wilds, and gather thorns for flowers;
Between th' extremes, direct he sees the way,
Yet wilful swerves, perversely fond to stray!

Whilst niggard souls indulge their craving thirst,
Rich without bounty, with abundance curst;
The prodigal pursues expensive vice,
And buys dishonour at a mighty price;
On beds of state the splendid glutton sleeps,
While starving merit unregarded weeps:
His ill-plac'd bounty, while scorn'd virtue grieves,
A dog, a fawning sycophant receives;
And cringing knaves, or haughty strumpets, share
What would make sorrow smile, and cheer despair.

Then would'st thou steer where fortune spreads
the sails?

Go, flatter vice! for seldom flattery fails:
Soft through the ear the pleasing bane distills:
Delicious poison! in perfumes it kills!

VARIATION.

* Thou feel'st her power, my friend, &c.

Be all but virtuous: Oh! unwise to live
Unfashionably good, and hope to thrive!
Trees that aloft with proudest honours rise,
Root hell-ward, and thence flourish to the skies.

O happier thou, my friend, with ease content,
Blest with the conscience of a life well-spent!
Nor would'st be great; but guide thy gather'd sails,
Safe by the shore nor tempt the rougher gales;
For sure, of all that feel the wound of fate,
None are completely wretched but the great:
Superior woes, superior stations bring;
A peasant sleeps, while cares awake a king:
Who reigns, must suffer! crowns with gems inlaid
At once adorn and lead the royal head:
Change but the scene, and kings in dust decay,
Swept from the earth the pageants of a day;
There no distinctions on the dead await,
But pompous graves, and rottenness in state.
Such now are all that shone on earth before;
Cæsar and mighty Marlborough are no more!
Unhallow'd feet o'er awful Tully tread,
And Hyde and Plato join the vulgar dead;
And all the glorious aims that can employ
The soul of mortals, must with Hammer die:
O Compton, when this breath we once resign,
My dust shall be as eloquent as thine!

Till that last hour which calls me hence away
To pay that great arrear which all must pay;
Oh! may I tread the paths which saints have trod,
Who knew they walk'd before th' all-seeing God!
Studious from ways of wicked men to keep,
Who mock at vice, while grieving angels weep.
Come, taste, my friend! the joys retirement brings,
Look down on royal slaves, and pity kings.
More happy! laid where trees with trees entwin'd
In bowery arches tremble to the wind,
With innocence and shade like Adam blest,
While a new Eden opens in the breast!
Such were the scenes descending angels trod
In guiltless days, when man convers'd with God,
Then shall my lyre to loftier sounds be strung,
Inspir'd by * Homer, or what thou hast sung:
My muse from thine shall catch a warmer ray;
As clouds are brighten'd by the God of day.
So trees unapt to bear, by art refin'd,
With shoots ennobled of a generous kind,
High o'er the ground with fruits adopted rise,
And lift their spreading honours to the skies.

A DIALOGUE

Between a Lady and her Looking-Glass, while she had the Green-Sickness.

THE gay Ophelia view'd her face
In the clear crystal of her glass;
The lightning from her eye was fled,
Her cheek was pale, the roses dead.

Then thus Ophelia, with a frown:—
Art thou, false thing, perfidious grown!
I never could have thought, I swear,
To find so great a slanderer there!

False thing! thy malice I defy!
Beaux vow I'm fair—who never lye.

* Dr. Broome translated eight books of the Odyssey.

More brittle far than brittle thou,
Would every grace of woman grow,
If charms so great so soon decay,
The bright possession of a day!
But this I know, and this declare,
That thou art false, and I am fair.

The glass was vex'd to be bely'd,
And thus with angry tone reply'd:

No more to me of falsehood talk,
But leave your oatmeal and your chalk!
'Tis true, you're meagre, pale, and wan;
The reason is, you're sick for man.—

While yet it spoke, Ophelia frown'd,
And dash'd th' offender to the ground;
With fury from her arm it fled,
And round a glittering ruin spread;
When lo! the parts pale looks disclose,
Pale looks in every fragment rose;
Around the room instead of one,
An hundred pale Ophelias shone;
Away the frightened virgin flew,
And humbled, from herself withdrew.

THE MORAL.

Ye beaux, who tempt the fair and young,
With snuff, and nonsense, dance, and song;
Ye men of compliment and lace!
Behold this image in the glass:
The wondrous force of flattery prove,
To cheat fond virgins into love:
Though pale the cheek, yet swear it glows
With the vermilion of the rose:
Praise them—for praise is always true,
Though with both eyes the cheat they view.
From hateful truths the virgin flies;
But the false sex is caught with lies.

A POEM ON THE SEAT OF WAR IN FLANDERS,

Chiefly with Relation to the Sieges:

WITH THE PRAISE OF PEACE AND RETIREMENT,
WRITTEN IN 1710.

"Secessus mei non desidia nomen, sed tranquillitatis accipiant."—PLIN.

HAPPY, thou Flandria, on whose fertile plains,
In wanton pride luxurious plenty reigns;
Happy! had heaven bestow'd one blessing more,
And plac'd thee distant from the Gallic power!
But now in vain thy lawns attract the view,
They but invite the victor to subdue:
War, horrid war, the sylvan scene invades,
And angry trumpets pierce the woodland shades;
Here shatter'd towers, proud works of many an age,
Lie dreadful monuments of human rage;
There palaces and hallow'd domes display
Majestic ruins, awful in decay!
Thy very dust, though unistinguish'd trod,
Compos'd, perhaps, some hero, great and good,
Who nobly for his country lost his blood!

Ev'n with the grave, the haughty spoilers war,
And death's dark mansions wide disclose to air:
O'er kings and saints insulting stalk, nor dread
To spurn the ashes of the glorious dead.

See! the Britannic lions wave in air! [war!
See! mighty Marlborough breathing death and
From Albion's shores, at Anna's high commands,
The dauntless hero pours his martial bands.
As when in wrath stern Mars the thunderer sends
To scourge his foes; in pomp the God descends;
He mounts his iron car; with fury burns;
The car fierce-rattling thunders as it turns;
Gloomy he grasps his adamant shield,
And scatters armies o'er th' ensanguin'd field:
With delegated wrath thus Marlborough glows;
In vengeance rushing on his country's foes.
See! round the hostile towers embattled stands
His banner'd host, embodied bands by bands!
Hark! the shrill trumpet sends a mortal sound,
And prancing horses shake the solid ground;
The surly drums beat terrible afar,
With all the dreadful music of the war;
From the drawn swords effulgent flames arise,
Flash o'er the plains, and lighten to the skies;
The heavens above, the fields and floods beneath,
Glare formidably bright, and shine with death;
In fiery storms descends a murderous shower,
Thick flash the lightnings, fierce the thunders roar.
As when in wrathful mood Almighty Jove
Aims his dire bolts red-hissing from above;
Through the sing'd air, with unresisted sway,
The forked vengeance rends its flaming way,
And, while the firmament with thunder roars,
From their foundations hurls imperial towers;
So rush the globes with many a fiery round,
Tear up the rock, or rend the stedfast mound.
Death shakes aloft her dart, and o'er her prey
Stalks with dire joy, and marks in blood her way;
Mountains of heroes slain deform the ground,
The shape of man half bury'd in the wound:
And lo! while in the shock of war they close,
While swords meet swords, and foes encounter foes,
The treacherous earth, beneath their footsteps
cleaves,

Her entrails tremble, and her bosom heaves;
Sudden in bursts of fire eruptions rise,
And whirl the torn battalions to the skies.

Thus earthquakes, rumbling with a thundering
sound,
Shake the firm world, and rend the cleaving ground;
Rocks, hills, and groves, are tost into the sky,
And in one mighty ruin nations die.

See! through th' encumber'd air the ponderous bomb
Bears magazines of death within its womb;
The glowing orb displays a blazing train,
And darts bright horror through th' ethereal plain;
It mounts tempestuous, and with hideous sound
Wheels down the heavens, and thunders o'er the ground:

VARIATION.

* Ev'n the stern souls of heroes feel dismay;
Proud temples nod, aspiring towers give way.

Th' imprison'd deaths rush dreadful in a blaze,
And mow a thousand lives, a thousand ways;
† Earth floats with blood, while spreading flames arise

From palaces, and domes, and kindle half the skies.

Thus terribly in air the comets roll,
And shoot malignant gleams from pole to pole;
'Tween worlds and worlds they move, and from their hair

Shake the blue plague, the pestilence, and war.

But who is he, who stern bestrides the plain,
Who drives triumphant o'er huge hills of slain;
Serene, while engines from the hostile tower
Rain from their brazen mouths an iron shower;
While turbid fiery smoke obscures the day,
Hews through the deathful breach his desperate
way?

Sure Jove descending joins the martial toil;

Or is it Marlborough, or the great Argyll?

Thus, when the Grecians, furious to destroy,
Levell'd the structures of imperial Troy;
Here angry Neptune hurl'd his vengeful mace,
There Jove o'erturn'd it from his inmost base:
Though brave, yet vanquish'd, she confess'd the odds;

Her sons were heroes, but they fought with gods.

Ah! what new horrors rise? In deep array
The squadrons form: aloft the standards play!
The captains draw the sword: on every brow
Determin'd valour lowers: the trumpets blow!
See! the brave Briton delves the cavern'd ground
Through the hard entrails of the stubborn mound:
And, undismay'd by death, the foe invades
Through dreadful horrors of infernal shades!
In vain the wall's broad base deep-rooted lies,
In vain an hundred turrets threat the skies!
Lo! while at ease the bands immur'd repose,
Nor careless dream of subterranean foes,
Like the Cadmean host, embattled swarms
Start from the earth, and clash their sounding arms,
And, pouring war and slaughter from beneath,
Wrap towers, walls, men, in fire, in blood, in death.

So some fam'd torrent dives within the caves
Of opening earth, ingulph'd with all his waves;
High o'er the latent stream the shepherd feeds
His wandering flock, and tunes the sprightly reed:
Till from some rifted chasm the billows rise,
And foaming burst tumultuous to the skies;
Then roaring dreadful o'er the delug'd plain,
Sweep herds and hinds in thunder to the main.

Bear me, ye friendly powers, to gentler scenes,
To shadowy bowers, and never-fading greens!
Where the shrill trumpet never sound alarms,
Nor martial din is heard, nor clash of arms;
Hail, ye soft seats! ye limpid springs and floods!
Ye flowery meads, ye vales, and woods!
Ye limpid floods, that ever murmuring flow!
Ye verdant meads, where flowers eternal blow!

VARIATIONS.

Dreadful it mounts, tempestuous in its flight,
It sinks, it falls, earth groans beneath its weight.
Th' imprison'd deaths rush out in smoke and fire,
The mighty bleed, heaps crush'd on heaps expire.
† The barriers burst, wide-spreading flames arise.

Ye shady vales, where zephyrs ever play!

Ye woods, where little warblers tune their lay!

Here grant me, heaven, to end my peaceful days,
And steal myself from life by slow decays;
Draw health from food the temperate garden yields
From fruit, or herb, the bounty of the fields;
Nor let the loaded table groan beneath
Slain animals, the horrid feast of death:
With age unknown to pain or sorrow blest,
To the dark grave retiring as to rest;
While gently with one sigh this mortal frame
Dissolving turns to ashes, whence it came;
While my freed soul departs without a groan,
And joyful wings her flight to worlds unknown.

Ye gloomy grots! ye awful solemn cells,
Where holy thoughtful Contemplation dwells,
Guard me from splendid cares and tiresome state,
That pompous misery of being great!
Happy! if by the wise and learn'd lov'd;
But happiest above all, if self-approv'd!
Content with ease: ambitious to despise
Illustrious vanity, and glorious vice!

Come, thou chaste maid, here ever let me stray,
While the calm hours steal unperceiv'd away;
Here court the muses, while the sun on high
Flames in the vault of heaven, and fires the sky:
Or while the night's dark wings this globe surround,
And the pale moon begins her solemn round,
Bid my free soul to starry orbs repair,
Those radiant worlds that float in ambient air,
And with a regular confusion stray
Oblique, direct, along th' ærial way:
Or when Aurora, from her golden bowers,
Exhales the fragrance of the balmy flowers,
Reclin'd in silence on a mossy bed,
Consult the learned volumes of the dead;
Fall'n realms and empires in description view,
Live o'er past times, and built whole worlds anew;
Or from the bursting tombs in fancy raise
The sons of fame, who liv'd in ancient days:
And lo! with haughty stalk the warrior treads!
Stern legislators frowning lift their heads!

I see proud victors in triumphal cars,
Chiefs, kings, and heroes, seam'd with glorious scars!

Or listen till the raptur'd soul takes wings,
While Plato reasons, or while Homer sings.

Charm me, ye sacred leaves*, with loftier themes,

With opening heavens, and angels rob'd in flames:
Ye restless passions, while I read, be aw'd:
Hail, ye mysterious oracles of God!
Here I behold how infant time began,
How the dust mov'd and quicken'd into man;
Here through the flowery walks of Eden rove,
Court the soft breeze, or range the spicy grove;
There tread on hallow'd ground where angels trod,
And reverend patriarchs talk'd as friends with God;

Or hear the voice to slumbering prophets given,
Or gaze on visions from the throne of heaven.

But nobler yet, far nobler scenes advance!
Why leap the mountains? why the forests dance?

* The Holy Scriptures.

Why flashes glory from the golden spheres?
 Rejoice, O earth, a God, a God appears!
 A God, a God, descending angels sing,
 And mighty seraphs shout, Behold your King!
 Hail, virgin-born! Lift, lift, ye blind, your eyes!
 Sing, oh ye dumb! and oh ye dead, arise!
 Tremble, ye gates of hell! In noblest strains
 Tell it aloud, ye heavens! the Saviour reigns!

Thus lonely, thoughtful, may I run the race
 Of transient life, in no inuseful ease!
 Enjoy each hour, nor, as it fleets away,
 Think life too short, and yet too long the day;
 Of right observant, while the soul attends
 Each duty, and makes heaven and angels friends.
 And thou, fair Peace, from the wild floods of war
 Come dovelike, and thy blooming olive bear;
 Tell me, ye victors, what strange charms ye find
 In conquest, that destruction of mankind!
 Unenvy'd may your laurels ever grow,
 That never flourish but in human woe,
 If never earth the wreath triumphal bears,
 Till drench'd in heroes' blood or orphans' tears.

Let Ganges from afar to slaughter train
 His sable warriors on th' embattled plain;
 Let Volga's sons in iron squadrons rise,
 And pour in millions from her frozen skies:
 Thou, gentle Thames, flow thou in peaceful streams,
 Bid thy bold sons restrain their martial flames.
 In thy own laurel's shade, great Marlborough, stay,
 There charm the thoughts of conquer'd worlds a-
 way:

Guardian of England! born to scourge her foes,
 Speak, and thy word gives half the world repose;
 Sink down, ye hills; eternal rocks, subside;
 Vanish, ye forts; thou, ocean, drain thy tide:
 We safety boast, defended by thy fame,
 And armies—in the terror of thy name!
 Now fix o'er Anna's throne thy victor blade.
 War, be thou chain'd! ye streams of blood, be stay'd!

Though wild Ambition her just vengeance feels,
 She wars to save, and where she strikes, she heals.

So Pallas with her javelin smote the ground,
 And peaceful olives flourish'd from the wound.

To the Right Honourable
 CHARLES LORD CORNWALLIS,

Baron of Eyre, Warden, Chief Justice, and Justice in Eyre of all His Majesty's Forests, Chases, Parks, and Warrens, on the South Side of Trent.

—δῶρον τοι τῷτο δίδωμι

Μνημα—

Odyſſey, Lib. 15.

O THOU whose virtues sanctify thy state!
 O great, without the vices of the great!
 Form'd by a dignity of mind to please,
 To think, to act with elegance and ease!*

ADDITION.

* Firm to thy king, and to thy country brave;
 Loyal, yet free; a subject, not a slave;
 Say, &c.

Say, wilt thou listen while I tune the string.
 And sing to thee, who gav'st me ease to sing?
 Unskill'd in verse, I haunt the silent grove;
 Yet lowly shepherds sing to mighty Jove;
 And mighty Jove attends the shepherd's vows,
 And gracious what his suppliants asks bestows:
 So by thy favour may the muse be crown'd,
 And plant her laurels in more fruitful ground;
 The grateful muse shall in return bestow
 Her spreading laurels to adorn thy brow.

Thus, guarded by the tree of Jove, a flower
 Shoots from the earth, nor fears th' inclement shower;

And when the fury of the storm is laid,
 Repays with sweets the hospitable shade.

Severe their lot, who, when they long endure
 The wounds of fortune, late receive a cure!
 Like ships in storms o'er liquid mountains tost,
 Ere they are sav'd must almost first be lost;
 But you with speed forbid distress to grieve:
 He gives by halves,* who hesitates to give.

Thus, when an angel views mankind distress'd,
 He feels compassion pleading in his breast;
 Instant the heavenly guardian cleaves the skies,
 And, pleas'd to save, on wings of lightning flies†.

Some the vain promises of courts betray;
 And gaily straying, they are pleas'd to stray;
 The flattering nothing still deludes their eyes,
 Seems ever near, yet ever distant flies:
 As perspectives present the object nigh,
 Though far remov'd from the mistaking eye;
 Against our reason fondly we believe,
 Assist the fraud, and teach it to deceive:
 As the faint traveller, when night invades,
 Sees a false light relieve the ambient shades,
 Pleas'd he beholds the bright delusion play,
 But the false guide shines only to betray:
 Swift he pursues, yet still the path mistakes,
 O'er dangerous marshes, or through thorny brakes;
 Yet obstinate in wrong he toils to stray,
 With many a weary stride, o'er many a painful way.
 So man pursues the phantom of his brain,
 And buys his disappointment with his pain:
 At length when years invidiously destroy
 The power to taste the long-expected joy,
 Then fortune envious sheds her golden showers,
 Malignly smiles, and curses him with stores.

ADDITION.

† Few know to ask, or decently receive;
 And fewer still with dignity to give:
 If earn'd by flattery, gifts of highest price
 Are not a bounty, but the pay of vice.
 Some wildly lavish, yet no friend obtain;
 Nor are they generous, but absurd and vain.
 Some give with surly pride and boisterous hands,
 As Jove pours rain in thunder o'er the lands.
 When merit pleads, you meet it and embrace,
 And give the favour lustre by the grace;
 So Phœbus to his warmth a glory joins,
 Blessing the world, and while he blesses shines.

* The Lord Cornwallis, in a most obliging manner, recommended the author to the rectory of Pulham.

Thus o'er the urns of friends departed weep
The mournful kindred, and fond vigils keep;
Ambrosial ointments o'er their ashes shed,
And scatter useless roses on the dead;
And when no more avail the world's delights,
The spicy odours, and the solemn rites,
With fruitless pomp they deck the senseless tombs,
And waste profusely floods of vain perfumes.

THE ROSE-BUD.

To the Right Honourable the Lady Jane Wharton.

QUEEN of fragrance, lovely rose,
The beauties of thy leaves disclose!
The winter's past, the tempests fly,
Soft gales breathe gently through the sky;
The lark sweet warbling on the wing
Salutes the gay return of spring:
The silver dews, the vernal showers,
Call forth a bloomy waste of flowers;
The joyous fields, the shady woods,
Are cloth'd with green, or swell with buds;
Then haste thy beauties to disclose,
Queen of fragrance, lovely rose!

Thou, beauteous flower, a welcome guest,
Shalt flourish on the fair one's breast,
Shalt grace her hand, or deck her hair,
The flower most sweet, the nymph most fair.
Breathe soft, ye winds! be calm ye skies!
Arise, ye flowery race, arise!
And haste thy beauties to disclose,
Queen of fragrance, lovely rose!

But thou, fair nymph, thyself survey
In this sweet offspring of a day:
That miracle of face must fail;
Thy charms are sweet, but charms are frail:
Swift as the short-liv'd flower they fly,
At morn they bloom, at evening die:
Though sickness yet a while forbears,
Yet time destroys what sickness spares.
Now Helen lives alone in fame,
And Cleopatra's but a name.
Time must indent that heavenly brow,
And thou must be, what they are now.

This moral to the fair disclose,
Queen of fragrance, lovely rose.

BELINDA AT THE BATH.

WHILE in these fountains bright Belinda laves,
She adds new virtues to the healing waves:
Thus in Bethesda's pool an angel flood,
Bade the soft waters heal, and blest the flood;
But from her eye such bright destruction flies,
In vain they flow! for her, the lover dies.

No more let Tagus boast, whose beds unfold
A shining treasure of all-conquering gold!
No more the * Po! whose wandering waters stray,
In mazy errors, through the starry way:

* "—Eridanum cernes in parte locatum cœli."
Tull. in Arateis.
"Gurgite fidereo subterluit Oriona." Claud.

Henceforth these springs superior honours share;
There Venus laves, but my Belinda here.

THE COY;

AN ODE.

Love is a noble rich repast,
But seldom should the lover taste;
When the kind fair no more restrains,
The glutton surfeits and disdains.

To move the nymph, he tears bestows,
He vainly sighs, he falsely vows:
The tears deceive, the vows betray;
He conquers, and contemns the prey.

Thus Ammon's son with fierce delight
Smil'd at the terrors of the fight:
The thoughts of conquest charm'd his eyes,
He conquer'd, and he wept the prize.

Love, like a prospect, with delight
Sweetly deceives the distant sight,
Where the tir'd travellers survey,
O'er hanging rocks, a dangerous way.

Ye fair that would victorious prove,
Seem but half kind when most you love:
Damon pursues, if Celia flies;
But when her love is born, his dies.

Had Danaë the young, the fair,
Been free and unconfined as air,
Free from the guards and brazen tower,
She'd ne'er been worth a golden shower.

To the Honourable

MRS. ELIZABETH TOWNSHEND,

AFTERWARDS LADY CORNWALLIS,

ON HER PICTURE AT RAINHAM.

—περίσσι γυναικῶν

Εἶδος τ' ἰδὲ φένας.

Odyssæ, Lib. 18.

Al! cruel hand, that could such power employ
To teach the pictur'd beauty to destroy!
Singly she charm'd before; but by his skill
The living beauty and her likeness kill!
Thus when in parts the broken mirrors fall,
A face in all is seen, and charms in all!

Think then, O fairest of the fairer race,
What fatal beauties arm thy heavenly face,
Whose very shadow can such flames inspire;
We see 'tis paint, and yet we feel 'tis fire.

See! with false life the lovely image glows,
And every wondrous grace transplanted shows;
Fatally fair the new creation reigns,
Charms in her shape, and multiplies our pains;
Hence the fond youth, that ease by absence found,
Views the dear form, and bleeds at every wound;
Thus the bright Venus, though to heaven she soar'd,
Reign'd in her image, by the world ador'd.

Oh! wond'rous power of mingled light and shades!
Where beauty with dumb eloquence persuades,

Where passions are beheld in picture wrought,
And animated colours look a thought:
Rare art! on whose command all nature waits!
It copies all Omnipotence creates:
Here crown'd with mountains earth expanded lies,
There the proud seas with all their billows rise:
If life be drawn, responsive to the thought
The breathing figures live throughout the draught;
The mimic bird in skies fictitious moves,
Or fancy'd beasts in imitated groves:
Ev'n heaven it climbs; and from the forming hands
An angel here, and there a Townshend stands.

Yet, painter, yet, though art with nature strive,
Though ev'n the lovely phantom seem alive,
Submit thy vanquish'd art! and own the draught,
Though fair, defective, and a beauteous fault:
Charms, such as her's, inimitably great,
He only can express, that can create.
Couldst thou extract the whiteness of the snow,
Or of its colours rob the heavenly bow,
Yet would her beauty triumph o'er thy skill,
Lovely in thee, herself more lovely still!

Thus in the limpid fountain we descry
The faint resemblance of the glittering sky;
Another sun displays his lessen'd beams,
Another heaven adorns th' enlighten'd streams:
But though the scene be fair, yet high above
Th' exalted skies in nobler beauties move;
There the true heaven's eternal lamps display
A deluge of inimitable day.

TO MR. POPE,

ON HIS WORKS. 1726.

LET vulgar souls triumphal arches raise,
And speaking marble to record their praise;
Or carve with fruitless toil, to fame unknown,
The mimic feature on the breathing stone;
Mere mortals, subject to death's total sway,
Reptiles of earth, and beings of a day!
'Tis thine, on every heart to grave thy praise,
A monument which worth alone can raise;
Sure to survive, when time shall whelm in dust
The arch, the marble, and the mimic bust;
Nor till the volumes of th' expanded sky
Blaze in one flame, shalt thou and Homer die;
When sink together in the world's last fires
What heaven created, and what heaven inspires.

If aught on earth, when once this breath is fled,
With human transport touch the mighty dead;
Shakspeare, rejoice! his hand thy page refines,
Now every scene with native brightness shines;
Just to thy fame, he gives thy genuine thought,
So Tully publish'd what Lucretius wrote;
Prun'd by his care, thy laurels loftier grow,
And bloom afresh on thy immortal brow.

Thus when thy draughts, O Raphael, time invades,
And the bold figure from the canvas fades;
A rival hand recalls from every part
Some latent grace, and equals art with art;
'Transported we survey the dubious strife,
While the fair image starts again to life.

How long untun'd had Homer's sacred lyre,
Jarr'd grating discord, all extinct his fire!
This you beheld; and, taught by heaven to sing,
Call'd the loud music from the founding string.
Now wak'd from slumbers of three thousand years,
Once more Achilles in dread pomp appears,
Towers o'er the field of death; as fierce he turns,
Keen flash his arms, and all the hero burns;
His plume nods horrible, his helm on high
With cheeks of iron glares against the sky;
With martial stalk, and more than mortal might,
He strides along, he meets the god in fight:
Then the pale Titans, chain'd on burning fires;
Start at the din that rends th' infernal shores;
Tremble the towers of heaven; earth rocks her coasts;

And gloomy Pluto shakes with all his ghosts.
To every theme responds thy various lay;
Here pours a torrent, there meanders play:
Sonorous as the storm thy numbers rise,
Toss the wild waves, and thunder in the skies;
Or softer than a yielding virgin's sigh,
The gentle breezes breathe away, and die.
How twangs the bow, when with a jarring spring
The whizzing arrows vanish from the string!
When giants strain, some rock's vast weight to shove,
The flow'rs heave, and the clogg'd words scarce
move;

But when from high it rolls, with many a bound,
Jumping it thundering whirls, and rushes to the
ground:

Swift flows the verse, when winged lightnings fly,
Dart from the dazzled view, and flash along the sky:

Thus, like the radiant god who sheds the day,
The vale you paint, or gild the azure way;
And, while with every theme the verse complies,
Sink without grovelling, without rashness rise.

Proceed, great bard, awake th' harmonious
string,

Be ours all Homer, still Ulysses sing!
Ev'n I, the meanest of the muses' train,
Inflam'd by thee, attempt a nobler strain;
Adventurous waken the * Mæonian lyre,
Tun'd by your hand, and sing as you inspire:
So, arm'd by great Achilles for the fight,
Patroclus conquer'd in Achilles' might.
Like theirs our friendship! and I boast my name
To thine united, for thy friendship's fame.

How long Ulysses, by unskillful hands
Stript of his robes, a beggar trod our lands,
Such as he wander'd o'er his native coast,
Shrunk by the † wand, and all the hero lost;
O'er his smooth skin a bark of wrinkles spread,
Old age disgrac'd the honours of his head;
Nor longer in his heavy eye-ball shin'd
The glance divine forth-beaming from the mind:
But you, like Pallas, every limb infold
With royal robes, and bid him shine in gold;
Touch'd by your hand, his manly frame improves
With air divine, and like a God he moves.

* The author translated eight books of the Odyssey.

† See the 16th Odyssey, ver. 186, and 476.

This labour past, of heavenly subjects sing,
While hovering angels listen on the wing;
To hear from earth such heart-felt raptures rise,
As when they sing, suspended hold the skies:
Or, nobly rising in fair virtue's cause,
From thy own life transcribe th' unerring laws;
Teach a bad world beneath her sway to bend,
To verse like thine fierce savages attend, [lay,
And men more fierce! When Orpheus tunes the Ev'n fiends relenting hear their rage away.

PART OF THE TENTH BOOK OF THE
ILIADS OF HOMER.

IN THE STYLE OF MILTON.

Now high advanc'd the night, o'er all the host
Sleep shed his softest balm; restless alone
Atrides lay, and cares revolv'd on cares.

As when with rising vengeance gloomy Jove
Pours down a watery deluge, or in storms
Of hail or snow commands the goary jaws
Of war to roar; through all the kindling skies,
With flaming wings on lightnings lightnings play:
So while Atrides meditates the war,
Sighs after sighs bursts from his manly breast,
And shake his inmost soul: round o'er the fields
To Troy he turns his eyes, and round beholds
A thousand fires blaze dreadful; through his ears
Passes the direful symphony of war,
Of fife, or pipe, and the loud hum of hosts
Strikes him dismay'd: Now o'er the Grecian tents
His eyes he rolls; now from his royal head
Rends the fair curl in sacrifice to Jove,
And his brave heart heaves with imperial woes.

Thus groans the thoughtful king; at length resolves

To seek the Pylian sage, in wise debate
To ripen high designs, and from the sword
Preserve his banded legions. Pale and sad
Uprose the monarch: instant o'er his breast
A robe he threw, and on his royal feet
Glitter'd th' embroider'd sandals: o'er his back
A dreadful ornament, a lion's spoils,
With hideous grace down to his ankles hung;
Fierce in his hand he grasp'd a glittering spear.

With equal care was Menelaus toss'd:
Sleep from his temples fled, his generous heart
Felt all his people's woes, who in his cause
Stemm'd the proud main, and nobly stood in arms
Confronting death: A leopard's spotted spoils
Terrific clad his limbs, a brazen helm
Beam'd on his head, and in his hand a spear.
Forth from his tent the royal Spartan strode
To wake the king of men; him wak'd he found
Clasping his polish'd arms; with rising joy
The heroes meet, the Spartan thus begun:

Why thus in arms, my prince? Send'st thou some spy

To view the Trojan host? Alas! I fear
Lest the most dauntless sons of glorious war
Shrink at the bold design! This task demands
A soul resolv'd, to pass the gloom of night,
And 'midst her legions search the powers of Troy.

O prince, he cries, in this disastrous hour
Greece all our counsel claims, now, now demands

Our deepest cares! the power omnipotent
Frowns on our arms, but smiles with aspect mild
On Hector's incense: Heavens! what son of fame,
Renown'd in story, e'er such deeds achiev'd
In a whole life, as in one glorious day
This favourite of the skies? and yet a man!
A mortal! born to die! but such his deeds
As future Grecians shall repeat with tears
To children yet unborn.—But haste, repair
To Ajax and Idomeneus: we wake
Ourselves the Pylian sage; to keep the guards
On duty be his care; for o'er the guards
His son presides nocturnal, and in arms
His great compeer, Meriones the bold.

But say, rejoins the prince, these orders borne,
There shall I stay, or, measuring back the shores,
To thee return?—No more return, replies
The king of hosts, lest treading different ways
We meet no more; for through the camp the ways

Lie intricate and various: but aloud
Wake every Greek to martial fame and arms;
Teach them to emulate their godlike fires;
And thou awhile forget thy royal birth,
And share a soldier's cares: the proudest king
Is but exalted dust; and when great Jove
Call'd us to life, and gave us royal power,
He gave a sad pre-eminence of woes.

He spoke, and to the tent of Nestor turns
His step majestic: on his couch he found
The hoary warrior; all around him lay
His arms, the shield, the spears, the radiant helm,
And scarf of various dye: with these array'd,
The reverend father to the field of fame
Led his bold files; for, with a brave disdain,
Old as he was, he scorn'd the ease of age.

Sudden the monarch starts, and half uprais'd,
Thus to the king aloud; What art thou, say?
Why in the camp alone? while others sleep,
Why wanderest thou obscure the midnight hours?
Seek'st thou some centinel, or absent friend?
Speak instant!—Silent to advance, is death!

O pride of Greece, the plaintive king returns,
Here in thy tent thou Agamemnon view'st,
A prince, the most unhappy of mankind;
Woes I endure, which none but kings can feel,
Which ne'er will cease until forgot in death:
Pensive I wander through the damp of night,
Through the cold damp of night; distress'd! alone!
And sleep is grown a stranger to my eyes:
The weight of all the war, the load of woes
That presses every Greek, united falls
On me—the cares of all the host are mine!
Grief discomposes, and distracts my thoughts;
My restless panting heart, as if it strove
To force its prison, beats against my sides!
My strength is fail'd, and even my feet refuse
To bear so great a load of wretchedness!

But if thy wakeful cares (for o'er thy head
Wakeful the hours glide on) have aught matur'd
Useful, the thought unfold: but rise, my friend,
Visit with me the watches of the night;
Lest tir'd they sleep, while Troy with all her war
Hangs o'er our tents, and now, perhaps ev'n now
Arms her proud bands. Arise, my friend, arise!

To whom the Pylian : Think not, mighty king,
Jove ratifies vain Hector's haughty views ;
A sudden, sad reverse of mighty woes
Waits that audacious victor, when in arms
Dreadful Achilles shines. But now thy steps
Nestor attends : Be it our care to wake
Sage Ithacus, and Diomed the brave,
Meges the bold, and in the race renown'd
Oïlean Ajax : To the ships that guard
Outmost the camp, some other speed his way
To raise stern Ajax and the Cretan king.
But love, nor reverence to the mighty name
Of Menelaus, nor thy wrath, O king,
Shall stop my free rebuke : Sleep is a crime
When Agamemnon wakes ; on him it lies
To share thy martial toils, to court the peers
To act the men : this hour claims all our cares.

Reserve, rejoins the king, for future hours
Thy generous anger : Seems the royal youth
Remiss ? 'tis not through indolence of soul,
But deference to our power ; for our commands
He waits, and follows when we lead the way.
This night disdaining rest, his steps he bent
To our pavilion : now the illustrious peers,
Rais'd at his call, a chosen synod stand
Before the gates : haste, Nestor, haste away. [hands

To whom the sage well pleas'd : In such brave
No Greek will envy power : with loyal joy
Subjects obey, when men of worth command.

He added not, but o'er his manly breast
Flung a rich robe : beneath his royal feet
The glittering sandals shone : a soft, large vest,
Florid with purple wool, his aged limbs
Graceful adorn'd : tipt with a star of brass
A ponderous lance he grasp'd, and strode away
To wake sage Ithacus. Aloud his voice
He rais'd : his voice was heard, and from his tent
Instant Ulysses sprung ; and why, he cry'd,
Why thus abroad in the chill hours of night ?
What new distress invades ?—Forgive my cares,
Reply'd the hoary sage ; for Greece I wake,
Greece and her dangers bring me to thy tent :
But haste, our wakeful peers in council meet ;
This, this one night determines flight or war.

Swift at the word he seiz'd his ample shield,
And strode along ; and now they bend their way
To wake the brave Tydides : him they found
Stretch'd on the earth, array'd in shining arms,
And round, his brave companions of the war :
Their shields sustain'd their heads ; erect their spears
Shot through th' illumin'd air a streaming ray,
Keen as Jove's lightning wing'd athwart the skies.
Thus slept the chief : beneath him on the ground
A savage bull's black hide was roll'd ; his head
A splendid carpet bore. The slumbering king
The Pylian gently with these words awakes :

Rise, son of Tydeus ! ill, a whole night's rest Suits with the brave ! and sleep'st thou, while proud Troy

Hangs o'er our tents, and from yon joining hill
Prepares her war ? Awake, my friend, awake !

Sudden the chief awoke, and mildly gave
This soft reply : Oh ! cruel to thy age, [cease
Thou good old man ! ne'er wilt thou, wilt thou
To burthen age with cares ? Has Greece no youths

To wake the peers ? unwearied man, to bear
At once the double load of toils, and years !

'Tis true, he cry'd, my subjects and my sons
Might ease a sire and king : but rest's a crime
When on the edge of fate our country stands :
Ere yet a few hours more have run their course,
Important space ! Greece triumphs, or Greece falls !
But, since an old man's care thy pity moves,
Haste, generous youth, with speed to council call
Meges the brave, and in the race renown'd
Oïlean Ajax.—Strait the chief obey'd,
Strait o'er his shoulders flung the shaggy spoil
Of a huge tawny lion ; with dire grace
Down to his feet they hung : fierce in his hand
He grasp'd a glittering spear, and join'd the guards.
Wakeful in arms they sat, a faithful band,
As watchful dogs protect the fleecy train,
Then the stern lion, furious for his prey,
Rushes through crashing woods, and on the fold
Springs from some mountain's brow, while mingled cries

Of men and hounds alarm ; to every sound
Faithful they turn : so through the gloom of night
They cast their view, and caught each noise of Troy.

Now met th' illustrious synod ; down they fate,
Down on a spot of ground unstain'd with blood
Where vengeful Hector from the slaughter stay'd
His murderous arm, when the dark veil of night
Sabled the pole : To whom thus Nestor spoke :

Lives there a son of fame so nobly brave,
That Troy-ward dares to trace the dangerous way,
To seize some struggling foe ? or learn what Troy
Now meditates ? to pour the flood of war
Fierce on our fleet, or back within her walls
Lead her proud legions ? Oh ! what fame would crown

The hero thus triumphant, prais'd o'er earth
Above the sons of men ! And what rewards
Should he receive ! From every grateful peer
A fable ewe, and lamb, of highest worth
Memorial ; to a brave, heroic heart
The noblest prize ! and at the social feast
Amongst the great, be his the seat of fame.

Abash'd they fate, and ev'n the brave knew fear.
Not so Tydides : unappall'd he rose,
And nobly spoke ! My soul ! Oh ! reverend sage,
Fires at the bold design ; through yon black host
Venturous I bend my way ; but, if his aid
Some warrior lend, my courage might arise
To nobler heights : the wise by mutual aid
Instruct the wise, and brave men fire the brave.

Fierce at the word upstart'd from the ground
The stern Ajaces, fierce bold Merion rose,
And Thrasymedes, sons of war : nor fate
The Royal Spartan, nor great Nestor's heir,
Nor greater Ithacus, his manly heart
Swell'd at the view of fame.—Elate with joy
Atrides saw ; and oh ! thou best of friends,
Brave Diomed, he cries, of all the peers
Choose thou the valiantest : when merit pleads,
Titles no deference claim ; high birth and state
To valour yield, and worth is more than power.

Thus, fearing for his brother, spoke the king,
Not long ! for Diomed dispels his fears.

Since free my choice, can I forget a friend,

The man, for wisdom's various arts renown'd;
The man, whose dauntless soul no toils dismay,
Ulysses, lov'd by Pallas! through his aid,
Though thousand fires oppose, a thousand fires
Oppose in vain; his wisdom points the way.

Nor praise, nor blame, the hero strait replies;
You speak to Greeks, and they Ulysses know:
But haste; swift roll the hours of night, the morn
Already hastens to display her beams,
And in the vault of heaven the stars decay. [limbs

Swift at the word they sheathe their manly
Horrid in arms: a two-edg'd sword and shield
Nestor's bold son to stern Tydides gave;
A tough bull's hide his ample helmet form'd,
No cone adorn'd it, and no plumy crest
Wav'd in the air; a quiver and a bow,
And a huge faulchion, great Ulysses bears,
The gift of Merion: on his head an helm
Of leather nodded, firm within, and bound
With many a thong; without, in dreadful rows
The snowy tusks of a huge savage boar
Grinn'd horrible. Thus arm'd, away they stalk
Undaunted: o'er their heads the martial maid
Sends on the right an her'n; the ambient gloom
Conceals him from the view, but loud in air
They hear the clangor of his sounding wings.
Joyful the prosperous sign Ulysses hail'd,
And thus to Pallas: Offspring of dread Jove,
Who hurls the burning bolts! O guardian power,
Present in all my toils, who view'st my way
Where'er I move, now thy celestial aid,
Now, goddess, lend! may deeds this night adorn,
Deeds that all Troy may weep; may we return
In safety by thy guidance, heavenly maid!

Tydides caught the word; and oh! he cries,
Virgin armipotent, now grant thy aid,
As to my sire! he by the gulfy flood
Of deep Æsopus left th' embattled bands
Of Greece in arms, and to imperial Thebes
Bore terms of peace; but as from haughty Thebes
Alone he journey'd, deeds, heroic deeds,
His arm achiev'd, for Tydeus was thy care:
Thus guard his offspring, Oh! stern queen of arms;
So shall an heifer on thy altars bleed,
Young and untam'd; to thee her blood I pour,
And point her lunar horns with burnish'd gold.

Thus pray the chiefs, and Pallas hears their
prayer;
Then, like two lions through the shades of night,
Dauntless they stride along; and hold their way
Through blood, and mangled limbs, o'er arms and
* Nor pass they far, e'er the sagacious eye [death.
Of Ithacus discerns a distant foe

Coasting from Troy, and thus to Diomed:

See! o'er the plain some Trojan bends this way,
Perhaps to spoil the slain! or to our host
Comes he a spy? beyond us o'er the field
'Tis best he pass, then sudden from behind
Rush we precipitant: but if in flight
His active feet prevail, thy spear employ
To force him on our lines, lest hid in shades,
Through the dusk air he re-escape to Troy. [lay
Then couching to the ground, ambush'd they

Behind a hill of slain: onward the spy
Incessant mov'd: he pass'd, and now arose
The fierce pursuers. Dolon heard the sound
Of trampling feet, and panting, listening stood;
Now reach'd the chiefs within a javelin's throw,
Stern foes of Dolon! swift along the shores
He wing'd his flight, and swift along the shores
They still pursued: as when two skillful hounds
Chase o'er the lawn the hare or bounding roe,
Still from the sheltering brake the game they turn,
Stretch every nerve, and bear upon the prey!
So ran the chiefs, and from the host of Troy
Turn'd the swift foe: now nigh the fleet they flew,
Now almost mingled with the guards; when lo!
The martial goddess breath'd heroic flames
Fierce on Tydides' soul: the hero fear'd
Lest some bold Greek should interpose a wound,
And ravish half the glories of the night.

Furious he shook his lance, and stand he cry'd,
Stand, or thou dy'st: then sternly from his arm
Launch'd the wild spear; willful the javelin err'd,
But whizzing o'er his shoulder, deep in earth
Stood quivering; and he quaking stopp'd aghast;
His teeth all chatter'd, and his slack knees knock'd;
He seem'd the bloodless image of pale fear.

Panting the spy they seize; who thus with tears
Abject entreats: Spare me, oh! spare, he cries;
My hoary sire your mercy shall repay,
Soon as he hears I draw the vital air, [gold.
With ample wealth, with steel, with brass, with
To whom Ulysses artfully: Be bold:

Far hence the thought of death! but instant say
Why thus alone in the still hours of night
While every eye is clos'd? to spoil the slain
Com'st thou rapacious? or some nightly spy
By Hector sent? or has thy venturous mind
Impell'd thee to explore our martial bands?
By Hector sent, and by rewards undone,
Returns the spy (still as he spoke he shook),
I come unwilling: the refulgent car
He promis'd, and immortal steeds that bear
To fight, the great Achilles: thus betray'd,
Through the dun shades of night I bend my way
Unprosperous, to explore the tented host
Of adverse Greece, and learn if now they stand
Wakeful on guard, or vanquish'd by our arms
Precipitant desert the shores of Troy.

To whom with smiles of scorn the sage returns:
Bold were thy aims, O youth! but those proud
steeds,

Restive, disdain the use of vulgar hands;
Scarce ev'n the goddess-born, when the loud din
Of battle roars, subdues them to the rein
Reluctant: but this night where Hector sleeps
Faithful disclose: where stand the warrior's steeds?
Where lie his arms and implements of war?
What guards are kept nocturnal? say, what Troy
Now meditates? to pour the tide of fight
Fierce on our fleet, or back within her walls
Transfer the war?—To these demands, he cries,
Faithful my tongue shall speak: the peers of Troy
Hector in council meets: round Ilus' tomb
Apart from noise they stand: no guards surround
The spacious host: where through the gloom yon
fires

Blaze frequent, Trojans wake to guard their Troy;
Secure th' auxiliars sleep, no tender cares
Of wife or son disturb their calm repose,
Safe sleep their wives and sons on foreign shores.

But say, apart encamp th' auxiliar bands,
Replies the sage, or join the powers of Troy?

Along the sea-beat shores, returns the spy,
The Leleges and Carians stretch their files;
Near these the Caucons, and Pelasgian train,
And Pæons, dreadful with the battle-bow,
Extended lie; on the Thymbræan plain
The Lycians and the Mysians in array
Spread their deep ranks: there the Mæonian bands,
And Phrygians, range the fiery steeds of war.
But why this nice inquiry? if your way
Venturous you bend to search the host of Troy,
There in yon outmost lines, a recent aid,
The Thracians lie, by Rhesus led, whose steeds
Outshine the snow, outfly the winged winds,
With glittering silver plates, and radiant gold
His chariot flames; gold forms his dazzling arms,
Arms that may grace a God!—but to your tents
Unhappy me convey; or bound with chains,
Fast bound with cruel chains, sad on the shores
Here leave me captive, till you safe return,
And witness to the truth my tongue unfolds.

To whom stern-frowning Diomed replies:
Though every syllable be stamp'd with truth,
Dolon, thou dy'st: would'st thou once more return

Darkling a spy, or wage, a nobler foe, [more
New war on Greece? traitor, thou dy'st; nor
New war thou wagest, nor return'st a spy.

He spoke terrific: and as Dolon rais'd
Suppliant his humble hands, the trenchant blade
Sheer through his neck descends; the furious blow
Cleaves the tough nerves in twain; down drops
the head,

And mutters unintelligible sounds.

Strait they despoil the dead: the wolf's gray hide
They seize the helm, the spear, and battle-bow:
These, as they dropp'd with gore, on high in air
Ulysses rais'd, and to the martial maid

Thus lowly consecrates: stern power of war,
Virgin armipotent, receive these arms,
Propitious to my vows, thee, goddess, thee
Chiefly I call: direct our prosperous way
To pierce the Thracian tents, to seize the steeds
Of Rhesus, and the car that flames with gold.

Then fierce o'er broken arms, through streams of blood

They move along: now reach the Thracian bands
All hush'd in sleep profound; their shining arms
Rang'd in three ranks along the plain, around
Illumin'd the dun air: chariot and horse

By every Thracian flood: Rhesus their king
Slept in the centre of the circling bands,
And his proud steeds were rein'd behind his car.
With joy Ulysses through the gloom descry'd
The sleeping king; and lo! he cries, the steeds,
Lo! Diomed, the chief of Thrace, this night
Describ'd by Dolon: now, oh! now, thy strength
Dauntless exert! loose thou the furious steeds;
Or while the steeds I loose, with slaughtering
hands

Invade the soldiery: he spoke, and now
The queen of arms inflam'd Tydides' soul
With all her martial fires: his reeking blade
On every side dealt fate; low, hollow groans
Murmur'd around, blood o'er the crimson field
Well'd from the slain: as in his nightly haunts
The surly lion rushes on the fold
Of sheep, or goat, and rends th' unguarded prey;
So he the Thracian bands: twelve by his sword
Lay breathless on the ground: behind him stood
Sage Ithacus, and, as the warrior flew,
Swift he remov'd the slain, lest the fierce steeds,
Not yet inur'd to blood, should trembling start,
Impatient of the dead: now o'er the king
He whirls his wrathful blade, now furious gores
His heaving chest: he wak'd not; but a dream
By Pallas sent, rose in his anxious thoughts;
A visionary warrior frowning stood
Fast by his head, and his aerial sword
Plung'd through his lab'ring breast: mean while the steeds

The sage unbinds, and instant with his bow
Drives through the sleeping ranks: then to his friend

Gave signals of retreat; but nobler deeds
He meditates, to drag the radiant car,
Or lift it through the threefold ranks, up-borne
High on his shoulders, or with slaughter stain
Th' ensanguin'd field; when, lo! the martial
maid

Down rushes from the battlements of heaven,
And sudden cries, return, brave chief, return,
Lest from the skies some guardian power of Troy
Wrathful descend, and rouse the hostile bands.

Thus speaks the warrior queen: the heavenly voice

Tydides owns, and mounts the fiery steeds,
Observant of the high command; the bow
Sage Ithacus apply'd, and tow'rd the tents
Scourg'd the proud steeds, the steeds flew o'er the plain.

A PASTORAL,

To a Young Lady, upon her leaving, and return to the Country.

Damon.

SAY, while each scene so beautiful appears,
Why heaves thy bosom, and why flow thy tears?
See! from the clouds the spring descends in showers,
The painted vallies laugh with rising flowers:
Smooth flow the floods, soft breathe the vernal
airs;
The spring, flowers, floods, conspire to charm our cares.

Florus.

But vain the pleasure which the season yields,
The laughing vallies, or the painted fields.
No more, ye floods, in silver mazes flow;
Smile not, ye flowers; no more soft breezes blow:
Far, Damon, far from these unhappy groves,
The cruel, lovely Rosalinda roves.

Damon.

Ah! now I know why late the opening buds
Clos'd up their gems, and sicken'd in the woods;

Why droop'd the lily in her snowy pride;
And why the rose withdrew her sweets, and dy'd:
For thee, fair Rosalind, the opening buds
Clos'd up their gems, and ficken'd in the woods;
For thee the lily shed her snowy pride;
For thee the rose withdrew her sweets, and dy'd.

Florus.

See! where yon vine in soft embraces weaves
Her wanton ringlets with the myrtle's leaves;
There tun'd sweet Philomel her sprightly lay,
Both to the rising and the falling day:
But since fair Rosalind forsook the plains,
Sweet Philomel no more renews her strains;
With sorrow dumb, she disregards her lay,
Nor greets the rising nor the falling day.

Damon.

Say, O ye winds, that range the distant skies,
Now swell'd to tempests by my rising sighs;
Say, while my Rosalind deserts these shores,
How Damon dies for whom his soul adores.

Florus.

Ye murmuring fountains, and ye wandering floods,
That visit various lands through various roads;
Say, when ye find where Rosalind resides,
Say, how my tears increase your swelling tides.

Damon.

Tell me, I charge you, O ye sylvan swains!
Who range the mazy grove, or flowery plains,
Beside what fountain, in what breezy bower,
Reclines my charmer in the noon-tide hour!

Florus.

Soft, I adjure you, by the skipping fawns,
By the fleet roes, that bound along the lawns;
Soft tread, ye virgin daughters of the grove,
Nor with your dances wake my sleeping love?

Damon.

Return, O virgin! and if proud disdain
Arm thy fierce soul, return, enjoy my pain;
If pleas'd thou view'st a faithful lover's cares,
Thick rise, ye sighs; in floods descend, ye tears!

Florus.

Return, O virgin! while in verdant meads
By springs we sport, or dream on flowery beds;
She weary wanders through the desert way,
The food of wolves, or hungry lion's prey.

Damon.

Ah! shield her, heaven! your rage, ye beasts,
forbear!

Those are not limbs for savages to tear!
Adieu, ye meads! with her through wilds I go
O'er burning sands, or everlasting snow;
With her I wander through the desert way,
The food of wolves, or hungry lions' prey.

Florus.

Come, Rosalind, before the wintery clouds
Frown o'er th' aerial vault, and rush in floods;
Ere raging storms howl o'er the frozen plains;
Thy charms may suffer by the storms or rains.

Damon.

Come, Rosalind, O come! then infant flowers
Shall bloom and smile, and form their charms by yours:

By you the lily shall her white compose;
Your blush shall add new blushes to the rose;

Each flowery mead, and every tree shall bud,
And fuller honours clothe the youthful wood.

Florus.

Yet ah! forbear to urge thy homeward way,
While sultry suns infest the glowing day:
The sultry suns thy beauties may impair!—
Yet haste away! for thou art now too fair.

Damon.

Hark! from yon bower what airs soft-warbled
play!

My soul takes wing to meet th' enchanting lay:
Silence, ye nightingales! attend the voice!
While thus it warbles, all your songs are noise.

Florus.

See, from the bower a form majestic moves,
And smoothly gliding shines along the groves!
Say, comes a goddess from the golden spheres?
A goddess comes, or Rosalind appears!

Damon.

Shine forth, thou sun, bright ruler of the day;
And where she treads, ye flowers, adorn the way!
Rejoice, ye groves; my heart, dismiss thy cares!
My goddess comes, my Rosalind appears!

POVERTY AND POETRY.

'Twas sung of old how one Amphion
Could by his verses tame a lion,
And by his strange enchanting tunes,
Make bears or wolves dance ridagoons:
His songs could call the timber down,
And form it into house or town;
But it is plain that in these times
No house is rais'd by poets' rhymes;
They for themselves can only rear
A few wild castles in the air;
Poor are the brethren of the bays,
Down from high strains, to ekes and ayes.
The muses too are virgins yet,
And may be—till they portions get.
Yet still the doating rhymer dreams,
And sings of Helicon's bright streams;
But Helicon, for all his clatter,
Yields only uninspiring water;
Yet ev'n athirst he sweetly sings
Of nectar and Elysian springs.

What dire malignant planet sheds,
Ye bards, his influence on your heads?
Lawyers by endless controversies,
Consume unthinking clients' purses,
As Pharoah's kine, which strange and odd is,
Devour'd the plump and well-fed bodies.

The grave physician who by physic,
Like death, dispatches him that is sick,
Pursues a sure and thriving trade;
Though patients die, the doctor's paid:
Licens'd to kill, he gains a palace,
For what another mounts the gallows.

In shady groves the muses stray,
And love in flowery meads to play;
An idle crew! whose only trade is
To shine in trifles, like our ladies;
In dressing, dancing, toying, singing,
While wiser Pallas thrives by spinning;

Thus they gain nothing to bequeath
Their votaries, but a laurel wreath.

But love rewards the bard! the fair
Attend his song, and ease his care:
Alas! fond youth, your plea you urge so ill
Without a jointure, though a Virgil:
Could you like Phœbus sing, in vain
You nobly swell the lofty strain;
Coy Daphne flies, and you will find as
Hard hearts as hers in your Belinda's.

But then some say you purchase fame,
And gain that envy'd prize, a name;
Great recompence! like his who sells
A diamond for beads and bells.
Will fame be thought sufficient bail
To keep the poet from the jail?

Thus the brave soldier in the wars,
Gets empty praise and aching scars;
Is paid with fame and wooden legs;
And starv'd, the glorious vagrant begs.

TO A LADY

PLAYING WITH A SNAKE.

It is a pleasing, direful sight!
At once you charm us and affright!
So heaven destroying angels' arms
With terror, dreadful in their charms!

Such, such was Cleopatra's air,
Lovely, but formidably fair,
When the griev'd world impoverish'd lost,
By the dire asp, its noblest boast.

Aw'd by your guardian's dangerous power,
At distance trembling we adore;
At distance, once again behold
A serpent guard the blooming gold.

Well pleas'd and harmless, lo! he lies,
Basks in the sunshine of your eyes;
Now twists his spires, and now unfurls
The gay confusion of his curls.

Oh! happy on your breast to lie,
As that bright * star that gilds the sky,
Who ceasing in the spheres to shine,
Would for your breast his heaven resign.

Yet, oh! fair virgin, caution take,
Lest some bold cheat assume the snake.
When Jove compress'd the † Grecian dame,
Aloof he threw the light'ning's flame;
On radiant spires the lover rode,
And in the snake conceal'd the god.

TO A LADY OF THIRTY.

No more let youth in beauty boast,
S—n at thirty reigns a toast;
And like the sun as he declines,
More mildly, but more sweetly shines.

The hand of time alone disarms
Her face of its superfluous charms;

* The Scorpion.

† Olympias, mother of Alexander the Great.

VOL. VIII.

But adds for every grace resign'd;
A thousand to adorn her mind.
Youth was her too inflaming time;
This her more habitable clime:
How must she then each heart engage,
Who blooms like youth, is wise like age!
Thus the rich orange-trees produce
At once both ornament and use:
Here opening blossoms we behold,
There fragrant orbs of ripen'd gold.

ON THE

BIRTH-DAY OF MR. ROBERT TREFUSIS,

Being three Years old, March 22. 1710-11.

AWAKE, sweet babe! the sun's emerging ray,
That gave you birth, renews the happy day!
Calmly serene, and glorious to the view,
He marches forth, and strives to look like you.

Fair beauty's bud! when time shall stretch thy span,
Confirm thy charms, and ripen thee to man,
What plenteous fruits thy blossoms shall produce,
And yield not barren ornament, but use!
Ev'n now thy spring a rich increase prepares
To crown thy riper growth and manly years.

Thus in the kernel's intricate disguise,
In miniature a little orchard lies;
The fibrous labyrinths by just degrees
Stretch their swell'n cells, replete with future trees;
By time evolv'd, the spreading branches rise,
Yield their rich fruits, and shoot into the skies.

O lovely babe, what lustre shall adorn
Thy noon of beauty, when so bright thy morn!
Shine forth advancing with a brighter ray,
And may no vice o'ercloud thy future day!

VARIATIONS.

WHY, lovely babe, does slumber seal your eyes?
See, fair Aurora blushes in the skies!
The sun, which gave you birth, in bright array
Begins his course, and ushers in the day.
Calmly serene, and glorious to the view,
He marches forth, and strives to look like you.

Fair beauty's bud! when time shall stretch thy
span,
Confirm thy charms, and ripen thee to man, [plain,
How shall each swain, each beauteous nymph com-
For love each nymph, for envy every swain!
What matchless charms shall thy full noon adorn,
When so admir'd, so glorious, is thy morn!
So glorious is thy morn of life begun,
That all to thee with admiration run,
Turn Persians, and adore the rising sun.
So fair thou art, that if great Cupid be
A child, as poets say, sure thou art he.
Fair Venus would mistake thee for her own,
Did not thy eyes proclaim thee not her son.
There all the lightnings of thy mother's shine,
Their radiant glory and their sweetness join,
To show their fatal power, and all their charms
in thine.

With nobler aims instruct thy soul to glow,
Than those gay trifles, titles, wealth, and show :
May valour, wisdom, learning, crown thy days !
Those fools admire—these heaven and angels
praise * !

With riches blest, to heaven those riches lend,
The poor man's guardian, and the good man's friend :
Bid virtuous sorrow smile, scorn'd merit cheer,
And o'er affliction pour the generous tear.
Some, wildly liberal, squander, not bestow,
And give unprais'd, because they give for show :
To sanctify thy wealth, on worth employ
Thy gold, and to a blessing turn the toy :
Thus offerings from th' unjust pollute the skies,
The good turn smoke into a sacrifice.

As when an artist plans a favourite draught,
The structures rise responsive to the thought ;
A palace grows beneath his forming hands,
Or worthy of a God a temple stands :
Such is thy rising frame by heaven design'd
A temple, worthy of a godlike mind ;
Nobly adorn'd, and finish'd to display
A fuller beam of heaven's ethereal ray.

May all thy charms increase, O lovely boy !
Spare them, ye pains, and age alone destroy !
So fair thou art, that if great Cupid be
A child, the god might boast to look like thee !
When young Iulus' form he deign'd to wear,
Such were his smiles, and such his winning air :
Ev'n Venus might mistake thee for her own,
Did not thy eyes proclaim thee not her son ;
Thence all the light'ning of thy mother's flies,
A Cupid grac'd with Cytheræa's eyes !

Yet ah ! how short a date the powers decree
To that bright frame of beauties, and to thee !
Pass a few days, and all those beauties fly !
Pass a few years, and thou, alas ! shalt die !
Then all thy kindred, all thy friends shall see
With tears, what now thou art, and they must be ;
A pale, cold, lifeless lump of earth deplore !
Such shalt thou be, and kings shall be no more !

VARIATIONS.

If fond Narcissus in the crystal flood,
A form like thine, O lovely infant, view'd,
Well might the flame the pining youth destroy ;
Excess of beauty justified the boy.

ADDITION.

* To brace the mind to dignity of thought,
To emulate what godlike Tully wrote,
Be this thy early wish ! The garden breeds,
If unimprov'd, at least but gaudy weeds :
And stubborn youth, by culture unsubdued,
Lies wildly barren, or but gayly rude.
Yet as some Phidias gives the marble life,
While art with nature holds a dubious strife,
Adorns a rock with graces not its own,
And calls a Venus from the rugged stone ;
So culture aids the human soul to rise,
To scorn the sordid earth, and mount the skies,
Till by degrees the noble guest refines,
Claims her high birth-right, and divinely shines.

But oh ! when ripe for death, fate calls thee hence,
Sure lot of every mortal excellence !
When pregnant as the womb the teeming earth
Relinquish thee quicken'd to thy second birth,
Rise cloth'd with beauties that shall never die !
A saint on earth ! an angel in the sky !

TO A GENTLEMAN OF SEVENTY,

Who Married a Lady of Sixteen.

WHAT woes must such unequal union bring,
When hoary winter weds the youthful spring !
You like Mezentius* in the nuptial bed,
Once more unite the living to the dead.

THE

XLIII. CHAPTER OF ECCLESIASTICUS.

A PARAPHRASE.

THE sun that rolls his beamy orb on high,
Pride of the world, and glory of the sky,
Illustrious in his course, in bright array
Marches along the heavens, and scatters day
O'er earth, and o'er the main, and through th' }
ethereal way.

He in the morn renews his radiant round,
And warms the fragrant bosom of the ground ;
But ere the noon of day, in fiery gleams
He darts the glory of his blazing beams ;
Beneath the burnings of his sultry ray,
Earth to her centre pierc'd admits the day ;
Huge vales expand, where rivers roll'd before,
And lessen'd seas contract within their shore.

O ! Power Supreme ! O ! high above all height !
Thou gav'st the sun to shine, and thou art light :
Whether he falls or rises in the skies,
He by thy voice is taught to fall or rise ;
Swiftly he moves, refulgent in his sphere,
And measures out the day, the month, and year ;
He drives the hours along with flower pace,
The minutes rush away impetuous in their race :
He wakes the flowers that sleep within the earth,
And calls the fragrant infants out to birth ;
The fragrant infants paint th' enamel'd vales
And native incense loads the balmy gales ;
The balmy gales the fragrant convey
To heaven, and to their God an offering pay.

By thy command the moon, as day-light fades,
Lifts her broad circle in the deepening shades ;
Array'd in glory, and enthron'd in light,
She breaks the solemn terrors of the night ;
Sweetly inconstant in her varying flame,
She changes still, another, yet the same !
Now in decrease by slow degrees she shrouds
Her fading lustre in a veil of clouds ;
Now at increase, her gathering beams display
A blaze of light, and give a paler day ;
Ten thousand stars adorn her glittering train,
Fall when she falls, and rise with her again ;
And o'er the deserts of the sky unfold
Their burning spangles of sidereal gold :

* The living and the dead at his command,
Were coupled face to face, and hand to hand."

DAYDEN'S Virg. Æn. viii.

Through the wide heavens she moves serenely
bright,

Queen of the gay attendants of the night;
Orb above orb in sweet confusion lies,
And with a bright disorder paints the skies.

The Lord of Nature fram'd the showery bow,
Turn'd its gay arch, and bade its colours glow:
Its radiant circle compasses the skies,
And sweetly the rich tinctures faint, and rise;
It bids the horrors of the storm to cease,
Adorns the clouds, and makes the tempest please.

He, when deep-rolling clouds blot out the day,
And thunderous storms a solemn gloom display,
Pours down a watery deluge from on high,
And opens all the sluices of the sky:
High o'er the shores the rushing surge prevails,
Bursts o'er the plain, and roars along the vales;
Dashing abruptly, dreadful down it comes,
Tumbling through rocks, and tosses, whirls and foams:

Meantime, from every region of the sky,
Red burning bolts in forked vengeance fly;
Dreadfully bright o'er seas and earth they glare,
And bursts of thunder rend th' encumber'd air;
At once the thunders of th' Almighty sound,
Heaven lours, descend the floods, and rocks the
ground.

He gives the furious whirlwind wings to fly,
To rend the earth, and wheel along the sky;
In circling eddies whirl'd, it roars aloud,
Drives wave on wave, and dashes cloud on cloud;
Where'er it moves, it lays whole forests low;
And at the blast, eternal mountains bow;
While, tearing up the sands, in drifts they rise,
And half the deserts mount the burthen'd skies.

He from aerial treasures downward pours
Sheets of unfully'd snow in lucid showers;
Flake after flake, through air thick-wavering flies,
Till one vast shining waste all nature lies:
Then the proud hills a virgin whiteness shed,
A dazzling brightness glitters from the mead;
The hoary trees reflect a silver show,
And groves beneath the lovely burden bow.

He from loose vapours with an icy chain
Binds the round hail, and moulds the harden'd rain:

The stony tempest, with a rushing sound,
Beats the firm glebe, resulting from the ground:
Swiftly it falls, and as it falls invades
The rising herb, or breaks the spreading blades:
While infant flowers that rais'd their bloomy heads,

Crush'd by its fury, sink into their beds.

When stormy winter from the frozen north
Borne on his icy chariot issues forth,
The blasted groves their verdant pride resign,
And billows harden'd into crystal shine:
Sharp blows the rigour of the piercing winds,
And the proud floods as with a breast-plate binds:
Ev'n the proud seas forget in tides to roll
Beneath the freezings of the northern pole;
There waves on waves in solid mountains rise,
And Alps of ice invade the wondering skies;
While gulfs below, and slippery vallies lie,
And with a dreadful brightness pain the eye:

But if warm winds a warmer air restore,
And softer breezes bring a genial shower,
The genial shower revives the cheerful plain,
And the huge hills flow down into the main.

When the seas rage, and loud the ocean roars,
When foaming billows lash the sounding shores;
If he in thunder bid the waves subside,
The waves obedient sink upon the tide,
A sudden peace controls the limpid deep,
And the still waters in soft silence sleep.
Then heaven lets down a golden-streaming ray,
And all the broad expansion flames with day:
In the clear glass the mariners descry
A sun inverted, and a downward sky.

They who adventurous plough the watery way,
The dreadful wonders of the deep survey;
Familiar with their storms, their sails unbind,
Tempt the rough blast, and bound before the wind:
Now high they mount, now shoot into a vale,
Now smooth their course, and scud before the gale;

There rolling monsters, arm'd in scaly pride,
Flounce in the billows, and dash round the tide;
There huge leviathan unweildy moves,
And through the waves, a living island roves;
In dreadful pastime terribly he sports,
And the vast ocean scarce his weight supports;
Where'er he turns, the hoary deeps divide;
He breathes a tempest, and he spouts a tide.

Thus, Lord, the wonders of earth, sea, and air,
Thy boundless wisdom and thy power declare;
Thou high in glory, and in might serene,
See'st and mov'st all, thyself unmov'd, unseen:
Should men and angels join in songs to raise
A grateful tribute equal to thy praise,
Yet far thy glory would their praise outshine,
Though men and angels in the song should join;
For though this earth with skill divine is wrought,
Above the guess of man, or angel's thought,
Yet in the spacious regions of the skies
New scenes unfold, and worlds on worlds arise;
There other orbs, round other suns advance,
Float on the air, and run their mystic dance;
And yet the power of thy Almighty hand
Can build another world from every sand:
And though vain man arraign thy high decree,
Still this is just! what is, that ought to be.

THE CONCLUSION OF AN EPILOGUE

To Mr. Southern's Last Play, called "Money the Mistress."

THERE was a time, when in his younger years,
Our author's scenes commanded smiles or tears;
And though beneath the weight of days he bends,
Yet, like the sun, he shines as he descends:
Then with applause, in honour to his age,
Dismiss your veteran soldier * off the stage;
Crown his last exit with distinguish'd praise,
And kindly hide his † baldness with the bays.

* From the stage.

† Alluding to a vote of the Roman senate, by which they decreed Caesar a crown of laurel to cover his baldness.

THE PARTING,

A SONG,

Set by Dr. Tudway, Professor of Music in Cambridge.

WHEN from the plains Belinda fled,
The sad Amintor sigh'd;
And thus, while streams of tears he shed,
The mournful shepherd cry'd:

"Move slow, ye hours! thou, time, delay!
"Prolong the bright Belinda's stay:
"But you, like her, my prayer deny,
"And cruelly away ye fly.
"Yet though she flies, she leaves behind
"Her lovely image in my mind.
"O! fair Belinda, with me stay,
"Or take thy image too away!
"See! how the fields are gay around,
"How painted flowers adorn the ground!
"As if the fields, as well as I,
"Were proud to please my fair-one's eye.
"But now, ye fields, no more be gay;
"No more, ye flowers, your charms display!
"'Tis desert all, now you are fled,
"And paradise is where you tread."

Unmov'd the virgin flies his cares,
To shine at court and play:
To lonely shades the youth repairs,
To weep his life away.

ON A FLOWER

WHICH BELINDA GAVE ME FROM HER BOSOM.

O! LOVELY offspring of the May,
Whence flow thy balmy odours, say!
Such odours—not the orient boasts!
Though paradise adorn'd the coasts!
O! sweeter than each flower that blooms,
This fragrance from thy bosom comes!
Thence, thence such sweets are spread abroad,
As might be incense for a God!

When Venus stood conceal'd from view,
Her son, the latent * goddess knew,
Such sweets breath'd round! and thus we knew
Our other Venus here below.

But see! my fairest, see this flower,
This short-liv'd beauty of an hour!—
Such are thy charms!—yet zephyrs bring
The flower to bloom again in spring:
But beauty, when it once declines,
No more to warm the lover shines:
Alas! incessant speeds the day,
When thou shalt be but common clay!
When I, who now adore, may see,
And ev'n with horror start from thee!

But ere, sweet gift, thy grace consumes,
Show thou my fair-one how she blooms!
Put forth thy charms:—and then declare
Thyself less sweet, thyself less fair!

* *Ambrosiaque comæ divinum vertice odorem
Spiravére.* VIRG.

Then sudden, by a swift decay,
Let all thy beauties fade away;
And let her in thy glass descry,
How youth, and how frail beauty die.
Ah! turn, my charmer, turn thy eyes!

See! how at once it fades, it dies!
While thine—it gaily pleas'd the view,
Unfaded, as before it grew!
Now, from thy bosom doom'd to stray,
'Tis only beauteous in decay:

So the sweet-smelling Indian flowers,
Griev'd when they leave those happier shores,
Sicken, and die away in ours.
So flowers, in Eden fond to blow,
In paradise would only grow.

Nor wonder, fairest, to survey
The flower so suddenly decay!
Too cold thy breast! nor can it grow
Between such little hills of snow.

I now, vain infidel, no more
Deride th' Egyptian, who adore
The rising herb, and blooming flower;
Now, now their convert I will be,
O lovely flower! to worship thee.

But if thou 'rt one of their sad train
Who dy'd for love, and cold disdain,
Who, chang'd by some kind pitying power,
A † lover once, art now a flower;
O pity me, O weep my care,
A thousand, thousand pains I bear,
I love, I die through deep despair!

THE STORY OF TALUS,

From the Fourth Book of Apollonius Rhodius. V. 1629.

Ἦμος δ' ἥελιος μινέδου, ἀνὰ δ' ἤλυθεν ἀσὴρ
Αὔλιος, &c.

THE evening-star now lifts, as day-light fades,
His golden circlet in the deepening shades;
Stretch'd at his ease, the weary labourer shares
A sweet forgetfulness of human cares;
At once in silence sink the sleeping gales;
The mast † they drop, and furl the flagging sails;
All night, all day, they ply the bending oars
Tow'rd Carpathus, and reach the rocky shores:
Thence Crete they view, emerging from the main,
The queen of isles; but Crete they view in vain;
There Talus, whirling with resistless sway
Rocks sheer uprent, repels them from the bay:
A giant, sprung from giant-race, who took
Their births from entrails of the stubborn oak;
Pierce guard of Crete! by Jove assistant given
To § legislators, styl'd the sons of heaven:
To mercy deaf, he thrice each year explores
The trembling isle, and strides from shores to shores:

‡ Argonauts.

§ Minos and Rhadamanthus.

A form of living brass! one part beneath
Alone he bears, a path to let in death,
Where o'er the ankle swells the turgid vein,
Soft to the stroke, and sensible of pain.

And now her magic spells * Medea tries,
Bids the red fiends, the dogs of Orcus rise,
That, starting dreadful from th' infernal shade,
Ride heaven in storms, and all that breathes, invade;

Thrice she applies the power of magic prayer,
Thrice, hellward bending, mutters charms in air;
Then, turning tow'rd the foe, bids mischief fly,
And looks destruction as she points her eye:
Then spectres, rising from Tartarean bowers,
Howl round in air, or grin along the shores;
While, † tearing up whole hills, the giant throws,
Outrageous, rocks on rocks, to crush the foes:
But, frantic as he strides, a sudden wound
Bursts the life-vein, and blood o'er spreads the
ground:

As from the furnace, in a burning flood,
Pours molten lead, so pours in streams his blood;
And now he staggers as the spirit flies,
He faints, he sinks, he tumbles, and he dies.
As some huge cedar on a mountain's brow,
Pierc'd by the steel, expects the final blow,
A while it totters with alternate sway,
Till freshening breezes through the branches play;
Then, tumbling downward with a thundering
found,
Falls headlong, and o'er spreads a breadth of ground:
So, as the giant falls, the ocean roars;
Out-stretch'd he lies, and covers half the shores.

FROM THE ELEVENTH BOOK OF THE
ILIADS OF HOMER.

IN THE STYLE OF MILTON.

Now gay Aurora from Tithonus' bed
Rose in the orient, to proclaim the day
To gods and men: down to the Grecian tents
Saturnian Jove sends discord red with blood;
War in her hand she grasps, ensigns of war;
On brave Ulysses' ship she took her stand,
The centre of the host, that all might hear
Her dreadful voice: her dreadful voice she rais'd;
Jarring along the rattling shores it ran
To the fleet's wide extremes. Achilles heard,
And Ajax heard the sound: with martial fires
Now every bosom burns; arms, glorious arms,
Fierce they demand; the noble Orthian song
Swells every heart; no coward thoughts of flight
Rise in their souls, but blood they breathe and war.

Now by the ‡ trench profound, the charioteers
Range their proud steeds; now car by car displays
A direful front; now o'er the trembling field
Rushes th' embattled foot; noise rends the skies,
Noise unextinguish'd: ere the beamy day
Flam'd in the th' aerial vault, stretch'd in the van
Stood the bold infantry: the rushing cars
Form'd the deep rear in battailous array.
Now from his heavens Jove hurls his burning bolts;
Hoarse muttering thunders grumble in the sky;

While from the clouds, instead of morning-dews,
Huge drops of blood distain the crimson ground;
Fatal presage! that in that dreadful day
The great should bleed, imperial heads lie low!

Meantime the bands of Troy in proud array
Stand to their arms, and from a rising ground
Breathe furious war: Here gathering hosts attend
The towering Hector: there resplendent bands
Surround Polydamas, Æneas there
Marshals his dauntless files; nor unemploy'd
Stand Polybus, Agenor great in arms,
And Acamas, whose frame the gods endow'd
With more than mortal charms: fierce in the van
Stern Hector shines, and shakes his blazing shield.
As the fierce dog-star with malignant fires
Flames in the front of heaven, then, lost in clouds,
Veils his pernicious beams; from rank to rank
So Hector strode; now dreadful in the van
Advanc'd his sun-broad shield, now to the rear
Swift rushing disappear'd: His radiant arms
Blaz'd on his limbs, and bright as Jove's dire bolts
Flash'd o'er the field, and lighten'd to the skies.

As toiling reapers in some spacious field,
Rang'd in two bands, move adverse, rank on rank
Where o'er the tilth the grain in ears of gold
Waves nodding to the breeze; at once they bend,
At once the copious harvest swells the ground:
So rush to battle o'er the dreadful field
Host against host; they meet, they close, and ranks
Tumble on ranks; no thoughts appear of flight,
None of dismay: dubious in even scales
The battle hangs; not fiercer, ravenous wolves
Dispute the prey; the deathful scene with joy
Discord, dire parent of tremendous woes,
Surveys exultant: of th' immortal train
Discord alone descends, assists alone
The horrors of the field; in peace the gods
High in Olympian bowers on radiant thrones
Lament the works of man; but loud complaints
From every god arose; Jove favour'd Troy,
At partial Jove they murmur'd: he unmov'd
All heaven in murmurs heard, apart he sat
Enthron'd in glory: down to earth he turn'd
His steadfast eye, and from his throne survey'd
The rising towers of Troy, the tented shores,
The blaze of arms, the slayer and the slain.

While, with his morning wheels, the God of day
Climb'd up the steep of heaven, with equal rage
In murderous storms the shafts from host to host
Flew adverse, and in equal numbers fell
Promiscuous Greek and Trojan, till the hour
When the tir'd woodman in the shady vale
Spreads his penurious meal, when high the sun
Flames in the zenith, and his sinewy arms
Scarce wield the ponderous ax, while hunger keen
Admonishes, and nature spent with toil
Craves due repast—Then Greece the ranks of Troy
With horrid inroad goar'd: fierce from the van Sprung th' stern * king of men; and breathing
death

Where, in firm battle, Trojans band by band
Embod'd stood, pursued his dreadful way:
His host his step attends: now glows the war;

‡ V. 48.

* Agamemnon, v. 148.

Horse treads on horse; and man encountering man,
Swells the dire field with death; the plunging fleeds

Beat the firm glebes; thick dust in rising clouds
Darkens the sky. Indignant o'er the plain
Atrides stalks; death every step attends.
As when, in some huge forest, sudden flames
Rage dreadful, when rough winds assist the blaze,
From tree to tree the fiery torrent rolls,
And the vast forest sinks with all its groves
Beneath the burning deluge; so whole hosts
Yield to Atrides' arm; car against car
Rush'd rattling o'er the field, and through the ranks
Unguided broke; while breathless on the ground
Lay the pale charioteers, in death deform'd;
To their chaste brides sad spectacles of woe,
Now only grateful to the fowls of air.

Meantime, the care of Jove, great Hector stood
Secure in scenes of death, in storms of darts,
In slaughter and alarms, in dust and blood.

Still Agamemnon rushing o'er the field
Leads his bold bands: whole hosts before him fly;
Now Ilus' tomb they pass, now urge their way
Close by the fig-tree shade: with shouts the king
Pursues the foe incessant: dust and blood, [hands.
Blood mix'd with dust, distains his murderous

As when a lion in the gloom of night
Invades an herd of bees, o'er all the plains
Trembling they scatter; furious on the prey
The generous savage flies, and with fierce joy
Seizes the last; his hungry foaming jaws
Churn the black blood, and rend the panting prey:
Thus fled the foe; Atrides thus pursued.
And still the hindmost flew: they from their cars
Fell headlong; for his javelin, wild for blood,
Rag'd terribly: and now proud Troy had fall'n,
But the dread fire of men and gods descends
Terrific from his heavens, his vengeful hand
Ten thousand thunders grasps; on Ida's heights
He takes his stand; it shakes with all its groves
Beneath the God; the God suspends the war.

TO MRS. ELIZ. M——T,

ON HER PICTURE. 1716.

O! wondrous art, that grace to shadows gives!
By whose command the lovely phantom lives!
Smiles with her smiles! the mimic eye instills
A real frame! the fancy'd lightning kills!
Thus mirrors catch the love-inspiring face,
And the new charmer grace returns for grace.

Hence shall thy beauties, when no more appears
Their fair possessor, shine a thousand years;
By age uninjur'd, future times adorn,
And warm the hearts of millions yet unborn,
Who, gazing on the portrait with a sigh,
Shall grieve such perfect charms could ever die:
How would they grieve, if to such beauties join'd
The paint could show the wonders of thy mind!

O virgin! born th' admiring world to grace!
Transmit thy excellence to latest days;
Yield to thy lover's vows! and then shall rise
A race of beauties conquering with thine eyes;
Who, reigning in thy charms, from death shall save
That lovely form, and triumph o'er the grave.

Thus, when through age the rose-tree's charms
decay,

When all her fading beauties die away;
A blooming offspring fills the parent's place
With equal fragrance, and with equal grace.
But ah! how short a date on earth is given
To the most lovely workmanship of heaven!
Too soon that cheek must every charm resign,
And those love-darting eyes forget to shine!
While thousands weeping round, with sighs survey
What once was you——now only beauteous clay:
Ev'n from the canvas shall thy image fade,
And thou re-perish in thy perish'd shade:
Then may this verse to future ages show
One perfect beauty——such as thou art now!
May it the graces of thy soul display,
Till this world sinks, and suns themselves decay;
When with immortal beauty thou shalt rise,
To shine the loveliest angel in the skies.

PROLOGUE

To Mr. Fenton's excellent Tragedy, Mariamne.

WHEN breathing statues mouldering waste away,
And tombs, unfaithful to their trust, decay;
The muse rewards the suffering good with fame,
Or wakes the prosperous villian into shame;
To the stern tyrant gives fictitious power
To reign the restless monarch of an hour.

Obedient to her call, this night appears
Great Herod rising from a length of years;
A name! enlarg'd with titles not his own,
Servile to mount, and savage on a throne:
Yet oft a throne is dire misfortune's seat,
A pompous wretchedness, and woe in state!
But such the curse that from ambition springs,
For this he slaughter'd half a race of kings!
But now, reviving in the British scene,
He looks majestic with a milder mien,
His features soften'd with the deep distress
Of love, made greatly wretched by excess:
From lust of power to jealous fury tost,
We see the tyrant in the lover lost.

O! love, thou source of mighty joy or woe!
Thou softest friend, or man's most dangerous foe!
Fantastic power! * what rage thy darts inspire,
When too much beauty kindles too much fire!
Those darts, to jealous rage stern Herod drove;
It was a crime, but crime of too much love!
Yet if condemn'd he falls—with pitying eyes
Behold his injur'd Mariamne rise!
No fancy'd tale! our opening scenes disclose
Historic truth, and swell with real woes.
Awful in virtuous grief the queen appears,
And strong the eloquence of royal tears;
By woes ennobled, with majestic pace,
She meets misfortune, glorious in disgrace!

Small is the praise of beauty, when it flies
Fair honour's laws, at best but lovely vice,
Charms it like Venus with celestial air?
Ev'n Venus is but scandalously fair;

VARIATION.

* What pangs, &c.

But when strict honour with fair features joins,
Like heat and light, at once it warms and shines.

* Then let her fate your kind attention raise,
Whose perfect charms were but her second praise:
Beauty and virtue your protection claim;
Give tears to beauty, give to virtue fame.

TO MR. A. POPE,

WHO CORRECTED MY VERSES.

If e'er my humble muse melodious sings,
'Tis when you animate and tune her strings;
If e'er she mounts, 'tis when you prune her
wings.

You, like the sun, your glorious beams display,
Deal to the darkest orb a friendly ray,
And clothe it with the lustre of the day.

Mean was the piece, unelegantly wrought,
The colours faint, irregular the draught;
But your commanding touch, your nicer art,
Rais'd every stroke, and brighten'd every part.
So, when Luke drew the rudiments of man,
An angel finish'd what the faint began;
His wondrous pencil, dipt in heavenly dyes,
Gave beauty to the face, and lightning to the eyes.

Confus'd it lay, a rough unpolish'd mass;
You gave the royal stamp, and made it pass:
Hence ev'n deformity a beauty grew;
She pleas'd, she charm'd, but pleas'd and charm'd
by you;

Though like Prometheus I the image frame,
You give the life, and bring the heavenly flame.

Thus when the Nile diffus'd his watery train
In streams of plenty o'er the fruitful plain;
Unshapen forms, the refuse of the flood,
Issued imperfect from the teeming mud;
But the great source and parent of the day
Fashion'd the creature, and inform'd the clay †.

VARIATION.

* Then let her fate your just attention raise,
Whose perfect graces were but second praise.

ADDITION.

† To nobler themes thy muse triumphant soars,
Mounts through the tracts of air, and heaven explores.

Say, has some seraph tun'd thy sacred lyre,
Or deign'd to touch thy hallow'd lips with fire?
For sure such sounds exalt th' immortal string,
As heaven approves, and raptur'd angels sing.

Ah! how I listen, while the mortal lay
Lifts me from earth above the solar way!

Ah! how I look with scorn on pompous crowns,
And pity monarchs on their splendid thrones,
While, thou, my guide, I trace all nature's laws,
By just gradations, to the sovereign cause!

Pleas'd I survey how varying schemes unite,
Worlds with the atoms, angels with the mite,
And end in God, high thron'd above all height,
Who sees, as Lord of all, with equal eye,
Now a proud tyrant perish, then a fly.

Weak of herself, my muse forbears her flight,
Views her own lowness, and Parnassus' height;
But when you aid her song, and deign to nod,
She spreads a bolder wing, and feels the present
god.

So the Cumean prophetess was dumb,
Blind to the knowledge of events to come;
But when Apollo in her breast abode,
She heav'd, she swell'd, she felt the rushing god:
Then accents more than mortal from her broke;
And what the god inspir'd, the priestess spoke.

MONSIEUR MAYNARD IMITATED.

To the Right Honourable the Lord Cornwallis.

WHILE past its noon the lamp of life declines,
And age my vital flame invades;
Faint, and more faint, as it descends, it shines,
And hastes, alas! to set in shades.

Then some kind power shall guide my ghost to glades,

Where, seated by Elysian springs,
Fam'd Addison attunes to patriot shades
His lyre, and Albion's glory sings.

There round, majestic shades, and heroes' forms,
Will throng, to learn what pilot guides,
Watchful, Britannia's helm through faction's storms,
And curbs the murmuring rebel tides.

I tell how Townshend treads the glorious path
That leads the great to deathless fame,
And dwell at large on spotless English faith,
While Walpole is the favourite theme.

How, nobly rising in their country's cause,
The steadfast arbiters of right
Exalt the just and good, to guard her laws,
And call forth merit into light.

A loud applause around the echoing coast
Of all the pleas'd Elysium flies.— [ghost,
But, friend, what place had you, replies some
When merit was the way to rise?

What deanery, or prebend thine, declare?
Good heavens! unable to reply,
How like a stupid idiot I should stare!
An answer, good my lord, supply.

ON A MISCHIEVOUS WOMAN.

FROM peace, and social joy, Medusa flies,
And loves to hear the storm of anger rise;
Thus hags and witches hate the smiles of day,
Sport in loud thunder, and in tempests play.

ADDITION.

Methinks I view the patriarch's ladder rise,
Its base on earth, its summit in the skies:
Each wond'rous step by glorious angels trod,
And heaven unfolding to the throne of God,
Be this thy praise! I haunt the lovely bower,
Sport by the spring, or paint the blooming flower,
Nor dares the muse attempt the arduous height,
&c.

THE COQUETTE.

SALLIA, with uncontested sway,
 Like Rome's fam'd tyrant reigns;
 Beholds adoring crowds obey,
 And heroes proud to wear her chains:
 Yet stoops, like him, to every prize,
 Busy to murder beaux and flies.
 She aims at every trifling heart,
 Attends each flatterer's vows;
 And, like a picture drawn with art,
 A look on all that gaze bestows.
 O! may the power who lovers rules,
 Grant rather scorn, than hope with fools!
 Mistaken nymph! the crowds that gaze
 Adore thee into shame;
 Unguarded beauty is disgrace,
 And coxcombs, when they praise, defame.
 O! fly such brutes in human shapes,
 Nor, like th' Egyptians, worship apes.

THE WIDOW AND VIRGIN SISTERS.

Being a Letter to the Widow in London.

WHILE Delia shines at Hurlothrumbo,
 And darts her sprightly eye at some beau;
 Then, close behind her fan retiring,
 Sees through the sticks whole crowds admiring:
 You sip your melancholy co-ffy
 And at the name of man, cry, O phy!
 Or, when the noisy rapper thunders,
 Say coldly—Sure the fellow blunders!
 Unseen! though peer on peer approaches:
 James, I'm abroad!—but learn the coaches.
 As some young pleader, when his purse is
 Unfill'd, through want of controversies,
 Attends until the chinks are fill'd all,
 Th' assizes, Westminster, and Guildhall;
 While graver lawyers keep their house, and
 Collect the guineas by the thousand;
 Or as some tradesmen, through show-glasses,
 Expose their wares to each that passes;
 Toys of no use! high-priz'd commodities
 Bought to no end! estates in oddities!
 Others, with like advantage, drive at
 Their gain, from store-houses in private;
 Thus Delia shines in places general,
 Is never missing where the men are all;
 Goes ev'n to church with godly airs,
 To meet good company at prayers;
 Where she devoutly plays her fan,
 Looks up to heaven, but thinks on man.
 You sit at home; enjoy your * cousin,
 While hearts are offer'd by the dozen:
 Oh! born above your sex to rise,
 With youth, wealth, beauty, titles—wae!
 O! Lady bright, did ne'er you mark yet,
 In country fair, or country market,
 A beau, whose eloquence might charm ye,
 Enlisting soldiers for the army?

* Mrs. S.—th.

He flatters every well-built youth,
 And tells him every thing but—truth.
 He cries, good friend, I'm glad I hap'd in
 Your company, you'll make a captain!
 He lists—but finds these gaudy shows
 Soon chang'd to surly looks, and blows:
 'Tis now, March, rascal! what, d'ye grumble?
 Thwack goes the cane! I'll make you humble.
 Such weddings are: and I resemble 'em,
 Almost in all points to this emblem.
 While courtship lasts, 'tis, Dear! 'tis, Madam!
 The sweetest creature sure since Adam!
 Had I the years of a Methusalem,
 How in my charmer's praise I'd use all 'em!
 Oh! take me to thy arms, my beauty!
 I doat, adore the very shoe-tie!
 They wed—but, fancy grown less warming,
 Next morn, he thinks the bride less charming:
 He says, nay swears, my wife grows old in
 One single month; then falls to scolding,
 What, madam, gadding every day!
 Up to your room! there sitch, or pray!
 Such proves the marriage-state! but for all
 These truths, you'll wed, and scorn the moral.

ON THE DEATH OF MY DEAR FRIEND
MR. ELIJAH FENTON, 1730.

“ Calentem

“ Debita sparges lacrymâ favillam

“ Vatis amici.”

HOZ.

As when the King of Peace, and Lord of Love,
 Sends down some brighter angel from above,
 Pleas'd with the beauties of the heavenly guest,
 Awhile we view him in full glory dress;
 But he, impatient from his heaven to stay,
 Soon disappears, and wings his airy way;
 So didst thou vanish, eager to appear,
 And shine triumphant in thy native sphere.

Yet hadst thou all that virtue can bestow,
 All, the good practise, and the learned know;
 Such holy rapture, as not warms, but fires,
 While the soul seems retiring, or retires;
 Such transports as those saints in vision share,
 Who know not whether they are rapt through air, [prayer.]

Or bring down heaven to meet them in a
 Oh! early lost! yet steadfast to survey
 Envy, disease, and death, without dismay;
 Serene, the sting of * pain thy thoughts beguile,
 And make afflictions, objects of a smile.
 So the fam'd patriarch on his couch of stone,
 Enjoy'd bright visions from th' eternal throne.

Thus wean'd from earth, where pleasure scarce
 can please,

Thy woes but hasten'd thee to heav'n and peace:
 As angry winds, when loud the tempest roars,
 More swiftly speed the vessel to the shores.

Oh! may these lays a lasting lustre shed
 O'er thy dark urn, like lamps that grace the dead!
 Strong were thy thoughts, yet reason bore the
 sway;
 Humble, yet learn'd; though innocent yet gay;

* The poet.

So pure of heart, that thou might'st safely show
Thy inmost bosom to thy basest foe:
Careless of wealth, thy bliss a calm retreat,
Far from the insults of the scornful great;
Thence looking with disdain on proudest things,
Thou deem'st mean the pageantry of kings;
Who build their pride on trappings of a throne,
A painted ribband or a glittering stone,
Uselessly bright! 'Twas thine the soul to raise
To nobler objects, such as angels praise!
To live, to mortals' empty fame a foe;
And pity human joy, and human woe!
To view ev'n splendid vice with generous hate;
In life unblemish'd, and in death sedate!
Then conscience, shining with a lenient ray,
Dawn'd o'er the soul, and promis'd endless day.
So from the setting orb of Phœbus fly
Beams of calm light, and glitter to the sky.

Where now, oh! where shall I true friendship find

Among the treacherous race of base mankind?
Whom, whom consult in all th' uncertain ways
Of various life, sincere to blame, or praise!
O friend! O falling in thy strength of years!
Warm from the melting soul receive these tears!
O woods! O wilds! O every bowery shade!
So often vocal by his music made,
Now other sounds—far other sounds return,
And o'er his herse with all your echoes mourn!—
Yet dare we grieve that soon the paths he trod
To heaven, and left vain man for saints and God?

Thus in the theatre the scenes unfold
A thousand wonders glorious to behold;
And here, or there, as the machine extends,
A hero rises, or a god descends:
But soon the momentary pleasure flies,
Swift vanishes the god, or hero dies.

Where were ye, muses, by what fountain side,
What river sporting, when your favourite dy'd?
He knew by verse to chain the headlong floods,
Silence loud winds, or charm attentive woods;
Nor deign'd but to high * themes to tune the string,

To such as heaven might hear, and angels sing;
Unlike those bards, who uninform'd to play,
Grate on their jarring pipes a flashy lay:
Each line display'd united strength and ease,
Form'd like his manners to instruct and please.

So herbs of balmy excellence produce
A blooming flower and salutary juice:
And while each plant a smiling grace reveals,
Usefully gay! at once it charms, and heals.

Transcend ev'n after death, ye great, in show;
Lend pomp to ashes, and be vain in woe;
Hire substitutes to mourn with formal cries,
And bribe unwilling drops from venal eyes;
While here sincerity of grief appears,
Silence that speaks, and eloquence in tears!
While, tir'd of life, we but consent to live
To show the world how really we grieve!
As some fond sire, whose only son lies dead,
All lost to comfort makes the dust his bed,

? Mr. Fenton intended to write upon moral subjects.

Hangs o'er his urn, with frantic grief deplores,
And bathes his clay-cold cheek with copious
flowers;

Such heart-felt pangs on thy sad bier attend;
Companion! brother! all in one—my friend!
Unless the soul a wound eternal bears,
Sighs are but air; but common water, tears:
The proud, relentless, weep in state, and show
Not sorrow, but magnificence of woe.

Thus in the fountain, from the sculptor's hands,
With imitated life, an image stands;
From rocky entrails, through his stony eyes,
The mimic tears in streams incessant rise:
Unconscious! while aloft the waters flow,
The gazers' wonder, and a public show.

Ye hallow'd domes, his frequent visits tell;
Thou court, where God himself delights to dwell;
Thou mystic table, and thou holy feast,
How often have ye seen the sacred guest!
How oft his soul with heavenly manna fed!
His faith enliven'd, while his sin lay dead!
While listening angels heard such raptures rise,
As, when they hymn th' Almighty, charm the skies!

But where, now where, without the body's aid,
New to the heavens, subsists thy gentle shade?
Glides it beyond our gross imperfect sky,
Pleas'd high o'er stars, from world to world, to fly!
And fearless marks the comet's dreadful blaze,
While monarchs quake, and trembling nations
gaze!

Or holds deep converse with the mighty dead,
Champions of virtue, who for virtue bled?
Or joins in concert with angelic choirs,
Where hymning seraphs sound their golden lyres,
Where raptur'd saints unfading crowns inwreath,
Triumphant o'er the world, o'er sin, and death?
O! may the thought his friend's devotion raise!
O! may he imitate, as well as praise!
Awake, my heavy soul! and upward fly,
Speak to the saint, and meet him in the sky,
And ask the certain way to rise as high.

TO THOMAS MARRIOT, ESQ.

I PREFIX your name to the following poem, as a monument of the long and sincere friendship I have borne you: I am sensible you are too good a judge of poetry to approve it; however, it will be a testimony of my respect: You conferred obligations upon me very early in life, almost as soon as I was capable of receiving them: May these verses on death long survive my own! and remain a memorial of our friendship and my gratitude, when I am no more.

WILLIAM BROOME,

A POEM ON DEATH.

Τὴς οὐδεν εἰ τὸ ζῆν μὲν ἐστὶ καρθαρὴν,
Τὸ καρθαρὴν δὲ ζῆν; EURIP.

Oh! for Elijah's car, to wing my way
O'er the dark gulf of death to endless day!
A thousand ways, alas! frail mortals lead
To her dire den, and dreadful all to tread.

See! in the horrors of yon house of woes,
Troops of all maladies the fiend enclose!
High on a trophy rais'd of human bones,
Swords, spears, and arrows, and sepulchral stones,
In horrid state she reigns! attendant ills
Besiege her throne, and when she frowns she kills:
Through the thick gloom the torch red-gleaming
burns.

O'er shrowds, and sable palls, and mouldering urns;
While flowing stoles, black plumes, and scutcheons
spread

An idle pomp around the silent dead:
Unaw'd by power, in common heap she flings
The scrips of beggars, and the crowns of kings:
Here gales of sighs, instead of breezes, blow,
And streams of tears for ever murmuring flow:
The mournful yew with solemn horror waves
His baleful branches, saddening even the graves:
Around all birds obscene loud-screaming fly,
Clang their black wings, and shriek along the sky:
The ground perverse, though bare and barren, breeds

All poisons, foes to life, and noxious weeds;
But, blasted frequent by th' unwholesome sky,
Dead fall the birds, the very poisons die.

Full in the entrance of the dreadful doors,
Old-age, half vanish'd to a ghost, deplores:
Propp'd on his crutch, he drags with many a groan
The load of life, yet dreads to lay it down.

There, downward driving an unnumber'd band,
Intemperance and disease walk hand in hand:
These, torment, whirling with remorseless sway
A scourge of iron, lashes on the way.

There frantic anger, prone to wild extremes,
Grasps an ensanguin'd sword, and heaven blas-phemes.

There heart-sick agony distorted stands,
Writhes his convulsive limbs, and wrings his hands.
There sorrow droops his ever-pensive head,
And care still tosses on his iron bed:

Or, musing, fastens on the ground his eye
With folded arms; with every breath a sigh.
Hydrops unwieldy wallows in a flood;
And murder rages, red with human blood,
With fever, famine, and afflictive pain,
Plague, pestilence, and war, a dismal train!
These and a thousand more the fiend surround,
Shrieks pierce the air, and groans to groans resound.
O heavens! is this the passage to the skies
That man must tread, when man your favourite
dies?

Oh! for Elijah's car to wing my way
O'er the dark gulf of death to endless day!

Confounded at the sight my spirits fled.
My eyes rain'd tears, my very heart was dead!
I wail'd the lot of man, that all would shun,
And all must bear that breathe beneath the sun.

When lo! an heavenly form, divinely fair,
Shoots from the starry vault through fields of air;
And swifter than on wings of lightning driven,
At once seems here and there, in earth and heaven!
A dazzling brightness in resplendent streams
Flows from his locks inwreath'd with sunny beams:
His roseate cheeks the bloom of heaven display,
And from his eyes dart glories more than day:

A robe of light condens'd around him shone,
And his loins glitter'd with a starry zone:
And while the listening winds lay hush'd to hear,
Thus spoke the vision, amiably severe!

Vain man! wouldst thou escape the common lot,
To live, to suffer, die, and be forgot?
Look back on ancient times, primæval years,
All, all are past! a mighty void appears!
Heroes and kings, those gods of earth, whose fame
Aw'd half the nations, now are but a name!
The great in arts or arms, the wise, the just,
Mix with the meanest in congenial dust!
Ev'n saints and prophets the same paths have trod,
Ambassadors of heaven, and friends of God!
And thou, wouldst thou the general sentence fly?
Moses is dead! thy Saviour deign'd to die!
Mortal, in all thy acts regard thy end;
Live well the time thou liv'st, and death's thy
friend:

Then curb each rebel thought against the sky,
And die resign'd, O man ordain'd to die!

He added not, but spread his wings in flight,
And vanish'd instant in a blaze of light.

Abash'd, ashamed, I cry, Eternal Power,
I yield! I wait resign'd th' appointed hour!
Man, foolish man, no more thy soul deceive!
To die, is but the surest way to live:
When age we ask, we ask it in our wrong,
And pray our time of suffering may be long;
The nauseous draught, and dregs of life to drain,
And feel infirmity, and length of pain!
What art thou, life, that we should court thy stay?
A breath, one single gasp must puff away!
A short-liv'd flower, that with the day must fade!
A fleeting vapour, and an empty shade!
A stream that silently, but swiftly glides
To meet eternity's immeasur'd tides!
A being, lost alike by pain or joy!
A fly can kill it, or a worm destroy!
Impair'd by labour, and by ease undone,
Commenc'd in tears, and ended in a groan!
Ev'n while I write, the transient now is past,
And death more near this sentence than the last!
As some weak isthmus seas from seas divides,
Beat by rude waves, and sapp'd by rushing tides,
Torn from its base, no more their fury bears,
At once they close, at once it disappears:
Such, such is life! the mark of misery plac'd
Between two worlds, the future and the past;
To time, to sickness, and to death a prey,
It sinks, the frail possession of a day!

As some fond boy in sport along the shore
Builds from the sands a fabric of an hour;
Proud of his spacious walls and stately rooms,
He styles the mimic cells imperial domes;
The little monarch swells with fancy'd sway,
Till some wind rising puffs the dome away:
So the poor reptile, man! an heir of woe,
The lord of earth and ocean, swells in show;
He plants, he builds, aloft the walls arise!
The noble plan he finishes, and——dies.
Swept from the earth, he shares the common fate;
His sole distinction now, to rot in state!
Thus busy to no end till out of breath,
Tir'd we lie down, and close up all in death.

Then blest the man whom gracious Heaven has led
Through life's blind mazes to th' immortal dead!
Who safely landed on the blissful shore,
Nor human folly feels, nor frailty more!
O death! thou cure of all our idle strife!
End of the gay, or serious farce of life!
Wish of the just, and refuge of th' oppressed!
Where poverty, and where ev'n kings find rest!
Safe from the frowns of power! calm thoughtful hate!

And the rude insults of the scornful great!
The grave is sacred! wrath and malice dread
To violate its peace, and wrong the dead:
But life, thy name is woe! to death we fly
To grow immortal—into life we die!
Then wisely heaven in silence has confin'd
The happier dead, lest none should stay behind.
What though the path be dark that must be trod,
Though man be blotted from the works of God,
Though the four winds his scatter'd atoms bear
To earth's extremes through all th' expanse of air;
Yet bursting glorious from the silent clay,
He mounts triumphant to eternal day.

So when the sun rolls down th' ethereal plain,
Exinct his splendours in the whelming main,
A transient night earth, air, and heaven, invades,
Eclips'd in horrors of surrounding shades;
But soon emerging with a fresher ray,
He starts exultant, and renews the day.

COURAGE IN LOVE.

My eyes with floods of tears o'erflow,
My bosom heaves with constant woe;
Those eyes, which thy unkindness swells;
That bosom, where thy image dwells!

How could I hope so weak a flame
Could ever warm that matchless dame,
When none Elysium must behold,
Without a radiant bough of gold?
'Tis hers in spheres to shine;
At distance to admire is mine:
Doom'd like th' enamour'd * youth to groan
For a new goddess form'd of stone.

While thus I spoke, love's gentle power
Descended from th' ethereal bower;
A quiver at his shoulder hung,
A shaft he grasp'd, and bow unstrung.
All nature own'd the genial god,
And the spring flourish'd where he trod:
My heart no stranger to the guest,
Flutter'd, and labour'd in my breast;
When with a smile that kindles joy
Ev'n in the gods, began the boy:

How vain these tears! is man decreed,
By being abject, to succeed?
Hop'st thou by meagre looks to move?
Are women frighten'd into love?
He most prevails who nobly dares;
In love an hero, as in wars:
Ev'n Venus may be known to yield,
But 'tis when Mars disputes the field:

Sent from a daring hand, my dart
Strikes deep into the fair-one's heart:
To winds and waves thy cares bequeath,
A sigh is but a waste of breath.
What though gay youth, and every grace
That beauty boasts, adorn her face;
Yet goddesses have deign'd to wed,
And take a mortal to their bed:
And heaven, when gifts of incense rise,
Accepts it, though it cloud their skies.

Mark! how this marygold conceals
Her beauty, and her bosom veils;
How from the dull embrace she flies
Of Phœbus, when his beams arise:
But when his glory he displays,
And darts around his fiercer rays,
Her charms she opens, and receives
The vigorous god into her leaves.

THE COMPLAINT.

CAELIA TO DAMON.

I who was once the glory of the plain,
The fairest virgin of the virgin train,
Am now (by thee, O faithless man betray'd)
A fall'n, a lost, a miserable maid.
Ye winds, that witness to my deep despair,
Receive my sighs, and waft them through the air,
And gently breathe them to my Damon's ear!
Curst, ever curst be that unlucky day,
When trembling, sighing, at my feet he lay,
I trembled, sigh'd, and look'd my heart away!
Why was he form'd, ye powers, his sex's pride,
Too false to love, too fair to be deny'd?
Ye heedless virgins, gaze not on his eyes;
Lovely they are, but she that gazes dies!
Oh! fly his voice, be deaf to all he says;
Charms has his voice, but charming it betrays!
At every word, each motion of his eye,
A thousand loves are born, a thousand lovers die.

Say, gentle youths, ye blest Arcadian swains,
Inhabitants of these delightful plains,
Say, by what fountain, in what rosy bower,
Reclines my charmer in the noon-tide hour!
To you, dear fugitive, where'er you stray,
Wild with despair, impatient of delay,
Swift on the wings of eager love I fly,
Or send my soul still swifter in a sigh!
I'd then inform you of your Cælia's cares,
And try the eloquence of female tears;
Fearless I'd pass where desolation reigns,
Tread the wild waste, or burning Libyan plains:
Or where the north his furious pinions tries,
And howling hurricanes embroil the skies!
Should all the monsters in Getulia bred
Oppose the passage of a tender maid;
Dauntless, if Damon calls, his Cælia speeds
Through all the monsters that Getulia breeds:
Bold was Bonduca, and her arrows flew
Swift and unerring from the twanging yew:
By love inspir'd, I'll teach the shaft to fly;
For thee I'd conquer, or at least would die!
If o'er the dreary Caucasus you go,
Or mountains crown'd with everlasting snow,

* Polydorus, who pined to death for the love of a beautiful statue.

Where through the freezing skies in storms it pours,
 And brightens the dull air with shining showers,
 Ev'n there with you I could securely rest,
 And dare all cold, but in my Damon's breast;
 Or should you dwell beneath the sultry ray,
 Where rising Phœbus ushers in the day,
 There, there I dwell! Thou sun, exert thy fires;
 Love, mighty love, a fiercer flame inspires:
 Or if, a pilgrim, you would pay your vows
 Where Jordan's streams in soft meanders flows;
 I'll be a pilgrim, and my vows I'll pay
 Where Jordan's streams in soft meanders play.
 Joy of my soul! my every wish in one!
 Why must I love, when loving I'm undone?
 Sweet are the whispers of the waving trees,
 And murmuring waters, curling to the breeze;
 Sweet are soft slumbers in the shady bowers
 When glowing suns infest the sultry hours:
 But not the whispers of the waving trees,
 Nor murmuring waters, curling to the breeze;
 Not sweet soft slumbers in the shady bowers,
 When thou art absent whom my soul adores!
 Come, let us seek some flowery, fragrant bed!
 Come, on thy bosom rest my love-sick head!
 Come, drive thy flocks beneath the shady hills,
 Or softly slumber by the murmuring rills!
 Ah no! he flies! that dear enchanting he!
 Whose beauty steals my very self from me!

Yet wert thou wont the garland to prepare,
 To crown with fragrant wreathes thy Cælia's hair:
 When to the lyre she tun'd the vocal lays,
 Thy tongue would flatter, and thine eyes speak
 praise:

And when smooth-gliding in the dance she mov'd,
 Ask thy false bosom if it never lov'd?
 And still her eye some little lustre bears,
 If swains speak truth!—though dim'd for thee with tears!

But fade each grace! since he no longer sees
 Those charms, for whom alone I wish to please!

But whence these sudden, sad presaging fears,
 These rising sighs, and whence these flowing tears?
 Ah! lest the trumpet's terrible alarms
 Have drawn the lover from his Cælia's charms,
 To try the doubtful field, and shine in azure
 arms!

Ah! canst thou bear the labours of the war,
 Bend the tough bough, or dart the pointed spear?
 Desist, fond youth! let others glory gain,
 Seek empty honour o'er the surgy main,
 Or sheath'd in horrid arms rush dreadful to the plain!

Thee, shepherd, thee the pleasurable woods,
 The painted meadows, and the crystal floods,
 Claim and invite to bless their sweet abodes.
 There shady bowers and sylvan scenes arise,
 There fountains murmur, and the spring supplies
 Flowers to delight the smell, or charm the eyes:
 But mourn, ye sylvan scenes and shady bowers;
 Weep, all ye fountains; languish, all ye flowers!
 If in a desert Damon but appear,
 To Cælia's eyes a desert is more fair
 Than all your charms, when Damon is not there!
 Gods! what soft words, what sweet delusive wiles
 He boasts! and, oh! those dear undoing smiles!

Pleas'd with our ruin, to his arms we run:
 To be undone by him who would not be undone!
 Alas! I rave! ye swelling torrents, roll
 Your watery tribute o'er my love-sick soul!
 To cool my heart, your waves, ye oceans, bear!
 Oh! vain are all your waves, for love is there!

But ah! what sudden thought to frenzy moves
 My tortur'd soul?—perhaps, my Damon loves!
 Some fatal beauty, yielding all her charms,
 Detains the lovely traitor from my arms!
 Blast her, ye skies! let instant vengeance seize
 Those guilty charms, whose crime it is to please!
 Damon is mine!—fond maid, thy fears subdue!
 Am I not jealous? and my charmer true?
 O, heaven, from jealousy my bosom save!
 Cruel as death, insatiate as the grave!

Ye powers! of all the ills that ever curst
 Our sex, sure man, dissembling man, is worst!
 Like forward boys, awhile in wanton play,
 He sports with hearts, then throws the toys away:
 With specious wiles weak woman he assails;
 He swears, weeps, smiles, he flatters, and prevails:
 Then, in the moment when the maid believes,
 The perjur'd traitor triumphs, scorns, and leaves,
 How oft my Damon swore, th' all-seeing sun
 Should change his course, and rivers backward run,
 Ere his fond heart should range, or faithless prove
 To the bright object of his stedfast love!

O! instant change thy course, all-seeing sun!
 Damon is false! ye rivers, backward run!

But die, O wretched Cælia, die! in vain
 Thus to the fields and floods you breathe your pain!
 The tear is fruitless, and the tender sigh,
 And life a load!—forsaken Cælia, die!
 Fly swifter, time! O speed the joyful hour!
 Receive me, grave!—then I shall love no more!
 Ah! wretched maid, so sad a cure to prove!
 Ah! wretched maid, to fly to death from love!
 Yet oh! when this poor frame no more shall live,
 Be happy, Damon! may not Damon grieve!
 Ah me! I'm vain! my death can not appear
 Worth the vast price of but a single tear.

Forlorn, abandon'd, to the rocks I go;
 But they have learn'd new cruelties of you!
 Alone, relenting Echo with me mourns,
 And faint with grief she scarce my sighs returns!
 Then, sighs, adieu! ye nobler passions, rise!
 Be wise, fond maid!—but who in love is wise?
 I rage, I rail, th' extremes of anger prove,
 Nay, almost hate—then love thee beyond love!
 Pity, kind heaven, and right an injur'd maid!
 Yet, oh! yet, spare the dear deceiver's head!
 If from the sultry suns at noon-tide hours
 He seeks the covert of the breezy bowers,
 Awake, O South, and where my charmer lies,
 Bid roses bloom, and beds of fragrance rise!
 Gently, O gently round in whispers fly,
 Sigh to his sighs, and fan the glowing sky!
 If o'er the waves he cuts the liquid way,
 Be still, ye waves, or round his vessel play!
 And you, ye winds, confine each ruder breath,
 Lie hush'd in silence, and be calm as death!
 But if he stay detain'd by adverse gales,
 My sighs shall drive the ship, and fill the flagging sails.

TRANSLATIONS

FROM

HESIOD AND APOLLONIUS RHODIUS.

" — Vos exemplaria Græca

" Nocturnâ versate manu, versate diurnâ." HOR.

THE

BATTLE OF THE GODS AND TITANS.

From the Theogony of Hesiod; with a Description of Tartarus, &c.

— μάχην δ' ἀνέγχετον ἑγυγαν

πάντες, &c. Ody. 666.

Now sounds the vault of heaven with loud alarms,
And gods by gods embattling rush to arms:
Here stalk the Titans of portentous size,
Burst from their dungeons, and assault the skies;
And there, unchain'd from Erebus and night,
Auxiliar * giants aid the gods in fight:
An hundred arms each tower-like warrior rears,
And stares from fifty heads amid the stars;
The dreadful brotherhood stern-frowning stands,
And hurls an hundred rocks from hundred hands;
The Titans rush'd with fury uncontroll'd;
Gods sunk on gods, o'er giant giant roll'd;
Then roar'd the ocean with a dreadful sound,
Heaven shook with all its thrones, and groan'd the ground,

Trembled th' eternal poles at every stroke,
And frighted hell from its foundations shook:
Noise, horrid noise, th' aerial region fills,
Rocks dash on rocks, and hills encounter hills;
Through earth, air, heaven, tumultuous clamours rise,

And shouts of battle thunder in the skies.
Then Jove omnipotent display'd the god,
And all Olympus trembled as he trod:
He grasps ten thousand thunders in his hand,
Bares his red arm, and wields the forked brand;
Then aims the bolts, and bids his lightnings play;
They flash, and tend through heaven their flaming way:

Redoubling blow on blow, in wrath he moves;
The sing'd earth groans, and burns with all her groves;
The floods, the billows, boiling hiss with fires,
And bickering flame, and smouldering smoke aspires:

A night of clouds blots out the golden day;
Full in their eyes the writhen lightnings play:

* Ægeon, Cottus, Gyges.

Ev'n chaos burns: again earth groans, heaven roars,
As tumbling downward with its shining towers;
Or burst this earth, torn from her central place,
With dire disruption from her deepest base:
Nor slept the wind: the wind new horror forms,
Clouds dash on clouds before th' outrageous storms,
While, tearing up the sands, in drifts they rise,
And half the deserts mount th' encumber'd skies:
At once the tempest bellows, lightnings fly,
The thunders roar, and clouds involve the sky:
Stupendous were the deeds of heavenly might;
What less, when gods conflicting cope in fight?
Now heaven its foes with horrid inroad gores,
And flow and four recede the giant powers:
Here stalks Ægeon, here fierce Gyges moves,
There Cottus tends up hills with all their groves;
These hurl'd at once against the Titan bands
Three hundred mountains from three hundred hands:

And overshadowing, overwhelming bound
With chains infrangible beneath the ground;
Below this earth, far as earth's confines lie,
Through space unmeasur'd, from the starry sky;
Nine days an anvil of an enormous weight,
Down rushing headlong from th' aerial height,
Scarce reaches earth; thence tost in giddy rounds
Scarce reaches in nine days th' infernal bounds:
A wall of iron of stupendous height [night:
Guards the dire dungeons black with threefold
High o'er the horrors of th' eternal shade
The steadfast base of earth and seas is laid;
There in coercive durance Jove detains
The groaning Titans in afflictive chains.
A seat of woe! remote from cheerful day,
Through gulfs impassable, a boundless way.

Above these realms, a brazen structure stands
With brazen portals, fram'd by Neptune's hands;
Through chaos to the ocean's base it swells;
There stern Ægeon with his giants dwells;
Fierce guards of Jove! from hence the fountains rise

That wash the earth, or wander through the skies;
That groaning murmur through the realm of woes,
Or feed the channels where the ocean flows;
Collected horrors throng the dire abodes,
Horrid and fell! detested ev'n by gods!
Enormous gulf! immense the bounds appear,
Wasteful and void, the journey of a year:

Where beating storms, as in wild whirls they fight,
Toss the pale wanderer, and retoss through night:
The powers immortal with affright survey
The hideous chasm, and seal it up from day.

Hence through the vault of heaven huge Atlas
rears

His giant limbs, and props the golden spheres:
Here sable night, and here the beamy day,
Lodge and dislodge, alternate in their sway.
A brazen port the varying powers divides:
When day forth issues, here the night resides;
And when night veils the skies, obsequious day,
Re-entering, plunges from the starry way.
She from her lamp, with beaming radiance bright,
Pours o'er th' expanded earth a flood of light:
But night, by sleep attended, rides in shades,
Brother of death, and all that breathes invades:
From *her foul womb they sprung, resistless powers,
Nurs'd in the horrors of Tartarean bowers,
Remote from day, when with her flaming wheels
She mounts the skies, or paints the western hills:
With downy footsteps sleep in silence glides
O'er the wide earth, and o'er the spacious tides;
The friend of life! Death unrelenting bears
An iron heart, and laughs at human cares;
She makes the mouldering race of man her prey,
And ev'n th' immortal powers detest her sway.

Thus fell the † Titans from the realms above,
Beneath the thunders of Almighty Jove;
Then earth impregnate felt maternal woes,
And shook through all her frame with teeming
throes:

Hence rose Typhœus, a gigantic birth,
A monster sprung from Tartarus and earth,
A match for gods in might! on high he spreads
From his huge trunk an hundred dragons heads,
And from an hundred mouths in vengeance flings,
Envenom'd foam, and darts an hundred stings;
Horror, terrific, frowns from every brow,
And like a furnace his red eye-balls glow;
Fires dart from every crest; and, as he turns,
Keen splendours flash, and all the giant burns:
Whene'er he speaks, in echoing thunders rise
An hundred voices, and affright the skies,
Unutterably fierce! the bright abodes
Frequent they shake, and terrify the gods.
Now bellowing like a savage bull, they roar,
Or angry lions in the midnight hour;
Now yells like furious whelps, or hiss like snakes;
The rocks rebound, and every mountain shakes:
He hurl'd defiance 'gainst th' immortal powers,
And heaven had seiz'd with all its shining towers,
But, at the voice of Jove, from pole to pole
Red lightnings flash, and raging thunders roll,
Rattling o'er all th' expansion of the skies,
Bolt after bolt o'er earth and ocean flies.
Stern frowns the god amidst the lightnings blaze,
Olympus shakes from his eternal base;
Trembles the earth: fierce flames involves the poles,
Devours the ground, and o'er the billows rolls:
Fires from Typhœus flash: with dreadful sound
Storms rattle, thunder rolls, and groans the ground;

* Of night.

Above, below, the conflagration roars,
Ev'n the seas kindled burn through all their shores;
Deluge of fire! Earth rocks her tottering coasts,
And gloomy Pluto shakes with all his ghosts;
Ev'n the pale Titans, chain'd on burning floors,
Start at the din that rends th' infernal shores:
Then, in full wrath, Jove all the god applies,
And all his thunders burst at once the skies;
And rushing gloomy from th' Olympian brow,
He blasts the giant with th' almighty blow;
The giant tumbling sinks beneath the wound,
And with enormous ruin rocks the ground:
Nor yet the lightnings of th' Almighty stay,
Through the sing'd earth they burst their burning
way;

Earth kindling inward, melts in all her caves,
And hissing floats with fierce metallic waves:
As iron fusile from the furnace flows,
Or molten ore with keen effulgence glows,
When the dire bolts of Jove stern Vulcan frames,
In burning channels roll the liquid flames;
Thus melted earth, and Jove, from realms on high,
Plung'd the huge giant to the nether sky.

Then from Typhœus sprung the winds that bear
Storms on their wings, and thunder in the air:
But from the gods descend of milder kind,
The east, the west, the south, and Boreal wind;
These in soft whispers breathe a friendly breeze,
Play through the groves, or sport upon the seas;
They fan the sultry air with cooling gales,
And waft from realm to realm the flying sails:
The rest in storms of sounding whirlwinds fly,
Toss the wild waves, and battle in the sky;
Fatal to man! at once all ocean roars,
And scatter'd navies bulge on distant shores.
Then thundering o'er the earth they rend their
way,

Grass, herb, and flower, beneath their rage decay;
While towers and domes, vain boasts of human trust,
Torn from their inmost base, are whelm'd in dust.

Thus heaven asserted its eternal reign
O'er the proud giants, and Titanic train;
And now in peace the gods their Jove obey,
And all the thrones of heaven adore his sway.

THE LOVE OF JASON AND MEDEA.

From the Third Book, Ver. 743. of Apollonius Rhodius.

Νὺ μὲν ἔπειτ' ἐπὶ γαίαν ἄγαν κνίσας, &c.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE translator has taken the liberty, in the following version of the Argonautics of Apollonius, as well as in the story of Talus, to omit whatever has not an immediate relation to the subject; yet hopes that a due connection is not wanting; and that the reader will not be displeased with these short sketches from a poet who is affirmed to be every where sublime, by no less a critic than Longinus; and from whom many verses are borrowed by so great a poet as Virgil.

Now rising shades a solemn gloom display,
 O'er the wide earth, and o'er th' ethereal way:
 All night the sailor marks the northern team,
 And golden circlet of Orion's beam:
 A deep repose the weary wanderer shares,
 And the faint watchman sleeps away his cares;
 Ev'n the fond mother, while all breathless lies
 Her child of love, in slumber seals her eyes;
 No sound of village-dog, no noise invades
 The death-like silence of the midnight shades;
 Alone Medea wakes: To love a prey,
 Restless she rolls, and groans the night away:
 Now the fire-breathing bulls command her cares;
 She thinks on Jason, and for Jason fears:
 In sad review, on horrors horrors rise;
 Quick beats her heart, from thought to thought
 she flies;

As from replenish'd urns, with dubious ray,
 The sun beams dancing from the surface play,
 Now here, now there, the trembling radiance falls
 Alternate flashing round th' illumin'd walls;
 Thus fluttering bounds the trembling virgin's blood,
 And from her shining eyes descends a flood:
 Now raving with resistless flames she glows,
 Now sick with love she melts with softer woes:
 The tyrant god, of every thought possess'd,
 Beats in each pulse, and stings and racks her breast:
 Now she resolves the magic to betray
 To tame the bulls, now yield him up a prey:
 Again, the drugs disdaining to supply,
 She lothes the light, and meditates to die:
 Anon, repelling with a brave disdain
 The coward thought, she nourishes the pain:
 Thus tost, retost with furious storms of cares,
 On the cold ground she rolls, and thus with tears:

Ah me! where'er I turn, before my eyes
 A dreadful view, on sorrows sorrows rise!
 Tost in a giddy whirl of strong desire,
 I glow, I burn, yet blest the pleasing fire.
 O had this spirit from its prison fled,
 By Dian sent to wander with the dead,
 Ere the proud Grecians view'd the Colchian skies;
 Ere Jason, lovely Jason, met those eyes!
 Hell gave the shining mischief to our coast,
 Medea saw him, and Medea lost—
 But why these sorrows? if the powers on high
 His death decree, die, wretched Jason, die!
 Shall I, elude my fire? my art betray?
 Ah me! what words shall purge the guilt away!
 But could I yield—O whither must I run
 To find the man—whom virtue bids me shun?
 Shall I, all lost to shame, to Jason fly?
 And yet I must—If Jason bleeds, I die!
 Then, shame, farewell! Adieu for ever, fame!
 Hail, black disgrace! be fam'd for guilt my name!
 Live! Jason, live! enjoy the vital air!
 Live through my aid! and fly where winds can bear!

But when he flies, ye poisons, lend your powers,
 That day, Medea treads th' infernal shores!
 Then, wretched maid, thy lot is endless shame,
 Then the proud dames of Colchos blast thy name:
 I hear them cry—"The false Medea's dead,
 "Through guilty passions for a stranger's bed;

"Medea, careless of her virgin fame,
 "Prefer'd a stranger to a father's name!"
 O may I rather yield this vital breath,
 Than bear that base dishonour, worse than death!
 Thus wail'd the fair, and seiz'd with horrid joy
 Drugs foes to life, and potent to destroy;
 A magazine of death! again she pours
 From swollen eye-balls tears in shining showers;
 With grief insatiate, and with trembling hands,
 All comfortless the cask of death expands:
 A sudden fear her labouring soul invades,
 Struck with the horrors of th' infernal shades:
 She stands deep musing with a faded brow,
 Absorb'd in thought, a monument of woe!
 While all the comforts that on life attend,
 The cheerful converse, and the faithful friend,
 By thought deep-imag'd on her bosom play,
 Endearing life, and charm despair away:
 Th' all-cheering suns with sweeter light arise,
 And every object brightens to her eyes:
 Then from her hand the baneful drugs she throws,
 Consents to live, recover'd from her woes;
 Resolv'd the magic virtue to betray,
 She waits the dawn, and calls the lazy day:
 Time seems to stand, or backward drive his wheels:
 The hours she chides, and eyes the eastern hills:
 At length the dawn with orient beams appears,
 The shades disperse, and man awakes to cares.
 Studious to please, her graceful length of hair,
 With art she binds, that wanton'd with the air;
 From her soft cheeks she wipes the tear away,
 And bids keen lightnings from her eyes to play;
 From limb to limb refreshing unguents pours,
 Unguents, that breathe of heaven, in copious
 showers:

Her robe she next assumes; bright clasps of gold
 Close to the lessening waist the robe infold;
 Down from her swelling loins, the rest unbound
 Floats in rich waves redundant o'er the ground:
 Last with a shining veil her cheeks she shades,
 Then swimming smooth along magnificently treads.

Thus forward moves the fairest of her kind,
 Blind to the future, to the present blind:
 Twelve maids, attendants on her virgin bower,
 Alike unconscious of the bridal hour,
 Join to the car the mules: dire rites to pay,
 To Hecate's black fane she bends her way;
 A juice she bears, whose magic virtue tames
 (Through fell Persephone) the rage of flames;
 It gives the hero, strong in matchless might,
 To stand secure of harms in mortal fight;
 It mocks the sword: the sword, without a wound,
 Leaps as from marble, shiver'd to the ground:
 She mounts the car*; nor rode the nymph alone;
 On either side two lovely damsels shone:
 Her hand with skill th' embroider'd rein controuls;
 Back fly the streets, as swift the chariot rolls.
 Along the wheel-worn road they hold their way,
 The domes retreat, the sinking towers decay:
 Bare to the knee succinct a damsel train
 Behind attends, and glitters tow'rd the plain.
 As when her limbs divine Diana laves
 In fair Parthenius, or th' Amnesian waves,

Sublime in royal state the bounding roes
 Whirl her bright car along the mountain brows;
 Swift to her fane in pomp the goddess moves;
 The nymphs attend that haunt the shady groves,
 Th' Amnesian fount, or silver streaming rills;
 Nymphs of the vales, or Oreads of the hills!
 The fawning beasts before the goddess play,
 Or, trembling, savage adoration pay:
 Thus on her car sublime the nymph appears,
 The crowd falls back, and as she moves reverts;
 Swift to the fane aloft her course she bends;
 The fane she reaches, and to earth descends:
 Then to her train—Ah me! I fear we stray,
 Missed by folly to this lonely way!
 Alas! should Jason with his Greeks appear,
 Where should we fly? I fear, alas, I fear!
 No more the Colchian youths, and virgin train,
 Haunt the cool shade, or tread in dance the plain:
 But since alone;—with sports beguile the hours,
 Come chaunt the song, or pluck the blooming
 flowers;
 Pluck every sweet to deck your virgin bowers!
 Then warbling soft*, she lifts her heavenly voice;
 But sick with mighty love, the song is noise;
 She hears from every note a discord rise,
 Till, pausing, on her tongue the music dies;
 She hates each object, every face offends;
 In every wish her soul to Jason sends;
 With sharpen'd eyes the distant lawn explores,
 To find the object whom her soul adores:
 At every whisper of the passing air
 She starts, she turns, and hopes her Jason there:
 Again she fondly looks, nor looks in vain;
 He comes, her Jason shines along the plain.
 As when, emerging from the watery way,
 Refulgent Sirius lifts his golden ray,
 He shines terrific! for his burning breath
 Taints the red air with fevers, plagues, and death;
 Such to the nymph approaching Jason shows,
 Bright author of unutterable woes;
 Before her eyes a swimming darkness spread,
 Her flush'd cheek glow'd, her very heart was
 dead;
 No more her knees their wonted office knew,
 Fix'd without motion as to earth she grew:
 Her train recedes; the meeting lovers gaze
 In silent wonder, and in still amaze:
 As two fair cedars on the mountain's brow,
 Pride of the groves! with roots adjoining grow;
 Erect and motionless the stately trees
 Awhile remain, while sleeps each fanning breeze,
 Till from th' Æolian caves a blast unbound
 Bends their proud tops, and bids their boughs re-
 found;
 Thus gazing they, till by the breath of love
 Strongly at length inspir'd, they speak, they move;
 With smiles the love-sick virgin he survey'd,
 And fondly thus address'd the blooming maid:
 Dismiss, my fair, my love, thy virgin fear;
 'Tis Jason speaks, no enemy is here!
 Man, haughty man, is of obdurate kind;
 But Jason bears no proud inhuman mind,
 By gentlest manners softest arts refin'd.

Whom wouldst thou fly? Stay, lovely virgin, stay!
 Speak every thought! far hence be fears away!
 Speak! and be truth in every accent found!
 Dread to deceive! we tread on* hallow'd ground.
 By the stern power who guards this sacred place,
 By the illustrious authors of thy race;
 By Jove, to whom the stranger's cause belongs,
 To whom the suppliant, and who feels the wrongs;
 O guard me, save me, in the needful hour!
 Without thy aid, thy Jason is no more;
 To thee a suppliant, in distress I bend,
 To thee a stranger, and who wants a friend!
 Then, when between us seas and mountains rise,
 Medea's name shall sound in distant skies;
 All Greece to thee shall owe her heroes fates,
 And bless Medea through her hundred states.
 The mother and the wife, who now in vain
 Roll their sad eyes fast-streaming o'er the main,
 Shall stay their tears; the mother, and the wife,
 Shall bless thee for a son's or husband's life!
 Fair Ariadne, sprung from Minos' bed,
 Sav'd the brave Theseus, and with Theseus fled,
 Forsook her father, and her native plain,
 And stemm'd the tumults of the surging main;
 Yet the stern sire relented, and forgave
 The maid, whose only crime it was to save:
 Ev'n the just gods forgave: and now on high
 A star she shines, and beautifies the sky:
 What blessings then shall righteous heaven decree

For all our heroes sav'd, and sav'd by thee!
 Heaven gave thee not, to kill, so soft an air,
 And cruelty sure never look'd so fair!

He ceas'd; but left so charming on her ear
 His voice, that listening still she seem'd to hear:
 Her eye to earth she bends with modest grace,
 And heaven in smiles is open'd in her face.
 A glance she steals; but rosy blushes spread
 O'er her fair cheek, and then she drops her head:
 A thousand words at once to speak she tries;
 In vain—but speaks a thousand with her eyes:
 Trembling, the shining casket she expands,
 Then gives the magic virtue to his hands;
 And had the power been granted to convey
 Her heart—had given her very heart away.

SIXTEEN ODES OF ANACREON.

ODE XV.—HAPPY LIFE.

THE wealth of Gyges I despise;
Gems are useless glittering toys.
Gold I leave, and such vain things,
To the low aim and pride of kings.
Let my hair with unguents flow;
With rosy garlands crown my brow!
The present moment I enjoy,
Doom'd in the next, perhaps, to die!
Then, while the hour serenely shines,
Toss the gay die, and quaff thy wines:
But ever, in the genial hour,
To Bacchus the libation pour,
Lest death in wrath approach, and cry,
Man—taste no more the cup of joy.

ODE XVI.—THE POWER OF BEAUTY.

SOME sing of Thebes, and some destroy
In lofty numbers haughty Troy.
VOL. VIII.

I mourn, alas! in plaintive strains,
My own captivity and chains!
No navy, rang'd in proud array,
No foot, no horseman, arm'd to slay,
My peace alarm! Far other foes,
Far other hosts, create my woes:
Strange, dangerous hosts, that ambush'd lie
In every bright love darting eye!
Such as destroy, when beauty arms
To conquer, dreadful in its charms!

ODE XX.—TO HIS MISTRESS.

THE gods o'er mortals prove their sway,
And steal them from themselves away:
Transform'd by their almighty hands,
Sad Niobe an image stands;
And Philomel, up-borne on wings
Through air, her mournful story sings.

Would heaven, indulgent to my vow,
The happy change I wish, allow;
The envy'd mirror I would be,
That thou might'st always gaze on me;
And could my naked heart appear,
Thou'dst see thyself—for thou art there
O! were I made thy folding vest,
That thou might'st clasp me to thy breast!
Or turn'd into a fount, to lave
Thy naked beauties in my wave!
Thy bosom-cincture I would grow,
To warm those little hills of snow;
Thy ointment, in rich fragrant streams
To wander o'er thy beauteous limbs;
Thy chain of shining pearl—to deck,
And close embrace thy graceful neck:
A very scandal I would be
To tread on—if trod on by thee!

ODE XXIV.—IMITATED.

ALAS! alas! I see each day
Steals me from myself away;
And every step of life I tread,
I speed to mingle with the dead.
How many years are past, my friends,
I know, and there my knowledge ends:
How many years are still in store,
I neither can, nor would explore.
Then, since the hours incessant fly,
They all shall find me crown'd with joy.
To those, my cares I here bequeath,
Who meanly die for fear of death,
And daily with assiduous strife
Contrive to live, accurs'd with life.
Then, care, begone! I'd dance and play;
Hence, with thy serious face away!
I'll laugh; and whilst gay wine inflames,
I'll court the laughter-loving dames;
And study to resign my breath
In ecstacy, and smile in death.

ODE XXV.—IMITATED.

BRING me, O bring th' enlivening draught,
Lenient of grief, and anxious thought.
Then care retires, ashamed to show
His downcast eye, and faded brow.
I banish business to the great,
To all that curse, yet covet state.
Death hastes again: then who would run
To meet what most he strives to shun?
Or antedate the dreadful day
By cares, and aid the fiend to slay?
If tears could bribe his dreadful powers,
I'd weep, and bless the precious showers;
But let our lot be joy or woe,
Alike he speeds to strike the blow.
Then crown the bowl!—ye sorrows, fly
To kill some wretch who wants to die.

ODE XXXI.—THE PLEASING FRENZY.

Now bring, by all the powers divine,
Being me a bowl of rosy wine;

A mighty bowl of wine I crave:
When wine inspires, 'tis sweet to rave.
In frantic rage Alcmaeon drew
His falchion, and his * mother flew:
Orestes in a furious mood
Raving shed his † mother's blood.
Dreadful, sober mankind, they!—
None, harmless drunkard, none I slay:
The blood of grapes I only crave;
I quaff it, and 'tis sweet to rave.
Alcides, frantic, grasp'd his bow;
His quiver rattled, stor'd with woe:
Stern Ajax shook his glittering blade,
And broad his sevenfold shield display'd:
Dangerous madman! how he drew
His sword, and hosts in fancy flew!
I, peaceful I, no falchion wield;
I bend no bow, I poise no shield.
The flowery garland crowns my hairs,
My hand the powerful goblet bears;
The powerful goblet nobly brave,
I drain, and then 'tis sweet to rave.

ODE XXXVI.

TALK not to me of pedant rules;
I leave debates to learned fools,
Who solemnly in form advise;
At best, impertinently wise!
To me more pleasing precepts give,
And teach the science how to live;
To bury in the friendly draught
Sorrows that spring from too much thought;
To learn soft lessons from the fair,
How life may glide exempt from care.
Alas! I'm old! I see my head
With hoary locks by time o'erspread:
Then instant be the goblet brought,
To make me young—at least in thought.
Alas! incessant speeds the day
When I must mix with common clay;
When I must tread the dismal shore,
And dream of love and wine no more.

ODE XXXVI. THE SPRING.

SEE, winter's past! the seasons bring
Soft breezes with returning spring;
At whose approach the graces wear
Fresh honours in their flowing hair:
The raging seas forget to roar,
And, smiling, gently kiss the shore:
The sportive duck, in wanton play,
Now dives, now rises into day;
The cranes from freezing skies repair,
And sailing float to warmer air:
Th' enlivening suns in glory rise,
And gaily dance along the skies.
The clouds disperse; or if in showers
They fall, it is to wake the flowers:
See, verdure clothes the teeming earth!
The olive struggles into birth:
The swelling grapes adorn the vine,
And kindly promise future wine:

* Eryphile.

† Clytemnestra.

Blest juice! already I in thought
Quaff an imaginary draught.

ODE XLVIII. GAY LIFE.

GIVE me Homer's tuneful lyre,
Let the sound my breast inspire!
But with no troublesome delight
Of arms and heroes slain in fight:
Let it play no conquests here,
Or conquests only o'er the fair!

Boy, reach that volume—book divine;
The statutes of the god of wine!
He, legislator, statutes draws;
And I his judge enforce his laws;
And, faithful to the weighty trust,
Compel his vot'ries to be just:
Thus, round the bowl impartial flies,
Till to the sprightly dance we rise;
We frisk it with a lively bound,
Charm'd with the lyre's harmonious sound;
Then pour forth, with an heat divine,
Rapturous songs that breathe of wine.

ODE I. THE HAPPY EFFECTS OF WINE

SEE! see the jolly god appears;
His hand a mighty goblet bears:
With sparkling wine full-charg'd it flows;
The sovereign cure of human woes.

Wine gives a kind release from care,
And courage to subdue the fair;
Instructs the cheerful to advance
Harmonious in the sprightly dance:
Hail, goblet! rich with generous wines!
See! round the verge a vine-branch twines.
See! how the mimic clusters roll,
As ready to re-fill the bowl!

Wine keeps its happy patients free
From every painful malady;
Our best physician all the year.
Thus guarded, no disease we fear;
No troublesome disease of mind,
Until another year grows kind,
And loads again the fruitful vine,
And brings again our health—new wine.

ODE LII. GRAPES; OR THE VINTAGE.

Lo! the vintage now is done!
And black'ned with th' autumnal sun
The grapes gay youths and virgins bear;
The sweetest product of the year!
In vats the heavenly load they lay,
And swift the damsels trip away:
The youths alone the wine-press tread,
For wine's by skilful drunkards made:
Meantime the mirthful song they raise;
Lo! Bacchus, to thy praise!
And, eying the blest juice, in thought
Quaff an imaginary draught.

Gaily, through wine, the old advance,
And doubly tremble in the dance:
In fancy'd youth they chant and play,
Forgetful that their locks are gray.

Through wine, the youth completes his loves;
He haunts the silence of the groves:
Where, stretch'd beneath th' embowering shade,
He spies some love-inspiring maid:
On beds of rosy sweets she lies,
Inviting sleep to close her eyes:
Fast by her side his limbs he throws,
Her hand he presses—breathes his vow
And cries, my love, my soul comply
This instant, or, alas! I die.

In vain the youth persuasion tries!
In vain!—her tongue at least denies:
Then scorning death through dull despair,
He storms th' unwilling willing fair;
Blessing the grapes that could dispense
The happy, happy impudence.

ODE LIII. THE ROSE.

COME, lyrist, tune thy harp, and play
Responsive to my vocal lay:
Gently touch it, while I sing
The rose, the glory of the spring.

To heaven the rose in fragrance flies,
The sweetest incense of the skies.
Thee, joy of earth, when vernal hours
Pour forth a blooming waste of flowers,
The gaily-smiling graces wear
A trophy in their flowing hair.
Thee Venus queen of beauty loves,
And, crown'd with thee, more graceful moves.

In fabled song, and tuneful lays,
Their favourite rose the muses praise:
To pluck the rose, the virgin-train
With blood their pretty fingers stain,
Nor dread the pointed terrors round,
That threaten, and inflict a wound:
See! how they wave the charming toy,
Now kiss, now snuff the fragrant joy!

The rose the poets strive to praise,
And for it would exchange their bays;
O! ever to the sprightly feast
Admitted, welcome, pleasing guest!
But chiefly when the goblet flows,
And rosy wreaths adorn our brows!

Lovely smiling rose, how sweet
The object where thy beauties meet!
Aurora with a blushing ray,
And rosy fingers, spreads the day:
The graces more enchanting show
When rosy blushes paint their snow;
And every pleas'd beholder seeks
The rose in Cytheræa's cheeks.

When pain afflicts, or sickness grieves,
Its juice the drooping heart relieves;
And, after death, its odours shed
A pleasing fragrance o'er the dead;
And when its withering charms decay,
And sinking, fading, die away,
Triumphant o'er the rage of time,
It keeps the fragrance of its prime.

Come, lyrist, join to sing the birth
Of this sweet offspring of the earth!
When Venus from the ocean's bed
Rais'd o'er the waves her lovely head;

When warlike Pallas sprung from Jove,
Tremendous to the powers above;
To grace the world, the teeming earth
Gave the fragrant infant birth,
And 'This,' she cry'd, 'I this ordain
'My favourite, queen of flowers to reign!'

But first th' assembled gods debate
The future wonder to create:
Agreed at length, from heaven they threw
A drop of rich, nectareous dew;
A bramble-stem the drop receives,
And strait the rose adorns the leaves.

The gods to Bacchus gave the flower,
To grace him in the genial hour.

ODE LIV.—GROWN YOUNG.

When sprightly youths my eyes survey,
I too am young, and I am gay;
In dance my active body swims,
And sudden pinions lift my limbs.

Haste, crown, Cybæba, crown my brows
With garlands of the fragrant rose!
Hence, hoary age!—I now am strong,
And dance, a youth among the young.

Come then, my friends, the goblet drain!
Blest juice!—I feel thee in each vein!
See! how with active bounds I spring!
How strong, and yet how sweet, I sing!

How blest am I! who thus excell
In pleasing arts of trifling well!

ODE LV.—THE MARK.

The stately steed expressive bears
A mark imprinted on his hairs:
The turban that adorns the brows
Of Asia's sons, the Parthian shows:
And marks betray the lover's heart,
Deeply engrav'd by Cupid's dart:
I plainly read them in his eyes,
That look too foolish, or too wise.

ODE LVI.

Alas! the powers of life decay!
My hairs are fall'n, or chang'd to grey!
The smiling bloom, and youthful grace,
Is banish'd from my faded face!
Thus man beholds, with weeping eyes,
Himself half-dead before he dies.

For this, and for the grave, I fear,
And pour the never-ceasing tear!
A dreadful prospect strikes my eye;
I soon must sicken, soon must die.

For this the mournful groan I shed;
I dread—alas! the hour I dread!

What eye can stedfastly survey
Death and its dark tremendous way?
For soon as fate has clos'd our eyes,
Man dies—for ever, ever dies!
All pale, all senseless in the urn!
Never, ah! never to return.

ODE LXIV.—TO APOLLO.

Once more, not uninspir'd, the string
I waken, and spontaneous sing:
No Pythic laurel-wreath I claim,
That lifts ambition into fame:
My voice unbidden tunes the lay:
Some god impells, and I obey.
Listen, ye groves!—The muse prepares
A sacred song in Phrygian airs;
Such as the swan expiring sings,
Melodious by Cæster's springs,
While listening winds in silence hear,
And to the gods the music bear.

Celestial muse! attend, and bring
Thy aid, while I thy Phœbus sing:
To Phœbus and the muse belong
The laurel, lyre, and Delphic song.

Begin, begin the lofty strain!
How Phœbus lov'd, but lov'd in vain;
How Daphne fled his guilty flame,
And scorn'd a god that offer'd shame.
With glorious pride his vows she hears;
And heaven, indulgent to her prayers,
To laurel chang'd the nymph, and gave
Her foliage to reward the brave.

Ah! how, on wings of love convey'd,
He flew to clasp the panting maid!
Now, now o'ertakes!—but heaven deceives
His hope—he seizes only leaves.
Why fires my raptur'd breast? ah! why,
Ah! whither strives my soul to fly?
I feel the pleasing frenzy strong,
Impulsive to some nobler song:
Let, let the wanton fancy play;
But guide it, lest it devious stray.

But oh! in vain, my muse denies
Her aid, a slave to lovely eyes.
Suffice it to rehearse the pains
Of bleeding nymphs, and dying swains;
Nor dare to wield the shafts of love,
That wound the gods, and conquer Jove.

I yield! adieu the lofty strain!
I am Anacreon once again:
Again the melting song I play,
Attemper'd to the vocal lay:
See! see! how with attentive ears
The youths imbibe the nectar'd airs!
And quaff, in lowery shades reclin'd,
My precepts, to regale the mind.

— Superior to the pains below,
Your thoughts in soaring meditations flow,
In rapt'rous trance, on Virgil's genius dwell,
To us, poor mortals, his strong beauties tell,
And, like Æneas, from your couch of state,
In all the pomp of words display the Trojan fate.

THE LIFE OF PITT.

CHRISTOPHER PITT was born at Blandford in Dorsetshire, in 1699. His father was an eminent physician in that place, and related to the family of Pitt of Stratfield-sea in Hampshire.

At the age of fifteen, he was received as a scholar into Winchester College, where he was distinguished by exercises of uncommon elegance.

In 1719, he was chosen to New College, Oxford; and at his removal, he presented to the electors two volumes of MS. poems, the product of his private and voluntary studies; one of which consisted of miscellaneous pieces, and the other contained a complete version of Lucan, which he did not then know to have been translated by Rowe.

The version was suppressed, perhaps from its being the production of early life, or from a consciousness of its inferiority to the version of Rowe, which was executed in the full vigour of his genius.

Such an instance, however, of early diligence deserves well to be recorded; and the suppression of such a work, recommended by such uncommon circumstances, is to be regretted; for examples of early excellence are never superfluous, and from this example, the danger is not great of many imitations.

When he had resided three years at this College, he was presented to the rectory of Pimperm near Blandford, in Dorsetshire, 1722, by his friend and relation George Pitt, Esq. of Stratfield-sea in Hampshire; and resigning his fellowship, continued at Oxford two years longer, till he became Master of Arts. While he resided at the university, he was affectionately beloved by all who knew him, and particularly distinguished by Young, who, with an engaging familiarity, used to call him his son, and to whom he addressed an Epistle in 1722.

He then retired to Pimperm, a place pleasing by its situation, and therefore likely to excite the imagination of a poet, where he passed the rest of his life.

At what time he composed his Miscellaneous Poems, published 1727, is not easy to know: those which have dates, appear to have been very early productions, and few of them rise above mediocrity.

Of the panegyric on Lord Stanhope, the conqueror of Minorca, in particular, he was afterwards ashamed. "I did write an idle thing," says he, in a letter to Mr. Duncombe, 1738, "on Lord Stanhope, the work of a day or two, which I have forgot, as I hope every body else has done. The lines, I believe, some at least, were round and strong; but, upon the whole, I own it was a rash incorrect thing. I knew indeed very little of the subject; but as he was married to a relation [Lucy, daughter of Thomas Pitt, Esq. of Stratford, Wilts], I fell to scribbling, without fear or wit, to show my respect."

Probably about this time he published his translation of Vida's Art of Poetry, which Pope's commendation, in his "Essay on Criticism," and Tristram's splendid edition, had then made popular. This poem is perhaps the most perfect of Vida's compositions, and has the praise of being one of the first, if not the very first pieces of criticism that appeared in Italy since the revival of learning; for it was finished in the year 1520.

In this translation, he distinguished himself by a strict attention to the sense of the original, the utmost elegance of versification, and the skilful adaptation of his numbers to the images expressed; a beauty which Vida has with great ardour enforced and exemplified.

It was immediately on its publication very eagerly received by the readers of poetry. "I believe it was you," he writes Mr. Duncombe, "who gave a public testimony to the merit of the translation of Vida," (if it has any) in the "Whitehall Evening Post;" when it made its first appearance in the world, which I suppose did not a little contribute to its reputation and sale; for six or seven hundred were soon disposed of."

The success of his Vida animated him to a higher undertaking; and, in his thirtieth year, he published a version of the first book of the Æneid; which, being commended by his friends, he some time afterwards added three more, with an advertisement, in which he represents himself as translating with great indifference, and with a progress of which himself was hardly conscious.

"I am glad," he writes Mr. Duncombe, 1736, "that the version pleased Messrs. Spence, Browne [I. Hawkins], Duncombe, Glover, Benson, and some more of the best judges in town. If I may be allowed to judge in my own case, I think this last to be the best of my poetical performances; and I believe that you will agree with me, that the three last books have fewer grammatical inaccuracies than the first book. I cannot tell what to say to your compliment, 'that this version will be admired as long as the English language lasts;' but I am highly obliged to you for your partiality to me ever since the translation of Vida."

He completed the entire translation of the Æneid, June 2. 1738, which, without any further contention with his modesty, or any awe of the name of Dryden, he published, in two volumes, 4to, 1740. "I propose a good deal of pleasure," he writes Mr. Duncombe, "in correcting this large work, and hope that in time my friends will not be ashamed of it, though I know, that in many respects Mr. Dryden's version must have the advantage." In another letter, he styles Dryden's "a glorious translation." "I believe," he adds, "in all my version, there are not above seven or eight borrowed lines. I could not help taking two together from Mr. Dryden in this paragraph, they are so very sweet:

"All, all my life," replies the youth, "shall aim,
Like this one hour, at everlasting fame.
Though fortune only this attempt can bless,
Yet still my courage shall deserve success;
But one reward I ask before I go,
The greatest I can ask, or you bestow.
*Of Priam's royal race my mother came,
And sure the best that ever bore the name.*
Such was her love, she left her native Troy,
And fair Trinacria, for her darling boy;
And such is mine, that I must keep unknown
From her the danger of so dear a son.
To spare her anguish, lo! I quit the place,
Without one parting kiss, one last embrace!
By night, and that respected hand, I swear,
Her tender tears are more than I can bear.
For her, good prince, your pity I implore;
Support her, childless, and relieve her, poor.
Oh! let her find in you, when I am gone,
A friend, a spouse, a guardian, and a son!
With that dear hope embolden'd I shall go,
Brave every danger, and defy the foe."

He had certainly reason to be proud of these lines, it being scarce possible to find any superior to them in any version; Dryden's of the same passage ("sweet" as are the two lines he has taken), is much inferior in elegance and harmony.

The English Æneid is joined in this collection with his other poems, that the readers of poetry may have an opportunity of comparing the two best translations that perhaps ever were produced, by one nation, of the same author.

He did not enjoy the reputation which this great work deservedly conferred; for he died in 1748, in the forty-eight year of his age; and lies buried under a stone at Blandford, on which is this inscription:

In memory of
CHR. PITT, Clerk, M. A.
Very eminent
for his talents in poetry;
and yet more
for the universal candour of his mind, and the primitive simplicity of his manners.
He lived innocent,
and died beloved,
Apr. 13. 1748.
Aged 48.

His Original Poems, dispersed in the "The Student," and other publications, were collected and published in the edition of "The English Poets," 1779.

His version of the Æneid was re-printed in a complete edition of "Virgil's works translated into English," in 4 vols, 8vo, 1753. The translation of the "Eclogues" and "Georgics," three essays "on pastoral, didactic, and epic poetry," and "notes on the whole," were contributed by Dr. Warton, the present respectable master of Winchester school; with dissertations "on the VIth book of the Æneid," by Warburton; "on the shield of Æneas," by W. Whitehead; "on the character of Iapis," by Dr. Atterbury; and some new observations by Holdsworth, Spence, and others.

The amiable character of Pitt, transcribed from the stone that marks the place of his dust, owes nothing to flattery. He was revered for his virtue, and beloved for the softness of his temper, and the easiness of his manners. Before strangers, he had something of the scholar's timidity and distrust; but when he became familiar, he was in a very high degree cheerful and entertaining. His general benevolence procured him general respect; and he passed a life placid and honourable; neither too great for the kindness of the low, nor too low for the notice of the great.

As a poet, his compositions are characterised by splendour and elegance of diction, and the exquisite polish and harmony of the versification. Most of his original pieces are pleasing and poetical; but his Vida and the English Æneid, are the chief foundation of his fame. His version of Vida is executed with so much exactness and general elegance, that there is little fear of its being supplanted by the version of Mr. Hampson, published in 1793.

The excellence of his version of the Æneid, his greatest work, is generally allowed; but the critics have been divided concerning the just proportion of merit which ought to be ascribed to it, comparatively with that of Dryden. Some have asserted, that Pitt has done most justice to Virgil; that he shines in Pitt with a lustre which Dryden wanted not power, but leisure to bestow. Pitt, no doubt, had many advantages above Dryden in this arduous undertaking. As he was later in the attempt, he had consequently the version of Dryden to improve upon. He saw the errors of that great poet, and avoided them; he discovered his beauties, and improved upon them: and as he was not compelled by necessity, he had leisure to revise, correct, and finish his excellent work. Yet it may be justly doubted whether, upon the whole, the version of Dryden is not the most vigorous and poetical performance.

A comparison of the following passages may enable the reader to determine for himself, to whose translation he would give the preference. The first is taken from Virgil's description of Elysium, which "is so charming," says Dr. Trapp, "that it is almost Elysium to read it."

His demum exactis perfecto munera divæ,
Devenere locos lætos, et amœna vireta
Fortunatorum nemorum sedesque beatas
Largior hic campos æther et lumine vestit
Purpureo: solemque suum, sua sidera norunt
Pars in gramineis exercebat membra palæstris
Contendunt ludo, et fulva luctantur arena;
Pars pedibus plaudunt choreas et carmina decunt
Nec non Threicus longa cum veste sacerdos
Obloquitur numeris septem discrimina vocum,
Jamque eadem digitis, jam pectine pulsat eburno.—ÆNEID, Lib. VI. 637.

These holy rites performed, they took their way
Where long extended plains of pleasure lay.
The verdant fields with those of heaven may vie,
With ether vested, and a purple sky;
The blissful seats of happy souls below,
Stars of their own, and their own suns they know,
Their airy limbs in sports they exercise,
And on the green contend the wrestler's prize.
Some in heroic verse divinely sing,
Others in artful measures lead the ring.
The Thracian bard, surrounded by the rest,
There stands conspicuous in his flowing vest.
His flying fingers, and harmonious quill,
Strike seven distinguish'd notes, and seven at once they fill.—DRYDEN.

These rites complete, they reach the flowery plains,
The verdant groves, where endless pleasure reigns,
Here glowing ether shoots a purple ray,
And o'er the region pours a double day.

THE LIFE OF PITT.

From sky to sky th' unwearied splendour runs,
And nobler planets roll round brighter suns.
Some wrestle on the sands, and some in play,
And games heroic, pass the hours away.
Those raise the song divine, and these advance,
In measur'd steps, to form the solemn dance.
There Orpheus, graceful in his long attire,
In seven divisions strikes the sounding lyre.
Across the chords the quivering quill he flings,
Or with his flying fingers sweeps the strings.—PITT.

In the celebrated description of the swiftness of Camilla, in the VIIIth Æneid, the superiority of Dryden is more conspicuous than in the foregoing passage.

*Illa vel intactæ segetis per summa volaret
Gramina, nec teneras cursu læssit aristas,
Vel mare per medium fluctu suspensa tument
Ferret iter; celeres nec tingeret æquore plantas.*

—— the fierce virago fought—
Outstrip'd the winds in speed upon the plain;
Flew o'er the fields, nor hurt the bearded grain.
She swept the seas; and as she skimm'd along,
Her flying feet, unbath'd, on billows hung.—DRYDEN.

She led the rapid race, and left behind
The flagging floods, and pinions of the wind;
Lightly she flies along the level plain,
Nor hurts the tender grass, nor bends the golden grain;
Or o'er the swelling surge suspended sweeps,
And smoothly skims, unbath'd, along the deeps.—PITT.

It is evident from these passages, that Pitt's versification, though more exquisitely polished, abounds more in superfluous epithets and unessential images than that of Dryden, and is besides less distinguished by variety of pause and cadence. Alliteration is an inferior beauty, which is more remarkable in Pitt than Dryden. Benson, who in a pamphlet of his writing, has treated Dryden's version with great contempt, was yet fond of the alliteration of Pitt, to a degree of enthusiasm. He once took occasion, in conversation with Pitt, to magnify that beauty, and to compliment him upon it. Pitt thought it far less considerable than Benson did; but says he, "Since you are so fond of alliteration, this couplet upon Cardinal Wolsey will not displease you:

Begot by butchers, but by bishops bred,
How high his honour holds his haughty head."

Benson was no doubt charmed to hear his favourite grace in poetry so beautifully exemplified, which it certainly is, without any affectation or stiffness.

Spence, in his "Polymetis," has convicted Dryden, in several instances, of ignorance or negligence in translating the ancient allegories. "Upon this," says Dr. Warton, "I was desirous to examine Mr. Pitt's translation of the same passages, and was surprised to find near fifty instances which Mr. Spence has given of Dryden's mistakes of that kind, when Mr. Pitt had not fallen into above three or four."

To the estimate which Dr. Johnson has given of the comparative merits of the rival versions, the present writer has no great reason to object, as he is more disposed to admire the amazing force of Dryden's genius, than industriously to dwell on his imperfections.

"Pitt engaging as a rival with Dryden, naturally observed his failures, and avoided them; and as he wrote after Pope's "Iliad," he had an example of an exact, equable, and splendid versification. With these advantages, seconded by great diligence, he might successfully labour particular passages, and escape many errors. If the two versions are compared, perhaps the result would be, that Dryden leads the reader forward by his general vigour and sprightliness; and Pitt often stops him to contemplate the excellence of a particular couplet: That Dryden's faults are forgotten in the hurry of delight, and that Pitt's beauties are neglected in the languor of a cold and listless perusal; That Pitt pleases the critics, and Dryden the people: That Pitt is quoted, and Dryden read."

DEDICATION:

TO GEORGE PITT, Esq.

OF STRATFIELD SEA, IN HAMPSHIRE.

SIR,

SINCE you vouchsafe to be a patron to these sheets, as well as to their author, I will not make an ill use of the liberty you give me, to address you in this public manner, by running into the common topics of dedications. Should I venture to engage in such an extensive theme as your character, the world would judge the attempt to be altogether unnecessary, because it had long before been thoroughly acquainted with your virtues; besides I am sensible, that you as earnestly decline all praise and panegyric, as you eminently deserve them.

I hope, Sir, on another occasion, to present you with the product of my severer studies: in the mean time, be pleased to accept of this trifle, as one small acknowledgment of the many great favours you have bestowed on,

(Honoured Sir)

Your obliged humble servant,

CHRISTOPHER PITT.

PREFACE.

MY translation of Vida's Art of Poetry having been more favourably received than I had reason to expect, has encouraged me to publish this miscellany of poems and select translations. I shall neither embarrass myself nor my reader with apologies concerning this collection; for whether it is a good or a bad one, all excuses are unnecessary in one case, and offered in vain in the other.

An author of a miscellany has a better chance of pleasing the world, than he who writes on a single subject; and I have sometimes known a bad, or (which is still worse) an indifferent poet, meet with tolerable success; which has been owing more to the variety of subjects, than his happiness in treating them.

I am sensible the men of wit and pleasure will be disgusted to find so great a part of this collection consist of sacred poetry; but I assure these gentlemen, whatever they shall be pleased to object, that I shall never be ashamed of employing my talents

(such as they are) in the service of my Maker; that it would look indecent in one of my profession, not to spend as much time on the psalms of David, as the hymns of Callimachus; and farther, that if those beautiful pieces of divine poetry had been written by Callimachus, or any heathen author, they might have possibly vouchsafed them a reading even in my translation.

But I will not trespass further on my reader's patience in prose, since I shall have occasion enough for it, as well as for his good nature, in the following verses; concerning which I must acquaint him, that some of them were written several years since, and that I have precisely observed the rule of our great master Horace—Nonumque prematur in annum. But I may say more justly than Mr. Prior said of himself in the like case, that I have observed the letter more than the spirit of the precept.

RECOMMENDATORY POEMS

TO MR. CHRISTOPHER PITT.

ON HIS POEMS AND TRANSLATIONS.

FORGIVE th' ambitious fondness of a friend,
For such thy worth, 'tis glory to commend;
To thee, from judgment, such applause is due,
I praise myself while I am praising you;
As he who bears the lighted torch, receives
Himself assistance from the light he gives.

So much you please, so vast is my delight,
Thy, ev'n thy fancy cannot reach its height.
In vain I strive to make the transport known,
No language can describe it but thy own.
Could'st thou thy genius pour into my heart,
Thy copious fancy, thy engaging heart,
Thy vigorous thoughts, thy manly flow of sense,
Thy strong and glowing paint of eloquence;
Then should'st thou well conceive that happiness,
Which I alone can feel, and you express.

In scenes which thy invention sets to view,
Forgive me, friend, if I lose sight of you;
I see with how much spirit Homer thought,
With how much judgment cooler Virgil wrote;
In every line, in every word you speak,
I read the Roman, and confess the Greek;
Forgetting thee, my soul with rapture swell'd,
Cries out, "How much the ancient bards excell'd!"
But when thy just translations introduce
To nearer converse any Latian muse,
The several beauties you so well express,
I lose the Roman in the British dress!
Sweetly deceiv'd, the ancients I contemn,
And with mistaken zeal to thee exclaim,
(By so much nature, so much art betray'd)
"What vast improvements have our moderns
made!"

How vain and unsuccessful seems the toil,
To raise such precious fruits in foreign soil:
They mourn, transplanted to another coast,
Their beauties languid, and their flavour lost!
But such thy art, the ripening colours glow
As pure as those their native suns bestow;
Not an insipid beauty only yield,
But breathe the odours of Ausonia's field.

Such is the genuine flavour, it belies
Their stranger soil, and unacquainted skies.

Vida no more the long oblivion fears,
Which hid his virtues through a length of years;
Ally'd to thee, he lives again; thy rhymes
Shall friendly hand him down to latest times;
Shall do his injur'd reputation right,
While in thy work with such success unite
His strength of judgment, and his charms of speech,
That precepts please, and music seems to teach.

Lest unimprov'd I seem to read thee o'er,
Th' unhallow'd rapture I indulge no more;
By thee instructed, I the task forsake,
Nor for chaste love the lust of verse mistake;
Thy works that rais'd this frenzy in my soul,
Shall teach the giddy tumult to controul:
Warm'd as I am with every muse's charms,
Since the coy virgins fly my eager arms,
* I'll quit the work, throw by my strong desire,
And from thy praise reluctantly retire.

G. RIDLEY.

DR. COBDEN TO MR. PITT.

On his having a Bay-Leaf sent him from Virgil's Tomb.

FORGIVE me, Sir, if I approve
The judgment of your friend,
Who chose this token of his love
From Virgil's tomb to send.
You, who the Mantuan poet dress
In purest English lays,
Who all his soul and flame express,
May justly claim his bays.
Those bays, which water'd by your hand,
From Vida's spring shall rise,
And with fresh verdure crown'd, withstand
The lightning of the skies.
Let hence your emulation fir'd
His matchless strains pursue,
As from Achilles' tomb inspir'd,
The youth a rival grew.

* See Mr. Pitt's translation of Vida.

AN EPISTLE TO DR. EDWARD YOUNG,

AT EASTBURY IN DORSETSHIRE,

On the Review at Sarum, 1722.

WHILE with your Dodington retir'd you sit,
Charm'd with his flowing Burgundy and wit;
By turns relieving with the circling draught,
Each pause of chat, and interval of thought:
Or through the well-glaz'd tube, from business
freed,

Draw the rich spirit of the Indian weed;
Or bid your eyes o'er Vanbrough's models roam,
And trace in miniature the future dome,
(While busy fancy with imagin'd power
Builds up the work of ages in an hour);
Or lost in thought, contemplative you rove
Through opening vistas, and the shady grove;
Where a new Eden in the wilds is found,
And all the seasons in a spot of ground:
There, if you exercise your tragic rage,
To bring some hero on the British stage;
Whose cause the audience with applause will crown,
And make his triumphs or his tears their own:
Throw by the bold design; and paint no more
Imagin'd chiefs, and monarchs of an hour;
From fabled worthies, call thy muse to sing
Of real wonders, and Britannia's king. [train

Oh! hadst thou seen him, when the gathering
Fill'd up proud Sarum's wide-extended plain!
Then, when he stoop'd from awful majesty,
Put on the man, and laid the sovereign by;
When the glad nations saw their king appear,
Begirt with armies, and the pride of war;
More pleas'd his people's longing eyes to bless,
He look'd, and breath'd benevolence and peace:
When in his hand Britannia's awful lord
Held forth the olive, while he grasp'd the sword.
So Jove, though arm'd to blast the Titan's pride,
With all his burning thunders at his side,
Fram'd, while he terrify'd the distant foe,
His scheme of blessings for the world below.
This hadst thou seen, thy willing muse would raise
Her strongest wing, to reach her sovereign's praise.
To what bold heights our daring hopes may climb?
The theme so great! the poet so sublime!
I saw him, Young, and to these ravish'd eyes
Ev'n now his godlike figure seems to rise:
Mild, yet majestic, was the monarch's mien,
Lovely, though great, and awful, though serene.
(More than a coin or picture can unfold;
Too faint the colours, and too base the gold!)

At the blest sight, transported and amaz'd
One universal shout the thousands rais'd,
And crowds on crowds grew loyal as they gaz'd. }
His foes (if any) own'd the monarch's cause,
And chang'd their groundless clamours to ap-
plause;

Ev'n giddy faction hail'd the glorious day,
And wondering envy look'd her rage away.
As Ceres o'er the globe her chariot drew,
And harvests ripen'd where the goddess flew;
So, where his gracious footsteps he inclin'd,
Peace flew before, and plenty march'd behind,
Where wild affliction rages, he appears
To wipe the widow's and the orphan's tears:
The sons of misery before him bow,
And for their merit only plead their woe.
So well he loves the public liberty,
His mercy sets the private captive free.
Soon as our royal angel came in view,
The prisons burst, the starting hinges flew;
The dungeon's open'd, and resign'd their prey,
To joy, to life, to freedom, and the day:
The chains drop off; the grateful captives rear
Their hands unmanacled in praise and prayer.
Had thus victorious Cæsar sought to please,
And rul'd the vanquish'd world with arts like these;

The generous Brutus had not scorn'd to bend,
But sunk the rigid patriot in the friend;
Nor to that bold excess of virtue ran,
To stab the monarch, where he lov'd the man.
And Cato reconcil'd, had ne'er disdain'd
To live a subject where a Brunswick reign'd.
But I detain your nobler muse too long
From the great theme that mocks my humble
song, }
A theme that asks a Virgil or a Young.

ON THE APPROACHING

DELIVERY OF HER ROYAL HIGHNESS,

IN THE YEAR 1721.—AN ODE.

Ye angels, come without delay;
Britannia's genius, come away.
Descend, ye spirits of the sky;
Stand all ye winged guardians by;
Your golden pinions kindly spread,
And watch round Carolina's bed:
Here fix your residence on earth,
To hasten on the glorious birth;

Her fainting spirits to supply,
 Catch all the zephyrs as they fly.
 Oh! succour nature in the strife,
 And gently hold her up in life;
 Nor let her hence too soon remove,
 To join your sacred choirs above:
 But live, Britannia to adorn
 With kings and princes yet unborn.
 Ye angels, come without delay;
 Britannia's genius, come away.
 Assuage her pains, and Albion's fears,
 For Albion's life depends on her's.
 Oh then! to save her from despair,
 Lean down, and listen to her prayer.
 Crown all her tortures with delight,
 And call th' auspicious babe to light.
 We hope from your propitious care,
 All that is brave, or all that's fair.
 A youth, to match his fire in arms;
 Or nymph, to match her mother's charms;
 A youth, who over kings shall reign,
 Or nymph, whom kings shall court in vain.
 From far the royal slaves shall come,
 And wait from him or her their doom;
 To each their different suits shall move,
 And pay their homage, or their love.
 Ye angels, come without delay;
 Britannia's genius, come away.
 When the soft powers of sleep subdue
 Those eyes, that shine as bright as you;
 With scenes of bliss, transporting themes!
 Prompt and inspire her golden dreams:
 Let visionary blessings rise,
 And swim before her closing eyes.
 The sense of torture to subdue,
 Set Britain's happiness to view;
 That fight her spirits will sustain,
 And give her pleasure from her pain.
 Ye angels, come without delay;
 Britannia's genius, come away.
 Come, and rejoice; th' important hour
 Is past, and all our fears are o'er;
 See! every trace of anguish flies,
 While in her lap the infant lies,
 Her pain by sudden joy beguil'd,
 She hangs in rapture o'er the child,
 Her eyes o'er every feature run,
 The father's beauties and her own.
 There, pleas'd her image to survey,
 She melts in tenderness away;
 Smiles o'er the babe, nor smiles in vain,
 The babe returns th' auspicious smile again.
 Ye angels, come without delay;
 Britannia's genius, come away.
 Turn heaven's eternal volume o'er,
 And look for this distinguish'd hour;
 Consult the page of Britain's state,
 Before you close the books of fate:
 Then tell us what you there have seen,
 What æra's from this birth begin.
 What years from this blest hour must run,
 As bright and lasting as the sun.
 Far from the ken of mortal sight,
 These secrets are involv'd in night:
 The blessings which this birth pursue,
 Are only known to heaven and you.

On the Marriage of the Prince of Orange, and the Princess Royal of England.*

WHEN Nassau ey'd his native coasts no more,
 And first discern'd fair Albion's whitening shore;
 In that blest moment, while the friendly gales
 Wait on his course, and stretch the swelling sails,
 The deeps divide; and, as the waves uncloze,
 The genius of the British ocean rose.
 Loose to the wind his sea-green mantle flow'd,
 And in his eyes unusual pleasure glow'd.
 Awhile he paus'd, to mark on Nassau's face
 The well-known features of the godlike race;
 Whose swords were sacred to the generous cause
 Of truth, religion, liberty, and laws:
 Then spoke; the winds a still attention keep,
 And awful silence hush'd the murmuring deep:
 "Proceed, great prince, to our lov'd coast repair,
 Where Anna shines the fairest of the fair:
 For thy distinguish'd bed the fates ordain
 The royal maid, whom kings might court in vain;
 The royal maid, in whom the graces join'd
 Her mother's awful charms, and more than female
 mind.
 The merits of thy race, the vast arrears
 That Britain owes, shall all be paid in her;
 In her be paid the debt for laws restor'd,
 For England sav'd by William's righteous sword.
 Immortal William!—At thy sacred name
 My heart beats quick, and owns its ancient flame.
 Still must I call to mind the glorious day, [way,
 When through these floods the hero plough'd his
 To free Britannia from the tyrant's chain,
 And bid the prostrate nations rise again.
 Well-pleas'd I saw his fluttering streamers fly,
 And the full sails that hid the distant sky.
 High on the gilded stern, majestic rode
 The world's great patriot, like a guardian God.
 This trident aw'd the tumults of the sea,
 And bade the winds the hero's nod obey:
 Fond of the task, with this officious hand
 I push'd the sacred vessel to the land;
 The land of liberty, by Rome enslav'd;
 He came, he saw, he vanquish'd, and he sav'd.
 O may that hero, and thy Anna's fire
 To noblest deeds thy generous bosom fire,
 And with their bright transmissive virtues grace
 The great descendants of thy princely race!
 Still may they all their great example draw
 From her Augustus, and thy own Nassau!
 May the fair line each happy realm adorn,
 Bless future states, and nations yet unborn!"

On the Marriage of Frederic Prince of Wales, and Princess Augusta of Saxe-Gotha†.

WHEN pious frauds and holy pride no more
 Could hold that empire which so long they bore;

* Originally printed in the "Epithalamia Oxoniensia, Oxoniæ, 1734," in the name of Mr. Spence; but now reclaimed as Pitt's on the authority of Bishop Lowth.

† Originally printed in the "Gratulatio Academicæ Oxoniensis in Nuptias auspiciatissimas illustrissimas"

From fair Germania's states the truth began
To gleam, and shed her heavenly light on man;
To Frederic † first, the Saxon prince, 'twas given,
To nurse and cherish this best gift of heaven.
Its growth, whilst young and tender, was his

care,
To guard its blossoms from th' inclement air,
And dying, "May'st thou flourish!" was his prayer.

Again, when fair religion now had spread
Her influence round, and rais'd her captiv'd head;
When Charles and Rome their impious forces
join'd

To quench its light, and re-enslave mankind;
Another Frederic ‡ first appear'd in arms,
To guard th' endanger'd blessing from alarms.
Ye heavens! what virtues with what courage
join'd!

But join'd in vain!—See, vanquish'd, and confin'd
In the deep gloom, the pious hero lies,
And lifts to heaven his ever-streaming eyes.
There, spent with sorrows, as he sunk to rest
(The public cause still labouring in his breast),
Behold, in slumber, to his view display'd,
Rose the first Frederic's venerable shade!
His temples circled with a heavenly flame;
The same his flowing robe, his look the same.

"And art thou come? (the captive warrior cries)

What realms so long detained thee from our eyes?
After such wars, such deaths and honours past,
Is our great guardian chief return'd at last?
Say, from your heaven, so long desir'd in vain,
Descends our hero to our aid again?
Now when proud Rome, her standard wide un-

furl'd,
Pours like a deluge o'er the trembling world;
Fierce, her disputed empire to restore,

And scourge mankind for ten dark ages more?
Like me, religion wears the tyrant's chain;
Prostrate like me, she bleeds at every vein:
Oh! must we never, never rise again?"

"Dismiss thy fears, (the reverend shade replies)
Be firm, be constant, and absolve the skies.

Dark are the ways of heaven: let man attend:
Soon will the regular confusion end.

Soon shall thy eyes a brighter scene survey
(Lo, the fleet hours already wing their way!)

When, to thy native soil in peace restor'd,
Once more shall Gotha see her lawful Lord.

True to religion, each successive son
Shall aid the cause their generous fires begun.

Even now I look through fate. O glorious sight!
I see thy offspring as they rise to light.

"morum Principum Frederici Principis Walliæ et Augustæ Principissæ de Saxo-Gotha. Oxo- nii, 1736;" and now restored to Pitt, on the same unquestionable authority as the preceding poem.

† Frederic, Elector of Saxony, the chief Protector of Luther and the Protestant religion, died in the year 1520.

‡ John Frederic, nephew to the former, taken prisoner by Charles V. and despoiled of his electorate by him in 1547.

What benefits to man! what lights divine!
What heroes, and what saints adorn the line!
And oh! to crown the scene, my joyful eyes
Behold from far a princely virgin rise!
This, this is she, the smiling fates ordain
To bring the bright primeval times again!
The fair Augusta!—Grac'd with blooming charms;
Reserv'd to bless a British prince's arms.
Behold, behold the long-expected day!
Fly swift, ye hours, ye minutes, haste away;
To wed the fair, O favour'd of the skies,
Rise in thy time, thou destin'd hero, rise!
For through this scene of opening fate, I see
A greater Frederic shall arise in thee!
Then let thy fears from this blest moment cease,
Henceforth shall pure religion reign in peace.
Thy royal race shall Albion's sceptre sway,
And son to son th' imperial power convey:
All shall support, like thee, the noble cause
Of truth, religion, liberty, and laws."

This said, the venerable shade retir'd:
The wondering hero, at the vision fir'd,
With generous rapture glows; forgets his pains,
Smiles at his woes, and triumphs in his chains.

THE FIRST HYMN OF CALLIMACHUS TO JUPITER.

WHILE trembling we approach Jove's awful shrine,
With pure libations, and with rites divine;
What theme more proper can we choose to sing,
Then Jove himself, the great, eternal king!
Whose word gives law to those of heavenly birth;
Whose hand subdues the rebel sons of earth.
Since doubts and dark disputes thy titles move,
Hear'st thou, Dictæan and Lycæan Jove?
For here thy birth the tops of Ida claim,
And there Arcadia triumphs in thy name.
But Crete in vain would boast a grace so high,
Whose faithless sons through mere complexion lie:
Immortal as thou art in endless bloom,
To prove their claim, they build the thunderer's tomb.

Be then Arcadian, for the towering height
Of steep Parrhasia welcom'd thee to light;
When pregnant Rhæa, wandering through the wood,

Sought out her darkest shades, and bore the God;
The place thus hallow'd by the birth of Jove,
More than religious horror guards the grove:
The gloom all teeming females still decline,
From the vile worm, to woman, form divine.
Soon as the mother had discharg'd her load,
She sought a spring to bathe the recent god;
But sought in vain: no living stream she found,
Though since, the waters drench the realms a-
round.

Clear Erymanthus had not learn'd to glide,
Nor mightier Ladon drove his swelling tide,
At thy great birth, where now Iæon flows,
Tall towering oaks, and pathless forests rose.
The thirsty savages were heard to roar,
Where Cario softly murmurs to the shore;
Where spreading Melas widely floats the coast,
The flying chariot rais'd a cloud of dust.

With drowth o'er Cratis and Menope curst,
The fainting swain, to aggravate his thirst,
Heard from within the bubbling waters flow,
In close restraint, and murmur from below.

Thou too, O earth, (enjoin'd the power divine)
Bring forth; thy pangs are less severe than mine,
And sooner past; she spoke, and as she spoke Rear'd high her scepter'd arm, and pierc'd the rock.

Wide to the blow the parting mountain rent,
The waters gush'd tumultuous at the vent,
Impatient to be freed; amid the flood
She plung'd the recent babe, and bath'd the god.
She wrapp'd thee, mighty king, in purple bands,
Then gave the sacred charge to Neda's hands,
The babe to nourish in the close retreat,
And in the safe recess, of distant Crete.
In years and wisdom, of the nymphs who nurs'd
The infant thunderer, Neda was the first;
Next Styx and Phylirè; the virgin shar'd
For her great trust discharg'd a great reward:
For by her honour'd name the flood she calls,
Which rolls into the sea by Leprion's walls;
To drink her streams the sons of Arcas crowd,
And draw for ever from the ancient flood.

Thee, Jove, the careful nymph to Cnossus bore,
(To Cnossus seated on the Cretan shore)
With joyful arms the Corybantes heav'd,
And the proud nymphs the glorious charge receiv'd.
Above the rest in grace Adraсте stood,
She rock'd the golden cradle of the god;
On his ambrosial lips the goat distill'd
Her milky store, and fed th' immortal child:
With her the duteous bee presents her spoils,
And for the god repeats her flowery toils.

The fierce Curetes too in arms advance,
And tread tumultuously their mystic dance:
And, lest thy cries should reach old Saturn's ear,
Beat on their brazen shields the din of war.

Full soon, Almighty King, thy early prime
Advanc'd beyond the bounds of vulgar time.
Ere the soft down had cloth'd thy youthful face,
Swift was thy growth in wit and every grace.
Fraught was thy mind in life's beginning stage,
With all the wisdom of experienc'd age:
Thy elder brothers hence their claims resign,
And leave th' unbounded heavens by merit thine;
For sure those poets fable, who advance
The bold assertion, that capricious chance
By equal lots to Saturn's sons had given
The triple reign of ocean, hell and heaven.
Above blind chance the vast division lies,
And hell holds no proportion to the skies.
Things of a less, and equal value, turn
On the blind lot of an inverted urn.
Not chance, O Jove, attain'd heaven's high abodes,
But thy own power advanc'd thee o'er the gods,
Thy power that whirls thy rapid chariot on,
Thy power, the great assessor of thy throne.
Dismiss by thee, th' imperial eagle flies [skies:
Charg'd with thy signs and thunders through the
To me and mine glad omens may she bring,
And to the left extend her golden wing.

Thou to inferior gods hast well assign'd
The various ranks and orders of mankind:

Of these the wandering merchants claim the care:
Of those the poets, and the sons of war:
Kings claim from thee their titles and their reign
O'er all degrees, the foldier and the swain.
Vulcan presides o'er all who bear the mass,
Bend the tough steel, and shape the tortur'd brass.
Diana those adore who spread the toils;
To Mars the warrior dedicates his spoils.
The bard to Phœbus strikes the living strings,
Jove's royal province is the care of kings;
For kings submissive hear thy high decree,
And hold their delegated powers from thee.
Thy name the judge and legislator awes,
When this enacts, and that directs the laws:
Cities and realms thy great protection prove;
These bend to monarchs, as they bend to Jove.

Though to thy sceptre'd sons thy will extends,
The proper means proportion'd to their ends;
All are not favour'd in the same degree,
For power supreme belongs to Ptolemy;
What no inferior liminary king
Could in a length of years to ripeness bring,
Sudden his word performs; his boundless power
Completes the work of ages in an hour:
While others labour through a wretched reign,
Their schemes are blasted, and their counsels vain.

Hail Saturn's mighty son, to whom we owe
Life, health, and every blessing here below!
Who shall in worthy strains thy name adorn?
What living bard? what poet yet unborn?
Hail and all hail again; in equal shares
Give wealth and virtue, and indulge our prayers.
Hear us, great king, unless they meet combin'd,
Each is but half a blessing to mankind.
Then grant us both, that blended they may prove
A doubled happiness, and worthy Jove.

THE SECOND HYMN OF CALLIMACHUS TO APOLLO.

HA! how Apollo's hallow'd laurels wave?
How shakes the temple from its inmost cave?
Fly, ye profane; for lo! in heavenly state
The power descends, and thunders at the gate.
See, how the Delian palms with reverence nod!
Hark! how the tuneful swans confess the god!
Leap from your hinges, burst your brazen bars,
Ye sacred doors; the god, the god appears.

Ye youth, begin the song; in choirs advance;
Wake all your lyres, and form the measur'd dance.

No impious wretch his holy eyes have view'd,
None but the just, the innocent, and good.
To see the power confess your minds prepare,
Refin'd from guilt, and purify'd by prayer.
So may you mount in youth the nuptial bed,
So grace with silver hairs your aged head;
So the proud walls with lofty turrets crown,
And lay foundations for the rising town.

Apollo's song with awful silence hear;
Ev'n the wild seas the sacred song revere:
Nor wretched Thetis dares to make her moan,
For great Apollo flew her darling son.
When the loud Iô-Pæans ring around,
She checks her sighs, and trembles at the sound.

Fix'd in her grief must Niobe appear,
Nor through the Phrygian marble drop a tear;
Still, though a rock, she dreads Apollo's bow,
And stands her own sad monument of woe.
Sound the loud ló's, and the temple rend,
With the blest gods 'tis impious to contend.
In his audacious rage would brave the skies
He, who the power of Ptolemy defies,
(From whence the mighty blessing was bestow'd),
Or challenge Phœbus, and resist the god.

Beyond the night your hallow'd strains prolong,
Till the day rises on the unfinish'd song.
Nor less his various attributes require,
So shall he honour, and reward the choir;
For honour is his gift, and high above
He shines, and graces the right hand of Jove:
With beamy gold his robes divinely glow,
His harp, his quiver, and his Liétian bow;
His feet how fair and glorious to behold!
Shod in rich sandals of refulgent gold!
Wealth still attends him, and vast gifts bestow'd.
Adorn the Delphic temple of the god.
Eternal charms his youthful cheeks diffuse;
His tresses dropping with ambrosial dews,
Pale death before him flies, with dire disease,
And health and life are wafted in the breeze.

To thee, great Phœbus, various arts belong,
To wing the dart, and guide the poet's song:
Th' enlighten'd prophet feels thy flames divine,
And all the dark events of lots are thine.
By Phœbus taught, the sage prolongs our breath,
And in its flight suspends the dart of death.

To thy great name, O Nomian power, we cry,
Ere since the time when, stooping from the sky,
To tend Admetus' herds thy godhead chose,
On the fair banks where clear Amphryfus flows:
Blest are the herds, and blest the flocks, that lie
Beneath the influence of Apollo's eye.
The meads re-echo'd to the bleating lambs,
And the kids leap'd, and frisk'd around their dams;
Her weight of milk each ewe dragg'd on with
pain,

And dropp'd a double offspring on the plain.

On great Apollo for his aid we call,
To build th' town and raise th' embattled wall:
He, while an infant, fram'd the wondrous plan,
In fair Ortygia, for the use of man.
When young Diana urg'd her sylvan toils,
From Cynthus' tops she brought her savage spoils;
The heads of mountain-goats, and antlers lay
Spread wide around, the trophies of the day:
Of these a structure he compos'd with art,
In order rang'd, and just in every part;
And by that model taught us to dispose
The rising city, and with walls enclose;
Where the foundations of the pile should lie,
Or towers and battlements should reach the sky.

Apollo sent th' auspicious crow before,
When our great founder touch'd the Libyan shore:
Full on the right he flew to call him on,
And guide the people to their destin'd town;
Which to a race of kings Apollo vow'd,
And fix'd for ever stands the promise of the god.

Or hear'st thou, while thy honours we proclaim,
Thy Boëdromian, or thy Clarian name?

VOL. VIII.

(For to the power are various names assign'd
From cities rais'd, and blessings to mankind.)
In thy Carnean title I rejoice,
And join my grateful country's public voice.
Ere to Cyrene's realms our course we bore,
Thrice were we led by thee from shore to shore;
Till our progenitor the region gain'd,
And annual rites and annual feasts ordain'd.
When at thy prophet Carnus' will, we rais'd
A glorious temple; and the altars blaz'd
With hecatombs of bulls, whose reeking blood,
Great king, they shed to thee their guardian god.
ló! Carnean Phœbus! awful power!
Whom fair Cyrene's suppliant sons adore!
To deck thy hallow'd temple, see! we bring
The choicest flowers, and rifle all the spring:
The most distinguish'd odours nature yields,
When balmy zephyr breathes along the fields;
Soon as the sad inverted year retreats,
To thee the crocus dedicates his sweets.
From thy bright altars hallow'd flames aspire;
They shine incessant from the sacred fire.
What joy, what transport, swells Apollo's breast,
When at his great Carnean annual feast,
Clad in their arms our Libyan tribes advance,
Mix'd with our swarthy dames, and lead the dance.

Nor yet the Greeks had reach'd Cyrene's floods;
But rov'd through wild Azilis' gloomy woods;
Whom to his nymph Apollo deign'd to show,
High as he stood on tall Myrtusa's brow;
Where the fierce lion by her hands was slain,
Who in his fatal rage laid waste the plain.
Still to Cyrene are his gifts convey'd,
In dear remembrance of the ravish'd maid;
Nor were her sons ungrateful, who bestow'd
Their choicest honours on their guardian god.

ló! with holy raptures sing around;
We owe to Delphos the triumphant sound.
When thy victorious hands vouchsaf'd to show
The wonders of thy shafts and golden bow;
When Python from his den was seen to rise,
Dire, fierce, tremendous of enormous size;
By thee with many a fatal arrow slain,
The monster sunk extended on the plain;
Shaft after shaft in swift succession flew;
As swift the people's shouts and prayers pursue.
ló, Apollo, launch thy flying dart;
Send it, oh! send it to the monster's heart.
When thy fair mother bore thee, she design'd
Her mighty son, a blessing to mankind.

Envy, that other plague and fiend, drew near,
And gently whisper'd in Apollo's ear:
No poet I regard but him whose lays
Are swelling, loud, and boundless as the seas;
Apollo spurn'd the fury, and reply'd,
The vast Euphrates rolls a mighty tide;
With rumbling torrents the rough river roars;
But black with mud, discolour'd from his shores,
Prone down Assyria's lands his course he keeps,
And with polluted waters stains the deeps.
But the Melissian nymphs to Ceres bring
The purest product of the limpid spring;
Small is the sacred stream, but never stain'd
With mud, or foul ablutions from the land.

Hail, glorious king! beneath thy matchless power
May malice sink, and envy be no more!

TO SIR JAMES THORNHILL,

On his Excellent Painting, the Rape of Helen, at the Seat of General Erle in Dorsetshire.

Written in the Year 1718.

COULD I with thee, O Thornhill, bear a part,
And join the poet's with the painter's art,
(Though both share mutually each common name,
Their thoughts, their genius and design the same!)
The muse, with features neither weak nor faint,
Should draw her sister-art in speaking paint.
But while admiring thine and nature's strife,
I see each touch just starting into life,
From side to side with various raptures tost,
Amid the visionary scenes I'm lost.

Methinks as thrown upon some fairy land,
Amaz'd we know not how, nor where we stand;
While tripping phantoms to the sight advance,
And gay ideas lead the mazy dance:
While wondering we behold in every part
The beauteous scenes of thy creating art.

By such degrees thy colours rise and fall,
And breathing flush the animated wall;
That the bright objects which our eyes survey,
Ravish the mind, and steal the soul away;
Our footsteps by some secret power are crost,
And in the painter all the bard is lost.

Thus in a magic ring we stand confin'd
While subtle spells the fatal circle bind;
In vain we strive and labour to depart,
Fix'd by the charms of that mysterious art;
In vain the paths and avenues we trace,
While spirits guard and fortify the place.

How could my stretch'd imagination swell,
And on each regular proportion dwell!
While thy swift art unravels nature's maze,
And imitates her works, and treads her ways,
Nature with wonder sees herself out-done,
And claims the fair creation for her own;
Thy figures in such lively strokes excel,
They give those passions which they seem to feel.
Each various feature some strong impulse bears,
Wraps us in joy, or melts us all to tears.
Each piece with such transcendent art is wrought,
That we could almost say thy pictures thought;
When we behold thee conquer in the strife,
And strike the kindling figures into life,
Which does from thy creating pencil pass,
Warm the dull matter, and inspire the mass;
As fam'd Prometheus' wand convey'd the ray
Of heavenly fire to animate his clay.

How the just strokes in harmony unite!
How shades and darkness recommend the light!
No lineaments unequally surprise;
The beauties regularly fall and rise.
Lost in each other we in vain pursue
The fleeting lines that cheat our wearied view.
Nor know we how their subtle courses run,
Nor where this ended, nor where that begun.
Nor where the shades their utmost bounds display,
Or the light fades insensibly away;

But all harmoniously confus'd we see,
While all the sweet varieties agree.

Thus when the organ's solemn airs aspire,
The blended music wings our thoughts with fire;
Here warbling notes in whispering breezes sigh,
But in their birth the tender accents die;
While thence the bolder notes exulting come,
Swell as they fly, and bound along the dome.
With transport fir'd, each lost in each we hear,
And all the soul is center'd in the ear.

See first the senate of the gods above,
Frequent and full amid the courts of Jove:
Behold the radiant consistory shine,
With features, airs, and lineaments divine.
Hermes dispatch'd from the bright council flies,
And cleaves with all his wings the liquid skies.
In many a whirl and rapid circle driven
So swift, he seems at once in earth and heaven.
Oh! with what energy! what noble force
Of strongest colours you describe his course?
Till the swift god the Phrygian shepherd found
Compos'd for sleep, and stretch'd along the ground.
He brings the blooming gold, the fatal prize,
The bright reward of Cytherea's eyes.
The conscious earth the awful signal takes,
Without a wind the quivering forest shakes;
Tall Ida bows; th' unwieldy mountains nod;
And all confess the presence of the god.

Like shooting meteors, gliding from above,
See the proud consort of the thundering Jove,
War's glorious goddess, and the queen of love;
Arm'd in their naked charms, the Phrygian boy
Regards those charms with mingled fear and joy.
Here Juno stands with an imperial mien,
At once confess a goddess and a queen.
Her cheeks a scornful indignation warms,
Blots out her smiles, as conscious of her charms.
But Venus shines in milder beauties there,
And every grace adorns the blooming fair.
While, conscious of her charms, she seems to rise,
Claims, and already grasps in hope the prize;
Beauteous, as when immortal Phidias strove
From Parian rocks to carve the queen of love:
Each grace obey'd the summons of his art,
And a new beauty sprung from every part.
In all the terrors of her beauty bright,
Fair Pallas awes and charms the Trojan's sight,
And gives successive reverence and delight.

Nor thrones, nor victories, his soul can move;
Crowns, arms, and triumphs, what are you to love?
Too soon resign'd to Venus, they behold
The glittering ball of vegetable gold.
While Jove's proud consort thrown from her desires,

Inflam'd with rage maliciously retires;
Already kindles her immortal hate,
Already labours with the Trojan fate.
While a new transport flush'd the blooming boy,

Helen he seems already to enjoy,
And feeds the flame that must consume his Troy.
Another scene our wondering sight recalls;
The fair adulteress leaves her native walls: Joy;
Her cheeks are stain'd with mingled shame and Lull'd on the bosom of the Phrygian boy.

To the loud deeps he bears his charming spouse,
Freed from her lord, and from her former vows.
On their soft wings the whispering zephyrs play,
The breezes skim along the dimpled sea:
The wanton loves direct the gentle gales,
Sport in the shrowds, and flutter in the sails.
While her twin-brothers * with a gracious ray
Point out her course along the watery way.

Th' exalted strokes so delicately shine,
All so conspire to push the bold design;
That in each sprightly feature we may find
The great ideas of the master's mind,
As the strong colours faithfully unite,
Mellow to shade, and ripen into light.
Let others form with care the ruddy mass,
And torture into life the running brass,
With potent art the breathing statue mould,
Shape and inspire the animated gold;
Let others sense to Parian marbles give,
Bid the rocks leap to form, and learn to live;
Still be it thine, O Thornhill, to unite
The pleasing discord of the shade and light;
To vanquish nature in the generous strife,
And touch the glowing features into life.

But, Thornhill, would thy noble soul impart
One lasting instance of thy godlike art
To future times; and in thy fame engage
The praise of this and every distant age;
To stretch that art as far as it can go,
Draw the triumphant chief, and vanquish'd foe:
In his own dome, amidst the spacious walls,
Draw the deep squadrons of the routed Gauls;
Their ravish'd banners, and their arms resign'd,
While the brave hero thunders from behind;
Pours on their front, or hangs upon their rear;
Fights, leads, commands, and animates the war.
Let his strong courser champ his golden chain,
And proudly paw th' imaginary plain.
To Aghrim's bloody wreaths let Cressi yield,
With the fair laurels of Ramilia's field.

Next, on the sea the daring hero show,
To cheer his friends, and terrify the foe.
Lo! the great chief to furnish'd thousands bears,
The food of armies, and support of wars.
The Britons rush'd with native virtue fir'd,
And quell'd the foe, or gloriously expir'd;
Plunging through flames and floods, their valour
broke

O'er the rang'd cannon, and a night of smoke,
Through the wedg'd legions urg'd their noble toil,
To spend their thunder on the towers of Lisle;
While by his deeds their courage he inspires,
And wakes in every breast the sleeping fires.
Thus the whole series of his labours join,
Stretch'd from the Belgic ocean to the Boyne.

Then glorious in retreat the chief may read
Th' immortal actions of the noble dead;
And in recording colours, with delight,
Review his conquests, and enjoy the fight;
See his own deeds on each ennobled plain;
While fancy acts his triumphs o'er again.

Thus on the Tyrian walls Æneas read,
How stern Achilles rag'd, and Hector bled;

PART OF THE SECOND BOOK OF STATIUS.

Now Jove's command fulfill'd, the son of May
Quits the black shades, and slowly mounts to day,
For lazy clouds in gloomy barriers rise,
Obstruct the god, and intercept the skies;
No zephyrs here their airy pinions move,
To speed his progress to the realms above.
Scarce can he steer his dark laborious flight,
Lost and encumber'd in the damps of night:
There roaring tides of fire his course withstood,
Here Styx in nine wide circles roll'd his flood.
Behind old Laius trod th' infernal ground,
Trembling with age, and tardy from his wound;
(For all his force his furious son apply'd,
And plung'd the guilty falchion in his side.)
Propt and supported by the healing rod,
The shade pursued the footsteps of the god.
The groves that never bloom; the Stygian coasts,
The house of woe; the mansions of the ghosts.
Earth too admires to see the ground give way,
And gild hell's horrors with the gleams of day.

But not with life repining envy fled,
She still reigns there, and lives among the dead.
One from this crowd exclaim'd (whose lawless will
Inur'd to crimes, and exercis'd in ill,
Taught his preposterous joys from pains to flow,
And never triumph'd, but in scenes of woe)
Go to thy province in the realms above,
Call'd by the furies or the will of Jove:
Or drawn by magic force or mystic spell,
Rise, and purge off the sooty gloom of hell.
Go, see the sun, and whiten in his beams,
Or haunt the flowery fields and limpid streams,
With woes redoubled to return again,
When thy past pleasures shall enhance thy pain.

Now by the Stygian dog they bent their way;
Stretch'd in his den the dreadful monster lay;
But lay not long, for, startling at the sound,
Head above head he rises from the ground.
From their close folds his starting serpents break,
And curl in horrid circles round his neck.
This saw the god, and, stretching forth his hand,
Lull'd the grim monster with his potent wand;
Through his vast bulk the gliding slumbers creep,
And seal down all his glaring eyes in sleep.
There lies a place in Greece well known to fame,
Through all her realms, and Tænarus the name,
Where from the sea the tops of Malca rise,
Beyond the ken of mortals, to the skies:
Proud in his height he calmly hears below
The distant winds in hollow murmurs blow.
Here sleep the storms when weary'd and oppress'd,
And on his head the drowsy planets rest:
There in blue mists his rocky sides he shrouds,
And here the towering mountain props the clouds;
Above his awful brow no bird can fly,
And far beneath the muttering thunders die.

When down the steep of heaven the day descends,
The sun so wide his floating bound extends,
That o'er the deeps the mountain hangs display'd,
And covers half the ocean with his shade:
Where the Tænarian shores oppose the sea
The land retreats, and winds into a bay.
Here for repose imperial Neptune leads,
Tir'd from th' Ægion floods, his smoking steeds;
With their broad hoofs they scoop the beach away,
Their finny train rolls back, and floats along the sea,

Here fame reports th' unbody'd shades to go
Through this wide passage to the realms below.
From hence the peasants (as th' Arcadians tell)
Hear all the cries, and groans, and din of hell.
Oft, as her scourge of snakes the fury plies,
The piercing echoes mount the distant skies;
Scar'd at the porter's triple roar, the swains
Have fled astonish'd, and forsook the plains.

From hence emergent in a mantling cloud
Sprung to his native skies the winged god.
Swift from his face before th' ethereal ray,
Flew all the black Tartarian stains away,
And the dark Stygian gloom refin'd to day.
O'er towns and realms he held his progress on,
Now wing'd the skies where bright Arcturus shone,

And now the silent empire of the moon.
The power of sleep, who met his radiant flight,
And drove the solemn chariot of the night,
Rose with respect, and from th' empyreal road
Turn'd his pale steeds, in reverence to the god.
The shade beneath pursues his course, and spies
The well-known planets, and congenial skies.
His eyes from far, tall Cyrrha's heights explore,
And Phocian fields polluted with his gore.
At length to Thebes he came, and with a groan
Survey'd the guilty palace once his own;
With awful silence stalk'd before the gate,
But when he saw the trophies of his fate,
High on a column rais'd against the door,
And his rich chariot still deform'd with gore,
He starts with horror back; ev'n Jove's command

Could scarce controul him, nor the vital wand.

'Twas now the solemn day; when Jove, array'd
In all his thunders, grasp'd the Theban maid:
Then took from blasted Semele her load,
And in himself conceiv'd the future god.
For this the Thebans revel'd in delight,
And gave to play and luxury the night;
A national debauch! confus'd they lie
Stretch'd o'er the fields, their canopy the sky.
The sprightly trumpets sound, the timbrels play,
And wake with sacred harmony the day.
The matron's breast the gracious power inspires
With milder raptures, and with softer fires.
So the Bistonian race, a madding train,
Exult and revel on the Thracian plain;
With milk their bloody banquets they allay,
Or from the lion rend his panting prey:
On some abandon'd savage fiercely fly,
Seize, tear, devour, and think it luxury.
But if the rising fumes of wine conspire
To warm their rage, and fan the brutal fire,

Then scenes of horror are their dear delight,
They whirl the goblets, and provoke the fight:
Then on the slain the revel is renew'd
And all the horrid banquet floats in blood.

And now the winged Hermes from on high
Shot in deep silence from the dusky sky;
Then hover'd o'er the Theban tyrant's head,
As stretch'd at ease he prest his gorgeous bed:
Where labour'd tapestry from side to side,
Glow'd with rich figures, and Assyrian pride.
Oh! the precarious terms of human state!
How blind is man! how thoughtless of his fate!
See! through his limbs the dews of slumber creep,
Sunk as he lies, in luxury and sleep.
The reverend shade commission'd from above,
Hastes to fulfil the high behests of Jove:
Like blind Ixion to the bed he came,
In form, in habit, and in voice the same.
Pale, as before, the phantom still appear'd,
Down his wan bosom flow'd a length of beard;
His head an imitated fillet wore,
His hand a wreath of peaceful olive bore:
With this he touch'd the sleeping monarch's breast,
And in his own, the voice of fate express'd.

Then canst thou sleep, to thoughtless rest re-
sign'd?

And drive thy brother's image from thy mind?
Yon gathering storm demands thy timely care,
See! how it rolls this way the tide of war.
When o'er the seas the sweeping whirlwinds fly,
And roar from every quarter of the sky;
The pilot, in despair the ship to save,
Gives up the helm, a sport to every wave:
Such is thy error, and thy fate the same
(For know, I speak the common voice of fame),
Proud in his new alliances, from far
Against thy realm he meditates the war;
Big with ambitious hopes to reign alone,
And swell unrival'd on the Theban throne.
New signs and fatal prodigies inspire
His mad ambition, with his boasted fire;
And Argos' ample realms in dower bestow'd,
And Tydeus reeking from his brother's blood,
League and conspire to raise him to the throne,
And make his tedious banishment thy own.
For this, with pity touch'd, almighty Jove,
The fire of gods, dispatch'd me from above.
Be still a monarch; let him swell in vain
With a gay prospect of a fancy'd reign:
Still let him hope by fraud, or by the sword,
To humble Thebes beneath a foreign lord.

Thus the majestic ghost; but e'er he fled,
He pluck'd the wreaths and fillets from his head.
For now the sickening stars were chas'd away,
And heaven's immortal coursers breath'd the
day.

Awful to sight confest the grandfire stood.
Bared his wide wound, and all his bosom show'd,
Then dash'd the sleeping monarch with his blood.

With a distracted air, and sudden spring,
Starts from his broken sleep the trembling king.
Shakes off amaz'd th' imaginary gore,
While fancy paints the scene he saw before:
Deep in his soul his grandfire's image wrought,
And all his brother rose in every thought.

So while the toils are spread, and from behind
The hunter's shouts come thickening in the wind;
The tiger starts from sleep the war to wage,
Collects his powers, and rouses all his rage:
Sternly he grinds his fangs, he weighs his might,
And whets his dreadful talents for the fight;
Then to his young he bears his foe away,
His foe at once the chaser and the prey,
Thus on his brother he in every thought,
Waged future wars, and battles yet unfought.

ON THE DEATH OF A YOUNG GENTLE- MAN.

With joy, blest youth, we saw thee reach the goal;
Fair was thy frame, and beautiful thy soul;
The graces and the muses came combin'd,
These to adorn the body, those the mind;
'Twas there we saw the softest manners meet,
Truth, sweetness, judgment, innocence, and wit.
So form'd, he flew his race; 'twas quickly won,
'Twas but a step, and finish'd when begun.
Nature herself surpris'd would add no more,
His life complete in all its parts before;
But his few years with pleasing wonder told,
By virtues, not by days; and thought him old.
So far beyond his age those virtues ran,
That in a boy she found him more than man.
For years let wretches importune the skies,
Till, at the long expence of anguish wise,
They live, to count their days by miseries.
Those win the prize, who soonest run the race,
And life burns brightest in the shortest space.
So to the convex glass embody'd run,
Drawn to a point the glories of the sun;
At once the gathering beams intensely glow,
And through the streighten'd circle fiercely flow:
In one strong flame conspire the blended rays,
Run to a fire, and crowd into a blaze.

CHRIST'S PASSION,

From a Greek Ode of Mr. Martin's, formerly of New College.

AN ODE.

No more of earthly subjects sing,
To heaven, my muse, aspire;
To raise the song, charge every string,
And strike the living lyre.
Begin; in lofty numbers show
Th' Eternal King's unfathom'd love,
Who reigns the sov'reign God above,
And suffers on the cross below.
Prodigious pile of wonders! rais'd too high
For the dim ken of frail mortality.
What numbers shall I bring along!
From whence shall I begin the song?
The mighty mystery I'll sing inspir'd
Beyond the reach of human wisdom wrought,
Beyond the compass of an angel's thought,
How by the rage of man his God expir'd.
I'll make the trackless depths of mercy known,
How to redeem his foe God render'd up his Son;

I'll raise my voice to tell mankind
The victor's conquest o'er his doom,
How in the grave he lay confin'd,
To seal more sure the ravenous tomb.
Three days th' infernal empire to subdue,
He pass'd triumphant through the coasts of woe;
With his own dart the tyrant death he flew,
And led hell captive through her realms below.

A mingled sound from Calvary I hear,
And the loud tumults thicken on my ear,
The shouts of murderers that insult the slain,
The voice of torment and the shrieks of pain.

I cast my eyes with horror up
To the curst mountain's guilty top;
See there! whom hanging in the midst I view!
Ah! how unlike the other two!
I see him high above his foes,
And gently bending to the wood
His head in pity down to those,
Whose guilt conspires to shed his blood.
His wide-extended arms I see,
Transfix'd with nails, and fasten'd to the tree.

Man! senseless man! canst thou look on?
Nor make thy Saviour's pains thy own.
The rage of all thy pain exert,
Rend thy garments and thy heart:
Beat thy breast, and grovel low,
Beneath the burden of thy woe;
Bleed through thy bowels, tear thy hairs,
Breathe gales of sighs, and weep a flood of tears.

Behold thy King with purple cover'd round,
Not in the Tyrian tincture dy'd,
Nor dipt in poison of Sidonian pride,
But in his own rich blood that streams from every wound.

Dost thou not see the thorny circle red?
The guilty wreath that blushes round his head?
And with what rage the bloody scourge apply'd,
Curls round his limbs, and ploughs into his side?

At such a sight let all thy anguish rise,
Break up, break up the fountains of thy eyes.
Here bid thy tears in gushing torrents flow,
Indulge thy grief, and give a loose to woe.
Weep from thy soul, till earth be drown'd,
Weep, till thy sorrows drench the ground.
Canst thou, ungrateful man! his torment see,
Nor drop a tear for him, who pours his blood for thee?

ON THE KING'S RETURN,

IN THE YEAR 1720.

RETURN, auspicious prince, again,
Nor let Britannia mourn in vain;
Too long, too long, has she deplor'd
Her absent father and her lord.

To bend her gracious monarch's mind,
She sends her sighs in every wind:
Can Britain's prayer be thrown aside?
And that the first he e'er deny'd!

Yet, mighty prince, vouchsafe to smile,
Return and bless our longing isle;

Though fond Germania begs thy stay,
And courts thee from our eyes away.

Though Belgia would our king detain,
We know she begs and pleads in vain;
We know our gracious king prefers
Britannia's happiness to her's.

And lo! to save us from despair,
At length he listens to our prayer.
Dejected Albion's vows he hears,
And hastes to dry her falling tears.

He hears his anxious people pray,
And loudly call their king away,
Once more their longing eyes to bless,
And guard their freedom and their peace.

They know, while Brunswick fills the throne,
The seasons glide with pleasure on;
The British suns improve their rays,
Adorn, and beautify the days.

But see the royal vessel flies,
Lessening to Belgia's weeping eyes:
She proudly sails for Albion's shores,
Guard her, ye gods, with all your powers.

O sea, bid every wave subside,
And teach allegiance to thy tide;
Thy billows in subjection keep,
And own the monarch of deep.

Old Thames can scarce his joy sustain,
But runs down headlong to the main,
His mighty master to descry,
And leaves his spacious channel dry.

Augusta's sons from either hand
Pour forth, and darken all the strand;
Their eyes pursue the royal barge,
Which now resigns her sacred charge,

Th' unruly transport shakes the shore,
And drowns the feeble cannon's roar;
The nations in the sight rejoice,
And send their souls in every voice.

But now amidst the loud applause,
With shame the conscious muse withdraws,
Nor can her voice be heard amidst the throng,
The theme so lofty, and so low the song.

ON THE MASQUERADES.

"Si Natura negant, facit indignatio versum."

WELL—we have reach'd the precipice at last;
The present age of vice obscures the past.
Our dull forefathers were content to stay,
Nor sinn'd, till nature pointed out the way:
No arts they practis'd to forestal delight,
But stopp'd to wait the calls of appetite.
Their top-debauches were at best precise,
An unimprov'd simplicity of vice.

But this blest age has found a fairer road,
And left the paths their ancestors had trod.
Nay, we could wear (our taste so very nice is)
Their old cast-fashions sooner than their vices.

Whoring till now a common trade has been,
But masquerades refine upon the sin:
An higher taste to wickedness impart,
And second nature with the helps of art.
New ways and means to pleasures we devise,
Since pleasure looks the lovelier in disguise.
The stealth and frolic give a smarter gust,
Add wit to vice, and eloquence to lust.

In vain the modish evil to redress,
At once conspire the pulpit and the press:
Our priests and poets preach and write in vain;
All satyr's lost both sacred and profane.
So many various changes to impart,
Would tire an Ovid or a Proteus' art;
Where lost in one promiscuous whim we see,
Sex, age, condition, quality, degree.
Where the facetious crowd themselves lay down,
And take up every person but their own.
Fools, dukes, rakes, cardinals, fops, Indian queens,
Belles in tie-wigs, and lords in harlequins;
Troops of right honourable porters come,
And garter'd small-coal-merchants crowd the room:
Valets adorn'd with coronets appear,
Lacqueys of state, and footmen with a star:
Sailors of quality with judges mix,
And chimney-sweepers drive their coach and six,
Statesmen so us'd at court the mask to wear,
With less disguise assume the vizor here.
Officious Heydegger deceives our eyes,
For his own person is his best disguise:
And half the reigning toasts of equal grace,
Trust to the natural vizor of the face.
Ideots turn conjurers; and courtiers clowns;
And sultans drop their handkerchiefs to nuns.
Starch'd quakers glare in furbelows and silk;
Beaux deal in sprats, and duchesses cry milk.
But guard thy fancy, muse, nor stain thy pen
With the lewd joys of this fantastic scene;
Where sexes blend in one confus'd intrigue,
Where the girls ravish, and the men grow big:
Nor credit what the idle world has said,
Of lawyers forc'd, and judges brought to bed:
Or that to belles their brothers breathe their vows,
Or husbands through mistake gallant a spouse.
Such dire disasters, and a numerous throng
Of like enormities, require the song:
But the chaste muse, with blushes cover'd o'er,
Retires confus'd, and will reveal no more.

ON A SHADOW.

AN ODE.

How are deluded humankind
By empty shows betray'd?
In all their hopes and schemes they find
A nothing or a shade.

The prospects of a truncheon cast
A soldier on the wars;
Dismiss'd with shatter'd limbs at last,
Brats, poverty, and scars.

The fond philosopher for gain
Will leave unturn'd no stone;
But though they toil with endless pain,
They never find their own.

By the same rock the chemists drown,
And find no friendly hold,
But melt their ready specie down,
In hopes of fancy'd gold.

What is the mad projector's care?
In hopes elate and swelling,
He builds his castles in the air,
Yet wants an house to dwell in.

At court the poor dependants fail,
And damn their fruitless toil,
When complimented thence to jail,
And ruin'd with a smile.

How to philosophers will sound
So strange a truth display'd?
"There's not a substance to be found,
"But every where a shade."

TO CÆLIA PLAYING ON A LUTE.

ON ODE.

WHILE Cælia's hands fly swiftly o'er,
And strike this soft machine,
Her touch awakes the springs, and life
Of harmony within.

Sweetly they sink into the strings,
The quivering strings rebound,
Each stroke obsequiously obey,
And tremble into sound.

Oh! had you blest the years of old;
His lute had Ovid strung,
And dwelt on your's, the charming theme
Of his immortal song.

Yours, with Arion's wondrous harp,
The bard had hung on high;
And on the new-born star bestow'd
The honours of the sky.

The radiant spheres had ceas'd their tunes,
And danc'd in silence on,
Pleas'd the new harmony to hear,
More heavenly than their own.

Of old to raise one shade from hell,
To Orpheus was it given:
But every tune of your's calls down
An angel from his heaven.

TO THE

UNKNOWN AUTHOR OF THE BATTLE OF THE SEXES.

THE theme in other works, for every part,
Supplies materials to the builder's art:
To build from matter, is sublimely great,
But gods and poets only can create;
And such are you; their privilege you claim,
To show your wonders, but conceal your name.

Like some establish'd king, without controul,
You take a general progress through the soul;
Survey each part, examine every side,
Where she's secure, and where unfortify'd.
In faithful lines her history declare,
And trace the causes of her civil war;

Your pen no partial prejudices sway,
But truth decides, and virtue wins the day.

Through what gay fields and flowery scenes we pass,

Where fancy sports, and fiction leads the chase?
Where life, as through her various acts she tends,
Like other comedies, in marriage ends.

What muse but yours so justly could display
Th' embattled passions marshall'd in array?

Bid the rang'd appetites in order move,
Give lust a figure, and a shape to love?

To airy notions solid forms dispense,
And make our thoughts the images of sense?

Discover all the rational machine, [within?
And show the movements, springs, and wheels

But Hymen waves his torch, all discords cease;
All parley, drop their arms, and sue for peace.

Soon as the signal flames, they quit the fight,
For all at first but differ'd to unite.

From every part the lines in order move,
And sweetly centre in the point of love.

Let blockheads to the musty schools repair,
And poach for morals and the passions there,

Where virtue, like a dwarf in giant's arms,
Cumber'd with words, and manacled in terms,

Serves to amuse the philosophic fool,
By method dry, and regularly dull.

Who sees thy lines so visibly express
The soul herself in such a pleasing dress;

May from thy labours be convinc'd and taught,
How Spenser would have sung, and Plato thought.

THE TWELFTH ODE OF THE FIRST BOOK OF HORACE, TRANSLATED.

WHAT man, what hero will you raise,
By the shrill pipe, or deeper lyre?
What God, O Clio, will you praise,
And teach the echoes to admire?

Amidst the shades of Helicon,
Cold Hæmus' tops, or Pindus' head,
Whence the glad forests hasten'd down,
And danc'd as tuneful Orpheus play'd.

Taught by the muse, he stop'd the fall
Of rapid floods, and charm'd the wind;
The listening oaks obey'd the call,
And left their wondering hills behind.

Whom should I first record, but Jove,
Whose sway extends o'er sea and land,
The king of men and gods above,
Who holds the seasons in command?

To rival Jove, shall none aspire,
None shall to equal glory rise;
But Pallas claims beneath her fire,
The second honours of the skies.

To thee, O Bacchus, great in war,
To Dian will I strike the string,
Of Phœbus wounding from afar,
In numbers like his own I'll sing.

The muse Alcides shall resound;
The twins of Leda shall succeed;
This for the standing fight renown'd,
And that for managing the steed.

Whose star shines innocently still ;
The clouds disperse, the tempests cease,
The waves obedient to their will,
Sink down, and hush their rage to peace.

Next shall I Numa's pious reign,
Or thine, O Romulus, relate :
Or Rome by Brutus free'd again,
Or haughty Cato's glorious fate ?

Or dwell on noble Paulus' fame ?
Too lavish of the patriot's blood ?
Or Regulus' immortal name,
Too obstinately just and good ?

These with Camillus brave and bold,
And other chiefs of matchless might,
Rome's virtuous poverty of old,
Severely season'd to the fight.

Like trees, Marcellus' glory grows,
With an insensible advance ;
The Julian star, like Cynthia, glows,
Who leads the planetary dance.

The fates, O sire of human race,
Intrust great Cæsar to thy care,
Give him to hold thy second place,
And reign thy sole vicegerent here.

And whether India he shall tame,
Or to his chains the Seres doom ;
Or mighty Parthia dreads his name,
And bows her haughty neck to Rome.

While on our groves thy bolts are hurl'd,
And thy loud car shakes heaven above,
He shall with justice awe the world,
To none inferior but to Jove.

THE TWENTY-SECOND ODE OF THE FIRST BOOK OF HORACE.

THE man unsully'd with a crime,
Disdains the pangs of fear,
He scorns to dip the poison'd shaft,
Or poise the glittering spear.

Nor with the loaded quiver goes
To take the dreadful field :
His solid virtue is his helm,
And innocence his shield.

In vain the fam'd Hydaspes' tides,
Obstruct and bar the road,
He smiles on danger, and enjoys
The roarings of the flood.

All climes are native, and forgets
Th' extremes of heats and frosts,
The Scythian Caucasus grows warm,
And cool the Libyan coasts.

For while I wander'd through the woods,
And rang'd the lonely grove,
Lost and bewilder'd in the fogs
And pleasing cares of love ;

A wolf beheld me from afar,
Of monstrous bulk and might ;
But, naked as I was, he fled
And trembled at the sight.

A beast so huge, nor Daunia's grove,
Nor Afric ever view'd ;
Though nurs'd by her, the lion reigns
The monarch of the wood.

Expose me in those horrid climes,
Where not a gentle breeze
Revives the vegetable race,
Or cheers the drooping trees.

Where on the world's remotest verge
Th' unactive seasons lie,
And not one genial ray unbinds
The rigour of the sky.

On that uninhabitable shore,
Expose me all alone,
Where I may view without a shade,
The culminating sun.

Beneath th' equator, or the pole,
In safety could I rove ;
And in a thousand different climes
Could live for her I love.

A PROLOGUE FOR THE STROLLERS.

GENTEELS, of old pert prologues led the way,
To guide, defend, and usher in the play,
As powder'd footmen run before the coach,
And thunder at the door my lord's approach.
But though they speak your entertainment near,
Most prologues speed like other bills of fare ;
Seldom the languid stomach they excite,
And oftener pall, than raise the appetite.

As for the play—'tis hardly worth our care,
The prologue craves your mercy for the player ;
That is, your money—for by Jove I swear,
White gloves and lodging are confounded dear.
Since here are none but friends, the truth to own,
Hasp'd in a coach our company came down,
But I most shrewdly fear we shall depart,
Ev'n in our old original, a cart.

With pride inverted, and fantastic power,
We strut the fancy'd monarchs of an hour ;
While duns our emperors and heroes fear,
And * Cleomenes starves in earnest here :
The mightiest kings and queens we keep in pay,
Support their pomp on eighteen-pence a day.
Great Cyrus for a dram has pawn'd his coat,
And all our Cæsars can't command a groat ;
Our Scipios, Hannibals, and Pompeys break,
And Cleopatra shifts but once a week.

To aggravate the case, we have not one,
Of all the new refinements of the town :
No moving statues, no lewd harlequins,
No pasteboard players, no heroes in machines ;
No rosin to flash lightning—'twould exhaust us,
To buy a devil and a Doctor Faustus.
No windmills, dragons, millers, conjurers,
To exercise your eyes, and spare your ears ;
No paper seas, no thunder from the skies,
No witches to descend, no stage to rise ;
Scarce one for us the actors—we can set
Nothing before you but mere sense and wit.

* The Spartan Hero, a tragedy, by Mr. Dryden.

A bare downright old-fashion'd English feast,
Such as true Britons only can digest;
Such as your homely fathers us'd to love,
Who only came to hear and to improve:
Humbly content and pleas'd with what was dress'd,
When Otway, Lee, and Shakspeare rang'd the feast.

PSALM VIII. TRANSLATED.

O KING eternal and divine!

The world is thine alone:

Above the stars thy glories shine,

Above the heavens thy throne.

How far extends thy mighty name!

Where'er the sun can roll,

That sun thy wonders shall proclaim,

Thy deeds from pole to pole.

The infant's tongue shall speak thy power,

And vindicate thy laws;

The tongue that never spoke before,

Shall labour in thy cause.

For when I lift my thoughts and eyes,

And view the heavens around,

Yon stretching waste of azure skies,

With stars and planets crown'd;

Who in their dance attend the moon,

The empress of the night,

And pour around her silver throne,

Their tributary light:

Lord! what is mortal man? that he

Thy kind regard should share?

What is his son, who claims from thee

And challenges thy care?

Next to the blest angelic kind,

Thy hands created man,

And this inferior world assign'd,

To dignify his span.

Him all revere, and all obey

His delegated reign,

The flocks that through the valley stray,

The herds that graze the plain.

The furious tiger speeds his flight,

And trembles at his power;

In fear of his superior might,

The lions cease to roar.

Whatever horrid monsters tread

The paths beneath the sea,

Their king at awful distance dread,

And sullenly obey.

O Lord, how far extends thy name!

Where'er the sun can roll,

That sun thy wonders shall proclaim;

Thy deeds from pole to pole.

PSALM XXIV. PARAPHRASED.

FAR as the world can stretch its bounds,

The Lord is king of all,

His wondrous power extends around

The circuit of the ball.

For he within the gloomy deeps

Its dark foundations cast,

And rear'd the pillars of the earth

Amid the watery waste.

Who shall ascend his Sion's hill,

And see Jehovah there?

Who from his sacred shrine shall breathe

The sacrifice of prayer?

He only whose unfully'd soul

Fair virtue's paths has trod,

Who with clean hands and heart regards

His neighbour and his God.

On him shall his indulgent Lord

Diffusive bounties shed,

From God his Saviour shall descend

All blessings on his head.

Of those who seek his righteous ways,

Is this the chosen race,

Who bask in all his bounteous smiles,

And flourish in his grace.

Lift up your stately heads, ye doors,

With hasty reverence rise;

Ye everlasting doors, who guard

The passes of the skies.

Swift from your golden hinges leap,

Your barriers roll away,

Now throw your blazing portals wide,

And burst the gates of day.

For see! the King of glory comes

Along th' ethereal road:

The cherubs through your folds shall bear

The triumph of your God.

Who is this great and glorious King?

Oh! 'tis the Lord, whose might

Decides the conquest, and suspends

The balance of the fight.

Lift up your stately heads, ye doors,

With hasty reverence rise;

Ye everlasting doors, who guard

The passes of the skies.

Swift from your golden hinges leap,

Your barriers roll away,

Now throw your blazing portals wide,

And burst the gates of day.

For see! the King of glory comes

Along th' ethereal road:

The cherubs through your folds shall bear

The triumphs of their God.

Who is this great and glorious King?

Oh! 'tis the God, whose care

Leads on his Israel to the field,

Whose power controuls the war.

PSALM XXIX.

Ye mighty princes, your oblations bring,

And pay due honours to your awful King;

His boundless power to all the world proclaim,

Bend at his shrine, and tremble at his name.

For hark! his voice with unresisted sway

Rules and controuls the raging of the sea;

Within due bounds the mighty ocean keeps,
 And in their watery cavern awes the deeps:
 Shook by that voice, the nodding groves around
 Start from their roots, and fly the dreadful sound.
 The blasted cedars low in dust are laid
 And Lebanon is left without a shade.
 See! when he speaks, the lofty mountains crowd,
 And fly for shelter from the thundering God:
 Sirion and Lebanon like hinds advance,
 And in wild measures lead th' unwieldy dance.
 His voice, his mighty voice, divides the fire,
 Back from the blast the shrinking flames retire.
 Ev'n Cades trembles when Jehovah speaks,
 With all his savages the desert shakes.
 At the dread sound the hinds with fear are stung,
 And in the lonely forest drop their young.
 While in his hallow'd temple all proclaim
 His glorious honours, and adore his name.
 High o'er the foaming surges of the sea
 He sits, and bids the listening deeps obey:
 He reigns o'er all; for ever lasts his power
 Till nature sinks, and time shall be no more.
 With strength the sons of Israel shall he bless,
 And crown our tribes with happiness and peace.

PSALM XLVI. PARAPHRASED.

ON God we build our sure defence,
 In God our hope repose:
 His hand protects us in the fight,
 And guards us from our woes.
 Then be the earth's unwieldy frame
 From its foundation hurl'd,
 We may, unmov'd with fear, enjoy
 The ruins of the world.
 What though the solid rocks be rent,
 In tempests whirl'd away?
 What though the hills should burst their roots,
 And roll into the sea?
 Thou sea, with dreadful tumults swell,
 And bid thy waters rise
 In furious surges, till they dash
 The flood-gates of the skies.
 Our minds shall be serene and calm,
 Like Siloah's peaceful flood;
 Whose soft and silver streams refresh
 The city of our God.
 Within the proud delighted waves
 Their wanton turrets play;
 The streams lead down their humid train
 Reluctant to the sea.
 Amid the scene the temple floats,
 With its reflected towers,
 Gilds all the surface of the flood,
 And dances to the shores.
 With wonder see what mighty power
 Our sacred Sion cheers;
 Lo! there amidst her stately walls
 Her God, her God appears.
 Fix'd on her basis she shall stand,
 And, innocently proud,
 Smile on the tumults of the world,
 Beneath the wings of God.

See! how, their weakness to proclaim,
 The heathen tribes engage!
 See! how with fruitless wrath they burn,
 And impotence of rage!

But God has spoke; and, lo! the world,
 His terrors to display,
 With all the melting globe of earth,
 Drops silently away.

Still to the mighty Lord of hosts
 Securely we resort;
 For refuge fly to Jacob's God,
 Our succour and support.

Hither, ye numerous nations, crowd,
 In silent rapture stand,
 And see o'er all the earth display'd
 The wonders of his hand.

He bids the din of war be still,
 And all its tumults cease;
 He bids the guiltless trumpet sound
 The harmony of peace.

He breaks the tough reluctant bow,
 He bursts the brazen spear,
 And in the crackling fire his hand
 Consumes the blazing car.

Hear then his formidable voice,
 "Be still and know the Lord;
 "By all the heathen I'll be fear'd,
 "By all the earth ador'd."

Still to the mighty Lord of hosts
 Securely we resort;
 For refuge fly to Jacob's God,
 Our succour and support.

PSALM XC. PARAPHRASED.

THY hand, O Lord, through rolling years
 Has sav'd us from despair,
 From period down to period stretch'd
 The prospects of thy care.

Before the world was first conceiv'd,
 Before the pregnant earth
 Call'd forth the mountains from her womb,
 Who struggled to their birth;

Eternal God! thy early days
 Beyond duration run,
 Ere the first race of starting time
 Was measur'd by the sun.

We die; but future nations hear
 Thy potent voice again;
 Rise at the summons, and restore
 The perish'd race of man.

Before thy comprehensive sight
 Duration fleets away;
 And rapid ages on the wing
 Fly swifter than a day.

As great Jehovah's piercing eyes
 Eternity explore,
 The longest æra is a night,
 A period is an hour.

We at thy mighty call, O Lord,
 Our fancy'd beings leave,

Rous'd from the flattering dream of life,
To sleep within the grave.

Swift from their barrier to their goal
The rapid moments pass,
And leave poor man, for whom they run,
The emblem of the grass.

In the first morn of life it grows,
And lifts its verdant head,
At noon decays, at evening dies,
And withers in the mead.

We in the glories of thy face
Our secret sins survey,
And see how gloomy those appear,
How pure and radiant they.

To death, as our appointed goal,
Thy anger drives us on,
To that full period fix'd at length
This tale of life is done.

With winged speed to stated bounds
And limits we must fly,
While seventy rolling suns complete
Their circles in the sky.

Or if ten more around us roll,
'Tis labour, woe, and strife,
Till we at length are quite drawn down
To the last dregs of life.

But who, O Lord, regards thy wrath,
Though dreadful and severe?
That wrath, whatever fear he feels,
Is equal to his fear.

So teach us, Lord, to count our days,
And eye their constant race,
To measure what we want in time
By wisdom and by grace.

With us repent, and on our hearts
Thy choicest graces shed,
And shower from thy celestial throne
Thy blessings on our head.

Oh! may thy mercy crown us here,
And come without delay;
Then our whole course of life will seem
One glad triumphant day.

Now the blest years of joy restore
For those of grief and strife,
And with one pleasant drop allay
This bitter draught of life.

Thy wonders to the world display,
Thy servants to adorn,
That may delight their future sons,
And children yet unborn.

Thy beams of majesty diffuse,
With them thy great commands,
And bid prosperity attend
The labours of our hands.

PSALM CXXXIX. PARAPHRASED.

IN MILTONIC VERSE.

O dread Jehovah! thy all-piercing eyes
Explore the motions of this mortal frame,

This tenement of dust: Thy stretching sight
Surveys th' harmonious principles that move
In beauteous rank and order, to inform
This cask and animated mass of clay.

Nor are the prospects of thy wondrous sight
To this terrestrial part of man confin'd;
But shoot into his soul, and there discern
The first materials of unfashion'd thought,
Yet dim and undigested, till the mind,
Big with the tender images, expands,
And, swelling, labours with th' ideal birth.

Where'er I move, thy cares pursue my feet
Attendant. When I drink the dews of sleep,
Stretch'd on my downy bed, and there enjoy
A sweet forgetfulness of all my toils,
Unseen thy sovereign presence guards my sleep
Wafts all the terrors of my dreams away,
Soothes all my soul, and softens my repose.

Before conception can employ the tongue,
And mould the ductile images to sound;
Before imagination stands display'd,
Thine eye the future eloquence can read,
Yet unarray'd with speech. Thou, mighty Lord!
Hast moulded man from his congenial dust,
And spoke him into being; while the clay,
Beneath thy forming hand, leap'd forth, inspir'd,
And started into life: through every part,
At thy command, the wheels of motion play'd.

But such exalted knowledge leaves below
And drops poor man from its superior sphere.
In vain, with reason's ballast, would he try
To stem th' unfathomable depth; his bark
O'ersets, and founders in the vast abyss.

Then whither shall the rapid fancy run,
Though in its full career, to speed my flight
From thy unbounded presence? which alone
Fills all the regions and extended space
Beyond the bounds of nature! Whither, Lord,
Shall my unrein'd imagination rove,
To leave behind thy spirit, and out-fly [spread,
Its influence, which, with brooding wings out-
Hatch'd unsledg'd nature from the dark profound.

If, mounted on my towering thoughts, I climb
Into the heaven of heavens, I there behold
The blaze of thy unclouded majesty!
In the pure empyrean thee I view,
High thron'd above all height, thy radiant shrine,
Throng'd with the prostrate seraphs, who receive
Beatitude past utterance! If I plunge
Down to the gloom of Tartarus profound,
There too I find thee in the lowest bounds
Of Erebus, and read thee in the scenes
Of complicated wrath: I see thee clad
In all the majesty of darkness there.

If, on the ruddy morning's purple wings
Upborne, with indefatigable course,
I seek the glowing borders of the east,
Where the bright sun, emergent from the deeps,
With his first glories gilds the sparkling seas,
And trembles o'er the waves; ev'n there thy hand
Shall through the watery desert guide my course,
And o'er the broken surges pave my way,
While on the dreadful whirls I hang secure,
And mock the warring ocean. If, with hopes,
As fond as false, the darkness I expect

To hide, and wrap me in its mantling shade,
Vain were the thought : for thy unbounded ken
Darts through the thickening gloom, and pries
through all

The palpable obscure. Before thy eyes,
The vanquish'd night throws off her dusky shroud,
And kindles into day : the shade and light,
To man still various, but the same to thee.

On thee is all the structure of my frame
Dependant. Lock'd within the silent womb,
Sleeping I lay, and ripening to my birth ;
Yet, Lord, thy out-stretch'd arm preserv'd me there ;
Before I mov'd to entity, and trod
The verge of being. To thy hallow'd name
I'll pay due honours : for thy mighty hand
Built this corporeal fabric, when it laid
The ground-work of existence. Hence, I read
The wonders of thy art. This frame I view,
With terror and delight ; and, wrapt in both,
I startle at myself. My bones, unform'd
As yet, nor hardening from the viscous parts,
But blended with th' unanimated mass,
Thy eye distinctly view'd ; and while I lay
Within the earth, imperfect, nor perceiv'd
The first faint dawn of life, with ease survey'd
The vital glimmerings of the active seeds,
Just kindling to existence ; and beheld
My substance scarce material. In thy book,
Was the fair model of this structure drawn,
Where every part, in just connection join'd,
Compos'd and perfected th' harmonious piece,
Ere the dim speck of being learn'd to stretch
Its ductile form, or entity had known
To range and wanton in an ampler space.

How dear, how rooted in my inmost soul,
Are all thy counsels, and the various ways
Of thy eternal providence ! The sum
So boundless and immense, it leaves behind
The low account of numbers ; and out-flies
All that imagination e'er conceiv'd,
Less numerous are the sands that crowd the shores,
The barriers of the ocean. When I rise
From my soft bed, and softer joys of sleep,
I rise to thee. Yet lo ! the impious flight
Thy mighty wonders. Shall the sons of vice
Elude the vengeance of thy wrathful hand,
And mock thy lingering thunder, which with-
holds

Its forked terrors, from their guilty heads !
Thou great tremendous God !—Avaunt, and fly,
All ye who thirst for blood.—For, sworn with
pride,

Each haughty wretch blasphemes thy sacred name,
And bellows his reproaches to affront
Thy glorious Majesty. Thy foes I hate
Worse than my own, O Lord ! Explore my soul,
See if a flaw or stain of sin infects
My guilty thoughts. Then, lead me in the way
That guides my feet to thy own heaven and thee.

PSALM CXLIV. PARAPHRASED.

My soul in raptures rise to bless the Lord,
Who taught my hands to draw the fatal sword ;
Led by his arm, undaunted I appear
In the first ranks of death and front of war.

He taught me first the pointed spear to wield,
And mow the glorious harvest of the field.
By him inspir'd, from strength to strength I pass,
Plung'd through the troops, and laid the battle waste.

In him my hopes I centre and repose,
He guards my life, and shields me from my foes.
He held his ample buckler o'er my head,
And screen'd me trembling in the mighty shade :
Against all hostile violence and power,
He was my sword, my bulwark, and my tower.
He o'er my people will maintain my sway,
And teach my willing subjects to obey.

Lord ! what is man of vile and humble birth,
Sprung with this kindred reptiles from the earth,
That he should thus thy secret counsels share,
Or what his son, who challenges thy care ?
Why does thine eye regard this nothing, man ?
His life a point, his measure but a span ;
The fancy'd pageant of a moment made,
Swift as a dream, and fleeting as a shade.

Come in thy power, and leave th' ethereal plain,
And to thy harness'd tempest give the rein ;
Yon starry arch shall bend beneath the load,
So loud the chariot, and so great the God !
Soon as his rapid wheels Jehovah rolls,
The folding skies shall tremble to the poles :
Heaven's gaudy axle with the world shall fall,
Leap from the centre, and unhinge the ball. [pire

Touch'd by thy hands, the labouring hills ex-
Thick clouds of smoke, and deluges of fire ;
On the tall groves the red destroyer preys,
And wraps th' eternal mountains in the blaze :
Full on my foes may all thy lightnings fly,
On purple pinions through the gloomy sky.

Extend thy hand, thou kind all-gracious God,
Down from the heaven of heavens thy bright
abode,

And shield me from my foes, whose towering pride
Lowers like a storm, and gathers like a tide :
Against strange children vindicate my cause,
Who curse thy name, and trample on thy laws ;
Who fear not vengeance which they never felt,
Train'd to blasphemy, and eloquent in guilt :
Their hands are impious, and their deeds profane,
They plead their boasted innocence in vain.

Thy name shall dwell for ever on my tongue,
And guide the sacred numbers of my song ;
To thee my muse shall consecrate her lays,
And every note shall labour in thy praise ;
The hallow'd theme shall teach me how to sing,
Swell on the lyre, and tremble on the string.

Oft has thy hand from fight the monarch led,
When death flew raging, and the battle bled ;
And snatch'd thy servant in the last despair
From all the rising tumult of the war.

Against strange children vindicate my cause,
Who curse thy name, and trample on thy laws ;
That our fair sons may smile in early bloom,
Our sons, the hopes of all our years to come :
Like plants that nurs'd by fostering showers arise,
And lift their spreading honours to the skies.

That our chaste daughters may their charms display,
Like the bright pillars of our temple, gay,
Polish'd, and tall, and smooth, and fair as they.

Piled up with plenty let our barns appear,
 And burst with all the seasons of the year;
 Let pregnant flocks in every quarter bleat,
 And drop their tender young in every street.
 Safe from their labours may our oxen come,
 Safe may they bring the gather'd summer home.
 Oh! may no sighs, no streams of sorrow flow,
 To stain our triumphs with the tears of woe,
 Bless'd is the nation, how sincerely bless'd!
 Of such unbounded happiness possess'd,
 To whom Jehovah's sacred name is known,
 Who claim the God of Israel for their own.

JOB, CHAP. III.

Job curs'd his birth, and bade his curses flow
 In words of grief, and eloquence of woe;
 Lost be that day which dragg'd me to my doom,
 Recent to life, and struggling from the womb;
 Whose beams with such malignant lustre shone,
 Whence all my years in anxious circles run.
 Lost be that night in undetermin'd space,
 And veil with deeper shades her gloomy face,
 Which crowded up with woes this slender span,
 While the dull mafs rose quickening into man.

O'er that curs'd day let sable darkness rise,
 Shroud the blue vault, and blacken all the skies;
 May God o'erlook it from his heavenly throne,
 Nor rouse from sleep the sedentary sun.
 O'er its dark face to shed his genial ray,
 And warm to joy the melancholy day.
 May the clouds frown, and livid poisons breathe,
 And stain heaven's azure with the shade of death.

May ten-fold darkness from that dreadful night
 Seize and arrest the straggling gleams of light;
 To pay due vengeance for its fatal crime,
 Still be it banish'd from the train of time;
 Nor in the radiant list of months appear,
 To stain the shining circle of the year:

There through her dusky range may silence
 roam,

There may no ray, no glimpse of gladness come,
 No voice to cheer the solitary gloom.
 May every star his gaudy light with-hold,
 Nor through the vapour shoot his beamy gold:
 Nor let the dawn with radiant skirts come on,
 Tipp'd with the glories of the rising sun;
 Because that dreadful period fix'd my doom,
 Nor seal'd the dark recesses of the womb.
 To that original my ills I owe,
 Heir of affliction, and the son of woe.
 Oh! had I dy'd unexercis'd in pain,
 And wak'd to life, to sleep in death again!
 Why did not fate attend me at my birth,
 And give me back to my congenial earth?
 Why was I, when an infant, sooth'd to rest,
 Lull'd on the knee, or hung upon the breast?
 For now the grave would all my cares compose,
 Conceal my sorrows, and inter my woes:
 There wrapp'd and lock'd within his cold embrace,
 Safe had I slumber'd in the arms of peace;
 There with the mighty kings, who lie inroll'd
 In clouds of incense, and in beds of gold;
 There with the princes, who in grandeur shone,
 And aw'd the trembling nations from the throne;

Afflicted Job an equal rest might have,
 And share the dark retirement of the grave;
 Or as a shapeless embryo seek the tomb,
 Rude and imperfect from the abortive womb:
 Ere motion's early principle began,
 Or the dim substance kindled into man. [cease,

There from their monstrous crimes the wicked
 There labouring guilt is weary'd into peace;
 There blended sleep the coward and the brave,
 Stretch'd with his lord, the undistinguish'd slave }
 Enjoys the common refuge of the grave.

An equal lot the mighty victor shares,
 And lies amidst the captives of his wars;
 With his, those captives mingle their remains,
 The same in death, nor lessen'd by their chains,
 Why are we doom'd to view the genial ray?
 Why curst to bear the painful light of day?
 Oh! with what joy the wretches yield their breath?
 And pant in bitterness of soul for death?
 As a rich prize, the distant bliss they crave,
 And find the glorious treasure in the grave.
 Why is the wretch condemn'd without relief,
 To combat woe, and tread the round of grief,
 Whom in the toils of fate his God has bound,
 And drawn the line of miseries around?

When nature calls for aid, my sighs intrude,
 My tears prevent my necessary food:
 Like a full stream o'ercharg'd, my sorrows flow,
 In bursts of anguish, and a tide of woe;
 For now the dire affliction which I fled,
 Pours like a roaring torrent on my head.
 My terrors still the phantom view'd, and wrought
 The dreadful image into every thought:
 At length pluck'd down, the fatal stroke I feel
 And lose the fancy'd in the real ill.

JOB, CHAP. XXV. PARAPHRASED.

THEN will vain man complain and murmur still?
 And stand on terms with his Creator's will?
 Shall this high privilege to clay be given?
 Shall dust arraign the providence of heaven?
 With reason's line the boundless distance scan;
 Oppose heaven's awful majesty to man.
 To what a length his vast dominions run?
 How far beyond the journeys of the sun?
 He hung yon golden balls of light on high,
 And launch'd the planets through the liquid sky:
 To rolling worlds he mark'd the certain space,
 Fix'd and sustain'd the elemental peace.

Unnumber'd as those worlds his armies move,
 And the gay legions guard his realms above;
 High o'er th' ethereal plains, the myriads rise,
 And pour their flaming ranks along the skies:
 From their bright arms incessant splendours stream,
 And the wide azure kindles with the gleam.

To this low world he bids the light repair,
 Down through the gulfs of undulating air:
 For man he taught the glorious sun to roll,
 From his bright barrier to his western goal.

How then shall man, thus insolently proud,
 Plead with his Judge, and combat with his God?
 How from his mortal mother can he come,
 Unstain'd from sin, untin'dur'd from the womb?

The Lord from his sublime empyreal throne,
 As a dark globe, regards the silver moon.

Those stars, that grace the wide celestial plain,
Are but the humblest sweepings of his train;
Dim are the brightest splendours of the sky;
And the sun darkens in Jehovah's eye.
But does not sin diffuse a fouler stain,
And thicker darkness cloud the soul of man?
Shall he the depths of endless wisdom know?
The short-liv'd sovereign of the world below?
His frail original confounds his boast, [dust.
Sprung from the ground, and quicken'd from the

THE SONG OF MOSES,

IN THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER OF EXODUS, PARAPHRASED.

THEN to the Lord, the vast triumphant throng
Of Israel's sons, with Moses, rais'd the song.

To God our grateful accents will we raise,
And every tongue shall celebrate his praise:
Behold display'd the wonders of his might;
Behold the Lord triumphant in the fight!
With what immortal fame and glory grac'd!
What trophies rais'd amid the watery waste!
How did his power the steeds and riders sweep
Ingulf'd in heaps, and whelm'd beneath the deep?

Whom should we fear, while he, heav'n's awful Lord,

Unsheaths for Israel his avenging sword?
His outstretch'd arm, and tutelary care,
Guarded and sav'd us in the last despair:
His mercy eas'd us from our circling pains,
Unbound our shackles and unlock'd our chains.
To him our God, our fathers God, I'll rear
A sacred temple, and adore him there,
With vows and incense, sacrifice and prayer.

The Lord commands in war; his matchless might

Hangs out and guides the balance of the fight:
By him the war the mighty leaders form,
And teach the hovering tumult where to storm.
His name, O Israel, Heaven's Eternal Lord,
For ever honour'd, reverenc'd, and ador'd.

When to the fight from Egypt's fruitful soil,
Pour'd forth in myriads all the sons of Nile;
The Lord o'erthrew the courser and the car,
Sunk Pharaoh's pride, and overwhelm'd his war.
Beneath th' encumber'd deeps his legions lay,
For many a league impurpling all the sea:
The chiefs, and steeds, and warriors whirl'd around,
Lay midst the roarings of the surges drown'd.

Who shall thy power, thou mighty God, withstand,

And check the force of thy victorious hand?
Thy hand, which red with wrath in terror rose,
To crush that day thy proud Egyptian foes.
Struck by that hand, their drooping squadrons fall,
Crowding in death; one fate o'erwhelms them all,

Soon as thy anger, charg'd with vengeance, came,

They sunk like stubble crackling in the flame.
At thy dread voice the summon'd billows crowd,
And a still silence lulls the wondering flood:
Roll'd up, the crystal ridges strike the skies,
Waves peep o'er waves, and seas o'er seas arise.

Around in heaps the listening surges band,
Mute and observant of the high command.
Congeal'd with fear attends the watery train,
Rous'd from the secret chambers of the main.

With savage joy the sons of Egypt cry'd,
(Vast were their hopes, and boundless was their pride)

Let us pursue those fugitives of Nile,
This servile nation, and divide the spoil:
And spread so wide the slaughter, till their blood
Dyes with a stronger red the blushing flood.
Oh! what a copious prey their hosts afford,
To glut and fatten the devouring sword!

As thus the yawning gulf the boasters pass'd,
At thy command rush'd forth the rapid blast.
Then, at the signal given, with dreadful sway,
In one huge heap roll'd down the roaring sea;
And now the disintangled waves divide,
Unlock their folds, and thaw the frozen tide.
The deeps alarm'd call terribly from far
The loud, embattled surges to the war;
Till her proud sons astonish'd Egypt found,
Cover'd with billows, and in tempests drown'd.

What God can emulate thy power divine,
Or who oppose his miracles to thine!
When joyful we adore thy glorious name,
Thy trembling foes confess their fear and shame.
The world attends thy absolute command,
And nature waits the wonders of thine hand.
That hand, extended o'er the swelling sea,
The conscious billows reverence and obey.
O'er the devoted race the surges sweep,
And whelm the guilty nation in the deep.
That hand redeem'd us from our servile toil,
And each insulting tyrant of the Nile:
Our nation came beneath that mighty hand,
From Egypt's realms to Canaan's sacred land.
Thou wert their Guide, their Saviour, and their God,

To smoothe the way, and clear the dreadful road.
The distant kingdoms shall thy wonders hear,
The fierce Philistines shall confess their fear;
Thy fame shall over Edom's princes spread,
And Moab's kings, the universal dread;
While the vast scenes of miracles impart
A thrilling horror to the bravest heart.
As through the world the gathering terror runs,
Canaan shall shrink, and tremble for his sons.
Till thou hast Jacob from his bondage brought,
At such a vast expence of wonders bought,
To Canaan's promis'd realms and blest abodes,
Led through the dark recesses of the floods.
Crown'd with their tribes shall proud Moriah rise,
And rear his summit nearer to the skies.

Through ages, Lord, shall stretch thy boundless power,

Thy throne shall stand when time shall be no more:
For Pharaoh's steeds, and cars, and warlike train,
Leap'd in, and boldly rang'd the sandy plain.
While in the dreadful road, and desert way,
The shining crowds of gasping fishes lay:
Till, all around with liquid toils beset,
The Lord swept o'er their heads the watery net.
He freed the ocean from his secret chain,
And on each hand discharg'd the thundering main.

The loosen'd billows burst from every side,
And whelm the war and warriors in the tide;
But on each hand the solid billows flood,
Like lofty mounds to check the raging flood;
Till the blest race to promis'd Canaan past
O'er the dry path, and trod the watery waste.

THE THIRD ODE OF THE SECOND BOOK
OF HORACE, PARAPHRASED.

LET the brave youth be train'd, the stings
Of poverty to bear,
And in the school of want be taught
The exercise of war.

Let him be practis'd in his bloom,
To listen to alarms,
And learn proud Parthia to subdue
With unresisted arms.

The hostile tyrant's beauteous bride,
Distracted with despair,
Beholds him pouring to the fight,
And thundering through the war.

As from the battlement she views
The slaughter of his sword,
Thus shall the fair express her grief,
And terrors for her Lord:

Look down, ye gracious powers, from heaven,
Nor let my comfort go,
Rude in the arts of war, to fight
This formidable foe.

Oh! not with half that dreadful rage
The royal savage flies,
When, at the slightest touch, he springs,
And darts upon his prize.

How fair, how comely are our wounds,
In our dear country's cause!
What fame attends the glorious fate,
That props our dying laws!

For death's cold hand arrests the fears
That haunt the coward's mind;
Swift she pursues the flying wretch,
And wounds him from behind.

Bravely regardless of disgrace,
Bold virtue stands alone,
With pure unfully'd glory shines,
And honours still her own.

From the dark grave, and silent dust,
She bids her sons arise,
And to the radiant train unfolds
The portals of the skies.

Now, with triumphant wings, she soars,
Above the realms of day,
Spurns the dull earth, and groveling crowd,
And towers th' ethereal way.

With her has silence a reward,
Within the blest'd abodes,
That holy silence which conceals
The secrets of the gods.

But with a wretch I would not live,
By sacrilege profan'd,

Nor lodge beneath one roof, nor launch
One vessel from the land:

For, blended with the bad, the good
The common stroke have felt,
And heaven's dire vengeance struck alike
At innocence and guilt.

The wrath divine pursues the wretch,
At present, lame and slow,
But yet, though tardy to advance,
She gives the surer blow.

THE THIRD ODE OF THE FOURTH BOOK
OF HORACE, PARAPHRASED.

Whom first, Melpomene, thy eye
With friendly aspect views,
Shall from his cradle rise renown'd,
And sacred to the muse.

Nor to the Isthmian games his fame
And deathless triumphs owe;
Nor shall he wear the verdant wreath,
That shades the champion's brow.

Nor in the wide Elæan plains
Fatigue the courser's speed;
Nor through the glorious cloud of dust,
Provoke the bounding steed.

Nor, as an haughty victor, mount
The Capitolian heights,
And proudly dedicate to Jove
The trophies of his fights.

Because his thundering hand in war
Has check'd the swelling tide
Of the stern tyrant's power, and broke
The measures of his pride.

But by sweet Tyburn's groves and streams
His glorious theme pursues,
And scorns the laurels of the war,
For those that crown the muse.

There in the most retir'd retreats,
He sets his charming song,
To the sweet harp which Sappho touch'd,
Or bold Alcæus strung.

Rank'd by thy sons, Imperial Rome,
Among the poet's quire,
Above the reach of envy's hand
I safely may aspire.

Thou sacred muse, whose artful hand
Can teach the bard to sing;
Can animate the golden lyre,
And wake the living string:

Thou, by whose mighty power, may sing,
In unaccustom'd strains,
The silent fishes in the floods,
As on their banks the swans.

To thee I owe my spreading fame,
That thousands, as they gaze,
Make me their wonder's common theme,
And object of their praise.

If first I struck the Lesbian lyre,
No fame belongs to me;
I owe my honours, when I please,
(If e'er I please) to thee.

ON THE
APPROACHING CONGRESS OF CAMBRAY.

WRITTEN IN 1721.

YE patriots of the world, whose cares combin'd
Consult the public welfare of mankind,
One moment let the crowding kingdoms wait,
And Europe in suspense attend her fate,
Which turns in your great councils; nor refuse
To hear the strains of the prophetic muse;
Who sees those councils with a generous care
Heal the wide wounds, and calm the rage of war;
She sees new verdure all the plain o'erspread,
Where the fight burn'd, and where the battle bled.
The fields of death a softer scene disclose,
And Ceres smiles where iron harvests rose.
The bleating flocks along the bastion pass,
And from the awful ruins crop the grass.
Freed from his fears, each unmolested swain,
In peaceful furrows cuts the fatal plain;
Turns the high bulwark and aspiring mound,
And sees the camp with all the seasons crown'd.
Beneath each clod, bright burnish'd arms appear;
Each furrow glitters with the pride of war;
The fields resound and tinkle as they break,
And the keen faulchion rings against the rake;
At rest beneath the hanging ramparts laid,
He sings securely in the dreadful shade.

Hark!—o'er the seas, the British lions roar
Their monarch's fame to every distant shore:
Swift on their canvas wings his navies go,
Wherever tides can roll, or winds can blow;
Their sails within the arctic circle rise,
Led by the stars that gild the northern skies;
Tempt frozen seas, nor fear the driving blast,
But swell exulting o'er the hoary waste;
O'er the wide ocean hold supreme command,
And active commerce spread through every land;
Or with full pride to southern regions run,
To distant worlds, on t' other side the sun;
And plough the tides, where odoriferous gales
Perfume the smiling waves, and stretch the belly-
ing sails.

See! the proud merchant seek the precious shore,
And trace the winding veins of glittering ore;
Low in the earth his wondering eyes behold
Th' imperfect metal ripening into gold.
The mountains tremble with alternate rays,
And cast at once a shadow and a blaze:
Streak'd o'er with gold, the pebbles flame around,
Gleam o'er the soil, and gild the tinkling ground;
Charg'd with the glorious prize, his vessels come,
And in proud triumph bring an India home.

Fair concord, hail; thy wings o'er Brunswick
spread,
And with thy olives crown his laurel'd head.
Come; in thy most distinguish'd charms appear;
Oh! come, and bolt the iron gates of war.
The fight stands still when Brunswick bids it cease,
The monarch speaks, and gives the world a peace;

Like awful justice, sits superior lord,
To poise the balance, or to draw the sword;
In due suspense the jarring realms to keep,
And hush the tumults of the world to sleep.

Now with a brighter face, and nobler ray,
Shine forth, thou source of light, and god of day;
Say, didst thou ever in thy bright career
Light up before a more distinguish'd year?
Through all thy journeys past, thou canst not see
A perfect image of what this shall be:
Scarce the Platonic year shall this renew,
Or keep the bright original in view.

THE FABLE

OF THE YOUNG MAN AND HIS CAT.

A HAPLESS youth, whom fates averse had drove
To a strange passion, and preposterous love,
Long'd to possess his puss's spotted charms,
And hug the tabby beauty in his arms.
To what odd whimsies love inveigles men?
Sure if the boy was ever blind, 'twas then.
Rack'd with his passion, and in deep despair,
The youth to Venus thus address'd his prayer.

O queen of beauty! since thy Cupid's dart
Has fir'd my soul, and rankles in my heart;
Since doom'd to burn in this unhappy flame,
From thee at least a remedy I claim;
If once, to bless Pigmalion's longing arms,
The marble soften'd into living charms;
And warm with life the purple current ran
In circling streams through every flinty vein;
If, with his own creating hands display'd,
He hugg'd the statue, and embrac'd a maid;
And with the breathing image fir'd his heart,
The pride of nature, and the boast of art:
Hear my request, and crown my wond'rous flame,
The same its nature, be thy gift the same;
Give me the like unusual joys to prove,
And though irregular, indulge my love.

Delighted Venus heard the moving prayer,
And soon resolv'd to ease the lover's care,
To set Miss Tabby off with every grace,
To dress, and fit her for the youth's embrace.

Now she by gradual change her form forsook,
First her round face an oval figure took;
The roguish dimples next his heart beguile,
And each grave whisker soften'd to a smile;
Unusual ogles wanton'd in her eye,
Her solemn purring dwindled to a sigh:
Sudden, a huge hoop-petticoat display'd,
A wide circumference! intrench'd the maid,
And for the tail in waving circles play'd.
Her fur, as destin'd still her charms to deck,
Made for her hands a muff, a tippet for her neck.

In the fine lady now her shape was lost,
And by such strange degrees she grew a toast;
Was all for ombre now; and who but she,
To talk of modes and scandal o'er her tea;
To settle every fashion of the sex,
And run through all the female politics;
To spend her time at toilet and basset,
To play, to flout, to flutter, and coquet:
From a grave thinking mouser, she was grown
The gayest flirt that coath'd it round the town.

But see how often some intruding woe
Nips all our blooming prospects at a blow !
For as the youth his lovely consort led
To the dear pleasures of the nuptial bed,
Just on that instant from an inner house,
Into the chamber popt a heedless mouse.
Miss Tabby saw, and brooking no delay, [prey.
Sprung from the sheets, and seiz'd the trembling
Nor did the bride, in that ill-fated hour,
Reflect that all her mousing-days were o'er.
The youth, astonish'd, felt a new despair,
Ixion-like he grasp'd, and grasp'd but air;
He saw his vows and prayers in vain bestow'd,
And lost the jilting goddess in a cloud.

TO MR. POPE,

ON HIS TRANSLATION OF HOMER'S ILIAD.

'Tis true, what fam'd Pythagoras maintain'd,
That souls departed in new bodies reign'd :
We must approve the doctrine, since we see
The soul of godlike Homer breathe in thee.
Old Ennius first, then Virgil felt her fires;
But now a British Poet she inspires.

To you, O Pope, the lineal right extends;
To you th' hereditary muse descends.
At a vast distance we of Homer heard,
Till you brought in, and naturaliz'd the bard;
Bade him our English rights and freedom claim,
His voice, his habit, and his air the same.
Now in the mighty stranger we rejoice,
And Britain thanks thee with a public voice.

See! too the poet, a majestic shade,
Lifts up in awful pomp his laurel'd head,
To thank his successor, who sets him free
From the vile hands of Hobbes and Ogilby;
Who vext his venerable ashes more,
Than his ungrateful Greece, the living bard before.

While Homer's thoughts in thy bold lines are shown, [own;
Though worlds contend, we claim him for our
Our blooming boys proud Ilion's fate bewail;
Our lisping babes repeat the dreadful tale,
Ev'n in their slumbers they pursue the theme,
Start, and enjoy a sight in every dream.
By turns the chief and bard their souls inflame,
And every little bosom beats for fame.
Thus shall they learn (as future times will see)
From him to conquer, or to write from thee.

In every hand we see the glorious song,
And Homer is the theme of every tongue.
Parties in state poetic schemes employ,
And Whig and Tory side with Greece and Troy;
Neglect their fends; and seem more zealous grown
To push those countries interests than their own.
Our busiest politicians have forgot [fought;
How Somer's counsel'd, and how Marlborough
But o'er their settling coffee gravely tell,
What Nestor spoke, and how brave Hector fell.
Our softest beaux and coxcombs you inspire,
With Glaucus' courage, and Achilles' fire.
Now they resent affronts which once they bore,
And draw those swords that ne'er were drawn
before:

VOL. VIII.

Nay, ev'n our belles, inform'd how Homer writ,
Learn thence to criticise on modern wit.

Let the mad critics to their side engage
The envy, pride, and dulness of the age:
In vain they curse, in vain they pine and mourn,
Back on themselves their arrows will return;
Whoe'er would thy establish'd fame deface,
Are but immortaliz'd to their disgrace.
Live, and enjoy their spight, and share that fate,
Which would, if Homer liv'd, on Homer wait.

And lo! his second labour claims thy care,
Ulysses' toils succeed Achilles' war.
Haste to the work; the ladies long to see
The pious frauds of chaste Penelope.
Helen they long have seen, whose guilty charms
For ten whole years engag'd the world in arms.
Then, as thy fame shall see a length of days,
Some future bards shall thus record thy praise:
" In those blest times when smiling heaven and " fare

" Had rais'd Britannia to her happiest state,
" When wide around, she saw the world submit,
" And own her sons supreme in arts and wit;
" Then Pope and Dryden brought in triumph
" home
" The pride of Greece, and ornament of Rome;
" To the great task each bold translator came,
" With Virgil's judgment, and with Homer's
" flame; [soar,
" Here the pleas'd Mantuan swan was taught to
" Where scarce the Roman eagles tower'd before;
" And Greece no more was Homer's native earth,
" Though her seven rival cities claim'd his birth;
" On her seven cities he look'd down with scorn,
" And own'd with pride he was in Britain born."

SPECIMEN

OF A TRANSLATION OF THE ODYSSEY *.

THE nurse all wild with transport seem'd to swim;
Joy wing'd her feet, and lighten'd ev'ry limb;
Then, to the room with speed impatient borne,
Flew with glad tidings of her lord's return.
There bending o'er the sleeping queen, she cries,
Rise, my Penelope, my daughter, rise
To see Ulysses thy long absent spouse,
Thy soul's desire and lord of all thy vows:
Though late, he comes, and in his rage has slain,
For all their wrongs, the haughty suitor train,
Ah! Euryclea, she replies, you rave;
The gods resume that reason which they gave;
For Heaven deep wisdom to the fool supplies,
But oft infatuates and confounds the wise.
And wisdom once was thine! but now I find
The gods have ruin'd thy distemper'd mind.
How could you hope your fiction to impose?
Was it to flatter or deride my woes?
How could you break a sleep with talk so vain,
That held my sorrows in so soft a chain?

* Dr. Ridley was one of Mr. Spence's executors.
Mr. Steevens assisted him in looking over the papers of the deceased; and transcribed this letter, &c. from the original.

A sleep so sweet I never could enjoy
 Since my dear lord left Ithaca for Troy:
 Curst Troy—oh! why did I thy name disclose?
 Thy fatal name awakens all my woes:
 But fly—some other had provok'd my rage*,
 And you but owe your pardon to your age.

No artful tales, no studied lies, I frame,
Ulysses lives (rejoins the reverend dame)
 In that dishonour'd stranger's close disguise,
 Long has he pass'd all unsuspecting eyes,
 All but thy son's—and long has he suppress'd
 The well-concerted secret in his breast;
 Till his brave father should his foes defeat,
 And the close scheme of his revenge complete.

Swift as the word the queen transported sprung,
 And round the dame in strict embraces hung;
 Then, as the big round tears began to roll,
 Spoke the quick doubts and hurry of her soul.

If my victorious hero safe arrives,
 If my dear lord, Ulysses, still survives,
 Tell me, oh tell me, how he fought alone:
 How were such multitudes destroy'd by one?

Nought I beheld, but heard their cries, she said,
 When death flew raging, and the suitors bled:
Immer'd we listen'd, as we sat around,
 To each deep groan and agonizing sound.
 Call'd by thy son to view the scene I fled,
 And saw Ulysses striding o'er the dead!
 Amidst the rising heaps the hero stood
 All grim, and terribly adorn'd with blood.

* * * "This is enough in conscience for this time: besides, I am desired, by Mr. Pope or Mr. Lintot, I don't know which, to write to Mr. Pope on a certain affair."

ON HIS MAJESTY'S PLAYING WITH A TIGER,

IN KENSINGTON GARDENS.

"Primâ dicte mihi, summâ dicende Camœnâ."

AMIDST the den, the lions prey,
 Seal'd up for death the prophet lay;
 But couch'd the hungry monsters fit,
 And fawning lick his sacred feet;
 Swift shot an angel from above,
 And chang'd their fury into love.

As swift did Britain's genius fly,
 And for her charge stand trembling by;
 When Brunswick, pious, brave, and wise,
 Like him the favourite of the skies,
 Play'd with the monster's dreadful teeth,
 And sported with the fangs of death.

Genius of Britain, spare thy fears,
 For know, within, our sovereign wears
 The surest guard; the best defence;
 A firm untainted innocence.
 So sweet an innocence disarms
 The fiercest rage with powerful charms,
 So far rebellion it beguiles,
 That faction bends; that envy smiles;
 That furious savages submit;
 And pay due homage at his feet.

* The words in Italics are copied by Pope.

Britain! by this example prove
 The duty, loyalty, and love.
 See! the fierce brutes thy king caress,
 And court him with a mute address;
 Well may'st thou own his gentle sway,
 If tigers bend, and savages obey.

A DIALOGUE BETWEEN A POET AND HIS SERVANT.

IN IMITATION OF HORACE, BOOK II. SAT. VII.

To enter into the beauties of this Satire, it must be remembered, that slaves, among the Romans, during the Feasts of Saturn, wore their masters' Habits, and were allowed to say what they pleased.

Servant.

SIR,—I've long waited in my turn to have
 A word with you—but I'm your humble slave.

P: What knave is that? my rascal!

S. Sir, 'tis I,

No knave nor rascal, but your trusty Guy.

P. Well, as your wages still are due, I'll bear
 Your rude impertinence this time of year. [ever,

S. Some folks are drunk one day, and some for
 And some, like Wharton, but twelve years together.

Old Evremond, renown'd for wit and dirt,
 Would change his living oftener than his shirt;
 Roar with the rakes of state a month; and come
 To starve another in his hole at home.

So rov'd wild Buckingham the public jest,
 Now some inholder's, now a monarch's guest;
 His life and politics of every shape,
 This hour a Roman, and the next an ape.

The gout in every limb from every vice,
 Poor Clodio hir'd a boy to throw the dice.
 Some wench for ever; and their sins on those,
 By custom, sit as easy as their clothes.

Some fly, like pendulums, from good to evil,
 And in that point are madder than the devil:
 For they—

P. To what will these wild maxims tend?
 And where, sweet sir, will your reflections end?

S. In you.

P. In me, you knave? make out your charge.

S. You praise low-living, but you live at large.
 Perhaps you scarce believe the rules you teach,
 Or find it hard to practise what you preach.
 Scarce have you paid one idle journey down,
 But, without business, you're again in town.
 If none invite you, sir, abroad to roam,
 Then—Lord, what pleasure 'tis to read at home:
 And sip your two half-pints, with great delight,
 Of beer at noon, and muddled port at night.
 From * Encombe, John comes thundering at the door,

With "Sir, my master begs you to come o'er,
 "To pass these tedious hours, these winter nights,
 "Not that he dreads invasions, rogues, or sprites."
 Strait for your two best wigs aloud you call,
 This stiff in buckle, that not curl'd at all,
 "And where, you rascal, are the spurs," you cry;
 "And O! what blockhead laid the buskins by?"

* The seat of John Pitt, Esq. in Dorsetshire.

On your old batter'd mare you'll needs be gone,
 (No matter whether on four legs or none)
 Splash, plunge, and stumble, as you scour the heath;
 All swear at Morden 'tis on life or death;
 Wildly through Wareham streets you scamper on,
 Raise all the dogs and voters in the town;
 Then fly for six long dirty miles as bad,
 That Corfe and Kingston gentry think you mad.
 And all this furious riding is to prove
 Your high respect, it seems, and eager love:
 And yet, that mighty honour to obtain,
 Banks, Shaftesbury, Doddington, may send in vain.
 Before you go, we curse the noise you make,
 And bless the moment that you turn your back:
 As for myself, I own it to your face,
 I love good eating, and I take my glass:
 But sure 'tis strange, dear Sir, that this should be
 In you amusement, but a fault in me.
 All this is bare refining on a name,
 To make a difference where the fault's the same.

My father sold me to your service here,
 For this fine livery, and four pounds a year.
 A livery you should wear as well as I,
 And this I'll prove—but lay your cudgel by.
 You serve your passions—Thus, without a jest,
 Both are but fellow-servants at the best.
 Yourself, good Sir, are play'd by your desires,
 A mere tall puppet dancing on the wires.

P. Who at this rate of talking, can be free?

S. The brave, wise, honest man, and only he:
 All else are slaves alike, the world around,
 Kings on the throne, and beggars on the ground:
 He, Sir, is proof to grandeur, pride, or pelf,
 And (greater still) is master of himself:
 Not to-and-fro by fears and factions hurl'd,
 But loose to all the interests of the world:
 And while that world turns round, entire and
 He keeps the sacred tenor of his soul; [whole,
 In every turn of fortune still the same,
 As gold unchang'd, or brighter from the flame:
 Collected in himself, with godlike pride,
 He sees the darts of envy glance aside;
 And, fix'd like Atlas, while the tempest blow,
 Smiles at the idle storms that roar below.
 One such you know, a layman, to your shame,
 And yet the honour of your blood and name,
 If you can such a character maintain,
 You too are free, and I'm your slave again.

But when in Hemskirk's pictures you delight,
 More than yourself, to see two drunkards fight;
 "Fool, rogue, sot, blockhead," or such names are
 mine:

Your's are, "a connoisseur," or "deep divine."
 I'm chid for loving a luxurious bit,
 The sacred prize of learning, worth, and wit:
 And yet some sell their lands these bits to buy;
 Then, pray, who suffers most from luxury?
 I'm chid, 'tis true; but then I pawn no plate,
 I seal no bonds, I mortgage no estate.

Besides, high living, Sir, must wear you out
 With surfeits, qualms, a fever, or the gout.
 By some new pleasures are you still engross'd,
 And when you save an hour, you think it lost.
 To sports, plays, races, from your books you run,
 And like all company, except your own,

You hunt, drink, sleep, or (idler still) you rhyme;
 Why?—but to banish thought, and murder time:
 And yet that thought, which you discharge in vain,
 Like a foul-loaded piece, recoils again.

P. Tom, fetch a cane, a whip, a club, a stone,—

S. For what?

P. A sword, a pistol, or a gun:
 I'll shoot the dog.

S. Lord! who would be a wit?
 He's in a mad, or in a rhyming fit.

P. Fly, fly, you rascal, for your spade and fork;
 For once I'll set your lazy bones to work:
 Fly, or I'll send your back, without a groat,
 To the bleak mountains where you first were caught.

ODE TO JOHN PITT, ESQ.

Advising him to build a Banqueting-house on a Hill that overlooks the Sea.

From this tall promontory's brow

You look majestic down,
 And see extended wide below
 Th' horizon all your own.

With growing piles the vales are crown'd,
 Here hills peep over hills;
 There the vast sky and sea profound
 Th' increasing prospect fills.

O bid, my friend, a structure rise,
 And this huge round command;
 Then shall this little point comprise
 The ocean and the land.

Then you, like Æolus, on high,
 From your aerial tower,
 Shall see secure the billows fly,
 And hear the whirlwinds roar.
 You, with a smile, their rage despise,
 Till some sad wreck appears,
 And calls, from your relenting eyes,
 The sympathizing tears.

Thus may you view, with proud delight,
 While winds the deep reform,
 (Till human woes your grief excite)
 All nature in a storm.

Majestic, awful scene! when, hurl'd
 On surges, surges rise,
 And all the heaving watery world
 Tumultuous mounts the skies.

The seas and thunder roar by turns,
 By turns the peals expire;
 The billows flash, and ether burns
 With momentary fire.

But lo! the furious tempests cease,
 The mighty rage subsides;
 Old ocean hush'd, in solemn peace,
 Has still'd the murmuring tides.

Spread wide abroad, the glassy plain,
 In various colours gay,
 Reflects the glorious sun again,
 And doubly gilds the day.

Th' horizon glows from side to side,
And flames with glancing rays;
The floating, trembling, silver tide,
Is one continual blaze.

Your eyes the prospect now command,
All uncontroul'd and free,
Fly like a thought from land to land,
And dart from sea to sea.

Thus, while above the clouds we sit,
And innocently gay,
Pass in amusements, wine, or wit,
The sultry hours away;

Sometimes, with pity, or disdain,
In thought a glance we throw
Down on the poor, the proud, the vain,
In yonder world below.

We see, from this exalted seat,
(How shrunk, reduc'd, confin'd!)
The little person of the great,
As little as his mind.

See there—amidst the crowds our view
Some scatter'd virtues strike;
But those so throng'd, and these so few,
The world looks all alike.

Yet, through this cloud of human-kind,
The Talbots we survey,
The Pitts, the Yorkes, the Seckers find,
Who shine in open day.

ODE TO JOHN PITT, ESQ.

ON THE SAME SUBJECT.

O'er curious models as you rove
The vales with piles to crown,
And great Palladio's plants improve
With nobler of your own;

O bid a structure o'er the floods
From this high mountain rise,
Where we may sit enthron'd like gods,
And revel in the skies.

Th' ascending breeze, at each repast,
Shall breathe an air divine,
Give a new brightness to the taste,
New spirit to the wine.

Or these low pleasures we may quit
For banquets more refin'd,
The works of each immortal wit,
The luxury of the mind.

Plato, or Boyle's, or Newton's page,
Our towering thoughts shall raise;
Or Homer's fire, or Pindar's rage,
Or Virgil's lofty lays.

Or with amusive thoughts the sea
Shall entertain the mind,
While we the rolling scene survey,
An emblem of mankind.

Where, like sworn foes, successive all,
The furious surges run,
To urge their predecessor's fall,
Though follow'd by their own.

Where, like our moderns so profound,
Engag'd in dark dispute,
The skuttles cast their ink around
To puzzle the dispute.

Where sharks, like shrewd directors, thrive,
Like lawyers, rob at will;
Where flying-fish, like trimmers live;
Like soldiers, sword-fish kill.

Where on the left the greater feed,
The tyrants of an hour,
Till the huge royal whale succeed,
And all at once devour.

Thus in the mortal world we now
Too truly understand,
Each monster of the sea below
Is match'd by one at land.

ON MRS. WALKER'S POEMS.

PARTICULARLY THAT ON THE AUTHOR.

BLUSH, Wilmot, blush; a female muse,
Without one guilty line,
The tender theme of love pursues
In softer strains than thine.

'Tis thine the passion to blaspheme,
'Tis her's with wit and ease
(When a mere nothing is the theme)
Beyond thyself to please.

Then be to her the prize decreed,
Whose merit has prevail'd;
For what male poet can succeed,
If Rochester has fail'd?

Since Phœbus quite forgetful grows,
And has not yet thought fit,
In his high wisdom, to impose
A sabbath law on wit;

Since of your thoughts he takes no care,
Ye Priors, Popes, and Gays;
'Tis hard!—but let the women wear
The breeches and the bays.

VERSES

ON A FLOWERED CARPET.

Worked by the Young Ladies at Kingston.

WHEN Pallas saw the piece her pupils wrought,
She stood long wondering at the lovely draught:
“And, Flora, now (she cried) no more display
Thy flowers, the trifling beauties of a day:
For see! how these with life immortal bloom,
And spread and flourish for an age to come!
In what unguarded hour did I impart
To these fair virgins all my darling art?
In all my wit I saw these rivals shine,
But this one art I thought was always mine:
Yet lo! I yield; their mistress now no more,
But proud to learn from these I taught before.
For look, what vegetable sense is here!
How warm with life these blushing leaves appear!
What temper'd splendours o'er the piece are laid!
Shade steals on light, and light dies into shade.
Through heaven's gay bow less various beauties run,
And far less bright, though painted by the sun.

See in each blooming flower what spirit glows!
 What vivid colours flush the opening rose!
 In some few hours thy lily disappears;
 But this shall flourish through a length of years,
 See unfelt winters pass successive by,
 And scorn a mean dependence on the sky.
 And oh! may Britain, by my counsels sway'd,
 But live and flourish, till these flowers shall fade!
 Then go, fond Flora, go, the palm resign
 To works more fair and durable than thine;
 For I, ev'n I, in justice yield the crown
 To works so far superior to my own."

VERSES

ON A FLOWERED CARPET.

ON this fair ground, with ravish'd eyes,
 We see a second Eden rise,
 As gay and glorious as the first,
 Before th' offending world was curst.
 While these bright nymphs the needle guide,
 To paint the rose in all her pride,
 Nature, like her, may blush to own
 Herself so far by art out-done.
 These flowers she rais'd with all her care,
 So blooming, so divinely fair!
 The glorious children of the sun,
 That David's regal heir outshone,
 Where scarce like one of these array'd;
 They died, but these shall never fade.

ON THE ART OF PREACHING.

A FRAGMENT.

In imitation of Horace's Art of Poetry.

" — Pedent opera interrupta. — "

SHOULD some fam'd hand, in this fantastic age,
 Draw Rich, as Rich appears upon the stage,
 With all his postures in one motley plan,
 The god, the hound, the monkey, and the man,
 Here o'er his head high brandishing a leg,
 And there just hatch'd, and breaking from his egg;

While monster crowds on monster through the
 Who could help laughing at a sight like this?

Or, as a drunkard's dream together brings

" A court of cobblers, or a mob of kings * ; "

Such is a sermon, where, confus'dly dark,

Join Sharp †, South, Sherlock, Barrow, Wake, and Clarke;

So eggs of different parishes will run

To batter, when you beat six yolks to one;

So six bright chemic liquors when you mix,

In one dark shadow vanish all the six.

Full licence priests and painters ever had

To run bold lengths, but never to run mad;

For these can't reconcile God's grace to sin,

Nor those paint tigers in an ass's skin.

No common dauber in one piece would join

The fox and goose—unless upon a sign.

* Dryden.

† Another copy reads,

" Join Hoadly, Sharp, South, Sherlock, Wake, and
 " Clarke."

Some steal a page of sense from Tillotson,
 And then conclude divinely with their own.
 Like oil on water, mounts the prelate up;
 His Grace is always sure to be at top:
 That vein of mercury its beams will spread,
 And shine more strongly through a mine of lead,
 With such low arts your audience never bilk;
 For who can bear a fustian lin'd with silk?
 Sooner than preach such stuff, I'd walk the town,

Without my scarf, in Whiston's draggled gown;
 Ply at the Chapter, and at Child's, to read
 For pence, and bury for a groat a-head.

Some easy subject choose, within your power,
 Or you can never hold out half an hour.

One rule observe: this Sunday split your text;
 Preach one part now, and t'other half the next.

Speak, look, and move, with dignity and ease,

Like mitred Secker, you'll be sure to please.

But, if you whine like boys at country schools,

Can you be said to study Cambray's rules?

Begin with care, nor, like that curate vile,

Set out in this high prancing stumbling style,

" Whoever with a piercing eye can see

" Through the past records of futurity—"

All gape—no meaning—the puff'd orator

Talks much, and says just nothing for an hour,

Truth and the text he labours to display,

Till both are quite interpreted away:

So frugal dames insipid water pour,

Till green, bohea, and coffee, are no more.

His arguments in silly circles run

Still round and round, and end where they begun:

So the poor turn-spit, as the wheel runs round,

The more he gains, the more he loses ground.

Surpris'd with solitary self-applause,

He sees the motley mingled scene he draws:

Dutch painters thus at their own figures start,

Drawn with their utmost uncreating art.

Thus when old Bruin teems, her children fail

Of limbs, form, figure, features, head, or tail;

Nay though she licks her cubs, her tender cares

At best can bring the bruises but to bears.

Still to your hearers all your sermons fort;

Who'd preach against corruption at the court?

Against church-power at visitations bawl,

Or talk about damnation at Whitehall?

Harangue the horse-guards on a cure of souls,

Condemn the quirks of chancery at the rolls,

Or rail at hoods and organ's at St. Paul's?

Or be, like David Jones, so indiscreet,

To rave at usurers in Lombard-street?

Ye country-vicars, when you preach in town,

A turn at Paul's to pay your journey down,

If you would shun the sneer of every prig,

Lay by the little band and rusty wig;

But yet be sure your proper language know;

Nor talk as born within the sound of bow;

Speak not the phrase that Drury-lane affords,

Nor from 'Change-alley steal a cant of words:

Coachmen will criticise your style; nay, further,

Porters will bring it in for wilful murder:

The dregs of the Caneille will look askew,

To hear the language of the town from you;

Nay, my Lord-mayor, with merriment posselt,
Will break his nap, and laugh among the rest,
And jog the aldermen to hear the jest.

INVITATION TO MR. DODINGTON.

In Allusion to Horace, Book I. Ep. V.

If Dodington will condescend
To visit a poetic friend,
And leave a numerous bill of fare,
For four or five plain dishes here;
No costly welcome, but a kind
He and his friends will always find;
A plain, but clean and spacious room,
The master and his heart at home,
A cellar open as his face,
A dinner shorter than his grace;
Your mutton comes from Pimper-down,
Your fish (if any) from the town;
Our rogues, indeed, of late, o'er-crow'd,
By human laws, not those of God,
No venison steal, or none they bring,
Or send it all to master King†;
And yet, perhaps, some venturous spark
May bring it, now the nights are dark.
Punch I have store, and beer beside,
And port that's good, though Frenchified.
Then, if you come, I'm sure to get
From Eastbery ‡—a desert—of wit.
One line, good Sir, to name the day,
And your petitioner will pray, &c.

MR. R. PITT, TO HIS BROTHER. C. PITT.

On his having a Fit of the Gout.

AMONG the well-bred natives of our isle,
"I kiss your hand, Sir," is the modish style;
In humbler manner, as my fate is low,
I beg to kiss your venerable toe,
Not old infallibilities can have
Profounder reverence from its meanest slave.
What dignity attends the solemn gout!
What conscious greatness if the heart be stout!
Methinks I see you o'er the house preside,
In painful majesty and decent pride,
With leg tost high, on stately sofa sit,
More like a sultan than a modern wit;
Quick at your call the trembling slaves appear,
Advance with caution, and retire with fear;
Ev'n Peggy trembles, though (or authors fail)
At times the anti-fallic laws prevail.

Now, Lord have mercy on poor Dick! say I;
"Where's the lac'd shoe—who laid the flannel
"by?"

Within, 'tis hurry, the house seems posselt;
Without, the horses wonder at their rest.
What terrible dismay, what scenes of care!
Why is the footy Mintrem's hopeful heir §

Before the morning-dawn compell'd to rise,
And give attendance with his half-shut eyes?
What makes that girl with hideous visage stare?
What fiends prevent Ead's * journey to the fair†?
Why all this noise, this bustle and this rout?
"Oh, nothing—but poor master has the gout."

Meantime, superior to the pains below,
Your thoughts in soaring meditations flow,
In rapturous trance on Virgil's genius dwell,
To us, poor mortals, his strong beauties tell,
And, like Æneas, from your couch of state,
In all the pomp of words display the Trojan fate.
Can nothing your aspiring thoughts restrain?
Or does the muse suspend the rage of pain?
Awhile give o'er your rage; in sickness prove
Like other mortals, if you'd pity move:
Think not your friends compassionate can be,
When such the product of disease they see;
Your sharpest pangs but add to our delight,
We'll wish you still the gout, if still you write.

AN EPITAPH,

Inscribed on a Stone that covers his Father, Mother, and Brother.*

YE sacred spirits! while your friends distress'd
Weep o'er your ashes, and lament the blest'd;
O let the pensive muse inscribe that stone,
And with the general sorrows mix her own:
The pensive muse!—who, from this mournful hour,
Shall raise her voice, and wake the string no more!
Of love, of duty, this last pledge receive;
'Tis all a brother, all a son can give.

A POEM

ON THE DEATH OF THE LATE EARL STANHOPE.

Humbly Inscribed to the Countess of Stanhope.

"At length, grim fate, thy dreadful triumphs
"cease:

"Lock up the tomb, and seal the grave in peace."

Now from thy riot of destruction breathe,
Call in thy raging plagues, thou tyrant death:
Too mean's the conquest which thy arms bestow,
Too mean to sweep a nation at a blow.
No, thy unbounded triumphs higher run,
And seem to strike at all mankind in one;
Since Stanhope is thy prey, the great, the brave,
A nobler prey was never paid the grave.
We seem to feel from this thy daring crime,
A blank in nature, and a pause in time.
He stood so high in reason's towering sphere,
As high as man unglorify'd could bear.
In arms, and eloquence, like Cæsar, shone
So bright, that each Minerva was his own.
How could so vast a fund of learning lie
Shut up in such a short mortality?
One world of science nobly travell'd o'er,
Like Philip's glorious son, he wept for more.

And now resign'd to tears, th' angelic choirs,
With drooping heads unstring their golden lyres,
Wrapt in a cloud of grief, they sigh to view
Their sacred image laid by death so low:
And deep in anguish sunk, on Stanhope's fate,
Begin to doubt their own immortal state.

But hold, my muse, thy mournful transport errs,
Hold here, and listen to Lucinda's tears,
While thy vain sorrows echo to his tomb,
Behold a sight that strikes all sorrow dumb:
Behold the partner of his cares and life,
Bright in her tears, and beautiful in grief.
Shall then in vain those streams of sorrow flow,
Drest up in all the elegance of woe?
And shall the kind officious muse forbear
To answer sigh for sigh, and tell out tear for tear?
Oh! no; at such a melancholy scene,
The poet echoes back her woes again.
Each weeping muse should minister relief,
From all the moving eloquence of grief.

* Robert Pitt, A. M. his eldest brother,

Each, like a Niobe, his fate bemoan,
Melt into tears, or harden into stone.
From dark obscurity his virtues save,
And, like pale spectres, hover round his grave.
With them the marble should due measures keep,
Relent at every sigh, at every accent weep.

Britannia mourn thy hero, nor refuse
To vent the sighs and sorrows with the muse:
Oh! let thy rising groans load every wind,
Nor let one sluggish accent lag behind.
Thy heavy fate with justice to deplore,
Convey a gale of sighs from shore to shore.
And thou, her guardian angel, widely spread
Thy golden wings, and shield the mighty dead,
Brood o'er his ashes, and illustrious dust,
And soothe with care the venerable ghost.
To guard the nobler relics, leave a while
The kind protection of thy favourite isle:
Around his silent tomb, thy station keep,
And, with thy sister-angel, learn to weep.

Ye sons of Albion, o'er your patriot mourn,
And cool with streams of tears his sacred urn.
His wondrous virtues, stretch'd to distant shores,
Demand all Europe's tears, as well as yours.
Nature can't bring in every period forth,
A finish'd hero, of exalted worth,
Whose godlike genius, towering and sublime,
Must long lie ripening in the womb of time:
Before a Stanhope enters on the stage,
The birth of years, and labour of an age.
In field, and council, born the palm to share,
His voice a senate, as his sword a war:
And each illustrious action of his life,
Conspire to form the patriot, and the chief:
On either side, unite their blended rays,
And kindly mingle in a friendly blaze.

Stand out, and witness this, unhappy Spain,
Lift up to view the mountains of thy slain:
Tell how thy heroes yielded to their fear,
When Stanhope rous'd the thunder of the war:
With what fierce tumults of severe delight
Th' impetuous hero plung'd into the fight.
How he the dreadful front of death defac'd,
Pour'd on the foe, and laid the battle waste,
Did not his arm the ranks of war deform,
And point the hovering tumult where to storm?
Did not his sword through legions cleave his way,
Break their dark squadrons, and let in the day?
Did not he lead the terrible attack,
Push conquest on, and bring her bleeding back?
Throw wide the scenes of horror and despair,
The tide of conflict, and the stream of war?
Bid yellow Tagus, who in triumph roll'd,
Till then his turbid tides of foaming gold,
Boast his rich channels to the world no more,
Since all his glittering streams, and liquid ore,
Lie undistinguish'd in a flood of gore.
Bid his charg'd waves, and loaded billows sweep,
Thy slaughter'd thousands to the frighted deep.
Confess, fair Albion, how the listening throng
Dwelt on the moving accents of his tongue.
In the sage council seat him, and confess
Thy arm in war, thy oracle in peace:
How here triumphant too, his nervous sense
Bore off the palm of manly eloquence:

The healing balm to Albion's wounds apply'd,
And charm'd united factions to his side:
Fix'd on his sovereign's head the nodding crown,
And propp'd the tottering basis of the throne,
Supported bravely all the nation's weight,
And stood the public Atlas of the state.

Sound the loud trumpet, let the solemn knell
Bid with due horror his great soul farewell.
Tune every martial instrument with care,
At once wake all the harmony of war.
Let each sad hero in procession go,
And swell the vast solemnity of woe.
Neglect the yew, the mournful cypress leave,
And with fresh laurels strew the warrior's grave.
There they shall rise, in honour of his name,
Grow green with victory, and bloom with fame.

Lo! from his azure throne, old father Thames Sighs through his floods, and groans from all his streams:

O'er his full urn he droops his reverend head,
And sinks down deeper in his oozy bed,
As the sad pomp proceeds along his sides,
O'ercharg'd with sorrow, pant his heaving tides.
Low in his humid palace laid to mourn,
With streams of tears, the god supplies his urn.
Within his channels he forgets to flow,
And pours o'er all his bounds the deluge of his woe.

But see, my muse, if yet thy ravish'd sight
Can bear that blaze, that rushing stream of light;
Where the great hero's disencumber'd soul,
Springs from the earth, to reach her native pole.
Boldly she quits th' abandon'd cask of clay,
Freed from her chains, and towers th' ethereal way:
Soars o'er th' eternal funds of hail and snow,
And leaves heaven's stormy magazines below.
Thence through the vast profound of heaven she flies,
And measures all the concave of the skies:
Sees where the planetary worlds advance,
Orb above orb, and lead the starry dance.
Nor rests she there, but, with a bolder flight,
Explores the undiscover'd realms of light,
Where the fix'd orbs, to deck the spangled pole,
In state around their gaudy axles roll.
Thence his aspiring course in triumph steers,
Beyond the golden circles of the spheres;
Into the heaven of heavens, the seat divine,
Where nature never drew her mighty line.
A region that excludes all time and place,
And shuts creation from th' unbounded space:
Where the full tides of light in oceans flow,
And see the sun ten thousand worlds below.
So far from our inferior orbs disjoin'd,
The tir'd imagination pants behind.
Then cease thy painful flight, nor venture more,
Where never muse has stretch'd her wing before.
Thy pinions tempt immortal heights in vain,
That throw thee fluttering back to earth again.

On earth a while, blest shade, thy thoughts employ,
And steal one moment from eternal joy.
While there, in heaven, immortal songs inspire
Thy golden strings, and tremble on the lyre,
Which raise to nobler strains th' angelic choir.
Look down with pity on a mortal's lays,
Who strives, in vain, to reach thy boundless praise:

Who with low verse profanes thy sacred name,
Lost in the spreading circle of thy fame.
Thy fame, which, like thyself, is mounted high,
Wide as thy heaven, and lofty as thy sky.

And thou, his pious consort, here below,
Lavish of grief, and prodigal of woe:
Oh! choke thy griefs, thy rising sighs suppress,
Nor let thy sorrows violate his peace.
This rage of anguish, that disdains relief,
Dims his bright joys, with some allay of grief.
Look on his dearest pledge, he left behind,
And see how nature, bountiful and kind,
Stamps the paternal image on his mind,
Oh! may th' hereditary virtues run
In fair succession, to adorn the son;
The last best hopes of Albion's realms to grace,
And form the hero worthy of his race:
Some means at last by Britain may be found,
To dry her tears, and close her bleeding wound.
And if the muse through future times can see,
Fair youth, thy father shall revive in thee:
Thou shalt the wondering nation's hopes engage,
To rise the Stanhope of the future age.

EPITAPH ON DR. KEIL.

THE LATE FAMOUS ASTRONOMER.

BENEATH this stone the world's just wonder lies,
Who, while on earth, had rang'd the spacious skies;
Around the stars his active soul had flown,
And seen their courses finish'd ere his own:
Now he enjoys those realms he could explore,
And finds that heaven he knew so well before.
He through more worlds his victory pursued
Than the brave Greek could wish to have subdued;

In triumph ran one vast creation o'er,
Then stopp'd,—for nature could afford no more.
With Cæsar's speed, young Ammon's noble pride
He came, saw, vanquish'd, wept, return'd, and died.

HORACE, BOOK II. EPIST. XIX. IMITATED.

AN EPISTLE TO MR. ROBERT LOWTH*.

'Tis said, dear Sir, no poets please the town,
Who drink mere water, though from Helicon:
For in cold blood they seldom boldly think;
Their rhymes are more insipid than their drink.
Not great Apollo could the train inspire,
Till generous Bacchus help'd to fan the fire.
Warm'd by two gods at once, they drink and write,
Rhyme all the day, and fuddle all the night.
Homer, says Horace, nods in many a place,
But hints, he nodded oftner o'er the glass.
Inspir'd with wine old Ennius sung and thought
With the same spirit, that his heroes fought:
And we from Johnson's tavern-laws divine,
That bard was no great enemy to wine.
'Twas from the bottle King deriv'd his wit,
Drank till he could not talk, and then he writ.
Let no coif'd serjeant touch the sacred juice,
But leave it to the bards for better use:

* Late Bishop of London.

Let the grave judges too the glass forbear,
 Who never sing and dance but once a year.
 This truth once known, our poets take the hint,
 Get drunk or mad, and then get into print:
 To raise their flames indulge the mellow fit,
 And lose their senses in the search of wit:
 And when with claret fir'd they take the pen,
 Swear they can write, because they drink like Ben.
 Such mimic Swift or Prior to their cost,
 For in the rash attempt the fools are lost.
 When once a genius breaks through common rules,
 He leads an herd of imitating fools.
 If Pope, the prince of poets, sick a-bed,
 O'er steaming coffee bends his aching head,
 The fools in public o'er the fragrant draught
 Incline those heads, that never ach'd or thought.
 This must provoke his mirth or his disdain,
 Cure his complaint,—or make him sick again.
 I too, like them, the poet's path pursue,
 And keep great Flaccus ever in my view;
 But in a distant view—yet what I write,
 In these loose sheets, must never see the light;
 Epistles, odes, and twenty trifles more,
 Things that are born and die in half an hour.
 What! you must dedicate, says sneering Spence,
 This year some new performance to the prince:
 Though money is your scorn, no doubt in time
 You hope to gain some vacant stall by rhyme;
 Like other poets, were the truth but known,
 You too admire whatever is your own.
 These wise remarks my modesty confound,
 While the laugh rises, and the mirth goes round;
 Vext at the jest, yet glad to shun a fray,
 I whisk into my coach, and drive away.

TO MR. SPENCE.

PREFIXED TO THE ESSAY ON POPE'S ODYSSEY.

'Tis done—Restor'd by thy immortal pen,
 The critic's noble name revives again;
 Once more that great, that injur'd name we see
 Shine forth alike in Addison and thee.
 Like curs, our critics haunt the poet's feast,
 And feed on scraps refus'd by every guest;
 From the old Thracian * dog they learn'd the way
 To snarl in want, and grumble o'er their prey.
 As though they grudg'd themselves the joys they feel,
 Vex'd to be charm'd, and pleas'd against their will.
 Such their inverted taste, that we expect
 For faults their thanks, for beauties their neglect;
 So the fell snake rejects the fragrant flowers,
 But every poison of the field devours.
 Like bold Longinus of immortal fame,
 You read your poet with a poet's flame;
 With his, your generous raptures still aspire;
 The critic kindles when the bard's on fire.
 But when some lame, some limping line demands
 The friendly succour of your healing hands;
 The feather of your pen drops balm around,
 And plays, and tickles, while it cures the wound.
 While Pope's immortal labour we survey,
 We stand all dazzled with excess of day,

* Zeilus, so called by the ancients.

Blind with the glorious blaze;—to vulgar sight
 'Twas one bright mass of undistinguish'd light;
 But, like the towering eagle, you alone
 Discern'd the spots and splendours of the sun.
 To point out faults, yet never to offend;
 To play the critic, yet preserve the friend;
 A life well spent, that never lost a day;
 An easy spirit, innocently gay;
 A strict integrity, devoid of art;
 The sweetest manners, and sincerest heart;
 A soul where depth of sense and fancy meet;
 A judgment brighten'd by the beams of wit,
 Were ever yours;—be what you were before,
 Be still yourself; the world can ask no more.

IMITATION OF SPENSER.

A WELL-KNOWN vase of sovereign use I sing,
 Pleasing to young and old, and Jordan hight,
 The lovely queen, and eke the haughty king
 Snatch up this vessel in the murky night:
 Ne lives there poor, ne lives there wealthy wight,
 But uses it in mantle brown or green;
 Sometimes it stands array'd in glossy white;
 And eke in mighty dortours may be seen
 Of China's fragile earth, with azure flowrets sheen.
 The virgin, comely as the dewy rose,
 Here gently sheds the softly-whispering rill;
 The frannion, who ne shame ne blushing knows,
 At once the potter's glossy vase does fill;
 It whizzes like the waters from a mill.
 Here fronzy housewives clear their loaded reins;
 The beef-fed justice, who fat ale doth swill,
 Grasps the round-handled jar, and tries, and strains, [drains.
 While slowly dribbling down the scanty water
 The dame of Fraunce shall without shame convey
 This ready needment to its proper place;
 Yet shall the daughters of the lond of Fay
 Learn better amenaunce and decent grace;
 Warm blushes lend a beauty to their face,
 For virtue's comely tints their cheeks adorn;
 Thus o'er the distant hillocks you may trace
 The purple beamings of the infant morn:
 Sweet are our blooming maids—the sweetest creatures born.
 None but their husbands or their lovers true
 They trust with management of their affairs;
 Nor even these their privacy may view,
 When the soft beavys seek the bower by pairs:
 Then from the sight accoy'd, like timorous hares,
 From mate or bellamour alike they fly;
 Think not, good swain, that these are scornful
 airs,
 Think not for hate they shun thine amorous eye,
 Soon shall the fair return, nor done thee, youth,
 to dye.
 While Belgic frows across a charcoal stove
 (Replenish'd like the Vestal's lasting fire) [love,
 Bren for whole years, and scorch the parts of
 No longer parts that can delight inspire,
 Erst cave of blifs, now monumental pyre;
 O British maid, for ever clean and neat,
 For whom I aye will make my simple lyre,

With double care preserve that dun retreat,
Fair Venus' mystic bower, Dan Cupid's feather'd seat.

So may your hours soft-sliding steal away,
Unknown to gnarring slander and to bale,
O'er seas of bliss peace guide her gondelay,
Ne bitter dole impest the passing gale.
O! sweeter than the lilies of the dale,
In your soft breasts the fruits of joyance grow.
Ne fell despair be here with visage pale,
Brave be the youth from whom your bosoms
glow,
Ne other joy but you the faithful striplings know.

EPISTLE TO J. PITT, Esq.

In Imitation of Horace, Epist. IV. Book I.

DEAR SIR,

To all my trifles you attend,
But drop the critic to indulge the friend,
And with most Christian patience lose your
time,
To hear me preach, or pester you with rhyme.
Here with my books or friend I spend the day,
But how at Kingston pass your hours away?
Say, shall we see some plan with ravish'd eyes,
Some future pile in miniature arise?
(A model to excel in every part Judicious Jones, or great Palladio's art)
Or some new bill, that, when the house is met,
Shall claim their thanks, and pay the nation's debt?
Or have you study'd in the silent wood
The sacred duties of the wise and good?
Nature, who form'd you, nobly crown'd the whole
With a strong body, and as firm a soul:
The praise is yours to finish every part
With all th' embellishments of taste and art.
Some see in canker'd heaps their riches roll'd,
Your bounty gives new lustre to your gold.
Could your dead father hope a greater bliss,
Or your surviving parent more than this?
Than such a son—a lover of the laws,
And ever true to honour's glorious cause:
Who scorns all parties, though by parties sought:
Who greatly thinks, and truly speaks his thought:
With all the chaste severity of sense,
Truth, judgment, wit, and manly eloquence.
So in his youth great Cato was rever'd,
By Pompey courted, and by Cæsar fear'd:
Both he disdain'd alike with godlike pride,
For Rome and Liberty he liv'd—and dy'd.
In each perfection as you rise so fast,
Well may you think each day may be your last.
Uncommon worth is still with fate at strife,
Still inconsistent with a length of life.
The future time is ever in your power,
Then 'tis clear gain to seize the present hour;
Break from the serious thought, and laugh away
In Pimperm walls one idle easy day,
You'll find your rhyming kinsman well in case,
For ever fix'd to the delicious place.
Though not like L—with corpulence o'ergrown
For he has twenty cures, and I but one.

EPISTLE TO MR. SPENCE.

In Imitation of Horace, Epist. X. Book I.

HEALTH from the bard who loves the rural sport,
To the more noble bard that haunts the court:
In every other point of life we chime,
Like two soft lines when coupled into rhyme.
I praise a spacious villa to the sky,
You a close garret full five stories high;
I revel here in nature's varied sweets,
You in the nobler scents of London streets.
I left the court, and here at ease reclin'd,
Am happier than the king who staid behind:
Twelve stifling dishes I could scarce live o'er,
At home I dine with luxury on four.
Where would a man of judgment choose a seat,
But in a wholesome, rural, soft retreat?
Where hills adorn the mansion they defend?
Where could he better answer nature's end?
Here from the sea the melting breezes rise,
Unbind the snow, and warm the wintery skies:
Here gentle gales the dog-star's heat allay,
And softly breathing cool the sultry day.
How free from cares, from dangers and affright,
In pleasing dreams I pass the silent night!
Does not the variegated marble yield
To the gay colours of the flowery field?
Can the New-river's artificial streams,
Or the thick waters of the troubled Thames,
In many a winding rusty pipe convey'd,
Or dash'd and broken down a deed cascade,
With our clear sylvan streams in sweetness vie,
That in eternal rills run bubbling by;
In dimples o'er the polish'd pebbles pass,
Glide o'er the sands, or glitter through the grass?
And yet in town the country prospects please,
Where stately colonades are flank'd with trees:
On a whole country looks the master down
With pride, where scarce five acres are his own.
Yet nature, though repell'd, maintains her part,
And in her turn she triumphs over art;
The handmaid now may prejudice our taste,
But the fair mistress will prevail at last.
That man must smart at last whose puzzled sight
Mistakes in life false colours for the right;
As the poor dupe is sure his loss to rue,
Who takes a pinchbeck guinea for a true.
The wretch, whose frantic pride kind fortune crowns,
Grows twice as abject when the goddess frowns;
As he, who rises when his head turns round,
Must tumble twice as heavy to the ground.
Then love, not grandeur, 'tis a splendid curse;
The more the love, the harder the divorce.
We live far happier by these gurgling springs,
Than statesmen, courtiers, counsellors, or kings.
The stag expell'd the courser from the plain;
What can he do?—he begs the aid of man;
He takes the bit and proudly bears away
His new ally; he fights and wins the day;
But, ruin'd by success, he strives in vain
To quit his master and the curb again.
So from the fear of want most wretches fly,
But lose their noblest wealth, their liberty;

To their imperious passions they submit,
 Who mount, ride, spur, but never draw the bit.
 'Tis with your fortune, Spence, as with your shoe,
 A large may wrench, a small one wring your toe.
 Then bear your fortune in the golden mean,
 Not every man is born to be a dean.
 I'll bear your jeers, if ever I am known
 To seek two cures, when scarce I merit one.
 Riches, 'tis true, some service may afford,
 But oftner play the tyrant o'er their lord.
 Money I scorn, but keep a little still,
 To pay my doctor's, or my lawyer's bill.
 From Encombe's soft romantic scenes I write,
 Deep sunk in ease, in pleasure and delight;
 Yet, though her gen'rous lord himself is here,
 'T would be one pleasure more, could you appear.

INVITATION TO A FRIEND AT COURT.

If you can leave for books the crowded court,
 And generous Bourdeaux for a glass of Port,
 To these sweet solitudes without delay
 Break from the world's impertinence away.

Soon as the sun the face of nature gilds,
 For health and pleasure will we range the fields;
 O'er her gay scenes and opening beauties run,
 While all the vast creation is our own.
 But when his golden globe with faded light
 Yields to the solemn empire of the night;
 And in her sober majesty the moon
 With milder glories mounts her silver throne;
 Amidst ten thousand orbs with splendour crown'd,
 That pour their tributary beams around; [light
 Through the long levell'd tube our strengthen'd
 Shall mark distinct the spangles of the night;
 From world to world shall dart the boundless eye,
 And stretch from star to star, from sky to sky.

The buzzing insect families appear,
 When suns unbind the rigour of the year;
 Quick glance the myriads round the evening
 bower,

Hosts of a day, or nations of an hour.
 Astonish'd we shall see th' unfolding race,
 Stretch'd out in bulk, within the polish'd glass;
 Through whose small convex a new world we spy,
 Ne'er seen before, but by a seraph's eye!
 So long in darkness shut from human kind
 Lay half God's wonders to a point confin'd!
 But in one peopled drop we now survey
 In pride of power some little monster play;
 O'er tribes invisible he reigns alone,
 And struts a tyrant of a world his own.

Now will we study Homer's awful page,
 Now warm our souls with Pindar's noble rage:
 To English lays shall Flaccus' lyre be strung,
 And lofty Virgil speak the British tongue.
 Immortal Virgil! at thy sacred name
 I tremble now, and now I pant for fame;
 With eager hopes this moment I aspire
 To catch or emulate thy glorious fire;
 The next pursue the rash attempt no more,
 But drop the quill, bow, wonder, and adore;
 By thy strong genius overcome and aw'd!
 That fire from heaven! that spirit of a God!

Pleas'd and transported with thy name I tend
 Beyond my theme, forgetful of my friend;
 And from my first design by rapture led,
 Neglect the living poet for the dead.

EPISTLE TO MR. SPENCE,

When Tutor to Lord Middlesex.

IN IMITATION OF HORACE, BOOK I. EPIST XVIII.

SPENCE, with a friend you pass the hours away
 In pointed jokes, yet innocently gay:
 You ever differ'd from a flatterer more,
 Than a chaste lady from a flaunting whore.

'Tis true you rallied every fault you found,
 But gently tickled, while you cur'd the wound:
 Unlike the paultry poets of the town,
 Rogues who expose themselves for half a crown:
 And still impose on every soul they meet
 Rudeness for sense, and ribaldry for wit:
 Who, though half-starv'd, in spite of time and place,

Repeat their rhymes, though dinner stays for grace:
 And as their poverty their dresses fit,
 They think of course a sloven is a wit;
 But sense (a truth these coxcombs ne'er suspect)
 Lies just 'twixt affectation and neglect.

One step still lower, if you can, descend,
 To the mean wretch, the great man's humble
 friend;

That moving shade, that pendant at his ear,
 That two-legg'd dog, still pawing on the peer.
 Studying his looks, and watching at the board,
 He gapes to catch the droppings of my lord;
 And, tickled to the soul at every joke,
 Like a press'd watch, repeats what t'other spoke:
 Echo to nonsense! such a scene to hear!
 'Tis just like Punch and his interpreter.

On trifles some are earnestly absurd,
 You'll think the world depends on ev'ry word.
 What, is not every mortal free to speak?
 I'll give my reasons, though I break my neck.
 And what's the question?—if it shines or rains,
 Whether 'tis twelve or fifteen miles to Staines.

The wretch reduc'd to rags by every vice,
 Pride, projects, races, mistresses, and dice,
 The rich rogue shuns, though full as bad as he,
 And knows a quarrel is good husbandry.

'Tis strange, cries Peter, you are out of pelf,
 I'm sure I thought you wiser than myself;
 Yet gives him nothing—but advice too late,
 Retrench, or rather mortgage your estate,
 I can advance the sum,—'tis best for both;
 But henceforth cut your coat to match your cloth.

A minister, in mere revenge and sport,
 Shall give his foe a paltry place at court.
 The dupe for every royal birth-day buys
 New horses, coaches, clothes, and liveries;
 Plies at the levee, and distinguish'd there
 Lives on the royal whisper for a year;
 His wenches shine in Brussels and Brocade!
 And now the wretch, ridiculously mad,
 Draws on his banker, mortgages and sells,
 Then to the country runs away from jails:
 There ruin'd by the court he sells a vote
 To the next burghers, as of old he bought;

Rubs down the steeds which once his chariot bore,
Or sweeps the town, which once he serv'd before.

But, by this roving meteor led, I tend
Beyond my theme, forgetful of my friend.
Then take advice; I preach not out of time,
When good lord Middlesex is bent on rhyme.

Their humour check'd, or inclination cross'd,
Sometimes the friendship of the great is lost.
Unless call'd out to wench, be sure comply,
Hunt when he hunts, and lay the fathers by:
For your reward you gain his love, and dine
On the best venison and the best French wine,
Nor to Lord  make the observation,
How the twelve peers have answer'd their creation,
Nor in your wine or wrath betray your trust,
Be silent still, and obstinately just:
Explore no secrets, draw no characters,
For echo will repeat, and walls have ears:
Nor let a busy fool a secret know,
A secret gripes him till he lets it go:
Words are like bullets, and we wish in vain,
When once discharg'd, to call them back again.

* * * * *

Defend, dear Spence, the honest and the civil,
But to cry up a rascal—that's the devil.
Who guards a good man's character, 'tis known,
At the same time protects and guards his own.
For as with houses 'tis with people's names,
A shed may set a palace all on flames;
The fire neglected on the cottage preys,
But mounts at last into a general blaze.

'Tis a fine thing, some think, a lord to know;
I wish his tradesmen could but think so too.
He gives his word—then all your hopes are gone:
He gives his honour—then your quite undone.
His and some women's love the same are found;
You rashly board a fire-ship, and are drown'd.

Most folks so partial to themselves are grown,
They hate a temper differing from their own.
The grave abhor the gay, the gay the sad,
And formalists pronounce the witty mad:
The sot, who drinks six bottles in a place,
Swears at the flinchers who refuse their glass.
Would you not pass for an ill-natur'd man,
Comply with every humour that you can.

Pope will instruct you how to pass away
Your time like him, and never lose a day;
From hopes or fears your quiet to defend,
To all mankind as to yourself a friend,
And, sacred from the world, retir'd, unknown,
To lead a life with mortals like his own.

When to delicious Pimperne I retire,
What greater bliss, my Spence, can I desire?
Contented there my easy hours I spend
With maps, globes, books, my bottle, and a friend.
There can I live upon my income still,
E'en though the house should pass the Quakers
bill:

Yet to my share should some good prebend fall,
I think myself of size to fill a stall.
For life or wealth let Heaven my lot assign,
A firm and even soul shall still be mine.

VIDA'S ART OF POETRY.

To the Right Honourable

PHILIP, EARL STANHOPE, VISCOUNT MAHON, AND BARON ELVASTON,

THIS TRANSLATION IS DEDICATED, BY HIS LORDSHIP'S HUMBLE SERVANT AND CHAPLAIN, CHRISTOPHER PITT,

BOOK I.

GIVE me, ye sacred muses, to impart
The hidden secrets of your tuneful art;
Give me your awful mysteries to sing,
Unlock, and open wide, your sacred spring;
While from his infancy the bard I lead,
And set him on your mountain's lofty head;
Direct his course, and point him out the road
To sing in epic strains an hero or a god. [praise,
What youth, whose generous bosom pants for
Will dare with me to beat those arduous ways?
O'er high Parnassus' painful steep to go,
And leave the groveling multitude below:
Where the glad muses sing, and form the choir,
While bright Apollo strikes the silver lyre,
Approach thou first, great Francis, nor refuse
To pay due honours to the sacred muse;

While Gallia waits for thy auspicious reign,
Till age completes the monarch in the man;
Mean time the muse may bring some small relief,
To charm thy anguish, and suspend thy grief;
While guilty fortune's stern decrees detain
Thee and thy brother in the realms of Spain;
Far, far transported from your native place,
Your country's, father's, and your friend's embrace!

Such are the terms the cruel fates impose
On your great father, struggling with his woes,
Such are their hard conditions:—they require
The sons to purchase, and redeem the sire. [stain,
But yet, brave youth, from grief, from tears ab-
Fate may relent, and heaven grow mild again;
At last perhaps the glorious day may come,
The day that brings our royal exile home;

When, to thy native realms in peace restor'd,
The ravish'd crowds shall hail their passing lord;
When each transported city shall rejoice,
And nations bless thee with a public voice;
To the throng'd fanes the matrons shall repair;
Absolve their vows, and breathe their souls in prayer.

Till then, let every muse engage thy love,
With me at large o'er high Parnassus rove,
Range every bower, and sport in every grove.

First then observe, that verse is ne'er confin'd
To one fix'd measure, or determin'd kind;
Though at its birth it sung the gods alone,
And then religion claim'd it for her own;
In sacred strains address'd the Deity,
And spoke a language worthy of the sky;
New themes succeeding bards began to choose,
And in a wider field engag'd the muse;
The common bulk of subjects to rehearse
In all the rich varieties of verse.

Yet none of all with equal honours shine
(But those which celebrate the power divine)
To those exalted measures, which declare
The deeds of heroes, and the sons of war.
From hence posterity the name bestow'd
On this rich present of the Delphic god;
Fame says, Phæmonoe in this measure gave
Apollo's answers from the Pythian cave.

But ere you write, consult your strength and choose

A theme proportion'd justly to your muse.
For though in chief these precepts are bestow'd
On him who sings an hero or a god;
To other themes their general use extend
And serves in different views to different ends.
Whether the lofty muse with tragic rage
Would proudly stalk in buskins on the stage;
Or in soft elegies our pity move,
And show the youth in all the flames of love;
Or sing the shepherd's woes in humble strains,
And the low humours of contending swains:
These faithful rules shall guide the bard along
In every measure, argument, and song.

Be sure (whatever you propose to write)
Let the chief motive be your own delight,
And well-weigh'd choice;—a task enjoin'd refuse,
Unless a monarch should command your muse.
(If we may hope those golden times to see,
When bards become the care of majesty!)
Free and spontaneous the smooth numbers glide,
Where choice determines, and our wills preside;
But, at command, we toil with fruitless pain,
And drag th' involuntary load in vain.

Nor, at its birth, indulge your warm desire,
On the first glimmering of the sacred fire;
Defer the mighty task; and weigh your power
And every part in every view explore;
And let the theme in different prospects roll
Deep in your thoughts, and grow into the soul.

But ere with sails unfurl'd you fly away,
And cleave the bosom of the boundless sea;
A fund of words and images prepare,
And lay the bright materials up with care,
Which at due time, occasion may produce,
All rang'd in order for the poet's use.

Some happy objects by mere chance are brought
From hidden causes to the wandering thought;
Which if once lost, you labour long in vain
To catch th' ideal fugitives again.

Nor must I fail their conduct to extol,
Who, when they lay the basis of the whole,
Explore the ancients with a watchful eye,
Lay all their charms and elegancies by,
Then to their use the precious spoils apply.

At first without the least restraint compose,
And mould the future poem into prose;
A full and proper series to maintain,
And draw the just connection in a chain;
By stated bounds your progress to controul,
To join the parts, and regulate the whole.

And now 'tis time to spread the opening sails
Wide to the wanton winds and flattering gales;
'Tis time we now prescribe the genuine laws
To raise the beauteous fabric with applause;
But first some method requisite appears
To form the boy, and mould his tender years.
In vain the bard the sacred wreath pursues,
Unless train'd up and season'd to the muse.
Soon as the prattling innocent shall reach
To the first use and rudiments of speech,
Ev'n then, by Helicon he ought to rove,
Ev'n then the tuneful nine should win his love
By just degrees.—But make his guide your choice
For his chaste phrase and elegance of voice;
That he at first successfully may teach
The methods, laws, and discipline of speech;
Lest the young charge, mistaking right and wrong,
With vicious habits prejudice his tongue.
Habits, whose subtle seeds may mock your art,
And spread their roots and poison through his heart.

Whence none shall move me to approve the
Who wildly borne above the vulgar reach,
And big with vain pretences to impart
Vast shows of learning, and a depth of art,
For sense th' impertinence of terms affords;
An idle cant of formidable words;
The pride of pedants, the delight of fools;
The vile disgrace, and lumber of the schools:
In vain the circling youths, a blooming throng,
Dwell on th' eternal jargon of his tongue.
Deluded fools!—the same is their mistake,
Who at the limpid stream their thirst may slake,
Yet choose the tainted waters of the lake.
Let no such pest approach the blooming care,
Deprave his style, and violate his ear;
But far, oh far, to some remoter place.
Drive the vile wretch to teach a barbarous race.

Now to the muse's stream the pupil bring,
To drink large draughts of the Pierian spring;
And from his birth the sacred bard adore,
Nurst by the nine, on Mincio's flowery shore;
And ask the gods his numbers to inspire,
With like invention, majesty, and fire.
He reads Ascanius' deeds with equal flame,
And longs with him to run at nobler game.
For youths of ages past he makes his moan,
And learns to pity years so like his own;
Which with too swift, and too severe a doom,
The fate of war had hurried to the tomb.

His eyes, for Pallas, and for Lausus, flow,
Mourn with their fires, and weep another's woe.
But when Uryalus, in all his charms,
Is snatch'd by fate from his dear mother's arms,
And as he rolls in death, the purple flood Streams out, and stains his snowy limbs with blood,

His soul the pangs of generous sorrow pierce,
And a new tear steals out at every verse.
Meantime with bolder steps the youth proceeds,
And the Greek poets in succession reads;
Seasons to either tongue his tender ears;
Compares the heroes glorious characters;
Sees, how Æneas is himself alone,
The draught of Peleus' and Laertes' son;
How, by the poet's art, in one, conspire
Ulysses' conduct, and Achilles' fire.

But now, young bard, with strict attention hear,
And drink my precepts in at either ear;
Since mighty crowds of poets you may find,
Crowds of the Grecian and Ausonian kind,
Learn hence what bards to quit or to pursue,
To shun the false, and to embrace the true;
Nor is it hard to cull each noble piece,
And point out every glorious son of Greece;
Above whose numbers Homer sits on high,
And shines supreme in distant majesty;
Whom with a reverend eye the rest regard,
And owe their raptures to the sovereign bard;
Through him the god their panting souls inspires,
Swells every breast, and warms with all his fires,
Blest were the poets with the hollow'd rage,
Train'd up in that and the succeeding age:
As to his time each poet nearer drew,
His spreading fame in just proportion grew,
By like degrees the next degenerate race
Sunk from the height of honour to disgrace.
And now the fame of Greece extinguish'd lies,
Her ancient language with her glory dies.
Her banish'd princes mourn their ravish'd crowns,
Driven from their old hereditary thrones;
Her drooping natives rove o'er worlds unknown,
And weep their woes in regions not their own;
She feels through all her states the dreadful blow,
And mourns the fury of a barbarous foe. [maids

But when our bards brought o'er th' Aonian
From their own Helicon to Tyber's shades;
When first they settled on Hesperia's plains,
Their numbers ran in rough unpolish'd strains,
Void of the Grecian art their measures flow'd;
Pleas'd the wild satyrs, and the sylvan crowd.
Low shrubs and lofty forests whilom rung,
With uncouth verse, and antiquated song;
Nor yet old Ennius sung in artless strains,
Fights, arms, and hosts embattel'd on the plains,
Who first aspir'd to pluck the verdant crown
From Grecian heads and fix it on his own.
New wonders the succeeding bards explore,
Which slept conceal'd in nature's womb before;
Her awful secrets the bold poet sings,
And sets to view the principles of things;
Each part was fair, and beautiful the whole,
And every line was nectar to the soul.
By such degrees the verse, as ages roll'd,
Was stamp'd to form, and took the beautiful
mould,

Ausonia's bards drew off from every part
The barbarous dregs, and civiliz'd the art.
Till, like the day, all shining and serene,
That drives the clouds, and clears the gloomy
scene,

Refines the air, and brightens up the skies,
See the majestic head of Virgil rise;
Phœbus' undoubted son!—who clears the rust
Of the rough ancients, and shakes off their dust.
He on each line a nobler grace bestow'd;
He thought, and spoke in every word a god.
To grace this mighty bard, ye muses, bring
Your choicest flowers, and rifle all the spring;
See! how the Grecian bards, at distance thrown,
With reverence bow to this distinguish'd son;
Immortal sounds his golden lines impart,
And nought can match his genius but his art.
Ev'n Greece turns pale, and trembles at his fame,
Which shades the lustre of her Homer's name.
'Twas then Ausonia saw her language rise
In all its strength and glory to the skies;
Such glory never could she boast before,
Nor could succeeding poets make it more.
From that blest period the poetic state
Ran down the precipice of time and fate;
Degenerate souls succeed, a wretched train,
And her old fame at once drew back again.
One, to his genius trusts, in every part,
And scorns the rules and discipline of art.
While this, an empty tide of sound affords,
And roars and thunders in a storm of words.
Some, musically dull, all methods try
To win the ear with sweet stupidity;
Unruffled strains for solid wit dispense,
And give us numbers, when we call for sense.
Till from th' Hesperian plains and Tyber chas'd,
From Rome the banish'd sisters fled at last;
Driven by the barbarous nations, who from far
Burst into Latium with a tide of war.
Hence a vast change of their old manners sprung;
The slaves were forc'd to speak their masters
tongue;

No honours now were paid the sacred muse,
But all were bent on mercenary views;
Till Latium saw with joy th' Aonian train
By the great Medici restor'd again;
Th' illustrious Medici, of Tuscan race,
Were born to cherish learning in disgrace,
New life on every science to bestow,
And lull the cries of Europe in her woe.
With pity they beheld those turns of fate,
And propp'd the ruins of the Grecian state;
For lest her wit should perish with her fame,
Their care supported still the Argive name;
They call'd the aspiring youths from distant parts,
To plant Ausonia with the Grecian arts;
To bask in ease, and science to diffuse,
And to restore the empire of the muse;
They sent to ravag'd provinces with care,
And cities wasted by the rage of war,
To buy the ancients works of deathless fame,
And snatch th' immortal labours from the flame;
To which the foes had doom'd each glorious piece,
Who reign and lord it in the realms of Greece.
But we, ye gods, would raise a foreign lord,
As yet untaught to sheath the civil sword!)

Through many a period this has been the fate,
And this the list of the poetic state.

Hence sacred Virgil from thy soul adore
Above the rest, and to thy utmost power
Pursue the glorious paths he struck before.
If he supplies not all your wants, peruse
Th' immortal strains of each Augustan muse.
There stop—nor rashly seek to know the rest,
But drive the dire ambition from thy breast,
Till riper years and judgment form thy thoughts
To mark their beauties, and avoid their faults.
Meantime, ye parents, with attention hear,
And thus advis'd exert your utmost care;
The blameless tutor from a thousand choose,
One from his soul devoted to the muse;
Who, pleas'd the tender pupil to improve,
Regards and loves him with a father's love.
Youth, of itself to numerous ills betray'd,
Requires a prop, and wants a foreign aid;
Unless a master's rules his mind incline
To love and cultivate the sacred nine,
His thoughts a thousand objects will employ,
And from Parnassus lead the wandering boy.
So trusts the swain the saplings to the earth;
So hopes in time to see the sprouting birth;
Against the winds defensive props he forms,
To shield the future forest from the storms,
That each embolden'd plant at length may rise
In verdant pride, and shoot into the skies.

But let the guide, if e'er he would improve
His charge, avoid his hate, and win his love;
Lest in his rage wrong measures he may take,
And lothe the muses for the teacher's sake.
His soul then slacken'd from her native force,
Flags at the barrier, and forgets the course.
Nor by your anger be the youth o'er-aw'd,
But scorn th' ungenerous province of the rod;
Th' offended muses never can sustain
To hear the shriekings of the tender train,
But stung with grief and anguish hang behind;
Damp'd is the sprightly vigour of the mind.
The boy no daring images inspire,
No bright ideas set his thoughts on fire:
He drags on heavily th' ungrateful load,
Grown obstinately dull, and season'd to the rod.

I know a pedant, who to penance brought
His trembling pupils for the lightest fault;
His soul transported with a storm of ire,
And all the rage that malice could inspire:
By turns the torturing scourges we might hear,
By turns the shrieks of wretches stunn'd the ear.
Still to my mind the dire ideas rise,
When rage unusual sparkled in his eyes;
When with the dreadful scourge insulting loud,
The tyrant terrify'd the blooming crowd;
A boy the fairest of the frighted train,
Who yet scarce gave the promise of a man,
Ah! dismal object! idly past the day
In all the thoughtless innocence of play;
When lo! th' imperious wretch inflam'd with rage,
Fierce, and regardless of his tender age,
With fury storms; the fault his clamours urge:
His hand high-waving brandishes the scourge.
Tears, vows, and prayers, the tyrant's ears assail;
In vain;—nor tears, nor vows, nor prayers prevail.

The trembling innocent from deep despair
Sicken'd, and breath'd his little soul in air.
For him, beneath his poplar, mourns the Po;
For him the tears of hoary Serious flow;
For him their tears the watery sisters shed,
Who lov'd him living, and deplor'd him dead.
The furious pedant, to restrain his rage,
Should mark th' example of a former age;
How fierce Alcides, warm'd with youthful ire,
Dash'd on his master's front his vocal lyre.
But yet, ye youths, confess your masters sway,
And their commands implicitly obey.

Whoever then this arduous task pursues,
To form the bard, and cultivate the muse,
Let him by softer means, and milder ways,
Warm his ambition with the love of praise;
Soon as his precepts shall engage his heart,
And fan the rising fire in every part,
Light is the task;—for then the eager boy
Pursues the voluntary toil with joy;
Disdains th' inglorious indolence of rest,
And feeds th' immortal ardour in his breast.

And here the common practice of the schools
By known experience justifies my rules,
The youths in social studies to engage;
For then the rivals burn with generous rage,
Each soul the stings of emulation raise,
And every little bosom beats for praise.
But gifts propos'd will urge them best to rise;
Fir'd at the glorious prospect of a prize,
With noble jealousy the blooming bard
Reads, labours, glows, and strains for the reward.
Fears lest his happy rival win the race,
And raise a triumph on his own disgrace.

But when once season'd to the rage divine,
He loves and courts the raptures of the nine;
The sense of glory, and the love of fame,
Serve but as second motives to the flame;
The thrilling pleasure all the bard subdues,
Lock'd in the strict embraces of the muse.
See! when harsh parents force the youth to quit
For meaner arts the dear delights of wit,
If e'er the wonted warmth his thoughts inspire,
And with past pleasures set his mind on fire,
How from his soul he longs, but longs in vain,
To haunt the groves and purling streams again!
No stern commands of parents can controul,
No force can check the fallies of his soul.
So burns the courser season'd to the rein,
That spies his females on a distant plain,
And longs to act his pleasures o'er again.
Fir'd with remembrance of his joys, he bounds,
He foams and strives to reach the well-known grounds;

The goring spurs his furious flames improve,
And rouse within him all the rage of love;
Ply'd with the scourge he still neglects his haste,
And moves reluctant when he moves at last;
Reverts his eye, regrets the distant mare,
And neighs impatient for the dappled fair.

How oft the youth would long to change his fate,
Who, high advanc'd to all the pomp of state,
With grief his gaudy load of grandeur views,
Lost at too high a distance from the muse!

How oft he sighs by warbling streams to rove,
 And quit the palace for the shady grove !
 How oft in Tybur's cold retreats to lye,
 And gladly stoop to cheerful poverty,
 Beneath the rigour of the wintery sky !
 But yet how many curse their fruitless toil,
 Who turn and cultivate a barren soil ?
 'This, ere too late, the master may divine
 By a sure omen and a certain sign ;
 The hopeful youth, determin'd by his choice,
 Works without precept, and prevents advice,
 Consults his teacher, plies his task with joy,
 And a quick sense of glory fires the boy.
 He challenges the crowd ;—the conquest o'er,
 He struts away the victor of an hour. [care,
 Then vanquish'd in his turn ; o'erwhelm'd with
 He weeps, he pines, he sickens with despair ;
 Nor looks his little rivals in the face,
 But flies for shelter to some lonely place,
 To mourn his shame, and cover his disgrace. }
 His master's frowns impatient to sustain,
 Streight he returns, and wins the day again.
 'This is the boy his better fates design
 To rise the future darling of the nine ;
 For him the muses weave the sacred crown,
 And bright Apollo claims him for his own.
 Not the least hope th' unactive youth can raise,
 Dead to the prospect and the sense of praise ;
 Who your just rules with dull attention hears,
 Nor lends his understanding, but his ears,
 Resolv'd his parts in indolence to keep,
 He lulls his drowsy faculties asleep ;
 The wretch your best endeavours will betray,
 And the superfluous care is thrown away.

I fear for him who ripens ere his prime ;
 For all productions there's a proper time.
 Oh ! may no apples in the spring appear,
 Out-grow the seasons, and prevent the year,
 Nor mellow yet till autumn stains the vine,
 And the full presses foam with floods of wine.
 Torn from the parent-tree too soon, they lie
 Trod down by every swain who passes by.

Nor should the youth too strictly be confin'd,
 'Tis sometimes proper to unbend his mind ;
 When tir'd with study, let him seek the plains,
 And mark the homely humours of the swains ;
 Or pleas'd the toils to spread, or horns to wind,
 Hunt the fleet mountain-goat or forest-hind.
 Meantime the youth, impatient that the day
 Should pass in pleasures unimprov'd away,
 Steals from the shouting crowd, and quits the plains,

To sing the sylvan gods in rural strains ;
 Or calls the muses to Albuca's shades,
 Courts and enjoys the visionary maids.
 So labour'd fields, with crops alternate blest,
 By turns lie fallow, and indulge their rest ;
 The swain contented bids the hungry soil
 Enjoy a sweet vicissitude from toil,
 Till earth renews her genial powers to bear,
 And pays his prudence with a bounteous year.

On a strict view your solid judgment frame,
 Nor think that genius is in all the same :
 How oft the youth, who wants the sacred fire,
 Fondly mistakes for genius his desire !

Courts the coy muses, though rejected still,
 Nor nature seconds his misguided will :
 He strives, he toils with unavailing care ;
 Nor heaven relents, nor Phœbus hears his prayer.
 He with success perhaps may plead a cause,
 Shine at the bar, and flourish by the laws ;
 Perhaps discover Nature's secret springs,
 And bring to light th' originals of things.
 But sometimes precept will such force impart,
 That nature bends beneath the power of art.

Besides, 'tis no light province to remove
 From the rash boy the fiery pangs of love ;
 Till, ripe in years, and more confirm'd in age,
 He learns to bear the flames of Cupid's rage ;
 Oft hidden fires on all his vitals prey,
 Devour the youth, and melt his soul away.
 By slow degrees ;—blot out his golden dreams,
 The tuneful poets, and Castalian streams ;
 Struck with a secret wound, he weeps and sighs ;
 In every thought the darling phantoms rise ;
 The fancy'd charmer swims before his sight,
 His theme all day, his vision all the night :
 The wandering object takes up all his care,
 Nor can he quit th' imaginary fair.
 Meantime his fire, unconscious of his pain,
 Applies the temper'd medicines in vain ;
 The plague, so deeply rooted in his heart,
 Mocks every slight attempt of Pæan's art ;
 The flames of Cupid all his breast inspire,
 And in the lover's quench the poet's fire.

When in his riper years, without controul,
 The nine have took possession of his soul ;
 When, sacred to their god, the crown he wears,
 To other authors let him bend his cares ;
 Consult their styles, examine every part,
 And a new tincture take from every art.
 First study Tully's language and his sense,
 And range that boundless field of eloquence.
 Tully, Rome's other glory, still affords
 The best expressions and the richest words ;
 As high o'er all in eloquence he stood,
 As Rome o'er all the nations she subdu'd.
 Let him read men and manners, and explore
 The site and distances from shore to shore ;
 Then let him travel, or to maps repair,
 And see imagin'd cities rising there ;
 Range with his eyes the earth's fictitious ball,
 And pass o'er figur'd worlds that grace the wall.
 Some in the bloody shock of arms appear,
 To paint the native horrors of the war ;
 Through charging hosts they rush before they write,
 And plunge in all the tumult of the fight.
 But since our lives, contracted in their date
 By scanty bounds and circumscrib'd by fate,
 Can never launch through all the depths of arts,
 Ye youths, touch only the material parts ;
 There stop your labour, there your search controul,
 And draw from thence a notion of the whole.
 From distant climes when the rich merchants
 come,

To bring the wealth of foreign regions home ;
 Content the friendly harbours to explore,
 They only touch upon the winding shore ;
 Nor with vain labour wander up and down
 To view the land, and visit every town ;

That would but call them from their former road,
To spend an age in banishment abroad;
Too late returning from the dangerous main,
To see their countries and their friends again.

Still be the sacred poets your delight;
Read them by day, consult them in the night;
From those clear fountains all your raptures
bring,

And draw for ever from the muses' spring.
But let your subject in your bosom roll,
Claim every thought, and draw in all the soul.
That constant object to your mind display,
Your toil all night, your labour all the day.

I need not all the rules of verse disclose,
Nor how their various measures to dispose;
The tutor here with ease his charge may guide
To join the parts and numbers, or divide.
Now let him words to stated laws submit,
Or yoke to measures, or reduce to feet;
Now let him softly to himself rehearse
His first attempts and rudiments of verse;
Fix on those rich expressions his regard,
To use made sacred by some ancient bard;
Tost by a different gust of hopes and fears,
He begs of heaven an hundred eyes and ears.
Now here, now there, coy nature he pursues,
And takes one image in a thousand views.
He waits the happy moment that affords
The noblest thoughts, and most expressive words;
He brooks no dull delay; admits no rest;
A tide of passion struggles in his breast;
Round his dark soul no clear ideas play,
The most familiar objects glide away.
All fix'd in thought, astonish'd he appears,
His soul examines, and consults his ears;
And racks his faithless memory, to find
Some traces faintly sketch'd upon his mind.
There he unlocks the glorious magazine,
And opens every faculty within;
Brings out with pride their intellectual spoils,
And with the noble treasure crowns his toils;
And oft mere chance shall images display,
That strike his mind engag'd a different way.
Still he persists; regrets no toil or pain,
And still the task, he tried before in vain,
Plies with unweary'd diligence again.
For oft unmanageable thoughts appear,
That mock his labour, and elude his care;
Th' impatient bard, with all his nerves apply'd,
Tries all the avenues on every side;
Resolv'd and bent the precipice to gain;
Though yet he labours at the rock in vain;
By his own strength and heaven, with conquest
grac'd,

He wins th' important victory at last;
Stretch'd by his hands the vanquish'd monster lies,
And the proud triumph lifts him to the skies.
But when ev'n chance and all his efforts fail,
Nor toils, nor vigilance, nor cares prevail;
His past attempts in vain the boy renews,
And waits the softer seasons of the muse;
He quits his work; throws by his fond desires:
And from his task reluctantly retires.

Thus o'er the fields the swain pursues his road,
Till stopt at length by some impervious flood,

VOL. VIII.

That from a mountain's brow, o'ercharg'd with rains, [plains;
Bursts in a thundering tide, and foams along the
With horror chill'd, he traverses the shore,
Sees the waves rise, and hears the torrent roar;
Then griev'd returns; or waits with vain delay,
Till the tumultuous deluge rolls away.

But in no Iliad let the youth engage
His tender years, and unexperienc'd age;
Let him by just degrees and steps proceed,
Sing with the swains, and tune the tender reed:
He with success an humbler theme may ply,
And, Virgil-like, immortalize a fly:
Or sing the mice, their battles and attacks,
Against the croaking natives of the lakes:
Or with what art her toils the spider sets,
And spins her filmy entrails into nets.

And here embrace, ye teachers, this advice;
Not to be too inquisitively nice,
But, till the soul enlarg'd in strength appears,
Indulge the boy, and spare his tender years;
Till, to ripe judgment and experience brought,
Himself discerns and blushes at a fault;
For if the critic's eyes too strictly pierce,
To point each blemish out in every verse,
Void of all hope the stripling may depart,
And turn his studies to another art.

But if resolv'd his darling faults to see,
A youth of genius should apply to me,
And court my elder judgment to peruse
Th' imperfect labours of his infant muse;
I should not scruple, with a candid eye,
To read and praise his poem to the sky;
With seeming rapture on each line to pause,
And dwell on each expression with applause.
But when my praises had inflam'd his mind,
If some lame verse limp'd slowly up behind;
One, that himself, unconscious, had not found,
By numbers charm'd, and led away by sound,
I should not fear to minister a prop,
And give him stronger feet to keep it up;
Teach it to run along more firm and sure;
Nor would I show the wound before the cure.

For what remains; the poet I enjoin
To form no glorious scheme, no great design,
Till free from business he retires alone,
And flies the giddy tumult of the town;
Seeks rural pleasures, and enjoys the glades,
And courts the thoughtful silence of the shades,
Where the fair Dryads haunt their native
woods,

With all the orders of the Sylvan gods.
Here in their soft retreats the poets lie,
Serene, and blest with cheerful poverty;
No guilty schemes of wealth their souls molest,
No cares, no prospects, discompose their rest;
No schemes of grandeur glitter in their view;
Here they the joys of innocence pursue,
And taste the pleasures of the happy few.
From a rock's entrails the barbarian sprung,
Who dares to violate the sacred throng
By deeds or words—The wretch by fury driven,
Assaults the darling colony of heaven! [eyes
Some have look'd down, we know, with scornful
On the bright muse who taught them how to rise,

And paid, when rais'd to grandeur, no regard
 From that high station to the sacred bard.
 Uninjur'd, mortals, let the poets lie,
 Or dread th' impending vengeance of the sky;
 The gods still listen'd to their constant prayer,
 And made the poets their peculiar care.
 They, with contempt, on fortune's gift look down,
 And laugh at kings who wear an envy'd crown.
 Rais'd and transported by their soaring mind,
 From their proud eminence they view mankind
 Lost in a cloud; they see them toil below,
 All busy to promote their common woe;
 Of guilt unconscious, with a steady soul,
 They see the lightnings flash, and hear the thunders roll.

When, girt with terrors, heaven's Almighty Sire
 Launches his triple bolts and forked fire,
 When o'er high towers the red destroyer plays,
 And strikes the mountains with the pointed blaze;
 Safe in their innocence, like gods, they rise,
 And lift their souls serenely to the skies.

Fly, ye profane;—the sacred nine were given
 To bless these lower worlds by bounteous heaven:
 Of old, Prometheus, from the realms above,
 Brought down these daughters of all-mighty Jove,
 When to his native earth the robber came,
 Charg'd with the plunder of ethereal flame.
 As due compassion touch'd his generous mind,
 To see the savage state of human kind;
 When, led to range at large the bright abodes,
 And share th' ambrosial banquets of the gods;
 In many a whirl he saw Olympus driven,
 And heard th' eternal harmony of heaven. [ears
 Turn'd round and round the concert charm'd his
 With all the music of the dancing spheres;
 The sacred nine his wondering eyes behold,
 As each her orb in just divisions roll'd;
 The thief beholds them with ambitious eyes,
 And, bent on fraud, he meditates the prize;
 A prize! the noblest gift he could bestow
 (Next to the fire) on human race below;
 At length th' immortals reconcil'd resign'd
 The fair celestial sisters to mankind;
 Though bound to Caucasus with solid chains,
 Th' aspiring robber groan'd in endless pains;
 By which deterr'd, for ages lay supine
 The race of mortals, nor invok'd the nine:
 Till heaven in verse show'd man his future state,
 And open'd every distant scene of fate.
 First, the great father of the gods above
 Sung in Dedona and the Libyan grove;
 Next, to th' inquiring nations Themis gave,
 Her sacred answers from the Phocian cave;
 Then Phœbus warn'd them from the Delphic dome
 Of future time, and ages yet to come;
 And reverend Faunus utter'd truths divine
 To the first founders of the Latian line.
 Next the great race of hallow'd prophets came,
 With them the Sibylls of immortal fame,
 Inspir'd with all the god; who rapt on high
 With more than mortal rage unbounded fly,
 And range the dark recesses of the sky.
 Next, at their feasts, the people sung their lays
 (The same their prophets sung in former days);
 Their theme an hero, and his deathless praise.

What has to man of nobler worth been given,
 Than this the best and greatest boon of heaven?
 Whatever power the glorious gift bestow'd,
 We trace the certain footsteps of a God;
 By thee inspir'd, the daring poet flies,
 His soul mounts up, and towers above the skies;
 Thou art the source of pleasure, and we see
 No joy, no transport, when debarr'd of thee;
 Thy tuneful deity the feather'd throng
 Confess in all the measures of their song.
 Thy great commands the savages obey,
 And every silent native of the sea:
 Led by thy voice, the starting rocks advance,
 And listening forests mingle in the dance.
 On thy sweet notes the damn'd rejoice to dwell,
 Thy strains suspended all the din of hell;
 Lull'd by the sound, the furies rag'd no more,
 And hell's infernal porter ceas'd to roar.
 Thy powers exalt us to the realms above,
 To feast with gods, and sit the guests of Jove:
 Thy presence softens anguish, woe, and strife,
 And reconciles us to the load of life;
 Hail, thou bright comfort of these low abodes,
 Thou joy of men, and darling of the gods.
 As priest and poet, in these humble lays,
 I boldly labour to resound thy praise;
 To hang thy shrines, this gift I bring along,
 And to thy altars guide the tender throng.

BOOK II.

PROCEED, ye Nine, descended from above,
 Ye tuneful daughters of almighty Jove;
 To teach the future age, I hasten on,
 And open every source of Helicon.
 Your priest and bard with rage divine inspire,
 While to your shrine I lead the blooming choir.
 Hard was the way, and dubious, which we trod,
 Now show, ye goddesses, a surer road;
 Point out those paths, which you can find alone,
 To all the world but to yourselves unknown;
 Lo! all th' Hesperian youths with me implore
 Your softer influence, and propitious power,
 Who, rang'd beneath my banners, boldly tread
 Those arduous tracks to reach your mountain's
 head.

New rules 'tis now my province to impart;
 First to invent, and then dispose with art;
 Each a laborious task: but they who share
 Heaven's kinder bounty, and peculiar care,
 A glorious train of images may find,
 Preventing hope, and crowding on the mind.
 The other task, to settle every part,
 Depends on judgment, and the powers of art;
 From whence in chief the poet hopes to raise
 His future glory, and immortal praise.

This as a rule the noblest bards esteem,
 To touch at first in general on the theme;
 To hint at all the subject in a line;
 And draw in miniature the whole design.
 Nor in themselves confide; but next implore
 The timely aid of some celestial power;
 To guide your labours, and point out your road,
 Choose, as you please, your tutelary god;
 But still invoke some guardian deity,
 Some power, to look auspicious from the sky:

To nothing great should mortals bend their care,
Till Jove be solemnly address'd in prayer.
'Tis not enough to call for aid divine,
And court but once the favour of the Nine;
When objects rise, that mock your toil and pain,
Above the labour and the reach of man;
Then you may supplicate the blest abodes,
And ask the friendly succour of the gods.
Shock not your reader, nor begin too fierce;
Nor swell and bluster in a pomp of verse;
At first all needless ornament remove,
To shun his prejudice, and win his love.
At first, you find most favour and success
In plain expression, and a modest dress.
For if too arrogant you vaunt your might,
You fall with greater scandal in the sight,
When on the nicest point your fortune stands,
And all your courage all your strength demands.
With gradual flights surprise us as we read;
And let more glorious images succeed
To wake our souls; to kindle our desire
Still to read on, and fan the rising fire.
But ne'er the subject of your work proclaim
In its own colours, and its genuine name;
Let it by distant tokens be convey'd,
And wrapt in other words, and cover'd in their shade.

At last the subject from the friendly shroud
Bursts out, and shines the brighter from the cloud;
Then the dissolving darkness breaks away,
And every object glares in open day.
Thus great *Ulysses' toils were I to choose,
For the main theme that should employ my muse;
By his long labours of immortal fame,
Should shine my hero, but conceal his name;
As one, who lost at sea, had nations seen, [men,
And mark'd their towns, their manners, and their
Since Troy was levell'd to the dust by Greece;
Till a few lines epitomiz'd the piece.

But study now what order to maintain,
To link the work in one continued chain,
That, when the muse displays her artful scheme,
And at the proper time unfolds the theme;
Each part may find its own determin'd place,
Laid out with method, and dispos'd with grace;
That to the destin'd scope the piece may tend,
And keep one constant tenor to the end.
First to surprising novelties inclin'd,
The bards some unexpected objects find,
To wake attention, and suspend the mind. }
A cold, dull order bravely they forsake; }
Fix'd and resolv'd the winding way to take, }
They nobly deviate from the beaten track. }
The poet marks th' occasion, as he sings,
To launch out boldly from the midst of things,
Where some distinguish'd incident he views,
Some shining action that deserves a muse.
Thence by degrees the wondering reader brings
To trace the subject backward to its springs,
Left at his entrance he should idly stay,
Shock'd at his toil, and dubious of his way;
For when set down so near the promis'd goal,
The flattering prospect tempts and fires his soul;

* Vid. Hom. Odyss. Lib. I.

Already past the treacherous bounds appear,
Then most at distance, when they seem so near;
Far from his grasp the fleeting harbour flies,
Courts his pursuit, but mocks his dazzled eyes;
The promis'd region he with joy had spy'd,
Vast tracts of oceans from his reach divide;
Still must he backward steer his lengthen'd way,
And plough a wide interminable sea.
No skilful poet would his muse employ,
From Paris' vote to trace the fall of Troy,
Nor every deed of Hector to relate,
While his strong arm suspended Ilion's fate;
'Work for some annalist! some heavy fool,
Correctly dry, and regularly dull.
Best near the † end those dreadful scenes appear;
Wake then, and rouse the furies of the war.
But for his ravish'd fair at first engage
Peleides' soul in unrelenting rage.
Be this the cause that every Phrygian flood
Swell with red waves, and rolls a tide of blood;
That Xanthus' urns a purple deluge pour,
And the deep trenches float with human gore.
Nor former deeds in silence must we lose, }
The league at Aulis, and the mutual vows, }
The Spartan raging for his ravish'd spouse; }
The thousand ships; the woes which Ilion bore }
From Greece, for nine revolving years before. }
This ‡ rule with judgment should the bard main- } tain, }
Who brings Laertes' wandering son again,
From burning Ilion to his native reign.
Let him not launch from Ida's strand his ships,
With his attendant friends into the deeps;
Nor stay to vanquish the Ciconian host; }
But let him first appear (his comrades lost) }
With fair Calypso on th' Ogygian coast. }
From thence, a world of toils and dangers past,
Waft him to rich Phæacia's realms at last,
There at the feast his wanderings to relate,
His friends dire change; his own relentless fate.
But if the bard of former actions sings, }
He wisely draws from those remoter springs }
The present order, and the course of things. }
As yet unfold th' event on no pretence,
'Tis your chief task to keep us in suspense.
Nor tell what § presents Atreus' son prepares,
To reconcile Achilles to the wars;
Or || by what god's auspicious conduct led,
From Polyphemus' den Ulysses fled.
Pleas'd with the toil, and on the prospect bent,
Our souls leap forward to the wish'd event.
No call of nature can our search restrain,
And sleep, and thirst, and hunger, plead in vain.
Glad we pursue the labour we embrac'd,
And leave reluctant, when we leave at last.
See! how the bard triumphant in his art,
Sports with our passions, and commands the
heart;
Now here, now there, he turns the varying song;
And draws at will the captive soul along;

† See Homer's Iliad.

‡ See the Odyssey.

§ See the Iliad. Lib. XIX.

|| Odyss. IX.

Rack'd with uncertain hints, in every sense
 We feel the lengthen'd anguish of suspense.
 When * Homer once has promis'd to rehearse
 Bold Paris' fight, in many a sounding verse,
 He soon perceives his reader's warm desire
 Wrapt in the event, and all his soul on fire;
 The poet then contrives some specious stay,
 Before he tells the fortune of the day.
 Till Helen to the king and elders show,
 From some tall tower, the leaders of the foe,
 And name the heroes in the fields below.
 † When chaste Penelope, to gain her end,
 Invites her suitors the tough bow to bend;
 (Her nuptial bed the victor's promis'd prize)
 With what address her various arts she plies!
 Skill'd in delays, and politically slow
 To search her treasures for her hero's bow.
 None lead the reader in the dark along,
 To the last goal that terminates the song;
 Sometimes th' event must glance upon the fight,
 Not glare in day, nor wholly sink in night.
 'Tis thus Anchises to his son relates
 The various series of his future fates;
 For this the ‡ prophets see, on Tyber's shore,
 Wars, horrid wars, and Latium red with gore,
 A new Achilles rising to destroy
 With boundless rage the poor remains of Troy;
 But raise his mind with prospects of success,
 And give the promise of a lasting peace.
 This knew the hero when he fought the plains,
 Sprung § from his ships, and charg'd the embattled
 swains,
 Hew'd down the Latian troops with matchless might;
 (The first, auspicious omen of the fight)
 And at one blow gigantic Theron kill'd,
 Bold, but in vain, and foremost of the field;
 Thus too || Patroclus with his latest breath
 Foretold his unregarding victor's death:
 His parting soul anticipates the blow,
 That waits brave Hector from a greater foe.
 Thou too, poor Turnus, just before thy doom,
 Could'st read thy end, and antedate a tomb,
 When o'er thy head the baleful fury flew,
 And in dire omens set thy fate to view:
 A bird obscene, she flutter'd o'er the field,
 And scream'd thy death, and beat thy sounding shield.
 For lo! the time, the fatal time is come,
 Charg'd with thy death, and heavy with thy doom,
 When Turnus, though in vain, shall rue the day;
 Shall curse the golden belt he bore away;
 Shall wish too late young Pallas' spoils unfought,
 And mourn the conquest he so dearly bought.
 Th' event should glimmer through its gloomy
 throwd,
 Though yet confus'd, and struggling in the cloud.
 So, to the traveller, as he journeys on
 To reach the walls of some far distant town,
 If, high in air, the dubious turrets rise,
 Peep o'er the hills, and dance before his eyes;

* See Hom. Iliad III. † Odyss. XXI.

Pleas'd the refreshing prospect to survey,
 Each stride he lengthens, and beguiles the way.
 More pleas'd (the tempting scene in view) to go,
 Than pensively to walk the gloomy vales below.

Unless the theme within your bosom roll,
 Work in each thought, and run through all the soul;

Unless you alter with incessant pain,
 Pull down, and build the fabric o'er again;
 In vain, when rival-wits your wonder raise,
 You'll strive to match those beauties which you
 praise.

To one just scope with fixt design go on!
 Let sovereign reason dictate from her throne,
 By what determin'd methods to advance,
 But never trust to arbitrary chance.
 Where chance presides, all objects wildly join'd,
 Crowd on the reader, and distract his mind;
 From theme to theme unwilling is he tost,
 And in the dark variety is lost.
 You see some bards, who bold excursions make
 In long digressions from the beaten track;
 And paint a wild unnecessary throng
 Of things and objects foreign to the song;
 For new descriptions from the road depart,
 Devoid of order, discipline, and art.
 So, many an anxious toil and danger past,
 Some wretch returns from banishment at last;
 With fond delay to range the shady wood,
 Now here, now there, he wanders from the road,
 From field to field, from stream to stream he roves,

And courts the cooling shelter of the groves.
 For why should Homer * deck the gorgeous car,
 When our rais'd souls are eager for the war:
 Or dwell on every wheel, when loud alarms,
 And Mars in thunder calls the hosts to arms?
 When with his heroes we some dastard † find,
 Of a vile aspect, and malignant mind;
 His awkward figure is not worth our care;
 His monstrous length of head, or want of hair,
 Not, though he goes with mountain shoulders by,
 Short of a foot, or blinking in an eye.
 Such trivial objects call us off too long
 From the main drift and tenor of the song.

Drances ‡ appears a juster character,
 In council bold, but cautious in the war;
 Factious and loud the listening throng he draws,
 And swells with wealth and popular applause;
 But, what in our's would never find a place,
 The bold Greek language may admit with grace.

Why should I here the stratagems recite,
 And the low tricks of every little wit?
 Some out of time their stock of knowledge boast,
 Till in the pedant all the bard is lost.
 Such without care their useless lumber place;
 One black, confus'd, and undigested mass,
 With a wild heap encumbers every part,
 Nor rang'd with grace, nor methodis'd with art.
 But then in chief, when things abstruse they teach,
 Themes too abstracted for the vulgar reach;

* Vid. Hom. Iliad, Lib. V. v. 722.

† Ibid. Lib. II. v. 212.

‡ Virg. Æneid Lib. XI. v. 33

The hidden nature of the deities;
 The secret laws and motions of the skies;
 Or from what dark original began
 The fiery soul, and kindled up the man;
 Oft they in odious instances engage,
 And for examples ranfack every age,
 With every realm; no hero will they pass,
 But act against the rules of time and place.
 Avoid, ye youths, these practices; nor raise
 Your swelling souls to such a thirst of praise.
 Some bards of eminence there are, we own,
 Who sing sometimes the journies of the sun,
 The rising stars, and labours of the moon:
 What impulse bids the ocean rise and fall;
 What motions shake and rock the trembling ball.
 Though foreign subjects had engag'd their care,
 The rage, the din and thunder of the war,
 Through the loud field; the genius of the earth;
 Or rules to raise the vegetable birth:
 Yet 'tis but seldom, and when time and place
 Require the thing, and reconcile to grace.
 Those foreign objects necessary seem,
 And flow, to all appearance, from the theme;
 With so much art so well conceal'd they please,
 When wrought with skill, and introduc'd with ease.

Should not * Anchises, such occasion shown,
 Resolve the questions of his godlike son?
 If souls depriv'd of heaven's fair light repair
 Once more to day, and breathe the vital air?
 Or if from high Olympus first they came,
 Inspir'd with portions of ethereal flame,
 Though here encumber'd with the mortal frame?
 Tire not too long one subject when you write,
 For 'tis variety that gives delight;
 But when to that variety inclin'd,
 You seek new objects to relieve the mind,
 Be sure let nothing forc'd or labour'd seem,
 But watch your time, and steal from off your theme.

Conceal with care your longing to depart,
 For art's chief pride is still to cover art.
 So † Mulciber, in future ages skill'd,
 Engrav'd Rome's glories on Æneas' shield,
 On the bright orb her future fame enroll'd,
 And with her triumphs charg'd the rising gold;
 Here figur'd fights the blazing round adorn,
 There his long line of heroes yet unborn.
 But if a ‡ poet of Ausonian birth
 Describes the various kingdoms of the earth,
 Wide intersperst; the Medes, or swarthy Moors;
 The different natures of their soils explores,
 And paints the trees that bloom on India's
 shores:
 On his own land he looks with partial eyes,
 And lifts the fair Hesperia to the skies;
 To all the fair Hesperia he prefers,
 And makes the woods of Bactria yield to her's,
 With proud Panchaia; though her groves she boasts,
 And breathes a cloud of incense from her coasts.

Hear then, ye generous youths, on this regard
 I should not blame the conduct of the bard,
 Who in soft numbers, and a flowing strain,
 Relieves and reconciles our ears again.
 When I the various implements had sung
 That to the fields, and rural trade belong,
 In sweet harmonious measures would I tell
 How * nature mourn'd when the great Cæsar fell.
 When Bacchus' curling vines had grac'd my lays,
 The rural pleasures † next should share my praise.
 The labour ended, and complete the whole,
 Some bards with pleasure wander round the goal,
 The flights and fallies of the muse prolong,
 And add new beauties to the finish'd song;
 Pleas'd with th' excursion of the charming strain,
 We strive to quit the work, but strive in vain.
 Thus, were the bees the subject of my muse,
 Their laws, their natures, and celestial dews;
 Poor ‡ Aristæus should his fate disclose,
 His mother's counsel should assuage his woes;
 Old Proteus here should struggle in his chain,
 There in soft verse the Thracian bard complain
 As Philomela on a popular bough
 Bewails her young, melodious in her woe).
 Pangæan steep his sorrows should return,
 And vocal Thrace with Rhodope should mourn;
 Hebrus should roll low-murmuring to the deep,
 And barbarous nations wonder why they weep.
 Thus too the poets, who the names declare
 Of kings and nations gathering to the war,
 Sometimes diversify the strain, and sing
 The wondrous change of the § Ligurian king.
 While for his Phaëton his sorrows flow,
 And his harmonious strains beguile his woe,
 O'er all the man the snowy feathers rise,
 And in a tuneful swan he mounts the skies.
 Thus too || Hippolitus, by Dian's care
 And Pæan's art, returns to upper air.
 The bards now paint the arms their heroes wield,
 And each bold figure on the glittering shield.
 Great ¶ Aventinus, great Alcides' son,
 Wore the proud trophy which his father won;
 An hundred serpents o'er the buckler roll'd,
 And Hydra hiss'd from all her heads in gold.
 Now blooming Tempe's cool retreats they sing,
 And now with flowery beauties paint the spring.
 Now with a sylvan scene the floods they hide;
 Or teach the fam'd Eridanus to glide,
 Or sport on fabled Achelous' side.
 Or hoary Nereus' numerous race display,
 The hundred azure sisters of the sea.
 With them the nymphs that haunt their native
 woods,

And the long orders of the Sylvan gods.

With gay descriptions sprinkle here and there
 Some grave instructive sentences with care,
 That touch on life, some moral good pursue,
 And give us virtue in a transient view;

* Virg. Georg. Lib. I. v. 46.

Rules, which the future fire may make his own,
And point the golden precepts to his son.

Sometimes on little images to fall,
And thus illustrate mighty things by small;
With due success the licens'd poet dares,
When to the * ants the Phrygians he compares,
Who leaving Carthage, gather to the seas;
Or the laborious Tyrians to the † bees.
But swarming ‡ flies, offensive animals,
That buz incessant o'er the smoking pails,
Are images too low, to paint the hosts
That roll and blacken o'er Ausonia's coasts.
The lofty muse who sung the Latian war,
Would think such trivial things beneath her care.
How from his majesty would Virgil fall,
If Turnus, scarce repell'd from Ilion's wall,
Retiring grimly with a tardy pace,
Had e'er been figur'd by the patient § ass!
Whom unregarded troops of boys surround,
While o'er his sides their rattling strokes resound;
Slow he gives way, and crops the springing grain,
Turns on each side, and stops to graze again.
In every point the thing is just, we know,
But then the image is itself too low:
For Turnus, sprung from such a glorious strain,
The vile resemblance would with scorn disdain.
With better grace the || lion may appear,
Who, singly impotent the crowd to dare,
Repel, or stand their whole embody'd war,
Looks grimly back, and rolls his glaring eye,
Despairs to conquer, and disdains to fly.

Since fictions are allow'd, be sure, ye youths,
Your fictions wear at least the air of truths.
When ¶ Glaucus meets Tydides on the plain,
Inflam'd with rage, and reeking from the slain;
Some think they could not pass the time away,
In such long narratives, and cool delay,
Amidst the raging tumult of the day.
But yet we hear fierce Diomed relate
The crime of bold Lycurgus, and his fate;
And Glaucus talks of brave Bellerophon,
Doom'd for a lawless passion not his own;
Sets forth the hero's great exploits to view,
How the bold chief the dire Chimæra slew,
The Solymæan host, and Amazonian crew.
For those surprising fictions are design'd
With their sweet falsehoods to delight the mind;
The bards expect no credit should be given
To the bare lie, though authoriz'd by heaven,
Which oft with confidence they vent abroad,
Beneath the needful sanction of a god.
'Twas thus the  roasted heifers of the sun
Spoke o'er the fire with accents not their own;
'Twas thus †† Achilles' steed his silence broke,
And ‡‡ Trojan ships in human voices spoke;

As wrought by heaven these wonders they relate,
All airy visions of the ivory gate!

Speak things but once, if order be your care,
For more the cloy'd attention will not bear,
And tedious repetitions tire the ear.
In this we differ from the Grecian train,
Who tell * Atrides' visions o'er again.
'Tis not enough with them we know the cause
Why great Achilles from the war withdraws,
Unless the † weeping hero, on the shore,
Tells his blue mother all we heard before.
So much on punctual niceties they stand,
That, when their kings dispatch some high command,

All word for word, th' ambassadors ‡ rehearse
In the same tenor of unvaried verse.
Not so did § Venulus from Arpi bring
The final answer of th' Ætolian king.

Let others labour on a vast design,
A less, but polish'd with due care, be thine.
To change its structure, be your last delight;
Thus spend the day, and exercise the night,
Incessant in your toil. But if you choose
A larger field and subject for your muse;
If scanty limits should the theme confine,
Learn with just art to lengthen the design
Beyond its native bounds; the roving mind
A thousand methods to this end may find;
Unnumber'd fictions may with truths be join'd.
Nature supplies a fund of matter still;
Then cull th' rich variety at will.
See! how the bard calls down th' embattled gods,
All rang'd in factions, from their bright abodes;
Who, fir'd with mutual hate, their arms employ,
And in the field declare for Greece or Troy;
Till Jove convenes a council to assuage
Their rising fury, and suspend their rage;
Though the blest gods, remov'd from human eyes,
Live in immortal ease within the distant skies.
And now th' infernal realm his theme he makes,
The reign of Pluto, the Tartarean lakes,
The furies dreadful with their curling snakes.
He gathers omens from each bird that flies,
And signs from every wing that beats the skies.
He now describes a banquet, where the guest
Prolongs with narratives the royal feast.
Or at the glorious hero's tomb we read
Of games ordain'd in honour of the dead.
And oft for mercies in old times display'd,
To their own gods their annual rites are paid.
For monstrous Python slain, their praises rise,
And lift the fame of Phœbus to the skies.
In hymns Alcides' labours they resound.
While Cacus lies extended on the ground,
Alternate sing the labours of his hands,
Enjoin'd by fierce Eurystheus' stern commands;
The den of Cacus crowns the grateful strain,
Where the grim monster breathes his flames in vain.

|| All these particulars, to the end of this paragraph,
are taken from Homer and Virgil.

Mark how sometimes the bard without control
 Exerts his fire, and pours forth all his soul;
 His lines so daring, and his words so strong;
 We see the subject figur'd in the song:
 When with the winds old * Ocean he deforms,
 Or paints the rage and horrors of the storms;
 Or drives on pointed rocks the bursting ships,
 Tost on the Euxine, or Sicilian deeps.
 Or sings the † plagues that blast the livid sky,
 When beasts by herds, and men by nations die;
 Or the fierce flames ‡ that Ætna's jaws expire,
 Her melted rocks, and deluges of fire,
 When from her mouth the bursting vapour flies,
 And, charg'd with ruin, thunders to the skies;
 While drifts of smoke in sooty whirlwinds play,
 And clouds of cinders stain the golden day.
 See! as the poet sounds the dire alarms,
 Calls on the war, and sets the hosts in arms;
 Squadrons on squadrons driven, confus'dly die;
 Grim Mars in all his terrors strikes the eye;
 More than description rising to the sight,
 Presents the real horrors of the fight;
 A new creation seems our praise to claim;
 (Hence Greece derives the sacred § poet's name;) }
 The dreadful clang of clashing arms we hear;
 The agonizing groan, the fruitless prayer,
 And shrieks of suppliants thicken on the ear. }
 Who, when he reads a || city storm'd, forbears
 To feel her woes, and sympathize in tears?
 When o'er the palaces the flames aspire
 From wall to wall, and wrap the domes in fire?
 The fire, with years and hostile rage oppress!
 The starting infant, clinging to the breast!
 The tender mother runs, with piercing cries,
 Through friends and foes, and shrieking rends the skies.

Dragg'd from the altar, the distracted fair
 Beats her white breast, and tears her golden hair.
 Here in thick crowds the vanquish'd fly away,
 There the proud victors heap the wealthy prey;
 With rage relentless ravage their abodes,
 Nor spare the sacred temples of the gods.
 O'er the whole town they run with wild affright,
 Tumultuous haste, and violence of flight.

Why should I mention how our souls aspire,
 Lost in the raptures of the sacred fire?
 For ev'n the soul not always holds the same,
 But knows at different times a different frame.
 Whether with rolling seasons she complies,
 Turns with the sun, or changes with the skies;
 Or through long toil, remissive of her fires,
 Droops with the mortal frame her force inspires;
 Or that our minds alternately appear
 Now bright with joy, and now o'ercast with care.
 No!—but the gods, th' immortal gods, supply
 The glorious fires; they speak the deity.
 Then blest is he who waits th' auspicious nod,
 The warmth divine, and presence of the god;
 Who his suspended labours can restrain,
 Till heaven's serene indulgence smiles again.
 But strive, on no pretence, against your power,
 Till time brings back the voluntary hour.

‡ Ibid. Lib. III. v. 571. § A τὸ ποιεῖν.

|| Vid. Æneid. Lib. II.

Sometimes their verdant honours leave the woods,
 And their dry urns defraud the thirsty floods;
 Nor still the rivers a full channel yield,
 Nor spring with flowery beauties paints the field:
 The bards no less such fickle changes find,
 Damp't is the noble ardour of the mind;
 Their wonted toil her wearied powers refuse;
 Their souls grow slack and languid to the muse,
 Deaf to their call; their efforts are withstood;
 Round their cold hearts congeals the freezing blood.
 You'd think the muses fled; the god no more
 Would fire the bosom where he dwelt before,
 No more return!—how often, though in vain,
 The poet would renew the wonted strain!
 Nor sees the gods who thwart his fruitless care,
 Nor angry heaven relentless to his prayer.
 Some read the ancient bards, of deathless fame,
 And from their raptures catch the noble flame
 By just degrees; they feed the glowing vein,
 And all th' immortal ardour burns again
 In its full light and heat; the sun's bright ray
 Thus (when the clouds disperse) restores the day:
 Whence shoot this sudden flash that gilds the pole?

The god, the god comes rushing on his soul;
 Fires with ethereal vigour every part,
 Through every trembling limb he seems to dart, }
 Works in each vein, and swells his rising heart. }
 Deep in his breast the heavenly tumult plays,
 And sets his mounting spirits on a blaze.
 Nor can the raging flames themselves contain,
 For the whole god descends into the man.
 He quits mortality, he knows no bounds,
 But sings inspir'd in more than human sounds.
 Nor from his breast can shake th' immortal load,
 But pants and raves, impatient of the god;
 And rapt beyond himself, admires the force
 That drives him on reluctant to the course.
 He calls on Phœbus, by the god oppress,
 Who breathes excessive spirit in his breast;
 No force of thirst or hunger can controul
 The fierce, the ruling transport of his soul.
 Oft in their sleep, inspir'd with rage divine,
 Some bards enjoy the visions of the Nine:
 Visions! themselves with due applause may crown;
 Visions! that Phœbus or that Jove may own.
 To such an height the god exalts the flame,
 And so unbounded is their thirst of fame.
 But here, ye youths, exert your timely care,
 Nor trust th' ungovernable rage too far;
 Use not your fortune, nor unfurl your sails,
 Though softly courted by the flattering gales,
 Refuse them still, and call your judgment in,
 While the fierce god exults and reigns within;
 To reason's standard be your thoughts confin'd,
 Let judgment calm the tempest of the mind.
 Indulge your heat with conduct, and restrain;
 Learn when to draw, and when to give the rein.
 But always wait till the warm raptures cease,
 And lull the tumults of the soul to peace;
 Then, nor till then, examine strictly o'er
 What your wild fallies might suggest before.

Be sure, from nature never to depart;

To copy nature is the task of art.

The noblest poets own her sovereign sway,

And ever follow where she leads the way.

From her the different characters they trace,
 That mark the human, or the savage race,
 Each various and distinct; in every stage
 They paint mankind; their humours, sex, and age;
 They show what manners the slow sage become,
 What the brisk youth in all his sprightly bloom.
 In every word and sentiment explain,
 How the proud monarch differs from the swain.
 I nauseate all confounded characters,
 Where young Telemachus too grave appears,
 Or reverend Nestor acts beneath his years.
 The poet suits his speeches, when he sings,
 To proper persons, and the state of things;
 On each their just distinctions are bestow'd,
 To mark a male, a female, or a god.
 Thus when in * heaven seditious tumults rise,
 Amongst the radiant senate of the skies,
 The fire of gods, and sovereign of mankind,
 In a few words unfolds his sacred mind.
 Not so fair Venus; who at large replies,
 And pities Troy, and counts her miseries,
 Woes undeserv'd: but with contention fir'd,
 And with the spirit of revenge inspir'd,
 Fierce Juno storms amidst the blest abodes,
 And stuns with loud complaints the listening gods.
 When youthful † Turnus the stern combat claims,
 His rising heart is fill'd with martial flames;
 Impell'd by rage, and bent to prove his might,
 His soul springs forward, and prevents the fight;
 Rous'd to revenge, his kindling spirits glow,
 Confirm his challenge, and provoke the foe,
 The fugitive of Tr-y.—But while his rage
 And youthful courage prompts him to engage,
 On Latium's king incumbent it appears,
 Grown old in prudence, piety, and years,
 To weigh events, and youthful heat assuage,
 With the cold caution and the fears of age.
 In Dido's various character is seen,
 The furious lover and the gracious queen:
 When Troy's fam'd chief, commanded from above,
 Prepares to quit her kingdom, and her love;
 She raves, she storms with unavailing care,
 Grown wild with grief, and frantic with despair.
 Through every street she flies, with anguish hung,
 And broken accents flutter on her tongue;
 Her words confus'd and interrupted flow,
 Speak and express the hurry of her woe.
 How in this Dido is that Dido lost,
 Who late receiv'd the Trojans on her coast,
 And bade them banish grief, and share her throne,
 Dismiss their fears, and think her realms their own.

Next the great orators consult, and thence
 Draw all the moving turns of eloquence;
 That ‡ Sinon may his Phrygian foes betray,
 And lead the crowd, as fraud directs the way;
 That wise †† Ulysses may the Greeks detain,
 While Troy yet stood, from measuring back the main.

Need I name § Nestor, who could talk to peace,
 With melting words, the factious kings of Greece?

* Vid. Æneid, Lib. X.

† Ibid. Lib. XII. v. 9.

‡ Ibid. Lib. II.

†† Hom. Iliad. Lib. II.

§ Æneid. Lib. VIII. v. 370.

Whose soft address their fury could controul,
 Mould every passion, and subdue the soul!
 These soothing arts to * Venus sure were known,
 To beg immortal arms to grace her son;
 Her injur'd spouse each thrilling word inspires,
 With every pang of love to second her desires.
 With nicest art the fair adulteress draws
 Her fond addresses from a distant cause;
 And all her guileful accents are design'd
 To catch his passions, and ensnare his mind.
 'Tis hence the poet learns in every part
 To bend the soul, and give with wondrous art
 A thousand different motions to the heart.
 Hence, as his subject gay or sad appears,
 He claims our joy, or triumphs in our tears.
 Who, when he sees how † Orpheus' sorrows flow,
 Weeps not his tears, and answers woe for woe?
 When he his dear Eurydice deplores
 To the deaf rocks, and solitary shores;
 With the soft harp the bard relieves his pain,
 For thee, when morning dawns, prolongs the strain,

For thee, when Phœbus seeks the seas again.
 Or when the young ‡ Euryalus is kill'd,
 And rolls in death along the bloody field;
 Like some fair flower beneath the share he lies,
 His head declin'd, and drooping as he dies;
 The reader's soul is touch'd with generous woe,
 He longs to rush with Nisus on the foe;
 He burns with friendly pity to the dead,
 To raise the youth, and prop his sinking head;
 And strives in vain to stop the gushing blood,
 That stains his bosom with a purple flood.

But if the bard such images pursues,
 That raise the blushes of the virgin-muse;
 Let them be slightly touch'd, and ne'er express,
 Give but an hint, and let us guess the rest.
 If Jove commands the gathering storms to rise,
 And with deep thunders rends the vaulted skies,
 To the same cave together may repair
 To the Trojan § hero and the Tyrian fair.
 The poet's modesty must add no more;
 Enough, that earth had given the sign before;
 The conscious æther was with flames o'erspread,
 The nymphs ran shrieking round the mountain's head.

Nor let young Troilus, unhappy boy,
 Meet fierce Achilles in the plains of Troy;
 But show th' unequal youth's untimely fall,
 To great Æneas on the Tyrian wall;
 Supine and hanging from his empty car,
 Dragg'd by his panting coursers through the war.
 This, from our bright examples you may trace,
 To write with judgment, decency, and grace;
 From others learn invention to increase,
 And search in chief the glorious sons of Greece;
 For her bright treasures Argos' realms explore,
 Bring home triumphant all her gather'd store,
 And with her spoils enrich the Latian shore.
 Nor is the glory of translation less,
 To give the Grecian bards a Roman dress,

* Iliad. Lib. I. v. 246.

† Virgil. Georgic. Lib. IV. v. 464.

‡ Æneid, Lib. IX. v. 433.

If Phœbus' gracious smiles the labour crown,
Than if some new invention were your own.
Mincio's and Manto's glorious son behold,
Th' immortal Virgil, sheath'd in foreign gold,
Shines out unsham'd, and towers above the rest,
In the rich spoils of godlike Homer drest.
Let Greece in triumph boast that she imparts
To Latium's conquering realms her glorious arts:
While Latium's sons improve her best designs,
Till by degrees each polish'd labour shines,
While Rome advances now in arts, as far
Above all cities, as of old in war.

Ye gods of Rome, ye guardian deities,
Who lift our nation's glory to the skies;
And thou, Apollo, the great source of Troy,
Let Rome at least this single palm enjoy,
To shine in arts supreme, as once in power,
And teach the nations she subdued before;
Since discord all Ausonia's kings alarms,
And clouds the ancient glories of her arms.
In our own breasts we sheath the civil sword,
Our country naked to a foreign lord;
Which lately, prostrate, started from despair, [war;
Burn'd with new hopes, and arm'd her hands for
But arm'd in vain;—th' inexorable hate
Of envious fortune call'd her to her fate,
Insatiate in her rage; her frowns oppose
The Latian fame, and woes are heap'd on woes.
Our dread alarms each foreign monarch took,
Through all their tribes the distant nations shook;
To earth's last bounds the fame of Leo runs,
Nile heard, and Indus trembled for his sons.
Arabia heard the Medicean line,
The first of men, and sprung from race divine.
The sovereign priest, and mitred king, appears
With his lov'd Julius join'd, who kindly shares
The reins of empire, and the public cares. }
To break their country's chains, the generous pair
Concert their schemes, and meditate the war.
On Leo Europe's monarchs turn their eyes,
On him alone the western world relies;
And each bold chief attends his dread alarms,
While the proud crescent fades before his arms.
High on his splendid car, immortal Rome,
Thine eyes had seen the holy warrior come, }
Lord of the vanquish'd world, in triumph home. }
Thy streams, old Tyber, swell'd with conscious
pride,

Had borne thy kindred warrior down thy tide;
While, crowded up in heaps, thy waves admire
The captive nations, and their strange attire;
Behind his wheels should march a numerous
train }
Of scepter'd slaves, reluctant to the chain,
Forget their haughty threats, and boast in vain. }
Though the proud foe, of Jury's realm possesst,
Has spread his wide dominion through the east;
Sees his dread standard there at large unfurl'd,
And grasps in thought the empire of the world;
And now (ye gods) increas'd in barbarous power,
His armies hover o'er th' Hesperian shore.
To see the passing pomp, the ravish'd throng
Through every street should flow in tides along;
The sacred father, as the numbers roll'd, }
Should his dear citizens again behold, }
High o'er the shouting crowds enthron'd in gold; }

Should show the trophies of his glorious toils,
And hang the shrines with consecrated spoils.
Piles of barbaric gold should glitter there,
The wealth of kingdoms, and the pomp of war:
But, by your crime, ye gods, our hopes are cross'd,
And those imaginary triumphs lost;
Interr'd with Leo, in one fatal hour,
Our prospects perish'd, as they liv'd before.

BOOK III.

WHAT style, what language, suits the poet's lays,

To claim Apollo's and the muses' praise,
I now unfold; to this last bound I tend,
And see my promis'd labours at an end.

First then with care a just expression choose,
Led by the kind indulgence of the muse,
To dress up every subject when you write,
And set all objects in a proper light.
But lest the distant prospect of the goal
Should damp your vigour, and your strength
controul,

Rouse every power, and call forth all the soul. }
See! how the nine the panting youth invite,
With one loud voice to reach Parnassus' height;
See! how they hold aloft th' immortal crown,
To urge the course, and call the victor on;
See! from the clouds each lavish goddess pours
Full o'er thy head a sudden spring of flowers, }
And roses fall in odoriferous showers;
Celestial scents in balmy breezes fly,
And shed ambrosial spirits from the sky.

In chief avoid obscurity, nor shroud
Your thoughts and dark conceptions in a cloud;
For * some, we know, affect to shun the light,
Lost in forc'd figures, and involv'd in night,
Studious and bent to leave the common way,
They skulk in darkness, and abhor the day.
Oh! may the sacred nine inspire my lays
To shine with pride in their own native rays;
For this we need not importune the skies,
In our own power and will the blessing lies.
Expression, boundless in extent, displays
A thousand forms, a thousand several ways;
In different garbs from different quarters brought,
It makes unnumber'd dresses for a thought;
Such vast varieties of hues we find
To paint conception, and unfold the mind!
If e'er you toil, but toil without success,
To give your images a shining dress,
Quit your pursuit, and choose a different way, }
Till, breaking forth, the voluntary ray
Cuts the thick darkness, and lets down the day. }

Since then a thousand forms you may pursue,
A thousand figures rising to the view,
Unless confin'd and strengthen'd in your scheme,
With the short limits of a scanty theme,
From these to those with boundless freedom pass,
And to each image give a different face.
The readers hence a wond'rous pleasure find,
That charms the ear, and captivates the mind;
In this the laws of nature we obey,
And act as her example points the way,

* Persius and Lycophron.

Which has on every different species thrown
A shape distinct and figure of its own;
Man differs from the beast that haunts the woods,
The bird from every native of the floods.

See how the poet banishes with grace
A native term to give a * stranger place!
From different images with just success
He clothes his matter in the borrow'd dress:
The borrow'd dress the things themselves admire,
And wonder whence they drew the strange attire;
Proud of their ravish'd spoils, they now disclaim
Their former colour, and their genuine name,
And, in another garb more beauteous grown,
Prefer the foreign habit to their own.
Oft, as he paints a battle on the plain,
The battle's imagin'd by the roaring main;
Now he the fight a fiery deluge names,
That pours along the fields a flood of flames;
In airy conflict now the winds appear,
Alarm the deeps, and wage the stormy war;
To the fierce shock th' embattl'd tempests pour,
Waves charge on waves, th' encountering billows
Thus in a vary'd dress the subject shines, [roar.
By turns the objects shift their proper signs;
From shape to shape alternately they run,
To borrow others charms, and lend their own;
Pleas'd with the borrow'd charms, the readers
find

A crowd of different images combin'd,
Rise from a single object to the mind.
So the pleas'd traveller, from a mountain's brow,
Views the calm surface of the seas below;
Though wide beneath the floating ocean lies
The first immediate object of his eyes,
He sees the forests tremble from within,
And gliding meadows paint the deeps with green;
While to his eyes the fair delusions pass
In gay succession through the watery glass.
'Tis thus the bard diversifies his song,
Now here, now there, he calls the soul along.
The rich variety he sets to fight,
Cloys not the mind, but adds to our delight.
Now with a frugal choice the bard affords
The strongest light and energy of words;
While humble subjects he contrives to raise
With borrow'd splendours, and a foreign blaze.
This, if on old tradition we rely,
Was once the current language of the sky;
Which first the muses brought to these abodes,
Who taught mankind the secrets of the gods.
For in the court of Jove their choirs advance,
And sing alternate, as they lead the dance,
Mix'd with the gods; they hear Apollo's lyre,
And from high heaven the panting bard inspire.
Nor bards alone, but other writers, reach
This bold, this daring privilege of speech;
In chief the orators, to raise their sense,
In this strong figure dress their eloquence,
When with persuasive strokes they plead a cause,
And bridle vice, and vindicate the laws;
Or on the dreadful verge of death defend,
And snatch from fate a poor devoted friend,

* The Metaphor.

Ev'n the rough hinds delight in such a strain,
When the glad harvest waves with golden grain,
And thirsty meadows drink the pearly rain;
On the proud vine her purple gems appear;
The smiling fields rejoice, and hail the pregnant
year.

First from necessity the figure sprung
For things, that would not suit our scanty tongue,
When no true names were offer'd to the view,
Those they transferr'd that border'd on the true;
Thence by degrees the noble licence grew.
The bards those daring liberties embrac'd,
Through want at first, through luxury at last:
They now to alien things, at will, confirm
The borrow'd honours of a foreign term.
So man, at first, the rattling storm to fly,
And the bleak horrors of the wintery sky,
Rais'd up a roof of osiers o'er his head,
And clos'd with homely clay the slender shed:
Now regal palaces, of wond'rous size,
With brazen beams on Parian columns rise,
That heave the pompous fabric to the skies.
But other writers sprinkle here and there
These bolder beauties with a frugal care;
So vast a freedom is allow'd to none,
But suits the labours of the bard alone,
Who in the laws of verse himself restrains,
Ty'd up to time in voluntary chains.
Others, by no restraint or stop withheld,
May range the compass of a wider field;
The sacred poets, who their labours fill
With pleasing fictions, or with truths at will,
Their thoughts in bolder liberties express,
Which look more beauteous in a foreign dress,
To all unusual colours they impart,
Nor blush, if e'er detected in their art.

* Sometimes beyond the bounds of truth they fly,
And boldly lift their subject to the sky;
When with tumultuous shouts the heavens re-
bound,

And all Olympus trembles with the sound;
Or with repeated accents they relate
The fall of Troy, and dwell upon her fate;
† Oh fire! oh country, once with glory crown'd!
Oh wretched race of Priam, once renown'd!
Oh Jove! see Ilion smoking on the ground!

They now name Ceres for the golden grain,
Bacchus for wine, and Neptune for the main:
Or from the father's name point out the son;
Or for her people introduce a town:
So when alarm'd her natives dread their fates,
Pale Afric shakes, and trembles through her states:
And some, by Achelous' streams alone,
Comprise the floods of all the world in one.

‡ Lo! now they start aside, and change the strain
To fancy'd converse with an absent swain;
To grotts and caverns all their cares disclose,
Or tell the solitary rocks their woes;
To scenes inanimate proclaim their love,
Talk with an hill, or whisper to a grove.

* The Hyperbole.

† Hæc verba ex incerti nominis Poetâ citat Cicero.

‡ The Apostrophe.

On you they call, ye unattentive woods,
And wait an answer from your bordering floods.

† Sometimes they speak one thing, but leave behind

Another secret meaning in the mind :

A fair expression artfully dispense,
But use a word that clashes with the sense.

‡ Thus pious Helen stole the faithful sword,
While Troy was flaming, from her sleeping lord.

§ So glorious Drances tower'd amid the plain,
And pil'd the ground with mountains of the
slain;

Immortal trophies rais'd from squadrons kill'd,
And with vast spoils ennobled all the field.

|| But now to mention farther I forbear,
With what strong charms they captivate the ear ;
When the same terms they happily repeat,
The same repeated seem more soft and sweet.
This,  were Arcadia judge, if Pan withstood,
Pan's judge, Arcadia, would condemn her god.

But though our fond indulgence grants the muse

A thousand liberties in different views,
Whene'er you choose an image to express
In foreign terms, and scorn the native dress ;
Yet be discreet, nor strain the point too far,
Let the transition still unforc'd appear,

Nor e'er discover an excess of care :

For some, we know, with awkward violence
Distort the subject, and disjoint the sense ;

Quite change the genuine figure, and deface
The native shape with every living grace ;

And force unwilling objects to put on
An alien face, and features not their own.

A low conceit in disproportion'd terms,
Looks like a boy dress'd up in giants arms ;

Blind to the truth, all reason they exceed,
†† Who name a stall the palace of the steed,

Or grafs the tresses of great Rhæa's head.
'Tis best sometimes an image to express
In its own colours, and its native dress ;

The genuine words with happy care to use,
If nicely cull'd, and worthy of the muse.

Some things alternately compar'd are shown,
Both names still true, and mutually their own ;
But here the least redundance you must shun ;
Tell us, in short, from whence the hint you drew,
And set the whole comparison to view ;
Lest, mindless of your first design, you seem
To lead the mind away, and rove from theme to theme.

But now pursue the method, that affords
The fittest terms, and wisest choice of words.
Not all deserve alike the same regard,
Nor suit the godlike labours of the bard ;
For words as much may differ in degree,
As the most various kinds of poetry.
Though many a common term and word we find
Dispers'd promiscuously through every kind,
Those that will never suit th' heroic rage,
Might grace the buskin, and become the stage.

† The Irony.

‡ See Virg. Æn. Lib. VI. § Ibid. Lib. XI.

|| The Anaphora.  See Virg. Eccl. IV.

†† The Catastrophes.

Their large, their vast variety explore
With piercing eyes, and range the mighty store.

From their deep fund the richest words unfold,

With nicest care be rich expression cull'd,

To deck your numbers in the purest gold,

The vile, the dark degenerate crowd refuse,

And scorn a dress that would disgrace the muse :

Then, to succeed your search, pursue the road,

And beat the track the glorious ancients trod.

To those eternal monuments repair,

There read, and meditate for ever there.

If o'er the rest some mighty genius shines,

Mark the sweet charms and vigour of his lines.

As far as Phœbus and the heavenly powers

Smile on your labours, make his diction your's :

Your style by his authentic standard frame,

Your voice, your habit, and address, the same.

With him proceed to cull the rest ; for there

A full reward will justify your care.

Examine all ; and bring from all away

Their various treasures as a lawful prey.

Nor would I scruple, with a due regard,

To read sometimes a rude unpolish'd bard ;

Among whose labours I may find a line,

Which from unsightly rust I may refine,

And, with a better grace, adopt it into mine.

How often may we see a troubled flood

Stain'd with unsettled ooze and rising mud !

Which (if a well the bordering natives sink)

Supplies the thirsty multitude with drink.

The trickling stream by just degrees refines,

Till in its course the limpid current shines ;

And taught through secret labyrinths to flow,

Works itself clear among the sands below.

For nothing looks so gloomy, but will shine

From proper care, and timely discipline ;

If, with due vigilance and conduct, wrought

Deep in the soul, it labours in the thought.

Hence on the ancients we must rest alone,

And make their golden sentences our own.

To cull their best expressions claims our cares,

To form our notions, and our styles on their's.

See ! how we bear away their precious spoils,

And with the glorious dress enrich our styles ;

Their bright inventions for our use convey,

Bring all the spirit of their words away,

And make their words themselves our lawful
prey !

Unasham'd in other colours to be shown,

We speak our thoughts in accents not our own.

But your design with modest caution weigh,

Steal with due care, and meditate the prey.

Invert the order of the words with art,

And change their former site in every part.

Thus win your readers, thus deceive with grace,

And let th' expression wear a different face ;

Yourself at last, the glorious labour done,

Will scarce discern his diction from your own.

Some, to appear of diffidence bereft,

Steal in broad day, and glory in the theft ;

When with just art, design and confidence,

On the same words they graft a different sense ;

Preserve th' unvary'd terms and order too,

But change their former spirit for a new :

Or, with the sense of emulation bold,

With ancient bards a glorious contest hold ;

Their richest spoils triumphant they explore,
Which, rang'd with better grace, they varnish
o'er,

And give them charms they never knew before.
So trees, that change their soils, more proudly rise,
And lift their spreading honours to the skies;
And, when transplanted, nobler fruits produce,
Exalt their nature, and ferment their juice.
So Troy's fam'd chief the Asian empire bore,
With better omens, to the Latian shore;
Though from thy realm, O Dido, to the sea
Call'd by the gods reluctantly away;
Nor the first nuptial pleasures could controul
The fix'd, the stubborn purpose of his soul.
Unhappy queen! thy woes suppress thy breath;
Thy cares pursue thee, and surviv'd in death.
Had not the Dardan fleet thy kingdom sought,
Thy life had shone unfully'd with a fault. [toils;

Come then, ye youths, and urge your generous
Come strip the ancients, and divide the spoils
Your hands have won—but shun the fault of such,
Who with fond rashness trust themselves too much.
For some we know, who, by their pride betray'd,
With vain contempt reject a foreign aid;
Who scorn those great examples to obey,
Nor follow where the ancients point the way.
While from the theft their cautious hands refrain,
Vain are their fears, their superstition vain.
Nor Phœbus' smiles th' unhappy poet crown;
The fate of all his works prevents his own.
Himself his mould'ring monument survives,
And sees his labours perish while he lives:
His fame is more contracted than his span,
And the frail author dies before the man.
How would he wish the labour to forbear,
And follow other arts with more successful care.

I like a fair allusion nicely wrought;
When the same words express a different thought.
And such a theft true critics dare not blame,
Which late posterity shall crown with fame.
Void of all fear, of every doubt bereft,
I would not blush, but triumph in the theft.
Nor on the ancients for the whole rely,
The whole is more than all their works supply;
Some things your own invention must explore,
Some virgin images untouch'd before.

New terms no laws forbid us to induce,
To coin a word, and sanctify to use;
But yet admit no words into the song,
Unless they prove the stock from whence they sprung;

Point out their family, their kindred trace,
And set to view the series of their race.
But where you find your native tongue too poor

Transport the riches of the Grecian store;
Inform the lump, and work it into grace,
And with new life inspire th' unwieldy mass;
Till, chang'd by discipline, the word puts on
A foreign nature, and forgets its own.
So Latium's language found a rich increase,
And grew and flourish'd from the wealth of Greece;

Till use, in time, had rifled Argos' stores,
And brought all Athens to th' Hesperian shores.

How many words from rich Mycenæ come,
Of Greek extraction, in the dress of Rome?
That live with ours, our rights and freedom claim,
Their nature different, but their looks the same;
Through Latium's realms, in Latium's garb they go,

At once her strangers, and her natives too.
Long has her poverty been fled, and long
With native riches has she grac'd her tongue.
Nor search the poets only, but explore
Immortal Tully's inexhausted store;
And other authors, born in happier days, [lays.
Shall answer all your wants, and beautify your

Oft, in old bards, a verse above the rest
Shines, in barbaric spoils and trophies dress'd;
Thus Gaul, her victor's triumph to complete,
Supplies those words that paint her own defeat;
And vanquish'd Macedon, to tell her doom,
Gives up her language with her arms to Rome.
Then can we fear with groundless diffidence
A want of words that shall express our sense?

But, if compell'd by want, you may produce
And bring an antiquated word in use;
A word erst well receiv'd in days of yore,
A word our old forefathers us'd before:
Well-pleas'd the reader's wonder to engage,
He brings our grandfire's habit on the stage,
And garbs that whilom grac'd an uncouth age. }
Yet must not such appear in every place;
When rang'd too thick, the poem they disgrace.
Since of new words such numbers you command,
Deal out the old ones with a sparing hand.
* Whene'er your images can lay no claim
To a fix'd term, and want a certain name;
To paint one thing, the licens'd bard affords
A pompous circle, and a crowd of words.

Two plighted words in one with grace appear;
When they with ease glide smoothly o'er the ear.
Two may embrace at once, but seldom more, }
Nor verse can bear the mingled shape of four;
No triple monsters dwell on Latium's shore.
When mix'd with smooth, these harsher strains are found,

We start with horror at the frightful sound;
The Grecian Bards, in whom such freedoms please,
May match with more success such words as these;

Heap hills on hills, and bid the structure rise,
Till the vast pile of mountains prop the skies.
What words soever of vast bulk we view,
One of less size may sometimes split in two;
Sometimes we separate from the whole a part,
And prune the more luxuriant limbs with art.
Thus when the names of heroes we declare,
Names whose unpolish'd sounds offend the ear;
We add, or lop some branches which abound, }
Till the harsh accents are with smoothness crown'd. [sound.

That mellows every word, and softens every
By such an happy change, Sicharbas came,
To sink his roughness in Sichæus' name.
Hence would I rather choose those dire alarms
Of vast Enecladus, and heaven in arms.

And the bold Titan's battles to rehearse,
 Harmonious names, that glide into the verse;
 Than count the rough, the barbarous nations o'er,
 Which Rome subdued of old from shore to shore.

Let things submit to words on no pretence,
 But make your words subservient to your sense;
 Nor for their sake admit a single line,
 But what contributes to the main design.
 Through every part most diligently pierce,
 And weigh the sound and sense of every verse.
 Unless your strictest caution you display,
 Some words may lead the heedless bard away;
 Steal from their duty, and desert their post,
 And sculk in darkness, indolently lost;
 Or, while their proper parts their fellows ply,
 Contribute nought but sound and harmony.
 This to prevent, consult your words; and know
 How far their strength, extent, and nature go.
 To all their charges, and their labours fit;
 To all, their several provinces of wit.
 Without this care, the poem will abound
 With empty noise, and impotence of sound;
 Unmeaning terms will crowd in every part,
 Play round the ears, but never reach the heart.
 Yet would I sometimes venture to disperse
 Some words, whose splendor should adorn my verse;

(Words, that to wit and thought have no pretence,
 And rather vehicles of sound than sense;) }
 Till in the gorgeous dress the lines appear,
 And court with gentle harmony the ear.
 Nor with too fond a care such words pursue,
 They meet your sight, and rise in every view.
 Oft, from its chains the shackled verse unloose,
 And give it liberty to walk in prose;
 Then be the work renew'd with endless pain,
 And join with care the shatter'd parts again;
 The lurking faults and errors you may see,
 When the words run unmanacled and free.

Attend, young bard, and listen while I sing;
 Lo! I unlock the muses' sacred spring;
 Lo! Phœbus calls thee to his inmost shrine;
 Hark! in one common voice, the tuneful nine }
 Invite and court thee to the rites divine.
 When first to man the privilege was given,
 To hold by verse an intercourse with heaven,
 Unwilling that th' immortal art should lie
 Cheap and expos'd to every vulgar eye,
 Great Jove, to drive away the groveling crowd,
 To narrow bounds confin'd the glorious road,
 Which more exalted spirits may pursue,
 And left it open to the sacred few.

For many a painful task, in every part,
 Claims all the poet's vigilance and art.
 'Tis not enough his verses to complete,
 In measure, numbers, or determin'd feet;
 Or render things, by clear expression bright,
 And set each object in a proper light:
 To all, proportion'd terms he must dispense,
 And make the sound a picture of the sense;
 The correspondent words exactly frame,
 The look, the features, and the mien the same.
 His thoughts the bard must suitably express,
 Each in a different face, and different dress;
 Lest in unvary'd looks the crowd be shown,
 And the whole multitude appear as one,

With rapid feet and wings, without delay,
 This swiftly flies, and smoothly skims away:
 That, vast of size, his limbs huge, broad, and strong,
 Moves ponderous, and scarce drags his bulk along.
 This blooms with youth and beauty in his face,
 And Venus breathes on every limb a grace:
 That, of rude form, his uncouth numbers shows,
 Looks horrible, and frowns with his rough brows,
 His monstrous tail in many a fold and wind,
 Voluminous and vast, curls up behind:
 At once the image and the lines appear
 Rude to the eye, and frightful to the ear.
 Nor are those figures given without a cause,
 But fixt and settled by determin'd laws;
 All claim and wear, as their deserts are known,
 A voice, a face, and habit of their own.
 * Lo! when the sailors steer the ponderous ships,
 And plough, with brazen beaks, the foamy deeps,
 Incumbent on the main that roars around;
 Beneath their labouring oars the waves resound, }
 The prows wide-echoing through the dark pro-
 found:

To the loud call each distant rock replies,
 Tost by the storm the frothy surges rise;
 While the hoarse ocean beats the sounding shore,
 Dash'd from the strand, the flying waters roar,
 Flash at the shock, and gathering in an heap,
 The liquid mountains rise, and overhang the deep.
 See through her shores Trinacria's realms rebound,
 Starting and trembling at the bellowing sound;
 High-towering o'er the waves the mountains ride,
 And clash with floating mountains on the tide.
 But when blue Neptune from his car surveys,
 And calms at one regard the raging seas;
 Stretch'd like a peaceful lake the deep subsides,
 And o'er the level light the galley glides.
 The poet's art and conduct we admire,
 When angry Vulcan rolls a flood of fire;
 When on the groves and fields the deluge preys,
 And wraps the crackling stubble in the blaze.
 Nor less our pleasure, when the flame divides,
 And climbs aspiring round the cauldron's sides;
 From the dark bottom work the waters up,
 Swell, boil, and hiss, and bubble to the top.
 Thus in smooth lines, smooth subjects we rehearse,
 But the † rough rock roars in as rough a verse.
 If gay the subject, gay must be the song;
 And the brisk numbers quickly glide along:
 When the fields flourish; or the skies unfold
 Swift from the flying hinge their gates of gold.
 If sad the theme, then each grave line moves slow,
 The mournful numbers languishingly flow,
 And drag, and labour, with a weight of woe:
 If e'er the boding bird of night, who mourns
 O'er ruins, desolation, graves, and urns,
 With piercing screams the darkness should invade,
 And break the silence of the dismal shade.
 When things are small, the terms should still be so:
 For low words please us, when the theme is low.
 But when some giant, horrible and grim,
 Enormous in his gait, and vast in every limb,

* Most of these examples are drawn word for word from Virgil.

† ——— "Sonat hæc de nære capinâ

Littera."

Vid. Persium,

Stalks towering on; the swelling words must rise
In just proportion to the monster's size.
If some large weight his huge arms strive to shove,
The verse too labours; the throng'd words scarce
move

When each stiff clod beneath the ponderous plough,
Crumbles and breaks; th' encumber'd lines march
flow.

Nor less; when pilots catch the friendly gales,
Unfurl their shrouds, and hoist the wide-stretch'd
sails.

But if the poem suffers from delay,
Let the lines fly precipitate away.

And when the viper issues from the brake;
Be quick; with stones, and brands, and fire, attack
His rising crest, and drive the serpent back.

When night descends: or, stunn'd by numerous strokes,

And groaning, to the earth drops the vast ox;
The line too sinks with correspondent sound,
Flat with the steer, and headlong to the ground.

When the wild waves subside, and tempests cease,
And hush their roarings and their rage to peace;
So oft we see the interrupted strain

Stopp'd in the midst,—and with the silent main,
Pause for a space—at last it glides again.

When Priam strains his aged arm, to throw
His unavailing javelin at the foe;

(His blood congeal'd, and every nerve unstrung,)

Then with the theme compiles the artful song;
Like him the solitary numbers flow

Weak, trembling, melancholy, stiff, and flow.

Not so young Pyrrhus, who with rapid force
Beats down embattled armies in his course;

The raging youth on trembling Ilion falls,
Bursts her strong gates, and shakes her lofty walls;

Provokes his flying courser to his speed,
In full career to charge the warlike steed;

He piles the field with mountains of the slain;
He pours, he storms, he thunders through the plain.

In this the poet's justest conduct lies;

When with the various subjects he complies,

To sink with judgment, and with judgment rise.

We see him now, remissive of his force,

Glide with a low, and inoffensive course;

Stript of the gaudy dress of words he goes,

And scarcely lifts the poem up from prose:

And now he brings with loosen'd reins along

All in a full career the boundless song;

In wide array luxuriantly he pours

A crowd of words, and opens all his stores.

The lavish eloquence redundant flows,

Thick as the fleeces of the winter-snows,

When Jove invests the naked Alps, and sheds

The silent tempest on their hoary heads.

Sometimes the godlike fury he restrains,

Checks his impetuous speed, and draws the reins;

Balance'd and pois'd, he neither sinks nor soars,

Ploughs the mid space, and steers between the shores,

And shaves the confines;—till all dangers past,

He shoots with joy into the port at last.

For what remains unsung; I now declare

What claims the poet's last and strictest care.

When all adventures past, his labours tend

In one continued order to their end;

When the proud victor on his conquest smiles,
And sate enjoys the triumph of his toils;
Let him by timely diffidence be aw'd,
Nor trust too soon th' unpolish'd piece abroad.

Oh! may his rash ambition ne'er enflame
His breast, with such a dangerous thirst of fame!

But let the terror of disgrace controul

The warm, the partial fondness of his soul;

And force the bard to throw his passion by,

Nor view his offspring with a parent's eye:

Till his affections are by justice cross'd,

And all the father in the judge is lost.

He seeks his friends, nor trusts himself alone;

But asks their judgment, and resigns his own;

Begs them, with urgent prayers, to be sincere,

Just and exact, and rigidly severe;

Due verdict to pronounce on every thought,

Nor spare the slightest shadow of a fault;

But, bent against himself, and strictly nice;

He thanks each critic that detects a vice;

Though charg'd with what his judgment can defend,

He joins the partial sentence of his friend.

The piece thrown by; the careful bard reviews

The long-forgotten labours of his muse:

Lo! on all sides far different objects rise,

And a new prospect strikes his wondering eyes,

Warm from the brain, the lines his love engross,

Now in themselves their former selves are lost.

Now his own labours he begins to blame,

And blushing reads them with regret and shame.

He lothes the piece; condemns it; nor can find

The genuine stamp, and image of his mind.

This thought and that, indignant he rejects;

When most secure, some danger he suspects;

Anxious he adds, and trembling he corrects.

With kind severities, and timely art,

Lops the luxuriant growth of every part;

Prunes the superfluous boughs, that wildly stray;

And cuts the rank redundancies away.

Thus arm'd with proper discipline he stands,

By day, by night, applies his healing hands,

From every line to wipe out every blot,

Till the whole piece is guiltless of a fault.

Hard is the task, but needful, if your aim

Tends to the prospect of immortal fame.

If some unfinish'd numbers limp behind,

When the warm'd poet rages unconfin'd,

Then when his swift invention scorns to stay,

By a full tide of genius whirl'd away;

He brings the sovereign cure their failings claim,

Confirms the sickly, and supports the lame.

Oft as the seasons roll, renew thy pain,

And bring the poem to the test again.

In different lights th' expression must be rang'd,

The garb and colours of the words be chang'd.

With endless care thy watchful eyes must pierce,

And mark the parts distinct of every verse.

In this persist; for oft one day denies

The kind assistance which the next supplies;

As oft, without your vigilance and care,

Some faults detected by themselves appear.

And now a thousand errors you explore,

That lay involv'd in mantling clouds before.

Oft, to improve his muse, the bard should try,

By turns, the temper of a different sky.

For thus his genius takes a different face
From every different genius of a place.
The soul too changes, and the bard may find
A thousand various motions in his mind.
New gleams of light will every moment rise,
While from each part the scattering darkness flies.
And, as he alters what appears amiss,
He adds new flowers to beautify the piece.
But here, ev'n here, avoid th' extreme of such,
Who with excess of care correct too much :
Whose barbarous hands no calls of pity bound,
While with th' infected parts they cut the sound,
And make the cure more dangerous than the wound.

Till, all the blood and spirits drain'd away,
The body sickens, and the parts decay ;
The native beauties die, the limbs appear
Rough and deform'd with one continued scar.
No fix'd determin'd number I enjoin,
But when some years shall perfect the design ;
Reflect on life ; and, mindful of thy span,
Whose scanty limit bounds the days of man,
Wide o'er the spacious world, without delay,
Permit the finish'd piece to take its way ;
Till all mankind admires the heavenly song,
The theme of every hand and every tongue.
See ! thy pleas'd friends thy spreading glory draws,
Each with his voice to swell the vast applause ;
The vast applause shall reach the starry frame,
No years, no ages, shall obscure thy fame,
And earth's last ends shall hear thy darling name.
Shall we then doubt to scorn all worldly views,
And not prefer the raptures of the muse ?

Thrice happy bards ! who taught by heaven,
obey

These rules, and follow where they lead the way ;
And hear the faithful precepts I bestow'd, Inspir'd with rage divine, and labouring with the god.

But art alone, and human means must fail,
Nor these instructive precepts will prevail,
Unless the gods their present aid supply,
And look with kind indulgence from the sky.
I only pointed out the paths that lead
The panting youth to steep Parnassus' head ;
And show'd the tuneful muses from afar,
Mix'd in a solemn choir, and dancing there.
Thither forbidden by the fates to go,
I sink and grovel in the world below.
Deterr'd by them, in vain I labour up,
And stretch these hands to grasp the distant top.
Enough for me, at distance if I view
Some bard, some happier bard, the path pursue ;
Who, taught by me to reach Parnassus' crown,
Mounts up, and calls his slow companions on.
But yet these rules, perhaps, these humble lays,
May claim a title to a share of praise ;
When, in a crowd the gathering youths shall hear
My voice and precepts with a willing ear ;
Close in a ring shall press the listening throng,
And learn from me to regulate their song.
Then, if the pitying fates prolong my breath,
And from my youth avert the dart of death ;
Whene'er I sink in life's declining stage,

Trembling and fainting on the verge of age,
To help their wearied master shall they run,
And lend their friendly hands to guide him on ;
Through blooming groves his tardy progress wait,
And set him gently down at Phœbus' gate,
The while he sings, before the hallow'd shrine,
The sacred poets, and the tuneful nine.
Here then in Roman numbers will we rise,
And lift the fame of Virgil to the skies ;
Ausonia's pride and boast ; who brings along
Strength to my lines, and spirit to my song :
First how the mighty bard transported o'er
The sacred muses from th' Aonian shore ;
Led the fair sisters to th' Hesperian plains,
And sung in Roman towns the Grecian strains ;
How in his youth to woods and groves he fled,
And sweetly tun'd the soft Sicilian reed ;
Next, how, in pity to th' Ausonian swains,
He rais'd to heaven the honours of the plains ;
Rapt in Triptolemus's car on high,
He scatter'd peace and plenty from the sky ;
Fir'd with his country's fame, with loud alarms,
At last he rous'd all Latium up to arms ;
In just array the Phrygian troops bestow'd,
And spoke the voice and language of a god.
Father of verse ! from whom our honours spring ;
See ! from all parts, our bards attend their king ;
Beneath thy banners rang'd, thy fame increase,
And rear proud trophies from the spoils of Greece.
Low, in Elysian vales, her tuneful throng
Bow to thy laurels, and adore thy song :
On thee alone thy country turns her eyes ;
On thee her poets future fame relies.
See ! how in crowds they court thy aid divine
(For all their honours but depend on thine) ;
Taught from the womb thy numbers to rehearse,
And sip the balmy sweets of every verse.
Unrival'd bard ! all ages shall decree
The first unenvy'd palm of fame to thee ;
Thrice happy bard ! thy boundless glory flies,
Where never mortal must attempt to rise ;
Such heavenly numbers in thy song we hear,
And more than human accents charm the ear !
To thee, his darling, Phœbus' hands impart
His soul, his genius, and immortal art.
What help or merit in these rules are shown,
The youth must owe to thy support alone.
The youth, whose wandering feet with care I led Aloft, o'er steep Parnassus' sacred head ;
Taught from thy great example to explore [fore.
Those arduous paths which thou hast trod be-
Hail, pride of Italy ! thy country's grace !
Hail, glorious light of all the tuneful race !
For whom we weave the crown, and altars raise ;
And with rich incense bid the temples blaze ;
Our solemn hymns shall still resound thy praise.
Hail, holy bard, and boundless in renown !
Thy fame, dependent on thyself alone,
Requires no song, no numbers but thy own.
Look down propitious, and my thoughts inspire ;
Warm my chaste bosom with thy sacred fire !
Let all thy flames with all their raptures roll,
Deep in my breast, and kindle all my soul !

THE LIFE OF BLAIR.

OF the personal history of BLAIR, few particulars are known; and those few are such as give little scope for amplification and embellishment.

The life of a country clergyman, constantly engaged in the duties of his profession, the practice of the domestic virtues, and the occupations of literature, however respectable such a character may be, can afford but slender materials for biography.

The facts stated in the present account, were communicated to the compiler of this collection, in conversation with his son, Robert Blair, Esq., Solicitor General to his Majesty for Scotland, and his cousin, the learned and amiable Dr. Blair, one of the ministers of the High Church, and Professor of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, in the University of Edinburgh.

These authorities are produced by the present writer with much pleasure; as it gives him, at once, an opportunity of reflecting on the hereditary love of literature and distinguished politeness of Mr. Solicitor General; and of recording his obligations to the venerable director of his youthful studies; whose well-established reputation can suffer no diminution from the testimony of a grateful pupil, to the merit of his "Academical prelections," which constitute an æra in the history of Scottish literature; nor easily receive addition from the highest praise he can bestow on his "productions for the pulpit," which display the powers of a wise, and the acquisitions of a cultivated mind, in recommending the spirit of a pure and enlightened religion to every order of mankind; and exhibit to the literary world, a model of sound and elegant instruction, and of simple and persuasive eloquence, unprecedented in the history of that species of composition in our country.

Robert Blair was the eldest son of the Rev. David Blair, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, and Chaplain to the King. His mother was ——— Nisbet, daughter of ——— Nisbet, Esq., of Carfin. His grandfather was the Rev. Robert Blair, one of the most distinguished Scottish clergyman in the time of the civil wars; a descendent of the ancient and respectable family of Blair of Blair in Ayrshire.

He was born about the beginning of this century; had the most liberal education in the University of Edinburgh, and afterwards was sent abroad by his father for his improvement, and spent some time on the continent. After undergoing the usual trials appointed by the church, he was ordained minister of Athelstaneford, in the county of East Lothian, Jan. 5, 1731, where he past the remainder of his life.

As his fortune was easy, he lived very much in the style of a gentleman, and was greatly respected by Sir Francis Kinloch, Baronet, of Gilmerton, patron of the parish, and by all the gentlemen in that neighbourhood. He was a man both of learning, and of elegant taste and manners. He was a botanist and florist, which he showed in the cultivation of his garden; and was also conversant in optical and microscopical knowledge, on which subjects he carried on correspondence with some learned men in England. He was a man of sincere piety, and very assiduous in discharging the duties of his clerical function. As a preacher, he was serious and warm, and discovered the imagination of a poet.

He married Isabella Law, daughter of Mr. Law of Elvingston, and sister to the present sheriff-depute of East-Lothian, a lady of uncommon beauty and amiable manners. With her father, who had been professor of moral philosophy, in the University of Edinburgh, who was his relation, and had been left one of his tutors, he had been long and intimately connected; and, upon occasion of his death, which happened several years before his marriage with his daughter, he wrote and printed a funeral Poem to his Memory, which is thought worthy of being preserved; and is accordingly inserted in this collection.

By his lady, who survived him several years, he had five sons and one daughter; of these sons, Robert Blair, Esq., of Avington, Solicitor General to his Majesty for Scotland, is the fourth. His brother, Mr. Archibald Blair, was also a clergyman, and was settled in a parish near him in East Lothian. One of his sons, nephew to the poet, Robert Blair, M. D., is one of the Commissioners of the Sick and Wounded in London, and well known for his skill in optics and astronomy.

He died of a fever, on the 4th of February, 1746, in the 47th year of his age; and was succeeded in his living at Athelstaneford, by another poet, Mr. John Home, the celebrated author of "Douglas."

This is all that is known of Blair; an accomplished scholar, and an elegant poet, whose genius and virtue, though celebrated by some of the most eminent of his poetical contemporaries, have suffered such unmerited neglect, that his name is not to be found in any collection of literary biography.

Had the interesting correspondence of Watts been given to the world by his friend and biographer Dr. Jennings, it would probably have furnished many particulars relating to Blair, which might have gratified curiosity; though they could hardly have added to the honour which his talents and virtues have received from the esteem of a man, who has left behind him such purity of character, and such monuments of laborious piety.

The friends of Blair were the friends of science and of virtue; his love of poetry and polite literature, procured him the friendship of Watts, a polite scholar, and devout poet; no less remarkable for his genius and learning, than the mildness and fervency of his piety: And his passion for natural history, obtained him the correspondence of the famous naturalist, Henry Baker, Esq., Fellow of the Royal Society, an intelligent, upright, and benevolent man, who was particularly attentive to all the improvements which were made in natural science, and very solicitous for the prosecution of useful discoveries. Besides the papers written by himself in the "Philosophical Transactions," he was the means, by his extensive correspondence, of conveying to the Society, the intelligence and observations of other inquisitive and philosophical men. Like Blair, he was both a poet and a naturalist; and printed a volume of "Original Poems, serious and humorous," 8vo, 1725. He was the author likewise of "The Universe, a poem," which has been several times reprinted. But his principal publications are, "The Microscope made easy," 1742; and "Employment for the Microscope," which have gone through many editions, and are generally known. Having led a very useful and honourable life, he died Nov. 25, 1774, being then above seventy years of age. By his wife Sophia, youngest daughter of the celebrated De Foe, he had a son, David Erskine Baker, Esq., author of the "Muse of Ossian;" a dramatic poem, of three acts, performed at Edinburgh, 1763; and "The Companion to the Play Muse, 2 vols., 12mo, 1764, a work that has since been considerably improved by Mr. Reed, under the title of the "Biographica Dramatica," 2 vols. 8vo, 1781. His letters to Blair, are in the possession of Mr. Solicitor General.

With Dr. Doddridge, a man whose learning was respected by Warburton and Newton, and whose piety was venerated by Lyttleton and West, he also cultivated a correspondence; probably through the kindness of Watts, or the good offices of their common friend, Colonel James Gardiner, who was slain at the battle of Prestonpans, Sept. 21, 1745; and affectionately commemorated by Dr. Doddridge, in "Some remarkable passages in his life," published in 1747.

The following letter, dated Athelstaneford, Feb. 25, 1741-2, and inserted in the "Epistolary Correspondence of Dr. Doddridge," published by the Rev. Mr. Stedman of Shrewsbury, 1790, exhibits an advantageous specimen of his temper and disposition, and contains some interesting information relating to the composition and publication of The Grave.

"You will be justly surpris'd with a letter from one whose name is not so much as known to you: nor shall I offer to make an apology. Though I am entirely unacquainted with your person, I am no stranger to your merit as an author; neither am I altogether unacquainted with your personal character, having often heard honourable mention made of you by my much respected and worthy friends, Colonel Gardiner, and Lady Frances. About ten months ago, Lady Frances did me the favour to transmit to me some manuscript hymns of yours, with which I was wonderfully delighted. I wish I could, on my part, contribute in any measure to your entertainment, as you have sometimes done to mine in a very high degree. And that I may show how willing I am to do so, I have desired Dr. Watts to transmit to you a manuscript poem of mine, intituled The Grave, written, I hope, in a way not unbecoming my profession as a minister of the gospel, though the greatest part of it was composed several years before I was clothed with so sacred a character. I was urged by some friends here, to whom I showed it, to make it public; nor did I decline it, provided I had the approbation of Dr. Watts, from whom I have received many civilities, and for whom I had ever entertained the highest regard. Yesterday I had a letter from the Doctor, signifying his approbation of the piece in a manner most obliging. A great deal less from him would have done me no small honour. But at the same time he mentions to me that he had offered it to two booksellers of his acquaintance, who, he tells me, did not care to run the risk of publishing it. They can scarce think (considering how critical an age we live in, with respect to such kind of writings) that a person living three hundred miles from London, could write so as to be acceptable to the fashionable and polite. Perhaps it may be so; though, at the same time I must say, in order to make it more generally liked, I was obliged sometimes to go cross to my own inclination, well knowing, that whatever poem is written upon a serious argument, must, upon that very account, be under peculiar disadvantages; and, therefore, proper arts must be used to make such a piece go down with a licentious age, which cares for none of those things. I beg pardon for breaking in upon moments precious as yours, and hope you will be so kind as to give me your opinion of the poem."

The difficulties stated by Watts in the above letter, probably prevented the publication of The Grave during its author's lifetime. The earliest edition of it, which the present writer has seen, is that printed at Edinburgh, in 8vo, 1747. At the end is a translation of a pious ode of Volusenus; but of no value. The subsequent editions are too numerous to be specified. To the edition in 8vo, 1786, is added Gray's "Elegy in a Country Church-yard," with "notes moral, critical and explanatory." The notes are in general trifling and insipid. It is now, with the Poem to the memory of Mr. Law, received, for the first time, into a collection of classical English poetry.

The variations from the common editions, are printed from the original MS., 1741-2, in the possession of Mr. Solicitor General, communicated for the use of this edition. The reading in the printed copies has in general so much the appearance of improvement, and so consonant to the style of the poem, that it is probable it might be the result of a revision, subsequent to the date of the MS. Some verbal transpositions, of little importance, are not copied.

If Blair had written nothing else but this single poem, it is alone sufficient to entitle him to a classical distinction among the poets of our country. But the poem to the memory of Mr. Law, inserted in this collection by the favour of Dr. Blair, is no inconsiderable addition to his fame. It is evidently a juvenile performance, the tribute of affection and esteem to the merits of a friend; and justly chargeable, in some instances, with incorrectness of language, and incongruity of imagery: but the style is simple and beautiful; and the sentiments, though sometimes trite, are expressed with a tenderness and energy not unworthy of the author of The Grave. The apostrophe to Mrs. Law, in particular, is pathetic and pleasing; and the abrupt transition to the final conflagration of the universe, approaches to sublimity.

The Grave, his greatest work, amply establishes his fame. It is a production of real genius, and possesses a merit superior to many pieces of the very first celebrity. It is composed of a succession of unconnected descriptions, and of reflections that seem independent of one another, interwoven with striking allusions, and digressive sallies of imagination. It is a series of pathetic representations, without unity of design, variegated with imagery and allusion; which exhibit a wide display of original poetry. The poet's eye is awake on the objects of creation, and on the scenes of human misery; and he is alive to every feeling of compassion and benevolence. Through a shade of melancholy, which peculiar impressions of religion throw over the scenes he describes, we always perceive an amiable and generous principle struggling to overcome the degeneracy which it deplores. Whatever subject is either discussed or aimed at, he always endeavours to melt the heart, and alarm the conscience, by pathetic description and serious remonstrances; and his sentiments are always delivered in a novel and energetic manner, that impresses them strongly on the mind. He is always moral, yet never dull; and though he often expands an image, yet he never weakens its force. If the same thought occurs, he gives it a new form; and is copious without being tiresome. He writes under the strong impression of Christian and moral truths. Conviction gives force to imagination; and he dips his pen in the stream that religion has opened in his own bosom.

His imagination, excursive and vigorous, sometimes exceeds the bounds that criticism prescribes. Possessing strong powers of ridicule as well as fancy, he passes too suddenly from grave and serious description, to irony and satire. Instances of this improper association too frequently occur, and the grave and ludicrous destroy one another.

But the defects of The Grave bear a very small proportion to its beauties; and its beauties are of no common account. They are happily conceived and forcibly expressed. His language is the natural and unforced result of his conceptions. Anxious only to give each image its due prominence and relief, he has wasted no unnecessary attention on grace or embellishment; the diction, therefore, though seldom splendid, is always vigorous and animated, and carries the thought home to the heart with inexpressible energy. His versification is almost as singular as the materials upon which it is employed; sometimes careless and prosaic, and sometimes strikingly elegant and harmonious; resembling sometimes the best manner of Shakspeare and Rowe, and sometimes that of Milton and Young; but without any marks of servile imitation. Amidst such a profusion of beautiful and striking passages that are to be found in this singular poem, it is difficult to confirm these general remarks by particular quotations.

After a solemn introduction, the following striking passage appears.

The wind is up: hark! how it howls! Methinks
Till now I never heard a sound so dreary:
Doors creak, and windows clap, and night's foul bird,
Rook'd in the spire, screams loud: the gloomy ailes
Black plaster'd, and hung round with shreds of 'scutcheons
And tatter'd coats of arms, send back the sound
Laden with heavier airs, from the low vaults,
The mansions of the dead.—Rous'd from their slumbers,
In grim array the grisly spectres rise,
Grin horrible, and obstinately sullen,
Pass and repass, hush'd as the foot of night.
Again the screech-owl shrieks: ungracious sound!
I'll hear no more; it makes one's blood run chill.

The following picture is very fine and natural:

Oft, in the lone church-yard at night I've seen,
By glimpse of moon-shine chequering through the trees,
The school-boy with his satchel in his hand,
Whistling aloud to bear his courage up,
And lightly tripping o'er the long flat stones,
(With nettles skirted, and with moss o'ergrown,)—
That tell in homely phrase who lie below.
Sudden he starts, and hears, or thinks he hears
The sound of something purring at his heels;
Full fast he flies, and dares not look behind him,
Till out of breath he overtakes his fellows;
Who gather round, and wonder at the tale
Of horrid apparition, tall and ghastly,
That walks at dead of night, or takes his stand
O'er some new open'd grave; and (strange to tell!)
Evanesces at crowing of the cock.

This pleasing picture is finely contrasted by the affecting one, which immediately follows it:

The new-made widow——
Sad sight! flow moving o'er the prostrate dead,
Listless, she crawls along in doleful black,
While bursts of sorrow gush from either eye,

Fast falling down her now untasted cheek.
 Prone on the lowly grave of the dear man
 She drops; whilst busy meddling memory,
 In barbarous succession musters up
 The past endearments of their softer hours,
 Tenacious of its theme. Still, still she thinks
 She sees him, and indulging the fond thought,
 Clings yet more closely to the senseless turf;
 Nor heeds the passenger who looks that way.

In the above description there are many minute strokes, her now untasted cheek—busy meddling memory, &c., which mark the superior poet.

From the apostrophe to Friendship, which immediately follows, the heart catches sympathetic feelings; and the amiable poet leaves on it the impression of all that is tender, generous, and endearing. There is beautiful description, and much poetical enthusiasm in the following lines.

————— Oh! when my friend and I
 In some thick wood have wander'd heedless on,
 Hid from the vulgar eye, and sat us down
 Upon the sloping cowslip-cover'd bank,
 Where the pure limpid stream has slid along
 In grateful errors through the under-wood,
 Sweet murmuring; methought the shrill-tongu'd thrush
 Mended his song of love; the looty blackbird
 Mellow'd his pipe, and soften'd every note:
 The eglantine smell'd sweeter, and the rose
 Assum'd a dye more deep; whilst ev'ry flower
 Vied with its fellow plant in luxury
 Of drefs.—Oh! then, the longest summer's day
 Seem'd too, too much in haste: still the full heart
 Had not imparted half: 'twas happiness
 Too exquisite to last.—————

The following passage strongly reminds us of Shakspeare, and is equal to any of the most admired moral parts of that wonderful dramatist.

Dull grave! thou spoil'st the dance of youthful blood,
 Strik'st out the dimple from the cheek of mirth,
 And ev'ry smirking feature from the face;
 Branding our laughter with the name of madness.
 Where are the jesters now? the men of health
 Complexionally pleasant? Where the droll,
 Whose ev'ry look and gesture was a joke
 To clapping theatres and shouting crowds,
 And made ev'n thick-lip'd musing melancholy
 To gather up her face into a smile
 Before she was aware? Ah! fullen now,
 And dumb as the green turf that covers them.

The description of a funeral, beginning, But see the well-plum'd berse, &c. has the beauties and defects of the same admirable writer. The apostrophe to Beauty is a masterly passage; as are those on the death of the Strong Man, the Philosopher, and the Physician. This expression in the last reminds us of Milton.

————— From stubborn shrubs
 Thou wring'st their shy retiring virtues out,
 And vex'd them in the fire—————

The Sexton will be readily recognised as a relation of the grave-digger in Hamlet.

————— hoary-headed chronicle,
 Of hard unmeaning face, down which ne'er stole
 A gentle tear; with mattock in his hand

THE LIFE OF BLAIR.

Digs through whole rows of kindred and acquaintance,
By far his juniors.—Scarce a skull's cast up,
But well he knew its owner, and can tell
Some passage of his life.—

The following comparison, applied to time, is happily imagined.

Yet treads more soft than e'er did midnight thief,
Who slides his hand under the miser's pillow,
And carries off his prize—

The hand of Shakspeare could not possibly have gone higher, or have touched a situation with greater nicety.

Few similes can exceed the following for elegant simplicity. Among the various tenants of the grave, he enumerates

—The long-demurring maid,
Whose lonely unappropriated sweets
Smil'd, like yon knot of cowslips on the cliff,
Not to be come at by the willing hand.

Another simile, near the end of the poem, where he mentions the aversion even of the good to death, beginning, So have I seen upon a summer's eve, is natural and striking.

In Blair, it is difficult to discover any material traces of imitation, or even to conjecture who were his favourites among the poets of his country. His style of composition is his own, and his versification peculiar to himself. He undoubtedly, however, possessed a taste for our elder poets, the ancient wells of English undefiled, from whom he probably learned the energy, character, and truth of composition, and the genuine language of verse; particularly the frequent use of compound epithets, which are the life of a language, and in which our own is far from being deficient.

Blair, describing the death of a good man, says:

By unperceiv'd degrees he wears away,
Yet like the sun seems larger at his setting.

The last line is evidently borrowed from Quarles; a writer of true poetical genius, and of exemplary virtue, unjustly neglected.

Brave minds oppress'd, should (in dispirit of fate)
Looke greatest (like the sunne) in lowest state.—Job. Milt.

The testimonies to the merits of Blair are few, when compared with his deserts. The Grave, though it is written in a style that might well delight the learned, and deserve the attention of the writers of verse, yet has never been mentioned, till very lately, in any critical work, nor imitated in any poetical composition. "The Task" of Cowper, an ingenious and truly original performance, resembles it only in the singular combination of pathetic description, comic humour, and serious remonstrance. Its popularity, however, must be allowed as an unquestionable authority in its favour; for by the judgment of the common, unprejudiced, unpedantic reader, the merit of every poetical composition must be ultimately decided.

Mr. Pinkerton, the learned and ingenious editor of the "Ancient Scottish Poems, &c." was the first who celebrated the merits of Blair, and subjected The Grave to the examination of criticism; which, though somewhat too general and indiscriminate, merits attention.

"I know not, says Mr. Pinkerton," that he wrote any thing else; but The Grave is worth a thousand common poems. The language is such as Shakspeare would have used; yet he no where imitates Shakspeare, or uses any expression of his. It is frugal and chaste; yet, upon occasion, highly poetical, without any appearance of research. It is unquestionably the best piece of blank verse we have, save those of Milton."

THE GRAVE.

The House appointed for all Living.—JOB.

WHILST some affect the sun, and some the shade,
Some flee the city, some the hermitage;
Their aims as various, as the roads they take
In journeying through life;—the task be mine
To paint the gloomy horrors of the tomb;
Th' appointed place of rendezvous, where all
These travellers meet.—Thy succours I implore,
Eternal king! whose potent arm sustains
The keys of hell and death.—The grave, dread thing!

Men shiver when thou'rt nam'd: Nature appall'd,
Shakes off her wonted firmness.—Ah! how dark
Thy long-extended realms, and rueful wastes!
Where nought but silence reigns, and night, dark night,

Dark as was chaos, ere the infant sun
Was roll'd together, or had try'd his beams
Athwart the gloom profound.—The sickly taper,
By glimm'ring through thy low-brow'd misty vaults,

(Furr'd round with mouldy damps, and ropy slime)
Lets fall a supernumerary horror,

And only serves to make thy night more irksome.

Well do I know thee by thy trusty yew,
Cheerless, unsocial plant; that loves to dwell
'Midst skulls and coffins, epitaphs, and worms:

Where light-heel'd ghosts, and visionary shades,
Beneath the wan cold moon (as fame reports)
Embody'd, thick, perform their mystic rounds.
No other merriment, dull tree, is thine.

See yonder hallow'd fane;—the pious work
Of names once fam'd, now dubious or forgot,
And bury'd 'midst the wreck of things which were;
There lie interr'd the more illustrious dead.
The wind is up: hark! how it howls! Methinks

Dead men have come again, and walk'd about;

Worn on the edge of days the brass consumes,
The busto moulders, and the deep-cut marble,
Unsteady to the steel, give up its charge.
Ambition, half convicted of her folly,
Hangs down the head, and reddens at the tale.

Here all the mighty troublers of the earth, 209
Who swam to sov'reign rule through seas of blood;
Th' oppressive, sturdy, man-destroying villains,
Who ravag'd kingdoms, and laid empires waste,
And in a cruel wantonness of power
Thinn'd states of half their people, and gave up
To want the rest; now, like a storm that's spent,
Lie hush'd, and meanly sneak behind the covert.
Vain thought! to hide them from the gen'ral scorn
That haunts and dogs them like an injur'd ghost
Implacable.—Here too the petty tyrant,
Whose scant domains geographer ne'er notic'd, 220
And, well for neighbouring grounds, of arm as short,

Who fix'd his iron talons on the poor,
And gripp'd them like some lordly beast of prey;
Deaf to the forceful cries of gnawing hunger,
And piteous plaintive voice of misery;
(As if a slave was not a shred of nature,
Of the same common nature with his lord);
Now tame and humble, like a child that's whipp'd,
Shakes hands with dust, and calls the worm his kinsman;

Nor pleads his rank and birthright. Under ground
Precedency's a jest; vassal and lord, 231
Grossly familiar, side by side consume.

When self-esteem, or others adulation,
Would cunningly persuade us we were something
Above the common level of our kind, [ry,
The grave gainsays the smooth complexion'd flatt'-
And with blunt truth acquaints us what we are.

Beauty—thou pretty play-thing, dear deceit,
That steals so softly o'er the stripling's heart,
And gives it a new pulse, unknown before, 240
The grave discredits thee: thy charms expung'd,
Thy roses faded, and thy lilies soil'd,
What hast thou more to boast of? Will thy lovers
Flock round thee now, to gaze and do thee homage?

Methinks I see thee with thy head low laid,
Whilst surfeited upon thy damask cheek
The high fed worm, in lazy volumes roll'd,
Riots unscar'd.—For this, was all thy caution?
For this, thy painful labours at thy glass? 247
T' improve those charms, and keep them in repair,
For which the spoiler thanks thee not. Foul feeder,
Coarse fare and carrion please thee full as well,
And leave as keen a relish on the sense. ^{his}
Look how the fair one weeps!—the conscious tears
Stand thick as dew-drops on the bells of flow'rs:
Honest effusion! the swell'd heart in vain
Works hard to put a gloss on its distress.

Strength too—thou surly, and less gentle boast
Of those that loud laugh at the village ring;
A fit of common sickness pulls thee down 260
With greater ease, than e'er thou didst the stripling
That rashly dar'd thee to th' unequal fight.
What groan was that I heard?—deep groan indeed!
With anguish heavy laden; let me trace it:
From yonder bed it comes, where the strong man,
By stronger arm belabour'd, gasps for breath
Like a hard-hunted beast. How his great heart
Beats thick! his roomy chest by far too scant
To give the lungs full play.—What now avail
The strong-built sinewy limbs, and well-spread shoulders? 270

See how he tugs for life, and lays about him,
Mad with his pain!—Eager he catches hold
Of what comes next to hand, and grasps it hard,
Just like a creature drowning; hideous sight!
Oh! how his eyes stand out, and stare full ghastly!
While the distemper's rank and deadly venom
Shoots like a burning arrow cross his bowels,
And drinks his marrow up.—Heard you that groan?

It was his last.—See how the great Goliath,

Just like a child that brawl'd itself to rest, 280
Lies still—What mean'st thou then, O mighty
boaster, [bull,

To vaunt of nerves of thine? what means the Unconscious of his strength, to play the coward,
And flee before a feeble thing like man;
That, knowing well the slackness of his arm,
Trusts only in the well-invented knife?

With study pale, and midnight vigils spent,
The star-surveying sage close to his eye
Applies the sight-invigorating tube;
And travelling through the boundless length of space, 290

Marks well the courses of the far-seen orbs
That roll with regular confusion there,
In ecstasy of thought. But ah! proud man,
Great heights are hazardous to the weak head;
Soon, very soon thy firmest footing fails;
And down thou dropp'st into that darksome place,
Where nor device nor knowledge ever came.

Here the tongue-warrior lies disabled now,
Disarm'd, dishonour'd, like a wretch that's gagg'd
And cannot tell his ails to passers by. 300
Great man of language,—whence this mighty change,

This dumb despair, and drooping of the head?
Though strong persuasion hung upon thy lip,
And sly insinuation's softer arts
In ambush lay about thy flowing tongue;
Alas! how chop-fall'n now! Thick mists and silence
Rest, like a weary cloud, upon thy breast
Unceasing.—Ah! where is the lifted arm,
The strength of action, and the force of words,
The well-turn'd period, and the well-tun'd voice,
With all the lesser ornaments of phrase? 311
Ah! fled for ever, as they ne'er had been,
Raz'd from the book of fame: or, more provoking,
Perchance some hackney hunger-bitten scribbler
Insults thy memory, and blots thy tomb
With long flat narrative, or duller rhymes,
With heavy halting pace that drawl along;
Enough to rouse a dead man into rage,
And warm with red resentment the wan cheek.

Here the great masters of the healing-art, 320
These mighty mock defrauders of the tomb,
Spite of their juleps and catholicons,
Resign to fate—Proud Æsculapius' son!
Where are thy boasted implements of art,
And all thy well-cramm'd magazines of health?
Nor hill nor vale, as far as ship could go,
Nor margin of the gravel-bottom'd brook,
Escap'd thy rifling hand;—from stubborn shrubs
Thou wrung'st their sky-retiring virtues out,
And vex'd them in the fire: nor fly nor insect,
Nor writhy snake, escap'd thy deep research. 331
But why this apparatus? why this cost?

Tell us, thou doughty keeper from the grave,
Where are thy recipes and cordials now,
With the long list of vouchers for thy cures?
Alas! thou speakest not.—The bold impostor
Looks not more silly, when the cheat's found out.

Here the lank-sided miser, worst of felons
Who meanly stole, (discreditable shift),
From back, and belly too, their proper cheer, 341
Eas'd of a tax it irk'd the wretch to pay

To his own carcase; now lies cheaply lodg'd,
By clam'rous appetites no longer teas'd,
Nor tedious bills of charges and repairs.
But ah! where are his rents, his comings-in?
Ay! now you've made the rich man poor indeed,
Robb'd of his gods, what has he left behind?
Oh cursed lust of gold; when for thy sake,
The fool throws up his int'rest in both worlds: 349
First starv'd in this, then damn'd in that to come.

How shocking must thy summons be, O death!
To him that is at ease in his possessions;
Who counting on long years of pleasure here,
Is quite unfurnish'd for that world to come?
In that dread moment, how the frantic soul
Raves round the walls of her clay tenement,
Runs to each avenue, and shrieks for help,
But shrieks in vain!—How wishfully she looks
On all she's leaving, now no longer her's!
A little longer, yet a little longer, 360
Oh! might she stay, to wash away her stains,
And fit her for her passage.—Mournful sight!
Her very eyes weep blood;—and every groan
She heaves is big with horror.—But the foe,
Like a staunch murd'rer, steady to his purpose,
Pursues her close through every lane of life,
Nor misses once the track, but presses on;
Till forc'd at last to the tremendous verge,
At once she sinks to everlasting ruin.

Sure 'tis a serious thing to die! my soul, 370
What a strange moment must it be, when near
Thy journey's end, thou hast the gulf in view!
That awful gulf, no mortal e'er repass'd
To tell what's doing on the other side.
Nature runs back, and shudders at the sight,
And every life-string bleeds at thoughts of parting;
For part they must: body and soul must part;
Fond couple; link'd more close than wedded pair.
This wings its way to its almighty source,
The witness of its actions, now its judge; 380
That drops into the dark and noisome grave,
Like a disabled pitcher of no use.

If death were nothing, and nought after death;
If when men dy'd, at once they ceas'd to be,
Returning to the barren womb of nothing,
Whence first they sprung, then might the debauchee Untrembling mouth the heavens:—then might the drunkard

Reel over his full bowl, and, when 'tis drain'd,
Fill up another to the brim, and laugh [wretch

More horrid yet to die by one's own hand.
Self-murder!—name it not: our island's shame,
That makes her the reproach of neighbouring states.
Shall nature, swerving from her earliest dictate
Self-preservation, fall by her own act?
Forbid it heaven.—Let not, upon disgust
The shameless hand be fully crimson'd o'er
With blood of its own lord.—Dreadful attempt!
Just reeking from self-slaughter, in a rage 411
To rush into the presence of our Judge;
As if we challeng'd him to do his worst,
And matter'd not his wrath!—Unheard-of tortures
Must be reserv'd for such: these herd together;
The common damn'd shun their society,
And look upon themselves as fiends less foul.
Our time is fix'd, and all our days are number'd;
How long, how short, we know not:—this we
know,

Duty requires we calmly wait the summons, 420
Nor dare to stir till Heaven shall give permission:
Like centries that must keep their destin'd stand,
And wait th' appointed hour, till they're reliev'd.
Those only are the brave that keep their ground,
And keep it to the last. To run away
Is but a coward's trick: to run away
From this world's ills, that at the very worst
Will soon blow o'er, thinking to mend ourselves,
By boldly vent'ring on a world unknown,
And plunging headlong in the dark;—'tis mad;
No frenzy half so desperate as this. 431

Tell us, ye dead; will none of you, in pity
To those you left behind, disclose the secret?
Oh! that some courteous ghost would blab it out;
What 'tis you are, and we must shortly be.
I've heard, that souls departed, have sometimes Forewarn'd men of their death:—'Twas kindly done

To knock, and give the alarm.—But what means
This stinted charity?—'Tis but lame kindness
That does its work by halves.—Why might you not Tell us what 'tis to die? do the strict laws 441
Of your society forbid your speaking
Upon a point so nice?—I'll ask no more:
Sullen, like lamps in sepulchres, your shine
Enlightens but yourselves. Well, 'tis no matter;
A very little time will clear up all,
And make us learn'd as you are, and as close.

Yet strange! the living lay it not to heart.
See yonder maker of the dead man's bed,
The Sexton, hoary-headed chronicle,
Of hard unmeaning face, down which ne'er stole
A gentle tear; with mattock in his hand
Digs through whole rows of kindred and acquaintance,

By far his juniors.—Scarce a skull's cast up,
But well he knew its owner, and can tell 459
Some passage of his life.—Thus hand in hand
The sot has walk'd with death twice twenty years;
And yet ne'er yonker on the green laughs louder,
Or clubs a smuttier tale:—When drunkards meet,
None sings a merrier catch, or lends a hand
More willing to his cup.—Poor wretch! he minds not,

That soon some trusty brother of the trade
Shall do for him what he has done for thousands.

On this side, and on that, men see their friends
Drop off, like leaves in autumn; yet launch out
Into fantastic schemes, which the long livers 470
In the world's hale and undegen'rate days
Could scarce have leisure for.—Fools that we are,
Never to think of death and of ourselves
At the same time: as if to learn to die
Were no concern of ours.—Oh! more than sottish,
For creatures of a day in gamesome mood,
To frolic on eternity's dread brink

Unapprehensive; when, for ought we know,
The very first swol'n surge shall sweep us in.
Think we, or think we not, time hurries on 480
With a resistless unremitting stream;

Yet treads more soft than e'er did midnight-thief,
That slides his hand under the miser's pillow,
And carries off his prize.—What is this world?

What? but a spacious burial-field unwall'd,
Strew'd with death's spoils, the spoils of animals
Savage and tame, and full of dead men's bones.
The very turf on which we tread once liv'd;

And we that live must lend our carcases
To cover our own offspring: In their turns 490
They too must cover theirs.—'Tis here all meet,

And celebrated masters of the balance,
Deep read in stratagems, and wiles of courts. 500
Now vain their treaty-skill:—Death scorns to treat;

Here the o'erloaded slave flings down his burden
From his gall'd shoulders;—and when the stern tyrant,

With all his guards and tools of power about him,
Is meditating new unheard-of hardships,
Mocks his short arm,—and quick as thought escapes
Where tyrants vex not, and the weary rest.

Here is the mother, with her sons and daughters:
The barren wife, and long-demurring maid,
Whose lonely unappropriated sweets

Not to be come at by the willing hand.

Here are the prude, severe, and gay coquette,
The sober widow, and the young green virgin,

Poor man!—how happy once in thy first state!
When yet but warm from thy great Maker's hand,
He stamp'd thee with his image, and, well pleas'd,

Sound was the body, and the soul serene;
Like two sweet instruments, ne'er out of tune,
That play their several parts.—Nor head, nor heart,
Offer'd to ache: nor was there cause they should;

For all was pure within: no fell remorse, 550
Nor anxious castings-up of what might be,
Alarm'd his peaceful bosom.—Summer seas
Show not more smooth, when kiss'd by southern winds

Just ready to expire—scarce importun'd,
The generous soil, with a luxurious hand,
Offer'd the various produce of the year,
And ev'ry thing most perfect in its kind.

Oh! slipp'ry state of things.—What sudden turns!
 What strange vicissitudes in the first leaf
 Of man's sad history!—To-day most happy,
 And ere to-morrow's sun has set, most abject.
 How scant the space between these vast extremes!
 Thus far'd it with our fire:—Not long h' enjoy'd
 His paradise.—Scarce had the happy tenant
 Of the fair spot due time to prove its sweets,
 Or sum them up, when strait he must be gone,
 Ne'er to return again.—And must he go? 570
 Can nought compound for the first dire offence
 Of erring man?—Like one that is condemn'd,
 Fain would he trifle time with idle talk,
 And parley with his fate.—But 'tis in vain.
 Not all the lavish odours of the place,
 Offer'd in incense, can procure his pardon,
 Or mitigate his doom.—A mighty angel,
 With flaming sword, forbids his longer stay,
 And drives the loiterer forth; nor must he take
 One last and farewell round.—At once he lost 580
 His glory, and his God.—If mortal now,
 And sorely maim'd, no wonder.—Man has sinn'd.
 Sick of his bliss, and bent on new adventures,
 Evil he would needs try: nor try'd in vain.
 (Dreadful experiment! destructive measure!
 Where the worst thing could happen, is success.)
 Alas! too well he sped:—the good he scorn'd
 Stalk'd off reluctant, like an ill-us'd ghost,
 Not to return;—or if it did, its visits,
 Like those of angels, short and far between: 590
 Whilst the black dæmon, with his hell scap'd train,
 Admitted once into its better room,
 Grew loud and mutinous, nor would be gone;
 Lording it o'er the man: who now too late
 Saw the rash error, which he could not mend:
 An error fatal not to him alone,
 But to his future sons, his fortune's heirs.
 Inglorious bondage!—Human nature groans
 Beneath a vassalage so vile and cruel,
 And its vast body bleeds through ev'ry vein. 600
 What havoc hast thou made, foul monster, sin!
 Greatest and first of ills.—The fruitful parent
 Of woes of all dimensions!—But for thee
 Sorrow had never been.—All-noxious thing,
 Of vilest nature!—Other sorts of evils

 And there it stops.—The big-swoln inundation,
 Of mischief more diffusive, raving loud,
 Buries whole tracks of country, threat'ning more;
 But that too has its shore it cannot pass.
 More dreadful far than those! sin has laid waste,
 Not here and there a country, but a world:
 Dispatching at a wide extended blow
 Entire mankind; and for their sakes defacing
 A whole creation's beauty with rude hands; 619
 Blasting the foodful grain and loaded branches,
 And marking all along its way with ruin.

 My father's nakedness, and nature's shame.
 Here let me pause, and drop an honest tear,
 One burst of filial duty and condolence,
 O'er all those ample deserts death hath spread,
 This chaos of mankind.—O great man-eater! 640
 Whose ev'ry day is carnival, not sated yet!
 Unheard-of epicure! without a fellow!
 The veriest gluttons do not always cram;
 Some intervals of abstinence are sought
 To edge the appetite: Thou seekest none.
 Methinks the countless swarms thou hast devour'd,
 And thousands that each hour thou gobblest up,
 This, less than this, might gorge thee to the full.
 But ah! rapacious still, thou gap'st for more:
 Like one, whole days defrauded of his meals, 650
 On whom lank hunger lays her skinny hand,
 And whets to keenest eagerness his cravings.
 As if diseases, massacres, and poison,
 Famine, and war, were not thy caterers.

But know, that thou must render up the dead,
 And with high int'rest too.—They are not thine
 But only in thy keeping for a season,
 Till the great promis'd day of restitution;
 When loud diffusive sound from brazen trump
 Of strong-lung'd cherub, shall alarm thy captives,
 And rouse the long, long sleepers into life, 661
 Day-light, and liberty.—
 Then must thy doors fly open, and reveal
 The mines that lay long forming under ground,
 In their dark cells immur'd; but now full ripe,
 And pure as silver from the crucible,
 That twice has stood the torture of the fire
 And inquisition of the forge.—We know
 Th' illustrious deliverer of mankind,
 The Son of God, thee foil'd.—Him in thy power
 Thou could'st not hold:—self-vigorous he rose,
 And shaking off thy fetters, soon retok 672

 Climb the aerial heights, and glide along 680
 Athwart the severing clouds: but the faint eye,
 Flung backwards in the chase, soon drops its hold;
 Disabled quite, and jaded with pursuing.
 Heaven's portals wide expand to let him in;
 Nor are his friends shut out: As a great prince

 But for his train.—It was his royal will,

 Start we at transient hardships in the way
 That leads to purer air, and softer skies,
 And a ne'er-setting sun?—Fools that we are!
 We wish to be, where sweets unwith'ring bloom;
 But strait our wish revoke, and will not go.
 So have I seen, upon a summer's ev'n,
 Fast by the riv'let's brink, a youngster play: 700
 How wishfully he looks to stem the tide!
 This moment resolute, next unresolv'd:
 At last he dips his foot; but as he dips,
 His fears redouble, and he runs away
 From th' inoffensive stream, unmindful now
 Of all the flow'rs that paint the further bank,
 And smil'd so sweet of late.—Thrice welcome

 Conducts us to our home, and lands us safe 709
 On the long-wish'd-for shore.—Prodigious change!
 Our bane turn'd to a blessing!—Death, disarm'd,
 Loses its fellness quite.—All thanks to him
 Who scourg'd the venom out.—Sure the last end
 Of the good man is peace!—How calm his exit!
 Night-dews fall not more gently to the ground,
 Nor weary worn-out winds expire so soft.

And ev'ry joint possess its proper place,
 With a new elegance of form, unknown
 To its first state.—Nor shall the conscious soul
 Mistake its partner, but amidst the crowd
 Singling its other half, into its arms
 Shall rush with all th' impatience of a man
 That's new come home, and, having long been absent,

With haste runs over ev'ry different room, 760
 In pain to see the whole. Thrice happy meeting!
 Nor time, nor death, shall ever part them more.
 'Tis but a night, a long and moonless night;
 We make the grave our bed, and then are gone.

Thus, at the shut of ev'n, the weary bird
 Leaves the wide air, and in some lonely brake
 Cows down, and dozes till the dawn of day,
 Then claps his well-fledg'd wings, and bears away.

VARIATIONS.

721. ——— seems larger as he sets.
 725. Whilst the glad gates of sight are stretched wide.

A POEM,

Dedicated to the Memory of the late Learned and Eminent
 MR. WILLIAM LAW,

PROFESSOR OF PHILOSOPHY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.

In silence to suppress my griefs I've try'd,
 And keep within its banks the swelling tide;
 But all in vain: unbidden numbers flow;
 Spite of myself, my sorrows vocal grow.

This be my plea—Nor thou, dear shade, refuse
 The well-meant tribute of the willing muse,
 Who trembles at the greatness of its theme,
 And fain would say what suits so high a name.

Which, from the crowded journal of thy fame,
Which of thy many titles shall I name?
For, like a gallant prince, that wins a crown,
By undisputed right before his own,
Variety thou hast: our only care
Is what to single out, and what forbear.

Though scrupulously just, yet not severe;
Though cautious, open; courteous, yet sincere;
Though rev'rend, yet not magisterial;
Though intimate with few, yet lov'd by all;
Though deeply read, yet absolutely free
From all the stiffnesses of pedantry:
Though circumspectly good, yet never sour;
Pleasant with innocence, and never more.
Religion worn by thee, attractive show'd,
And with its own unborrow'd beauty glow'd:
Unlike the bigot, from whose watery eyes
Ne'er sunshine broke, nor smile was seen to rise;
Whose sickly goodness lives upon grimace,
And pleads a merit from a blubber'd face.
Thou kept thy raiment for the needy poor,
And taught the fatherless to know thy door;
From griping hunger set the needy free;
That they were needy was enough to thee.

Thy fame to please, whilst others restless be,
Fame laid her shyness by, and courted thee;
And though thou bade the flatt'ring thing give o'er,
Yet, in return, she only woo'd thee more.

How sweet thy accents! and how mild thy look!
What smiling mirth was heard in all thou spoke!
Manhood and grizzled age were fond of thee,
And youth itself sought thy society.
The ag'd thou taught, descended to the young,
Clear'd up th' irresolute, confirm'd the strong;
To the perplex'd thy friendly counsel lent,
And gently lifted up the diffident;
Sigh'd with the sorrowful, and bore a part
In all the anguish of a bleeding heart:
Reclaim'd the headstrong, and with sacred skill,
Committed hallow'd rapes upon the will;
Sooth'd our affections, and, with their delight,
To gain our actions, brib'd our appetite.

Now who shall, with a greatness like thy own,
Thy pulpit dignify, and grace thy gown?
Who with pathetic energy like thine,
The head enlighten, and the heart refine!
Learn'd were thy lectures, noble the design,
The language Roman, and the action fine;
The heads well rang'd, the inferences clear,
And strong and solid thy deductions were: [wrong,
Thou mark'd the bound'ries out 'twixt right and
And show'd the land-marks as thou went along.
Plain were thy reasonings, or if perplex'd
Thy life was the best comment on thy text;
For if in darker points we were deceiv'd,
'Twas only but observing how thou liv'd.

Bewilder'd in the greatness of thy fame,
What shall the muse, what next in order name?
Which of thy social qualities commend?
Whether of husband, father, or of friend!
A husband soft, beneficent and kind,
As ever virgin wish'd, or wife could find;
A father indefatigably true
To both a father's trust and tutor's too.
A friend affectionate and staunch to those
Thou wisely singled out; for few thou chose;

Few, did I say, that word we must recal,
A friend, a willing friend thou wast to all.
Those properties were thine, nor could we know
Which rose the uppermost, so all was thou.
So have I seen the many-colour'd mead,
Brush'd by the vernal breeze, its fragrance shed:
Though various sweets the various field exhal'd,
Yet could we not determine which prevail'd,
Nor this part rose, that boney-suckle, call,
But a rich bloomy aggregate of all.

And, thou, the once glad partner of his bed,
But now by sorrow's weeds distinguished,
Whose busy memory thy grief supplies,
And calls up all thy husband to thine eyes;
Thou must not be forgot. How alter'd now!
How thick thy tears! How fast thy sorrows flow!
The well known voice that cheer'd thee heretofore,
These soothing accents, thou must hear no more.
Untold by all the tender sighs thou drew,
When on thy cheek he fetch'd a long adieu.
Untold be all thy faithful agonies,
At the last anguish of his closing eyes:
For thou, and only such as thou, can tell
The killing anguish of a last farewell.

This earth, yon sun, and these blue-tinctur'd
skies,
Through which it rolls, must have their obsequies:
Pluck'd from their orbits, shall the planets fall,
And smoke and conflagration cover all:
What then is man? The creature of a day,
By moments spent, and minutes borne away.
Time, like a raging torrent, hurries on;
Scarce can we say it is, but that 'tis gone.

Whether, fair shade! with social spirits, tell
(Whose properties thou once describ'd so well),
Familiar now thou hearest them relate
The rites and methods of their happy state.
Or if, with forms more fleet, thou roams abroad,
And views the great magnificence of God,
Points out the courses of the orbs on high,
And counts the silver wonders of the sky;
Or if, with glowing seraphim, thou greets
Heav'n's King, and shoutest through the golden streets,

That crowds of white-rob'd choristers display,
Marching in triumph through the pearly way?
Now art thou rais'd beyond this world of cares,
This weary wilderness, this vale of tears,
Forgetting all thy toils and labours past,
No gloom of sorrow stains thy peaceful breast.
Now 'midst seraphic splendours shalt thou dwell,
And be what only these pure forms can tell.
How cloudless now, and cheerful is thy day!
What joys, what raptures, in thy bosom play!
How bright the sunshine, and how pure the air!
I here's no difficulty of breathing there.

With willing steps, a pilgrim at thy shrine,
To dew it with my tears the task be mine;
In lonely dirge, to murmur o'er thy urn,
And with new gather'd flowers thy turf adorn:
Nor shall thy image from my bosom part,
No force shall rip thee from this bleeding heart:
Oft shall I think o'er all I've left in thee,
Nor shall oblivion blot thy memory:
But grateful love its energy express
(The father's gone) now to the fatherless,
